The existing Regulations for collecting the revenue of Government, from persons holding lands in farm of Government, are adequate to the collections.

6.—Are the existing Regulations for enabling the zemindars and proprietors of land, and farmers of land holding their farms immedaitely of Government, to realize their rents from their under farmers and from their ryots, well calculated for the purposes intended, without, at the same time, affording to the proprietors and farmers of land the means of oppressing their under farmers and ryots?

The Regulations, which have been issued for the benefit of the landholders, have answered the purposes intended; and so far from enabling the landholders to oppress the ryots, that where they are inclined to be refractory, and withhold their rents, a considerable delay unavoidably happens in the collection of the revenues, owing to the ryots instituting frivolous and vexatious complaints in the Munsiffs and Darogahs Courts, established by Regulations 22 and 40, of 1793; who are too apt, either from a spirit of intrigue, or not knowing the extent of the authority delegated to them, to take cognizance of causes which do not come within their jurisdiction; to prevent which, they ought not to be allowed to receive complaints of abusive language used by the zemindars officers, until the ryots shall have paid the demands which have been the subject of contest. The provisions laid down by Section 12, Regulation VII. A. D. 1799, discountenancing all litigious suits tending to create embarrassment and delay in the collections, cannot be enforced against the lower classes of ryots, whose chief aim is to cause delay and embezzle the crops, and who have not the means of paying the damages incurred by the landholders. Many of the ryots would rather live a life of confinement than of liberty and labour; it is therefore no punishment.

7.—When were you appointed Collector of the district; and has its cultivation been improved and extended since the first year of the Decennial Settlement, and in what degree? What proportion do you suppose the uncultivated land in your district now bears to the cultivated land?

I was appointed to the Collectorship of Rungpore on the 2d of October 1795. With respect to the cultivation, it varies in some degree, agreeable to the season, but has certainly increased since the first year of the Decennial Settlement. The proportion of cultivated land is seven-eighths, and the uncultivated land one-eighth.

8.—Do the proprietors of estates, in general, derive a profit exceeding the 10 per cent. on the jumma, the profit estimated to be left to them on the conclusion of the Decennial Settlement?

At the time of the formation of the Decennial Settlement, many of the zemindars did not accept the malikannah, or allowance of 10 per cent. on the jumma; but in lieu thereof obtained, with the concurrence of Government, Pattebutta lands. Most of the estates yield to the proprietors considerably more than 10 per cent. profit on the jumma, and the few which are not at present capable of yielding this allowance, to the mismanagement of the proprietors or their agents it must be attributed.

9.—What is the present state of the embankments in your district?

The embankments required in this district are few, and those are but in an indifferent state of repair.

10.—Do the proprietors of land, in general, attend to the permanent improvement of their estates, by making of embankments, digging of tanks, and establishing such other works as are calculated to increase the produce of their lands?

Except a few tanks for religious purposes, the zemindars have not, to my knowledge, dug any; neither do I think, from the low situation of the country, that it would tend to increase the produce of their estates. The proprietors have not attended to the making of embankments, from the great expense they would incur by it. To make the embankments efficient would, in some of the estates, require more than the annual rent they at present yield; should, however, embankments he made, they would greatly improve the value of the lands.

11.—Have the proprietors of lands conducted themselves with more moderation, and with greater attention to the principles of good faith, in their transactions with their ryots, since the establishment of the permanent settlement, than was observed by the proprietors of land in general, previously to the conclusion of that

that settlement; and is the situation and condition of the ryots, or immediate cultivators of the soil, in every respect, as comfortable as can be expected?

The proprietors in general have behaved with greater moderation towards their ryots; who, for the most part, are so well acquainted with the protection afforded them by the Regulations, that, were the landholders inclined, there are but few instances in which they could oppress them. Their situation is consequently rendered more comfortable than previous to the formation of the Decennial Settlement.

12.—What is the state of the roads in your district? Are there any parts of the district, the making of roads through which would be particularly beneficial to the country, and what would be the expense attending the works?

Where the country is not subjected to inundations, the old causeways have been kept in tolerable repair; but in low situations they are in a very bad state; so much so, that in many places, there are scarcely any vestiges of a road. There is one road to Dinagepore, which, from the last heavy rains, is a little out of repair; besides which, there are two or three roads leading to the different indigo factories, made also by the prisoners, under the superintendance of the gentlemen to whom the factories belong, in a very good state of repair. The roads which I would recommend to be made, as essentially requisite, are, in the first instance, one from Cooch Behar to Rungpore, by way of Mogulhaut. The computed distance between Cooch Behar, and Mogulhaut, is 26 miles, and from thence to Rungpore 24 miles; in all 50. Admitting 250 prisoners, with the assistance of 100 coolies, at the rate of rupees 128 per diem, to complete one mile; the sum required to make the road between this and Cooch Behar, would be sicca rupees 625. The second road is to the military station of Deby Dobah, distant 52 miles, 30 of which is, from the high situation of the country, very good; the remainder may be completed at the same allowance per mile, amounting to sicca rupees 275. The third road is from the town of Rungepore to Gouind Gunge, distant 50 miles, which may be completed at the same rate per mile, amounting to sicca rupees 682. 8. The fourth road is to Chilmary, a place of great resort, distant 52 miles, which, during the rains, is impassable, from the old causeways having been entirely neglected, the expense of which would be sicca rupees 650. These calculations do not include bridges; instead of which I would recommend, that bridges of boats should be constructed over the large creeks and nullahs, which might, at the close of the rains, be removed, and the sides of the creeks and nullahs sloped, which would answer every purpose, and be but a trifling expense when compared with other descriptions of bridges. The roads being once formed, the landholders should be authorized to summon the attendance of the ryots, to make such repairs as may be necessary, which would be no hardship to them during the months of October and November, when they have little to do; and that either the Judge or Collector assisting, be deputed on the part of Government to report the state of the roads. The expense of labour, for making the roads above-mentioned, amounts to sicca rupees 2,262. 8. to which a trifling allowance must be made for bamboes and baskets for conveying the earth, and mats, bamboes, and twine, for temporary jails.

13.—What is the estimated number of the inhabitants of your district; and what proportion is it supposed the Mahomedans bear to the Hindoos?

The inhabitants of this district are computed at four lacs. The Mahomedans exceed the Hindoos, in what proportion cannot be ascertained.

14.—What are the most valuable articles of produce in your district; and has the cultivation of them particularly increased of late years? What is supposed to be the cause of that increase?

Sugar-cane and tobacco being the most lucrative to the cultivators, are the most valuable products of the district, and have greatly increased since the prohibition of opium, which was before the most valuable.

15.—Are the stamp duties becoming more productive; and what sum do you expect those duties will produce in your district, in the present year?

The stamp duties are becoming more productive. The receipts of last year were S.R^{s} 4,256. 4. and I expect will this year yield S.R^{s} 9,000, inclusive of the allowance granted to the Collector for the sale thereof.

16.—Are the abkaree collections increasing or decreasing?

The abkaree collections are decreasing, owing to the high rates at present assessed on them.

17.—Are there any articles in your district, on which a productive tax might be levied, without oppression to the people; name the articles, rate of tax, and the manner in which you would propose it to be levied?

I am of opinion that the re-establishment of the sayer would be productive of beneficial consequences both to Government and the country at large. The bazars and hauts are declining fast, for want of the protection which was formerly afforded while under the management of the zemindars, whose interest it was to guard the property brought into the markets; and in the event of the ryots not finding immediate sale for their articles, they were left under the care of the zemindars officers until the next market day: at present, they are often obliged to sell them at an under valuation, or return with them to their homes. I would therefore recommend, that the landholders be allowed to farm the markets of Government at the amount for which deductions were granted them in their engagements, making them responsible for any undue exaction, after a table of rates shall have been established. If, however, the re-establishment of the sayer on the gunges and hauts should not meet the approbation of Government, a duty of ½ per cent. on all exports of tobacco, sugar, sugar-candy and goor, mustard-seed, oil, and raw silk; and a duty of 2½ per cent. on coarse cloths and cotton might be levied by officers appointed for that purpose, at the principal places resorted to by merchants of the neighbouring districts.

No. 1.—part 2.

Answers by the COLLECTORS.

Rungpore, 6 January 1802.

18.—What are the descriptions of rent-free lands in your district; and what proportion does the produce of the rent-free lands bear to the jumma of the lands which pay revenue to Government?

The grants of lands in this district are of the description of Dewutter, Bermutter, Mohutterah, Peer Paul, Khanna Baurie, and Attar Budshare. The proportion which the produce of the rent-free lands bears to the jumma of lands paying revenue to Government is one-eighth, exclusive of Cooch Behar.

19.—Which of the description of lands are in the best cultivation; the rent-free lands, or the lands which pay revenue to Government?

The charity lands in Cooch Behar are in a far more flourishing state, while those in this district are equally so with the lands paying revenue to Government.

20.—What descriptions of old rupees are current in your district?

The 19 old sun Moorshedabad sicca, the French Arcot, and the Narraing rupees (the coinage of Cooch Behar) are current in this district.

21.—What is the reason that these rupees continue in circulation, and how are they replaced as they become worn and diminished in value; the 19 sun sicca rupees being the only description of rupees struck in the provinces, and that being the rupee in which the public revenue ought to be paid?

One reason for the 19 old sun Moorshedabad and the French Arcot rupees continuing in circulation, is their never having been wholly called in; another is, the advantages derived by the shroffs on the batta, which fluctuates from 2 to 4 per cent. on the Arcots, and from 1 to 1½ on the Moorshedabad old suns; and which are received at par in the interior parts of the district, in mercantile transactions. The amount of Arcot rupees in circulation in this district may be computed at 350,000, and the old 19 suns at about 300,000.

22.—What rules would you recommend to be adopted for the purpose of introducing the 19 sun sicca rupees into general circulation, and of rendering it advantageous to all persons to reject any other description of rupees?

With a view to prevent any other than the 19 sun sicca rupee being in general circulation, I would recommend that the landholders be permitted to pay their revenue into the public treasury in the specie collected on their estates, making good to Government any deficiency in weight. The advantages which such a measure would secure to the ryots, must ultimately be great. At present, for want of a sufficient number of the new milled siccas, a very considerable part of the rents are collected in the above-mentioned currency; exchanged by the shroffs at the discount of the day, and the difference made good by the ryots to their landlords. These rupees are bought by the merchants, and again circulated by them in the country, to the great detriment of the ryots.

23.—Do gold mohurs circulate in your district; to what extent, and do they pass at par, that is, for the value of 16 sicca rupees, when tendered for the purchase of goods; in payment of private debts and public demands, it is, of course, received at the rate which the law requires?

The annual average amount of gold mohur paid into the public treasury, is 28,000, and in constant circulation, about 30,000. They pass at par, in the purchase of goods, as well as in the payment of public and private debts.

24.—Has the establishment of the currency of the gold mohur in the interior of the country operated beneficially or otherwise?

The establishment of the gold mohurs has been beneficial to the traders and merchants, but not so to the lower class of people, from their poverty, and the difficulty they meet in exchanging them for smaller coins.

25.—What progress has been made by you in preparing the Quinquennial Register of lands paying revenue to Government, and the Quinquennial Register of lands held exempt from the payment of revenue?

The Quinquennial Register of lands paying revenue to Government, account 1202 B.S. has been prepared, and submitted to the Board of Revenue; the account 1197 B. S. is now in readiness, and the draught account, 1207 B. S. is also prepared, but has not been transcribed, the establishment of one native clerk being inadequate to the discharge of the current business. I expect this register also will be furnished in the course of a month, together with the general Pergunnah Register directed to be prepared under Section 4, Regulation VIII. A. D. 1800. The Quinquennial Register of lands held exempt from the payment of revenue still remains incomplete; the period for the registry and receipt of grants specified in Section 19 of the above-mentioned Regulation not having expired, and the grantees availing themselves of it.

26.—What description of persons are in general the purchasers of the lands disposed of by public sale in your district; and is the system of management of those purchasers regulated by principles better calculated for the permanent improvement of those estates, than the system of management of the former proprietors?

The

The description of persons by whom lands have been purchased are, the dependents of landholders, the dependents of Europeans, servants of the judicial and criminal courts, some, but very few ryots, and a few zemindars. Many of the purchasers have attended more to the improvement of their estates than the former proprietors.

27.—Are you of opinion that any of the proprietors of lands in your district would purchase of Government the permanent remission of any part of the fixed jumma assessed upon their lands (suppose a proportion of 10 or 20 per cent. of that jumma); and how many years purchase do you suppose the proprietors would offer for such remission?

I am of opinion that very few would purchase the permanent remission of any part of the fixed revenue, and those few would not give more than three or four years purchase. The only persons who are sufficiently affluent in this district to purchase remissions, are the Rajah of Cooch Behar, and the zemindars of Bahaibund and Pattledeo.

28.—What is your opinion as to the effect which the disposal of a proportion of the jumma, in the manner proposed in the preceding question, (supposing the arrangement to be carried into effect to the greatest practicable extent) would produce on the general improvement of the country?

In the event of the disposal of a portion of the jumma, as above-mentioned, I do not think it would be productive of beneficial improvement to the country, as the landholders obtaining remissions would be too apt to indulge their native indolence, become inattentive to their own interest, and by allowing the ryots to fall into arrears, incur great losses, which would, by the adoption of rigorous measures, be rendered irrecoverable, as a general desertion of the ryots would ensue.

Rungpore, 6th January 1802.

(Signed) Alexr Wright, Collector.

(Shahabad.)

To GEORGE DOWDESWELL, Esq.

Secretary to the Government, Revenue and Judicial Department.

SIR,

IN obedience to the orders contained in Mr. Secretary Edmonstone's Letter of the 21st ultimo, I have the honour to submit Answers to the Queries therein inclosed, for the consideration of the Honourable the Vice President in Council.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your most obedient humble servant,

Shahabad, 20 Nov. 18101.

(Signed) J. Deane, Collector.

1.—Are the crops of the present year expected to be productive?

The crops of the present year are expected to be very productive.

2.—What is the amount of the balances outstanding in your district on account of the past year; and what is the state of the collections for the present year?

The balances of this district for the past year amount to S.R^{s} 32,519. 7. 17. The balances of the present year is S.R^{s} 47,318. 1. 5.

3.—What is the amount of the jumma of the lands which have been or are expected to be sold in your district for realizing the balances of the past year; and have the lands disposed of sold at a favourable price, or otherwise; and if the latter, what is the cause of the unfavourableness of the sales?

The amount of the jumma of the lands which have been sold for the balances of the present year is S.R^{s} 13,657, that of the lands expected to be sold on the same account is S.R^{s} 32,800. The lands disposed of have sold at a favourable price.

4.—Are the existing Regulations for collecting the revenue of Government, from the zemindars and other proprietors of lands with whom a permanent settlement has been concluded, well calculated to secure the punctual collection of the public revenue, without, at the same time, affecting the security or value of landed property?

They are well calculated to secure the punctual collection of the public revenue, without, at the same time, affecting the security or value of landed property.

5.—Are the existing Regulations for collecting the revenue of Government, from persons holding lands in farm immediately of Government, calculated to secure the punctual collection of the public revenue from the farmers?

They are.

6.—Are the existing Regulations for enabling the zemindars and other proprietors of land, and farmers of land holding their farms immediately of Government, to realize their rent from their under farmers and from their ryots, well calculated for the

No. 1.—part 2.

Answers by the COLLECTORS.

Shahabad, 20 November 1801.

purposes intended, without, at the same time, affording to the proprietors and farmers of land, the means of oppressing their under farmers and ryots?

They probably are not.

7.—When were you appointed Collector of the district; and has its cultivation been improved and extended since the first year of the Decennial Settlement, and in what degree? What proportion do you suppose the uncultivated land in your district now bears to the cultivated land?

I was appointed Collector of this district in September 1797. Its cultivation has been improved and extended, since the first year of the Decennial Settlement, very considerably. The proportion which the uncultivated land now bears to the cultivated is as one to four, exclusive of the hills which form the southern boundary.

8.—Do the proprietors of estates, in general, derive a profit exceeding the ten per cent. on the jumma, the profit estimated to be left to them on the conclusion of the Decennial Settlement?

The proprietors of estates, in general, derive a profit on the jumma, which may, I think, be estimated at least at 40 per cent.

9.—What is the present state of the reservoirs in your district?

The reservoirs are, at present, in a state of extreme decay.

10.—Do the proprietors of land, in general, attend to the permanent improvement of their estates, by the making of embankments, digging of tanks, and establishing such other works as are calculated to increase the produce of their lands?

Generally speaking, they do not.

11.—Have the proprietors of land conducted themselves with more moderation, and with greater attention to the principles of good faith, in their transactions with their ryots, since the establishment of the permanent settlement, than was observed by the proprietors of land, in general, previously to the conclusion of that settlement; and is the situation and condition of the ryots or immediate cultivators of the soil, in every respect, as comfortable as can be expected?

The proprietors of land conduct themselves, from necessity, with more moderation, but not with greater attention to the principles of good faith, in their transactions with their ryots, since the settlement, than before. The situation of the ryots, or immediate cultivators, is as comfortable as can be expected.

12.—What is the state of the roads in your district? Are there any parts of the district, the making of roads through which would be particularly beneficial to the country, and what would be the expense attending the work?

The state of the roads in this district is very good. Roads leading to the several ghauts, on the banks of the Ganges, would be highly beneficial to the country. The expense may be estimated at 1,000 rupees per mile.

13.—What is the estimated number of the inhabitants of your district; and what proportion is it supposed the Mahomedans bear to the Hindoos?

I have no accurate data whereon to estimate the number of inhabitants; but suppose the population to amount to two millions at least. The proportion of Mahomedans to Hindoos I conceive to be one-twentieth.

14.—What are the most valuable articles of produce in your district; and has the cultivation of them particularly increased of late years? What is supposed to be the cause of that increase?

The most valuable articles of produce in this district are opium, tobacco, cotton, sugar, indigo, and hemp. Their cultivation (excepting sugar) is greatly increased; owing chiefly to increased population, a long peace, and the more general employment of large capitals in trade, which were formerly vested in landed securities.

15.—Are the stamp duties becoming more productive; and what sum do you expect those duties will produce in your district, in the present year?

The stamp duties are becoming more productive; I estimate the amount of the present year's receipts at sicca rupees 12,000.

16.—Are the abkarry collections increasing or decreasing?

The abkarry collections are increasing.

17.—Are there any articles in your district on which a productive tax might be levied without oppression to the people; name the articles, the rate of tax, and the manner in which you would propose it to be levied?

The most productive tax which appears to me free from the objection of oppressing the people, is a tax on horned cattle, at the rate of two annas per head per annum, to be collected by the Collector for a commission of five per cent.

18.—What are the descriptions of rent-free lands in your district; and what proportion does the produce of the rent-free lands bear to the jumma of the lands which pay revenue to Government?

The descriptions of rent-free lands are those specified in the Regulations of Government. I have not yet had leisure sufficient to ascertain what proportion their produce bears to the jumma of the lands which pay revenue to Government.

19.—Which

19.—Which of these descriptions of lands are, in general, in the best state of cultivation, the rent-free lands, or the lands which pay revenue to Government?

The lands which pay revenue to Government, are indisputably in the best state of cultivation.

Shahabad, 20 November 1801.

20.—What descriptions of old rupees are current in your district?

The old rupee generally current throughout this district, is the Benares 17 sun sicca rupee.

21.—What is the reason that these rupees continue in circulation, and how are they replaced as they become worn and diminished in value; the 19 sun sicca rupee being the only description of rupee struck, in which the public revenue ought to be paid?

The reason why this rupee continues in circulation, is, as I am informed, that the superior intrinsic value of the 19 sun sicca, struck in the provinces, affords a considerable profit in recoining into the 17 sun sicca struck at Benares. From the Benares mint they are replaced. The public revenue is payable in gold.

22.—What rules would you recommend to be adopted for the purpose of introducing the 19 sun sicca rupees into general circulation, and of rendering it advantageous to all persons to reject any other description of rupee?

For the purpose of introducing the 19 sun sicca rupee into general circulation, and of rendering it advantageous to all persons to reject any other description of rupee, I would recommend that the Benares mint be put a stop to, or the intrinsic value of the 19 sun sicca reduced.

23.—Do gold mohurs circulate in your district, and to what extent; and do they pass at par, that is, for the value of 16 sicca rupees when tendered for the purchase of goods; in payment of private debts and public demands, it is of course received at the rate which the law requires?

Gold mohurs do circulate in this district. It is not very easy to say, to what extent. They do not pass at par when tendered for the purchase of goods.

24.—Has the establishment of the currency of the gold mohur, in the interior of the country, operated beneficially or otherwise?

The currency of the gold mohur has been highly beneficial.

25.—What progress has been made by you in preparing the Quinquennial Register of lands paying revenue to Government, and the Quinquennial Register of the lands held exempt from the payment of revenue?

Copies of the Quinquennial Register of lands paying revenue to Government have been completed. Little progress has been made in the Register of the lands held exempt from the payment of revenue in this district.

26.—What descriptions of persons are, in general, purchasers of the lands disposed of by public sale in your district; and is the system of management of those purchasers regulated by principles better calculated for the permanent improvement of those estates, than the system of management of the former proprietors?

Zemindars residing in the district, are principally the purchasers of lands at public sales. Their system in their new purchases does not vary from that in their former possessions.

27.—Are you of opinion, that any of the proprietors of the lands in your district, would purchase of Government the permant remission of any part of the fixed jumma assessed upon their lands (suppose a proportion of 10 or 20 per-cent. of that jumma); and how many years purchase do you suppose the proprietors would offer for such remission?

I doubt much if any of the proprietors of land in this district, would purchase of Government the permanent remission of the fixed jumma assessed on their lands. If any such should be found, I conceive, the utmost extent of their offers would not exceed two years amount of their jumma.

28.—What is your opinion as to the effect which the disposal of a proportion of the jumma, in the manner proposed in the preceding question (supposing the arrangement to be carried into effect to the greatest practicable extent) would produce on the general improvement of the country?

The result of such a measure, would, I conceive, be detrimental, as may be inferred from the present state of the lakheraje lands. The natural indolence of the people seems to require some powerful incitement to exertion, independent of pecuniary advantage.

Shahabad, 20th Nov. 1801.

(Signed) J. Deane, Coll^r.

No. 1.—part 2.

Answers by the COLLECTORS.

(Zillah Sarun.)

To N. B. EDMONSTONE, Esq. Secretary to Government.

Zillah Sarun, 30 December 1801.

SIR,

I HAVE the honour to enclose my Answers to the Governor General's Interrogatories, which I request you will lay before his Lordship.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your most obedient servant,
(Signed) J. R. Elphinstone,
Coll^r.

Zillah Sarun,
30th Dec. 1801.

QUESTIONS.—1.—Are the crops of the present year expected to be productive?

ANSWERS.—The crops of the present year, I have every reason to believe, will be exceedingly productive.

2.—What is the amount of the balances outstanding in your district on account of the past year, and what is the state of the collections for the present?

The balances outstanding in this district for the last year, 1208 F. S. amount to S.R^s 5,000, but I have every hope of realizing the whole in the course of a month; the revenue of the present year is, in general, regularly paid.

3.—What is the amount of the jumma of the lands which have been or are expected to be sold in your district, for realizing the balances of the past year, and have the lands disposed of, sold at a favourable price or otherwise; and if the latter, what is the cause of the unfavourableness of the sales?

The amount of the jumma of the only lands which have been or will be sold, is 1,517 R^s. The lands have sold very favourably.

4.—Are the existing Regulations for collecting the revenue of Government from the zemindars and other proprietors of land, with whom a permanent settlement has been concluded, well calculated to secure the punctual collection of the public revenue, without, at the same time, affecting the security or value of landed property?

The Regulations, in my opinion, are perfectly well calculated to secure the collection of the public revenue, without, in the least degree, affecting the security of landed property.

5.—Are the existing Regulations for collecting the revenue of Government from persons holding lands in farm immediately from Government, calculated to secure the punctual collections of the public revenue from the farmers?

The Regulations for collecting the revenue from farmers, are, I think, very well calculated to secure the punctual collection of the revenue.

6.—Are the existing Regulations for enabling the zemindars and other proprietors of land, and farmers of land holding their farms immediately of Government, to realize their rents from their under farmers, and from their ryots, well calculated for the purpose intended, without, at the same time, affording to the proprietors and farmers of land, the means of oppressing their under farmers and ryots?

The Regulations for enabling zemindars and farmers, &c. to realize their rents from their under farmers, &c. are, in my opinion, perfectly well calculated for the purposes intended, without affording them the means of oppressing their under farmers and ryots.

7.—When were you appointed Collector of the district; and has its cultivation been improved and extended since the first year of the Decennial Settlement, and in what degree? What proportion do you suppose the uncultivated land in your district, now bears to the cultivated land?

I was appointed Collector of this district on the 16th March 1801. The cultivation, in my opinion, has certainly been improved and extended very much since the first year of the Decennial Settlement; I should suppose where 60 biggahs in 100 were in cultivation formerly, that 80 or more is now in that state.

8.—Do the proprietors of estates, in general, derive a profit of ten per cent. on the jumma; the profit estimated to be left to them on the conclusion of the Decennial Settlement?

I am of opinion that the proprietors, in general, derive much more than ten per cent. on the jumma, with the exception of a few in pergunnah Cusmur, whose lands have suffered by the encroachment and overflowing of the rivers.

9.—What is the present state of the reservoirs and embankments in your district?

The reservoirs are, in general, in good order; the embankments are chiefly in the pergunnahs of Goah, Muckair, Sepah, Dunsgsee, Nurhun, and Cusmur, and will require some repair before the setting in of the rainy season.

10.—Do the proprietors of land, in general, attend to the permanent improvement of their estates by the making of embankments, digging tanks, and establishing such other works as are calculated to increase the produce of their land?

The zemindars, for the most part, look only to what advantages they can immediately derive from their estates, and it very rarely occurs that any of them endeavour to improve them for the benefit of their posterity; there are, however, some instances where the proprietors prietors of land have raised embankments at their own expense, and have thereby rendered their estates more productive by preserving their crops from inundation.

11.—Have the proprietors of lands conducted themselves with more moderation, and with greater attention to the principles of good faith, in their transactions with their ryots, since the establishment of the permanent settlement, than was observed by the proprietors of land previously to the conclusion of that settlement; and is the situation and condition of the ryots or immediate cultivators of the soil, in every respect, as comfortable as can be expected?

The proprietors of lands, in my opinion, have certainly conducted themselves with more moderation to their ryots, &c. since the conclusion of the Decennial Settlement; and I am convinced that the situation and condition of the ryots and cultivators of the soil, is, in every respect, more comfortable than it formerly was.

12.—What is the state of the roads in your district? Are there any parts of the district, the making of roads through which would be particularly beneficial to the country; and what would be the expense attending the work?

The roads in this district (except those in the vicinity of Cheeprah, which are annually kept repaired by the Magistrate) are in a very bad state, being scarcely any thing more than paths leading from one village to another. The merchants who trade from the eastward to Benares, Oude, and Napaul, would certainly derive great benefit if some roads were made and kept in proper order; namely, from Hadgeepore to the Dewah river, from Chuprah to the frontiers of Napaul, and from Mehesy to Durouly. The roads could be established and kept in repair with a very little trouble and at a trifling expense, without subjecting Government to any charge; as the zemindars ever have been, and still are, bound by their engagements to repair and maintain the roads in their respective zemindarries.

13.—What is the estimated number of inhabitants in your district; and what proportion is it supposed the Mahomedans do bear to the Hindoos.

From records in my office, the estimated number of inhabitants in this district amounts to nearly 1,204,000; of which, I suppose, not more than one-fourth are Mahomedans.

14.—What are the most valuable articles of production in your district, and has the cultivation of them particularly increased of late years; what is supposed to be the cause of that increase?

The most valuable articles produced in this district, are opium, tobacco, saltpetre, barley, wheat, flax, peas, linseed, and a small quantity of cotton; the poppy has increased within these last three or four years, owing in a great measure to the activity of the agent.

15.—Are the stamp duties becoming more productive; and what sum do you expect those duties will produce in your district, in the present year?

The stamp duties, I do not think are increasing. I expect they will produce about 9,000 R^s this year.

16.—Are the abkarry collections increasing, or decreasing?

The abkarry collections were, last year, 47,000 rupees. I expect them to be near 60,000 this year.

17.—Are there are any articles in your district on which a productive tax might be levied, without oppression to the people; name the articles, the rate of tax, and the manner in which you would propose it to be levied?

There are no articles produced in this district, on which, in my opinion, any tax could be levied.

18.—What are the descriptions of rent-free lands in your district; what proportion does the produce of the rent-free lands bear to the jumma of the lands which pay revenue to Government?

There are eight descriptions of rent free lands in this district; namely, Aymah, Alkungall, Muddud Maash, Jaghier, Bishenpreet, Burmotur, Sershekun. The proportion of rent-free land is, I imagine, ten biggahs in the hundred.

19.—Which of these descriptions of lands are, in general, in the best state of cultivation; the rent free lands, or the lands which pay revenue to Government?

The lands which pay revenue to Government are, in my opinion, in the best state of cultivation.

20.—What description of old rupees are current in your district?

There are six descriptions of rupees at present current in this district; 1st. folea, the 8th and 9th sun, which is almost equal to the 19 sun, this was the rupee formerly current throughout the whole of this district. 2d. The milled rupee, in which the revenue is paid. 3d. The old 19 sun. 4th. The Moorshedabad 11th and 12th sun. 5th. sonats. And, 6th. The becce.

21.—What is the reason that these rupees continue in circulation, and how are they replaced as they become worn and diminished in value; the 19th sun sicca rupee being the only description of rupee struck in the provinces, and that being the rupee in which the public revenue ought to be paid.

The 19th sun milled sicca rupees and gold mohurs are the only coins in which the revenues of Government are received; but these coins are rarely to be met with in the country;

No. 1.—part 2.

Answers by the COLLECTORS.

Zillah Sarun, 30 December 1801.

country; those mentioned in my Answer to the last Question being the only ones in circulation; all the new rupees and gold mohurs being exclusively in the hands of the bankers. The zemindar receives his rents from the farmers and cultivators in the old rupees above mentioned, which he forwards to his agent at Chuprah, who exchanges them at an arbitrary batta with the bankers for the new rupees, with which he pays his revenue into the treasury. The merchants, who purchase grain, &c. from the cultivators, pay for the different articles with the old rupees, which are by these means kept up in constant circulation. The bankers also, when any zemindar or other person requires loans, make their advances in old rupees, though they take particular care to specify the new ones in the bond. It is also reported, but with what degree of accuracy I cannot take upon myself to determine, that the bankers transmitted large quantities of new rupees and gold mohurs, as they received them from the mint, to Benares, where they were recoined, and from thence again to the mint at Lucnow, by which mode they obtained considerable profit. If this circumstance is really true, it will easily account for the scarcity of the new coin in the Behar province.

22.—What rules would you recommend to be adopted for the purpose of introducing the 19th sun sicca rupee into general circulation, and rendering it advantageous to all persons to reject any other descriptions of rupees?

The only mode which at present occurs to me of reducing the quantity of old rupees now in circulation, and of introducing the new rupees as the sole coin of the country, would be for Government to receive them in the payment of the revenues, at a fair and reasonable exchange, equal to the real value of the coin to be received; and these old rupees should not again be issued from the treasury, but be forwarded to the mint to be recoined. This method would certainly require considerable time, but in the end it would tend to reduce, if not entirely to destroy, the old coinage. It would also afford great relief to the landholders, as they would not be obliged to pay so heavy a batta to the bankers, who now levy it at an arbitrary rate, according to their own pleasure. The exportation also, and destruction of the coin in making ornaments, plate, &c. should be strictly prohibited.

23.—Do gold mohurs circulate in your district; to what extent; and do they pass at par, that is, for the value of 16 rupees when tendered for the purchase of goods; in payment of private debts and public demands, it is of course received at the rate which the law requires?

Gold mohurs are not in general circulation, except in some of the large towns; but are principally monopolized by the bankers for the payment of the public revenue. They are received by individuals, in general, at the public value of 16 rupees; but the bankers levy a batta on the exchange, which however, at present, is very trifling.

24.—Has the establishment of the currency of the gold mohurs, in the interior of the country, operated beneficially or otherwise?

Gold mohurs are scarcely ever to be met with in the interior parts of the country, being principally monopolized by the bankers and other wealthy people. Were this coin in general circulation, it would certainly be beneficial.

25.—What progress has been made by you in preparing the Quinquennial Register of lands paying revenue to Government, and the Quinquennial Register of the lands exempt from the payment of revenue?

The Quinquennial Register of the lands paying revenue to Government, is in a state of forwardness; that of the lands exempt from the payment of revenue, is more than half finished.

26.—What descriptions of persons are, in general, the purchasers of the lands disposed of by public sale in your district; and is the system of management of those purchasers regulated by principles better calculated for the permanent improvement of those estates, than the system of management of the former proprietors?

The persons who have, in general, purchased lands at the sales in this district, are zemindars, bankers and native officers of the army. In many instances I think the system of management of those purchasers are better calculated to improve their estates, than that of the former proprietors.

27.—Are you of opinion that any of the proprietors of land in your district, would purchase of Government the permanent remission of any part of the fixed jumma assessed upon their lands (suppose a proportion of 10 or 20 per cent. of that jumma) and how many years purchase do you suppose the proprietors would offer for such remission?

I should doubt very much if any of the zemindars in this district, would be induced to make the purchase herein mentioned, or if indeed any of them could afford to advance the sum that would be required to purchase the remission of any part of their present jumma. The zemindars in general, endeavour to reap the greatest present advantages from the produce of their estates, without consulting the benefit of their successors; when they have accumulated a considerable sum of money they squander it in the marriage of some of their children; and a great many of them, though the settlement has for the most part been made with them on very easy terms, are, from these circumstances, obliged to borrow from their bankers to pay their instalments of revenue.

28th.—What is your opinion as to the effect which the disposal of a proportion of the jumma, in the manner proposed in the preceding question (supposing the arrangement arrangement to be carried into effect to the greatest practicable extent) would produce on the general improvement of the country?

This district is in a very high state of cultivation; and I do not conceive that any great improvement would arise from adopting this arrangement, even supposing it possible to carry it into effect.

Zillah Sarun, 30th December 1801.

(Signed) J. R. Elphinstone, Collector.

Sylhet, 19 December 1801.

(Sylhet.)

To his Excellency the Most Noble RICHARD Marquis WELLESLEY, K.P. Captain General and Governor General in India, &c. &c. &c. Allahabad.

My Lord,

IN consequence of an injunction received from the Secretary to the Government in the Revenue and Judicial Departments, under date 3d instant, I have the honour to submit to your Lordship Copy of my Reply to certain Interrogatories transmitted to me, regarding the internal state of the country, which was forwarded on the 12th instant to the Honourable the Vice President in Council.

I have the honour to be,
My Lord,
Your Lordship's most obedient and humble servant,

Sylliet, 19th December 1801.

(Signed) Jn° Ahmuty, Collector.

To GEORGE DOWDESWELL, Esq.

Secretary to the Government in the Revenue and Judicial Departments, Fort William.

Sir,

I HAVE the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Letter, under date 29th of October last, transmitting a Copy of certain Interrogatories, prepared with the view of obtaining accurate and authentic information, regarding the internal state of the country; and in reply beg leave to submit the under-mentioned Answers to the several points noticed in them, agreeably to the order of the different paragraphs, accompanied with an Appendix, containing such statements and papers to which references are made in the course of this Report.

1.—Are the crops of the present year expected to be productive?

The present harvest is considered by the inhabitants, to be the most abundant which they have seen for these three years past, as will appear from the accompanying Copy of my Report upon the state of the crops to the Board of Revenue. Vide Appendix, No. 1.

2.—What is the amount of the balances outstanding in your district on account of the past year; and what is the state of the collections for the present year?

In reply to this Interrogatory, two Statements (Nos. 1. & 3.) are herewith transmitted, drawn out to the 30th ultimo, which afford me the pleasing satisfaction to say, that the balances of the past were realized in the early part of the current year, conformably to the injunctions contained in Regulation 1st, of 1801; and that the revenues of the present year have been hitherto collected with more general punctuality and less trouble and vexation than those of any of the preceding years; for the difficulties attending the collection of one cawn in this district, are more than equal to that of one sicca rupee in any other, from the litigious disposition of the petty talookdars.

3.—What is the amount of the jumma of the lands which have been or are expected to be sold in your district, for realizing the balances of the past year; and have the lands disposed of sold at a favourable price, or otherwise; and if the latter, what is the cause of the unfavourableness of the sales?

1. The accompanying Statement, No. 4. will give the information required in the first part of this Interrogatory. With respect to the conclusion, I am sorry to intimate, that the lands which have been disposed of, sold in general at a very unfavourable price; that is to say, for little more than one year's purchase; and indeed a number of the petty talooks, when exposed for sale, did not even meet with purchasers.

2. This unfavourableness of the sales, as far as my knowledge extends, is to be ascribed chiefly to the causes explained in the accompanying Copies and Extracts of my Correspondence with the Board of Revenue, marked No. 5. in the Appendix, which are equally applicable to the lands which have proved unsaleable.

3. The greatest portions of such talooks, as are ultimately exposed for sale, being not only small but unproductive, holds out scarcely any inducement to individuals of note or property, who possess the means of improving such estates, to become purchasers, whilst the indigence of the lower classes of people precludes them from offering any favourable price for such lands; hence there is little or no competition at the public sales, except in cases where the estate is considerable or productive.

No. 1.—part 2.

Answers by the COLLECTORS.

Sylhet, 19 December 1801.

4. The population of this district not being equal to its extent and cultivation, the ryots in general are of the description denominated Pycausht, who, from their habits of cultivating the lands of several talookdars at one time, in such quantities as their convenience or circumstances permit them, are not considered as being attached exclusively to any particular estate. The improvement, therefore, of the petty talooks, must depend in a great measure upon the encouragement which is likely to be afforded by the proprietors to such ryots, who are not actually residents on their estates, and who are bound by no specific engagements to till their lands longer than it is agreeable to themselves; hence, in cases where any disagreements ensue between the proprietors, their paithee surreeks or mofussil copartners, and the ryots, the latter, as soon as the harvest is over, and they have discharged their rents agreeably to their engagements, if they have executed any, which is seldom the case, if not, according to the Sherréh or Nerickbundee of the pergunnah after a survey or actual measurement, which is the established custom, make no hesitation in abandoning the lands of such talookdar, and retiring to those of another; in consequence of which, the estate remains uncultivated in the ensuing year, unless timely measures be taken by the proprietor to procure other ryots.

5. In short, all those estates which fall into balance annually, and are exposed for sale, are in most cases in a declining and unproductive condition, owing principally to these three causes; viz. the misconduct and bad management of the proprietors, to improper and illegal alienations of portions of their estates formerly made, and to the irreconcileable feuds and dissentions which prevail amongst the mofussil copartners, who abound in almost every talook, be it ever so small.

4.—Are the existing Regulations for collecting the revenue of Government, from the zemindars and other proprietors of lands with whom a permanent settlement has been concluded, well calculated to secure the punctual collection of the public revenue, without, at the same time, affecting the security or value of landed property?

1. Considering the mild system of Government which has been adopted towards the inhabitants of the British dominions in India, far different from that despotism to which they had been formerly accustomed, the existing Regulations for collecting the public revenue are as well calculated as any that could be devised, upon the same principles of jurisprudence, to answer the intended purpose, without absolutely resorting to coercive measures.

2. But I am at the same time of opinion, that if a discretionary power were vested in the Collectors to confine the persons likewise of defaulters, in such cases where the measure might appear to them more conducive to the recovery of the public dues than by an attachment alone of their lands, agreeably to the rule laid down in Regulation 14th, of 1793, now rescinded, the annual balances would be considerably reduced, and the punctual discharge of the public revenue much better secured. In making use of such power, strict attention should be paid to the rank, character, and circumstances in life of the defaulter, and a proper discrimination made between a low litigious petty talookdar, who has neither credit or reputation to lose, and a respectable zemindar, who might suffer disgrace by the act. The fear of such a punishment would be productive of much beneficial effect among all descriptions of landholders.

3. The confinement of defaulters, after all their other property has been once disposed of, and when they are, it may be said, on the brink of starving, as at present practised, has never been attended, in this district, with any consequences advantageous to the public service. I have therefore avoided as much as possible, on such occasions, to put Government to the useless expense of feeding the Sylhet talookdars in jail, where they are more disposed to remain than to quit; since, in the latter event, the means of their future livelihood must depend entirely upon their future industry and exertions.

5.—Are the existing Regulations for collecting the revenue of Government, from persons holding lands in farm immediately of Government, calculated to secure the punctual collection of the public revenue from the farmers?

More so than the Regulations for collecting the revenue from landholders of the description mentioned in the preceding Interrogatory, because the property of the farmers is not only liable to be attached and ultimately sold, but their persons and those of their sureties are equally liable to be seized and confined at all times, for the due realization of the public revenue.

6.—Are the existing Regulations for enabling the zemindars and other proprietors of land, and farmers of land holding their farms immediately of Government, to realize their rents from their under farmers and from their ryots, well calculated for the purposes intended, without, at the same time, affording to the proprietors and farmers of land the means of oppressing their under farmers and ryots.

I am of opinion that they are. Some partial oppressions may be committed by the landholders in distraining the effects and crops of their under-tenants, but in such cases the road to obtain reparation is always open to the latter.

7.—When were you appointed Collector of the district, and has its cultivation been improved and extended since the first year of the Decennial Settlement, and in what degree? What proportion do you suppose the uncultivated land in your district now bears to the cultivated land?

1. I was appointed Collector of this district, on the 14th of July 1797. The cultivation of it, it, as far as I have been able to ascertain it from the reports of the Putwarries, has been much extended since the first year of the Decennial Settlement; but whilst the jungle and waste lands are cleared and brought into cultivation on one side, the arable and already cultivated lands on the other, have been in many instances neglected, owing as I have before observed, to the immense number of petty talooks into which this district is divided, and to the population not being equal to its extent and cultivation. Ryots therefore must abandon one land to cultivate another; and the advantages which such undertakings offer, and the facility with which the jungles (being mostly of cograh reed) may be cleared, operate as strong inducements with them.

2. The proportion of lands brought into cultivation since the formation of the permanent settlement may be one-third more than the quantity which was in cultivation at that period, but still there cannot be less than two-third parts of this district in an uncultivated and waste state.

8.—Do the proprietors of estates, in general, derive a profit exceeding the 10 per cent. on the jumma, the profit estimated to be left to them on the conclusion of the Decennial Settlement?

In general the proprietors do, and there are many who derive a profit of more than one hundred per cent.! There are, of course, some exceptions.

9.—What is the present state of the embankments in your district?

1. In the past year, the embankments in this district, extending from Boordasyl to Diglee, a distance of about 48 coss, were put in as excellent a state of repair as the advanced season of the year latterly permitted. The rains having set in earlier than usual, compelled me to leave some part of the bunds unfinished; and, during the last rainy season, the newly erected embankments have, in many places, settled, which will require raising, at least two feet.

2. From the active steps which have been taken, the repairs of the present season, when completed, will, I trust, put the bunds in such a condition, as not only to lessen any future charges on that account, but also to be able to resist any inundations which may hereafter occur, if they be not uncommonly violent; it being my intention to strengthen, as much as possible, the sides of the new embankments with mats and bamboos, in addition to turfing, which answered so fully in the past rainy season.

3. The numerous breaches which are annually made in the bunds, originate, in almost every instance, in the ryots cutting small drains, when the river begins to rise, in order to admit the waters for agricultural purposes, which they neglect afterwards to stop up, when no longer required. Under these circumstances, any sudden rise of the river, after the fall of heavy rains in the mountains, which is often the case, creates such an impetuous and rapid current, as to force passages through all these openings; which, when once enlarged, cannot be stopped up again or repaired, till the return of the dry season. It is impossible, considering the extent of the bunds, to prevent such acts on the part of the ryots, without entertaining a fixed establishment of overseers; and, to prevent it effectually, might be attended with much inconvenience, since the ryots are obliged to prepare their ground, at a time when a sufficient quantity of water can only be supplied from the river.

4. I feel some satisfaction in reflecting, that the abundance of the present harvest is to be attributed, in a great measure, to the state of the bunds, during the past rainy season.

10.—Do the proprietors of land, in general, attend to the permanent improvement of their estates, by the making of embankments, digging of tanks, and establishing such other works, as are calculated to increase the produce of their lands?

The zemindars of Turruff are the only landholders, to the best of my knowledge, who make it a practice of erecting embankments and digging tanks at their own expense; but, in the other parts of the district, works of such public utility, particularly the former, which are more required, are entirely neglected, owing to a want of unanimity and good faith amongst the proprietors.

In many purgunnahs, such as Etah, Shemsheernagur and Allynegur, which border on the hills where the torrents are so liable to rise suddenly, and inundate the adjacent country, the erection of embankments would be attended with much general benefit; the expense would not be considerable, if the proprietors would all agree and contribute towards it, in proportion to the extent of their respective estates: but notwithstanding that every encouragement has been afforded; notwithstanding that I deputed an aumeen two years ago to make an estimate jointly with the proprietors, of the expense which would be incurred, I found it an impracticable task to unite them in the construction of a work, which promised such mutual advantages, and in which the interest of every landholder of those three pergunnahs was equally concerned.

As more is to be apprehended from an excessive fall, than a want of rain in this district, the digging of tanks for agricultural purposes, does not become an object of so great an importance.

11.—Have the proprietors of land conducted themselves with more moderation, and with greater attention to the principles of good faith, in their transactions with their ryots, since the establishment of the permanent settlement, than was observed by the proprietors of land, in general, previously to the conclusion of that settlement; and is the situation and condition of the ryots, or immediate cultivators of the soil, in every respect, as comfortable as can be expected?

Yes,

No. 1.—part 2.

Answers by the COLLECTORS.

Sylhet, 19 December 1801.

Yes, they have; and the situation and condition of the ryots are become as comfortable, and more independent, than could have been expected, when it is considered what power the zemindars formerly possessed over them, and how cruelly they were accustomed to exercise it. In short, of all classes of people, the immediate cultivators of the soil have alone derived the greatest benefit and advantage from the existing Revenue Regulations of Government; and as long as they discharge their rents punctually, they have nothing to fear from the oppression or avarice of the zemindar.

12.—What is the state of the roads in your district? Are there any parts of the district, the making of roads through which would be beneficial to the country, and what would be the expense attending the work?

In reply to this Interrogatory, permit me to refer you to my former Report on the same subject, under date 12th of July 1800, in consequence of the orders of Government, under date 1st May 1800, communicated to me by the Board of Revenue, in their Secretary's Letter, under date 9th of May 1800.

13.—What is the estimated number of the inhabitants of your district, and what proportion is it supposed the Mahomedans bear to the Hindoos?

An Estimate of the population of this district, as well as the proportion which it is supposed the Mahomedans bear to the Hindoos, will be found in the Appendix, No. 6.

14.—What are the most valuable articles of produce in your district; and has the cultivation of them particularly increased of late years? What is supposed to be the cause of that increase?

The produce of this district, owing to the lowness of the grounds, and the swampy nature of the country, is principally paddy; but the most valuable articles among the produce of the land are cotton and sugar-cane; the former is cultivated upon the hills, and the latter on the elevated grounds in the different pergunnahs. The cultivation of cotton, however, has of late diminished, in consequence of the refractory and predatory conduct of the Rookies, a race of savage mountaineers, who inhabit the interior parts of the Tipperah and Cachar hills, and who make frequent incursions, to the great annoyance of the cultivators. As the Sylhet hills are attached to the same range, they can suddenly appear and cut off those whom they find upon them, unless the cultivators go in large bodies; and then retreat to their inaccessible haunts, where it is impossible to pursue them. The cultivation of cotton, therefore, is now chiefly confined to the hills situated more immediately within the district. In the past year, I am given to understand, that 18 persons were destroyed by them. The cultivation of sugar-cane has been of late greatly extended, owing, I believe, to the increased demand for sugar.

15.—Are the stamp duties becoming more productive; and what sum do you expect those duties will produce in your district, in the present year?

1. The stamp duties are becoming more productive than they were when first established, a convincing proof of the impossibility of checking the litigious disposition of the natives.

2. The sum which it is estimated these duties will produce, in the current year, amounts, at the lowest calculation, to sicca rupees 5,295, as particularized in Statement No. 7. in the Appendix.

16.—Are the abkarry collections increasing or decreasing?

The produce from the abkarry mehal is much decreased. In fact, not a single licence for distilleries has been renewed in the current year, owing to the high rates of tax prescribed by the existing Regulations, and to the confined consumption of spirituous liquors in this district.

17.—Are there any articles in your district on which a productive tax might be levied without oppression to the people; name the articles, the rate of tax, and the manner in which you would propose it to be levied?

Regulations 10th and 11th, of 1801, have enumerated every article of produce, which could, with propriety be taxed; I am not at present aware of any other article, being the produce of the country, upon which a duty could be proposed to be levied. A plan, however, for forming a registry of boats of every denomination in this district, and for the proprietors to pay an annual tax in proportion to the size of the boat, having been suggested to me by an European who has been long resident at this place; and the proposition, whether viewed in a political or financial light, appearing to me deserving of some attention, I shall take the liberty of submitting briefly the outlines thereof, for the consideration of Government.

It is proposed, that a general register shall be kept of every boat, large or small, in this district, with the exception of such dingees as are employed by ryots and other immediate cultivators of the soil for agricultural purposes.

That the zemindars and talookdars of every pergunnah should be obliged, in conjunction with an officer of Government appointed for that purpose, to take an account of every boat, barowtee, dingee, &c. their different burden, the names of the owners, and the place of residence within their estates respectively.

That previous to any new boat being launched, the proprietors should enter it in the register of the pergunnah where it is building; and, in the event of its being transferred by sale, gift, &c. due notice should be given, to facilitate the collection of the tax from the new owner.

That upon every boat being registered, and every year subsequently, till the boat be destroyed, or rendered unserviceable by age or otherwise, a certain tax shall be paid by the owners in proportion to the bulk of the boat, according to the tonnage specified in Statement, No. 8.

or

That after the expiration of the period fixed for the registry of such boats in each pergunnah, should any boat be found to be not entered, (which could be easily discoverable by such boat not bearing the registry mark, viz. its burden, number, and the names of the owner, pergunnah and zillah, to which it may appertain,) the boat shall be liable to confiscation, or the proprietor be compelled to forfeit a sum equal to the amount of three years tax, unless good and sufficient reasons be assigned for such omission.

That all boats of the size and description stated in Section 20th of Regulation XXII. of 1793, shall be excluded from such registry, and when discovered, destroyed upon the spot; rigourously enforcing the several clauses contained in the above section, as they may be found applicable to the case.

The execution of the above plan, I conceive, would not be attended with any insuperable difficulties or inconveniences. An Aumeen might, at first, be deputed into every pergunnah or grand division of the district, with instructions to take an account of the boats jointly with the proprietors of the land, and to form the registry within a given period; and the tax might subsequently be collected, with a trifling additional expense, by the tehseeldars appointed for the collection of the land revenue.

Any fraud which might be attempted to be practised by evasion or misstatement, with respect to the burden of the boat, would ultimately be discovered, and should subject the owner to suffer the same penalty as if he had wilfully omitted to register his boat.

The tehseeldars, tannadars munsiffs, all commissioners, all aumeens deputed into the Mofussil on public service, should be authorized to stop all boats which may be found unregistered, or in the predicament noticed above where fraud may be intended, and report the circumstances to the Sudder; liable, however, to be prosecuted in the Dewanny Adawlut for damages, should their proceedings subsequently appear vexatious, or their statement maliciously false.

The salt chokies, and those which may be established in consequence of Regulations X. and XI. of 1801, would operate as strong checks against any evasions or fraud on the part of owners of boats, by facilitating detection.

I am not aware, at present, of any material objections to the plan in question. It does not strike me, that the internal commerce of the country would in any respect be injured or diminished by its adoption, no more than by levying a duty upon the articles which the boat may contain. It might tend probably to increase the price of freight, and consequently the price of goods, but the whole weight in this event would ultimately fall upon the consumer; besides, the annual tax proposed to be levied upon boats is so trifling, as scarcely even to affect the price of freight or of goods: pinnaces, budgerows, and pleasure boats of all descriptions, are not to be exempted from the above tax.

In a financial point of view, the present plan promises to produce a large revenue, a part of which might be very justly and beneficially appropriated towards improving the general system of police of the country, which at present, is far from being efficient or complete. It is roughly estimated at from sicca rupees 40 to 50,000. per annum, in this district alone; a sketch of the above calculation will be found in Statement No. 9. in the Appendix.

It need not be observed, how much the adoption of the above plan would serve to answer the general purposes of police; if properly enforced, it would tend more effectually to put a stop to the perpetration of all kinds of dekoittee, than the severest penal laws, by facilitating the discovery of the haunts and lurking places of the dekoits. The zemindars, who are more or less concerned in all such depredations, would be deterred from permitting boats fit for such purposes to be built or harboured within their estates; besides, this plan whilst carrying into effect, would lead to the immediate detection and destruction of all boats calculated for dekoittee, which, although most rigidly proscribed by the existing Regulations of Government, still continue to be constructed and employed. In fact, every pergunnah has now its own dekoits.

I have endeavoured to compress as much as possible the outlines of the above plan, it being intended, at present, merely as a suggestion for the consideration of those who are better qualified than myself to judge of the propriety or eligibility of such a measure; but should it be deemed worthy of any attention, I shall be happy, hereafter, to afford such further information relative to the subject, as may be in my power.

18.—What are the descriptions of rent-free lands in your district; and what proportion does the produce of the rent-free lands bear to the jumma of the lands which pay revenue to Government?

The rent-free lands in this district, are generally of the description denominated Dewutter, Birmooter, Mudded Maash, Cherangee, &c. namely, held by grants not badshahee. It is calculated, that the produce of the rent-free lands bear a proportion of about one-fourth to the jumma of the lands which pay a revenue to Government.

19.—Which of those descriptions of lands are, in general, in the best state of cultivation; the rent-free lands, or the lands which pay revenue to Government?

The rent-free lands are undoubtedly not only the most productive, but in the best state of cultivation, owing to such lands having been originally of the best quality, (as they were granted for religious and charitable purposes) and to the general custom of the ryots paying in kind, instead of in cash; even in such instances where they do pay the rents in cash, the rates are much lower than those established for malguzarry lands: hence

No. 1.—part 2.

Answers by the COLLECTORS.

Sylhet, 19 December 1801.

the cultivation of rent-free lands holds out much greater advantages and encouragement to ryots, than that of malguzarry lands.

20.—What descriptions of old rupees are current in your district?

It may be said that sicca rupees, whether in gold or silver, are not the currency of this district, the revenues of which are collected in cowries, (with the exception of a small sum from pergunnah Turruff) and where all mercantile and other pecuniary transactions are carried on by means of those shells; within these three years, some sicca rupees have been introduced into circulation, but they are bought and sold as any other article of merchandize, and bear a high or low price, according to the demand, or state of the market.

There are a number of Arcot rupees also to be found in this district, which are so clipt and defaced, and so much reduced in weight, as to be considered in no other light than bullion. They are sold as such, and purchased by individuals with cowries, for the purposes of remittances, as there are no established houses of shroffs or bankers, who might receive cowries, and grant bills of exchange on Calcutta or Dacca. These rupees, when purchased, are sent to Dacca, and there disposed of as bullion for sicca rupees, whence they are ultimately dispatched by the shroffs and podars who purchase them, to the Calcutta mint, to be coined into 19 sun sicca rupees.

21.—What is the reason that these rupees continue in circulation, and how are they replaced as they become worn and diminished in value; the 19 sun sicca rupee being the only description of rupee struck in the provinces, and that being the rupee in which the public revenue ought to be paid?

Within these three years, since the introduction of sicca rupees into circulation, as noticed above, the number of Arcot rupees have greatly diminished; and I have reason to believe, that in two years hence they will entirely disappear, or at least, few will be found in this district. The principal cause of such rupees being imported from other places, and continuing so long in circulation, was the demand formerly for them. It was chiefly by means of Arcot rupees, which the contractor annually purchased, that he was enabled to make his remittances to Dacca, to answer the bills of exchange granted by him for the monthly balance of the treasury; but for the two past years, the contractor has made a practice of dispatching to Dacca the greatest part of the cowries received by him; which, by reducing the demand, has of course checked the importation.

I have understood that it has been found advantageous for individuals formerly to import sicca rupees into the province of Benares, and to have them recoined into Arcots; but as this information is not derived from any authentic source, it is given with diffidence. Arcot rupees are, I believe, likewise imported to Chittagong by the crews of vessels trading to the coast, and thence circulated to the eastern districts.

The old sicca rupees, viz. those not of 19 sun, denominated Bazar Chelteen sicca rupees, are scarcely seen at Sylhet; but at Dacca, where there are such considerable importations of every description of rupees, they still continue in circulation, from the advantages which the shroffs and podars there derive, by purchasing them at a great discount, and exchanging them for sicca rupees in gold or silver. Here again there is a batta between the gold and silver, according to the demand for the former. As long as the shroffs and podars, and, in short, all dealers in money, persevere in making a trade of the coinage of the country, and as long as there are other coins than the 19 sun sicca rupees, it will be in vain to attempt to confine the legal currency of the country to any one kind of specie.

22.—What rules would you recommend to be adopted for the purpose of introducing the 19 sun sicca rupee into general circulation, and of rendering it advantageous to all persons to reject any other description of rupee?

I am not prepared, at present, to answer satisfactorily to this interrogatory; but I conceive that the re-establishment of a mint at Dacca for three or four years, in order to induce individuals, who will always look to their advantage, to carry thither all Arcot and other old rupees which they may possess, or be able to procure, in order to be coined into 19 sun siccas, in preference to submitting to the impositions at present practised by shroffs and podars, as well as the strict enforcement of the existing Regulations relative to the legal currency of the country, would tend, in a short time, to produce the desired effect; as it is a notorious fact, that within these eight years the circulation of such illegal rupees, especially Arcots, with which the country formerly abounded, have been greatly diminished.

23.—Do gold mohurs circulate in your district, to what extent, and do they pass at par; that is, for the value of 16 sicca rupees when tendered for the purchase of goods; in payment of private bills and public demands, it is of course received at the rate which the law requires?

The answers given to the three preceding interrogatories are also applicable to this.

24.—Has the establishment of the currency of the gold mohur, in the interior of the country, operated beneficially or otherwise?

The revenues of this district being paid in cowries, excepting those of pergunnah Turruff, and all mercantile transactions being carried on in these shells, as already observed, the circulation of gold mohurs is very much confined; but I am however of opinion, that it would have operated more beneficially in other zillahs, the revenues of which are paid in sicca rupees, if a stop could have been put to that constant drawback of batta between gold and silver, so destructive to the intrinsic value of the former.

25.—What

No. 1.—part 2.

Answers by the COLLECTORS.

Sylhet, 19 December 1801.

25.—What progress has been made by you in preparing the Quinquennial Register of lands paying revenue to Government, and the Quinquennial Register of the lands held exempt from the payment of revenue?

The Quinquennial Register of lands paying revenue to Government, (No. 2.) commencing from 1202 B. S. as well as the register of intermediate mutations commencing from 1203, were completed and fairly transcribed some time ago; the former comprizing 26,472 estates, and the latter 1,284 separations; making altogether 27,756 independent estates.

Since the receipt of Regulation VIII. of 1800, both the Quinquennial and General pergunnah Registers have been commenced upon, and about 4,333 estates entered; in the execution of which arduous duty the record keepers and other mohirers, as far as their other avocations will permit, are constantly employed. In consequence of the uncommon number of estates, and the want of a separate establishment, the performance of the above task, as I have had occasion formerly to represent to the Board of Revenue, has become tedious, difficult, and peculiarly laborious.

Previously to the receipt of the regulations above noticed, the contents of such sunnuds as had been delivered in by holders of rent-free lands amounting to 489, in consequence of publications formerly issued for that purpose, had been entered in the Quinquennial Register of lands exempt from the payment of revenue, enjoined to be kept by Regulation XIX. of 1793.

In order that accurate information might be obtained respecting the particular situations of the rent-free lands, and the names and places of abode of the present proprietors, which indeed were very necessary preliminary measures, I thought it advisable to instruct the putwarries of the different pergunnahs to make proper enquires in the Mofussil, and to furnish me with the requisite accounts; as such information is obtained, I continue to issue the prescribed publications for a period of one year, for the production and registry of the sunnuds of the proprietors. Hitherto, no more sunnuds than those mentioned above have been delivered in; but I have every reason to expect that those individuals, in whose names the publications have been or may be issued, will produce their sunnuds and documents long before the expiration of the given period, and as they are delivered in, their contents shall be duly entered in the registers of rent-free lands, directed to be prepared by Regulation VIII. of 1800.

26.—What descriptions of persons are, in general, the purchasers of lands disposed of by public sale in your district; and is the system of management of those purchasers regulated by principles better calculated for the permanent improvement of those estates, than the system of management of the former proprietors?

The lands sold at public auction are purchased promiscuously, by the chowdries of the pergunnahs in which the talooks are situated; by podars and merchants; and by other persons following some particular occupation, who have not entirely to depend for subsistence upon the produce of the estate purchased. The system of management pursued by them, appears certainly better calculated for the improvement of these estates, than the system of management of the former proprietors, who paid little or no attention to the improvement of their estates, and were generally in the habits of anticipating and appropriating the rents to their private uses: to their mismanagement and neglect of cultivation, must be chiefly ascribed the decline and ultimate sale of their talooks; many of which, by falling into more provident hands, have since become productive and desirable estates.

I could enumerate several instances of estates which, on account of their ruinated state, sold three years ago for little more than one year's purchase, and for which the price of five years purchase has been since offered and refused, on account of the improvement which they have undergone.

27.—Are you of opinion that any of the proprietors of lands in your district, would purchase of Government the permanent remission of any part of the fixed jumma assessed upon their lands (suppose a proportion of 10 or 20 per cent. of that jumma); and how many years purchase do you suppose the proprietors would offer for such remission?

Considering the smallness of the jumma and the apparent poverty of the generality of the talookdars of this zillah, I apprehend that the purchase of a permanent remission of any part of the fixed assessment of their estates, would be confined entirely to a few of the principal zemindars.

On examining the Quinquennial Register and Register of intermediate mutations, I find that the number of estates which pay annually a revenue of cawns 2,000 and upwards, amount to 63, a list of which is transmitted. Vide Statement No. 10. in the Appendix.

I have not yet called upon any of the proprietors of the said estates, to ascertain whether they would be willing to purchase any remission of their fixed assessment, and how many years purchase they would offer; wishing to wait the receipt of further instructions from Government, after they shall have been furnished with the opinions of the different Collectors upon the subject.

From the enquiries which I have made of persons who are not landholders, relative to this proposition, I have grounds to believe, that none of the landholders of this district will be induced to offer more than ten years purchase, to be paid at once for any remission, not so much from want of inclination, as from want of the necessary means.

No. 1.—part 2.

Answers by the COLLECTORS,

Sylhet, 19 December 1801.

28.—What is your opinion as to the effect which the disposal of a proportion of the jumma, in the manner proposed in the preceding question, (supposing the arrangement to be carried into effect to the greatest practicable extent) would produce on the general improvement of the country?

In the event of the above arrangement being carried into effect upon any very extensive scale, many advantages would be likely to result both to Government and to the landholders; to the former by the realization of a considerable sum of ready money, which might be profitably appropriated to the liquidation of the public debt, and by diminishing the numerous sales of lands which unavoidably at present prevail, so prejudicial to that idea of security which is the foundation of all improvement in landed property; and to the latter, by enabling them, for obvious reasons, to discharge their revenues in future with more punctuality and ease, and affording them at the same time, greater confidence and encouragement towards exerting themselves in improving and extending the cultivation of their estates; since the fixed assessment being reduced, their lands will be less liable to be sold for a balance; and whatever increase of profit might be derived from their future labours, will be enjoyed exclusively by themselves, to whom and their posterity such hereditary estates will, by the above measure, be more firmly secured.

Having brought this Report to a conclusion, as speedily as my other avocations at this busy time of the year would allow, I have only to solicit the wonted indulgence of Government, should any part of my sentiments, remarks or propositions, contained therein appear erroneous, unsatisfactory or objectionable, since they are submitted with due deference, and to the best of my knowledge and judgment.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your most obedient, humble servant,
(Signed) John Ahmuty, Collector.

Sylhet,
the 12 December 1801.

(Copies.)

APPENDIX.

(No. 1.)

(No. 1.)

Copy of a LETTER from the Collector of Sylhet to the Board of Revenue, dated 14th November 1801.

To THOMAS GRAHAM, Esq. Acting President, and Members of the Board of Revenue, Fort William.

GENTLEMEN,

1. IN continuation of the Reports required by your Board, on the state of the crops, I beg leave to acquaint you, that the present harvest is reckoned by the inhabitants as the most abundant which they have seen for these three years past.

2. On the 4th instant we experienced some drizzling rain, which threatened some injury to the crops, and created some alarm; but hitherto I have not heard of any ill consequences having ensued.

3. Paddy is now selling at the rate of S[a] R[s] 15 and 16 per °/₀ maunds, and Rice in proportion.

I am, &c. &c.

(Signed) John Ahmuty, Coll[r].

(No. 2.)

No. 2.—part 2.

Answers by the COLLECTORS.

Sylhet, 19 December 1801, Appendix.

(No. 2.)

BALANCE outstanding on the 30th November 1801, for the past Year 1207, B. S.

ZILLAH.	Balance due from the 30th November 1801. Due from Defaulters.	Due from Khâs Mehals.	TOTAL BALANCE.	EXPLANATIONS.
Parcool	439 0 0 0	798 8 2 0	1,237 8 2 0	The balance stated to be due from defaulters, with a small exception, is irrecoverable, being as well deficiencies from the proceeds of sales of lands, as arrears of talooks, which proved unsaleable; such defaulters possessing no other property which could be sold for the recovery of these balances. The balance due from Khâs Mehals is also irrecoverable.
Latoo	413 12 17 2	2,117 5 14 3	2,531 2 12 1
Kingahjeah	519 0 0 0	247 2 15 0	766 2 15 0
Russulgunge	596 6 0 0	2,885 5 17 1	3,481 11 17 1
Nubbeegunge	5 0 0 0	- - -	5 0 0 0
Sunkerpossah	- - -	1,249 0 0 0	1,249 0 0 0
Taujpoor	169 0 0 0	971 4 0 0	1,140 4 0 0
Raujnagur	1,106 10 14 1	986 3 15 0	2,092 14 9 1
Noahcollee	18 0 0 0	- - -	18 0 0 0
Bongong	848 0 0 0	209 6 19 2	1,057 6 19 2
Cawns	4,114 13 11 3	9,464 5 3 2	13,579 2 15 1
S.R[s]	783 12 10 0	1,802 11 13 0	2,586 8 3 0

(E. E.)

Sylhet, the 30th November 1801.

(Signed) John Ahmuty, Collector.

(No. 3.)

(No. 3.)

JUMMA WASSIL BAWKEE of the Collectorship of Sylhet, for the current year, 1208, B. S. as it stood on the 30th November 1801.

ZILLAH.	Jumma of 1208, B. S.	Collected, to the 30th Nov. 1801.	BALANCE.	EXPLANATIONS.
Parcol	1,43,496 8 0 0	72,003 0 0 0	71,493 8 0 0
Latoo	1,80,378 4 16 0	1,12,106 0 0 0	68,272 4 16 0
Kingahjeah	1,06,843 9 12 0	65,700 0 0 0	41,143 9 12 0
Russulgunge	1,62,361 0 0 1	80,305 0 0 0	82,005 0 0 0
Nubbeegunge	1,18,921 0 0 0	90,070 0 0 0	28,851 0 0 0
Sunkerpossah	1,04,483 0 0 0	80,001 0 0 0	24,482 0 0 0
Taujpoor	1,33,012 0 0 0	71,254 0 0 0	61,758 0 0 0
Raujnagur	1,22,875 9 12 0	86,906 0 0 0	35,969 9 12 0
Noahcollee	1,15,006 0 0 0	84,001 0 0 0	31,005 0 0 0
Abeedabad	37,256 0 0 0	28,292 13 5 0	8,963 2 15 0
Bongong	29,222 0 0 0	21,627 0 0 0	7,595 0 0 0
Cawns	12,53,855 0 0 0	7,92,266 13 5 0	4,61,588 2 15 0
S.R[s]	2,38,829 8 7 3	1,50,907 11 9 2	87,921 12 18 1
Lushkerpoor	53,846 12 0 0	39,201 0 0 0	14,646 12 0 0
S.R[s]	2,92,676 4 7 3	1,90,108 11 9 2	1,02,567 8 18 1

(E. E.)

Sylhet, the 30th November 1801.

(Signed) John Ahmuty, Coll[r].

No. 1.—part 2.

Answers by the COLLECTORS.

Sylhet, 19 December 1801, Appendix.

(No. 4.)

STATEMENT, shewing the Jumma of the Lands which have been, or are expected to be sold, in the District of Sylhet, for realizing the Balances of 1207, B. S.

GRAND DIVISIONS.	Jumma of Lands already sold.	Jumma of Lands expected to be sold.	TOTAL JUMMA.
Parcool	2,082 4 0 0	- - -	2,082 4 0 0
Latoo	928 0 0 0	14 0 0 0	942 0 0 0
Kingahjeah	3,709 0 0 0	- - -	3,709 0 0 0
Russulgunge	2,154 8 14 0	- - -	2,154 8 12 0
Sunkerpossah	231 0 0 0	- - -	231 0 0 0
Taujpoor	789 0 0 0	26 0 0 0	815 0 0 0
Raujnagur	2,557 0 0 0	- - -	2,557 0 0 0
Noahcollee	31 0 0 0	- - -	31 0 0 0
Bongong	62 0 0 0	- - -	62 0 0 0
Cawns	12,543 12 12 0	40 0 0 0	12,583 12 12 0
S.R^{s}	2,389 4 13 3	7 9 18 0	2,396 14 11 3
Lushkerpoor	28 1 0 0	- - -	28 1 0 0
S.R^{s}	2,417 5 13 3	7 9 18 0	2,424 15 11 3

(E. E.)

Sylhet, the 30th November 1801.

(Signed) John Ahmuty, Coll^{r}.

(No. 5)

No. 5.

EXTRACT of a Letter from the Collector of Sylhet to the Board of Revenue, dated 8th September 1801.

Par. 3. I regret much that the lands in this district should have lately in so many instances proved unsaleable; the general causes of which, as far as they have been ascertained, are as follow, but how far they are applicable to each talook specified in the sale accounts lately transmitted, I am unable at present to inform your Board. A further and more particular Report shall be duly submitted as soon as I have made the necessary enquiries on the subject.

1st. Except within the past two years, the landholders of this district, as I have had occasion formerly to represent to your Board, were constantly in the habit of disposing of portions of their estates by private sale upon a disproportionate assessment, adjusted by themselves, without making any reference or notification to the Collectors office in the manner enjoined by the Regulations of Government; and as it was the interest of every purchaser to render the jumma payable on his portion as small as possible, a handsome consideration made to the proprietor generally effected his purpose. In consequence of such improper alienations, the proprietor of the entire estate being unable to discharge his revenue, the estate was ultimately exposed for sale in liquidation of the arrears due to Government; hence no individuals appear inclined to buy estates in such predicaments, as to the expense attending their subsequent applications to the Court for the purpose of dispossessing the private purchasers alluded to above, without taking into account, the vexation and delay unavoidable on such occasions, has in many cases, exceeded the purchase money, and in some instances they have not been able to receive the full and entire possession of their mehals to this period.

2dly. It has sometimes occurred, that the lands of a talook have been fraudulently taken possession of by a neighbouring talookdar or Chowdry, which has of course tended to create a balance. The proprietor, under these circumstances, sooner than that his lands should be sold, has continued to discharge his arrears at the end of the year, for two or three years successively, till at last his estate is exposed for sale, and for the above reasons proves unsaleable; for such is the aversion of the landholders of this district, and such their reluctance to institute suits in the Dewanny Adawlut, on account of the great expense and delays inseparable from the proceedings of a Court of Justice, that they would submit rather to be deprived of the greatest portion of their estates by their stronger neighbours, than apply regularly for redress, and patiently wait the result; whilst in the Foujdarry Court, where the field for controversy and litigation is more extensive and better suited to their genius, and the the expense and delays of justice less; they are not altogether forgetful of their private animosities, or backward in preferring their complaints.

Par. 4. There have been some instances of an estate in the above predicament being sold, but as soon as the purchaser had discovered that he could not well obtain possession of all the lands attached to his estate without resorting to the Court, he has immediately made a transfer of it to a second person, and the latter to a third, who has been at length compelled to apply to the Court for redress.

5. In stating the above circumstances, it is not my intention to intimate that every talook which has proved unsaleable is in one of the predicaments explained above. Many of the estates have been reduced to a waste and unprofitable condition, by the improvident conduct of the proprietors; who, by first anticipating and appropriating the rents to their private uses, and subsequently proceeding to some coercive exactions in order to remedy the defalcation, have often compelled the ryots to abscond, and if pykausht, which is generally the case, to cease to cultivate their lands. Hence, when an estate of the above description meets with a purchaser, he seldom expects to find any ryots upon it; he must then advance tuccavee, &c. This serves to explain, why some estates are sold for such trifling sums, and why, when held khâs, some scarcely produce any revenue.

6. In some estates, the lands have been and must unavoidably be, from the immense number of separate talooks, in some measure over-assessed, through the collusion of the putwarries at the time of Hustobood; and for the reasons assigned above, the proprietors will not make any regular application, or adopt any legal measures to procure, in such cases, the necessary abatement of jumma.

7. Lastly, with regard to the petty talooks, the jumma of which do not exceed C$ 10 per annum, the greatest part of which have proved unsaleable, it is necessary to explain, that these estates, in general, are no more than bheets or elevated spots (by nature or art) upon which barrees or habitations have been erected by individuals following some mechanical profession, who go out to service, and are not constant residents of the place; such as artificers, bearers, dandees, mangees, &c. These bheets, some of which have a trifling quantity of land attached to them, were assessed and formed into separate talooks at the time of the Decennial Settlement. As long as these talookdars, or, as they are termed, khoshlahshan, continue on the spot, the revenues are punctually paid; but when they emigrate to follow their different occupations and are dispersed, their talooks fall into arrears, which cannot be well recovered by attachment, since there are no rents to be collected, and which, when exposed for sale, few or no individuals appear inclined to purchase, since every person almost has his own barree or home, and may not find it convenient to alter his place of abode without necessity or some particular view. In the mean time the family of the talookdar, if he has any, retire, leaving an empty bheet, with sometimes an empty hut upon it, the proceeds of which, if separately sold, would scarcely pay for the deputation of a peon.

EXTRACT of a Letter from the Collector of Sylhet to the Board of Revenue, dated the 8th October 1801.

Par. 1. Agreeably to the promise contained in the 3d and 8th paragraphs of my Address, under date 8th ultimo, I now beg leave to transmit two Statements of Estates which have proved unsaleable in the past and current years, at present held under khâs management, in order to be advertised for sale, and, in the event of there being no bidders, to be bought in on the part of Government, previously to letting them in farm, or disposing of them in any other manner to individuals. I have also added, in the column of remarks, a summary of the causes which have rendered each talook unsaleable, as far as the same could be ascertained from the putwarries, who are well acquainted with the state of every estate in the district.

2. From Brendabun, who purchased the nine estates situated in pergunnah Plas, at a reduced jumma, I thought proper to demand a particular explanation in writing (which, with a translate, is herein inclosed) as he has frequently solicited me to recommend his case to the favourable notice of your Board; and, as far as the circumstances set forth by him have come to my knowledge, his statement appears perfectly correct. The lands of his talooks lying contiguous to the foot of the mountains, are constantly liable to the destructive visits of the wild beasts with which the surrounding jungles and hills abound, such as elephants, buffaloes, tygers and hogs, which deter ryots from making any permanent settlement, and subject the proprietor annually to a considerable expense in the advance of tuccavee, &c. I am given further to understand that, in the past year, no less than 100 families of ryots deserted. The quantity of land attached to the mehal, if it could be entirely brought into cultivation, is more than adequate to yield in a double proportion the assessed jumma. Under these circumstances Brendabun conceives himself justified in requesting that the balance due from him on account of 1207 B. S. amounting to cawns 848, may be relinquished by Government, the more especially as he has already paid to the tehsildars a sum far exceeding the gross collections from his mehal.

3. In my address above alluded to, I find that I had omitted to state one principal cause of the ruin of many petty estates in this district; viz. the irrecoverable disputes of the mofussil copartners. A talook which probably pays a jumma of cawns 100 per annum, and often less, is registered in my books in the name of a single proprietor, whilst, in the mofussil, there are no less, perhaps, than five pathee shurreeks or copartners, by right of consanguinity or otherwise, who are all in the actual possession of their respective russuds, or portions of lands. They usually collect the rents from the ryots of their own lands, and pay their revenue in the established proportion to the ostensible proprietor aforesaid, who discharges the same to, and receives a receipt in the name of the talook, as publicly registered from the tehsildar. It often occurs that these copartners quarrel among themselves, when some of them are alternately dispossessed by each other; the payment of their respective quota is immediately suspended, and, if the arrears be not recovered in time by attachment, the estate is brought to a sale, if not reduced at last to ruin; for no ryots feel inclined to settle upon or cultivate the lands of a talook which is so warmly disputed by the occupants. The first act on such occasions on the part of the person who has signed the settlement is, to seize the ryots of his copartners, and to demand the rent, on the ground of the estate being registered in his name; the former, having given no engagements to him, think proper to decline, and at last abscond *. In such cases, I think it my duty immediately to instruct the tehsildars to attach the lands; by which measure, although the dues of Government are generally realized, the evil is not remedied, nor is the estate benefited.

No. 1.—part 2.

Answers by the COLLECTORS.

Sylhet, 19 December 1801. Appendix.

(No. 6.)

No. 6.

ESTIMATE of the Population of the Sylhet District, ascertained by a Hustabood.

No. of Houses.	Men.	Women.	Children.	TOTAL.
1,03,637.	1,88,245.	1,64,381.	1,40,319.	4,98,945.

POPULATION of the Cusbah or Town of Sylhet alone.

31,220.	28,717.	25,127.	21,538.	75,382.

Sylhet, 30th Nov. 1801.

E. E.

(Signed) J. A. Collector.

N. B. The proportion which it is supposed the Mahomedans bear to the Hindoos, in the above population is two to three; viz. two-fifths, which, as far as I can judge, exceed the proportion generally in other zillahs.

(No. 7.)

No. 7.

STATEMENT exhibiting the amount of the Duties which the Stamps will produce in 1208, B.S.

	Value of Stamps sold between the 1st May and 30th Nov. 1801, European Style.	Estimated Value of Stamps expected to be sold between 1st Dec. 1801 and 30th April 1802, European Style.	TOTAL.
Stamp Papers of the Revenue and Judicial Departments - - - - - -	3,545. 0. 0. 0.	1,750. 0. 0. 0.	5,295. 0. 0. 0.
S.R^{s}	3,545. 0. 0. 0.	1,750. 0. 0. 0.	5,295. 0. 0. 0.

(E. E.)

Sylhet, 30th Nov. 1801.

(Signed) J. A. Collector.

* When estates in this predicament are attached, some of the copartners, or their ryots, frequently prefer vexatious complaints, as in a recent instance, in the Foujdarry Adawlut, and cause the tehsildar or kooruckdar to be summoned, to the great detriment of the public service, and their individual annoyance.

No. 8.

LIST OF TONNAGE.

	Maunds.		Maunds.		S. Rupees.
Dingee Boat from	5	to	10	Burden to pay	0	8	0 per Year
D°	10	to	15	D°	0	9	0 D°
D°	15	to	20	D°	0	10	0 D°
D°	20	to	30	D°	0	12	0 D°
D°	30	to	40	D°	0	14	0 D°
D°	40	to	50	D°	1	0	0 D°
D°	50	to	75	D°	1	8	0 D°
D°	75	to	100	D°	2	0	0 D°
D°	100	to	125	D°	2	4	0 D°
D°	125	to	150	D°	2	8	0 D°
D°	150	to	175	D°	2	12	0 D°
D°	175	to	200	D°	3	0	0 D°
D°	200	to	250	D°	3	4	0 D°
D°	250	to	300	D°	3	8	0 D°
D°	300	to	350	D°	3	12	0 D°
D°	350	to	400	D°	4	0	0 D°
D°	400	to	450	D°	4	4	0 D°
D°	450	to	500	D°	4	8	0 D°
D°	500	to	600	D°	4	12	0 D°
D°	600	to	700	D°	5	0	0 D°
D°	700	to	800	D°	5	4	0 D°
D°	800	to	900	D°	5	8	0 D°
D°	900	to	1000	D°	5	12	0 D°

N. B. All Boats above maunds 1,000, to pay rupees 1 per $\frac{1}{40}$ maunds, which would increase the tax, and fall on the rich merchants.

(E. E.)

Sylhet, 30th Nov. 1801. (Signed) Jno Ahmuty, Colr.

No. 9.

CALCULATION of the Number of BOATS supposed to belong to the District of Sylhet, and the probable Amount of the Annual Tax.

	Maunds to Maunds.	Number of Boats.	Average Price each Boat to pay yearly.	TOTAL Amount per Year.	Revenue per Year.
				S.Rs.	S.Rs.
Say Boats from	3,000 to 1,000	150	a' 8 S.Rs p' boat p' year	1,200 0 0
- - D° - -	1,000 to 500	350	a' 6 Rs - - D° - -	2,100 0 0
- - D° - -	500 to 400	500	a' 5½ Rs - - D° - -	2,750 0 0
- - D° - -	400 to 300	500	a' 5 Rs - - D° - -	2,500 0 0
		1,500			8,550 0 0
- - D° - -	300 to 200	1,000	a' 4½ p. - - D° - -	4,500 0 0
- - D° - -	200 to 100	2,000	a' 3¾ p. - - D° - -	7,500 0 0
		3,000			12,000 0 0
					20,550 0 0
- - D° - -	100 to 50	4,000	a' 3 p. - - D° - -	12,000 0 0
- - D° - -	50 to 20	5,000	a' 2 p. - - D° - -	10,000 0 0
- - D° - -	20 to 10	6,000	a' 1 p. - - D° - -	6,000 0 0
		15,000			28,000 0 0
					48,550 0 0
- - D° - -	10 to 5	8,000	a' 1 p. - - D° - -	8,000 0 0
		23,000			8,000 0 0
					56,550 0 0

Boats of this size from ten maunds to five maunds may be exempted.

(E. E.)

Sylhet, 30 Nov. 1801. (Signed) J. A. Collr.

(No. 10.)

A LIST of the LANDHOLDERS in the District who pay an Annual Jumma of Cawns 2,000, and upwards.

ZILLAH.	PERGUNNAH.	N° of Talooks.	TALOOKS.	Annual Jumma.	Sicca Rupees.
Parcool	Bengah	2	Allee Mahomed	2,236 0 0	425 14 9 3
	Kismut Chytunngur	1	Gour-hurry Sing	2,551 8 0	486 0 0 0
Latoo	Bhursons	1	Khauhdand	2,738 0 0	521 8 7 2
	Behaderpore	1	Allahdand	2,001 0 0	381 2 5 3
	Cossearcool	197	Allahdand	2,152 0 0	409 14 9 2
	Dowuddee	1	Mooraecchund	5,298 0 0	1,009 2 5 3
	Barroparah	1	Mooraeechund	3,733 0 0	711 0 15 2
	Kismut	1	Gourhurry Sing	4,578 4 16	872 0 18 1
Hingahjuah	Lunglah	1	Coorban Allee Chowdarry, purchased by Shamram & Cartishram	2,473 0 0	471 0 15 2
		2	Goldam Mended Chowderry	3,504 0 0	667 6 17 1
		3	Golam Nubbee Chowderry	2,166 0 0	412 9 3 1
		4	Golam Hussein Chowderry	2,016 0 0	384 0 0 0
		8	Mahomed Eusuf Chowdry	2,201 0 0	419 3 16 1
		16	Mahomed Mulfut	2,206 0 0	420 3 1 0
Russul Gunge	Bunsicoorah	1	Radhagobind	11,277 0 0	2,148 0 0 0
Russul Gunge	Selberrish	2	Woamacheaunt on the part at Radahgouind	2,201 0 0	419 3 16 1
	Coureeah	352	Seerychund Gucoul	2,610 0 0	497 2 5 3
	Kismut Bunnichung	1	Adum Rezah	3,206 0 0	610 10 13 3
		2	Coorbaun Rezah	3,028 0 0	576 12 3 3
		3	Allum Rezah	3,028 0 0	576 12 3 3
		4	Assuder Rezah	2,136 0 0	406 13 14 1
Nubbee Gunge	Betungul	3	Doollubram	2,121 0 0	404 0 0 0
		4	Goobind Raujkishen	4,125 0 0	785 11 8 2
	Zyenshye	1	Soobungsh Bhooput	4,072 0 0	775 9 18 1
	Sullookah	3	Ramgopaul	6,406 0 0	1,220 3 1 0
Nubbee Gunge	Kismut Bunniachung	1	Adrum Rezah	6,259 0 0	1,192 3 1 0
		2	Coorbaun Rezah	5,899 0 0	1,123 9 18 0
		3	Allum Rezah	5,890 0 0	1,121 14 9 2
		4	Assud D°	4,176 0 0	795 6 17 1
		6	Assud D°	2,239 0 0	426 7 12 2
Junkerpassah	Bejorah	2	Ramjoy Chowdry	10,491 0 0	1,998 4 11 2
	Luskey	4	Allah Unnoop	2,411 0 0	459 3 16 1
	Kitchy	1	Joy Gobind	2,719 0 0	517 14 9 3
	Cossimnagur	1	Ictol Nazeer	3,954 0 0	753 2 5 3
		2	Mahomed Eaaseen	3,178 0 0	605 5 6 3
Tarypoor	Kismut	1	Goomhurry Sing	4,653 0 0	886 4 11 3
Raynagur	Etah	17	Anundram, &c.	2,833 0 0	539 9 18 0
	Shumshernagur	1	Abul Fuzzul purchased by Mugul Baig, &c.	2,609 0 0	496 15 1 0
		2	Abul Zuffer	2,535 0 0	482 13 14 1
		36	Abul Hekeem Neij	4,222 0 0	804 3 1 0
			Purchased by Lunnahsing	2,528 0 0	481 8 7 3
	Alleenagur	18	Raujbullubroy purchased by Golaubram, &c.	4,986 0 0	949 11 8 2
	Bannoo Gatch	1	Gourchurry Sing	7,936 0 0	1,511 9 18 1
Noah Collee	Chowalis	13	Golaum Allee Kissa Pyrun	2,187 0 0	416 9 3 0
	Baleesiah	1	Bibee and Tazilah Khanum 3,536
			Hissa Golaum Mahomed 3,536
			Hissa Golaum Russul 3,536
			Hissa Loll Bibee 1,767
				15,911 0 0	3,030 10 13 3
			Carried forward	1,81,679 12 16	34,605 10 16 0

A List of the Landholders in the District—continued.

ZILLAH.	PERGUNNAH.	N° of Talooks.	TALOOKS.	Annual Jumma.	Sicca Rupees.
			Brought forward -	1,81,679 12 16	34,605 10 16 0
Noah Collee - -	Sant Gong - - -	1	Golaum Alee Hissa - - Pirun Bibee, &c. - 1,591 Hissa Golaum Russul 1,591 Hissa Golaum Mahomed - - 1,591 Hissa Golaum Mustofa 1,591 Hissa Loll Bibee - 794	7,158 0 0	1,363 6 17 1
	Kismut Chytunnagur	1	Gomhurry Sing - -	11,947 0 0	2,275 9 18 0
Abadabad - -	Kismut Bunniachun	1	Adum Rezah - - -	7,834 0 0	1,492 3 1 1
		2	Courbaun Rezah - -	7,399 0 0	1,409 5 6 3
		3	Allum Rezah - - -	7,399 0 0	1,409 5 6 3
		4	Assuder Rezah - -	5,220 0 0	994 4 11 2
		5	Mahomed Nazeer Aunfer -	2,398 0 0	465 12 3 3
		6	Assuder Rezah - -	3,599 0 0	685 8 7 2
Lushkerpore - -	Turruff - - - -	1	Syhed Mahomed Nazeer; viz.
			Hissa Syed Mahomed Natar - - -		2,521 7 0 0
			Hissa Syed Mahomed Bantier - - - - -		2,966 9 0 0
		2	Syhed Ahmud Allee; viz.
			Hissa Syed Ahmud Rezah - - - -		1,416 9 0 0
			Hissa Syed Muddun d° - - -		2,617 2 0 0
			D° - Kaeem - d° - - -		2,005 1 0 0
			D° - Hameed d° - - -		665 15 0 0
			D° - Cullum d° - - -		685 3 0 0
			D° - Hossen d° - - -		831 15 0 0
		4	Rammisser Shen - - -		956 2 0 0
		6	Gungahgouind - - -		542 15 0 0
		7	Hubeeb Ullah - - -		607 5 0 0
		202	Shah Rezoan Uddeen -		677 1 0 0
		203	Shah Zebub Abdee - -		542 14 0 0
Luskerpore - -	Turruff - - - -	581	Furkaun Ullah - - -		536 12 0 0
		1,081	Rampers and purchased by Shamram - - -		1,099 14 0 0
		3	Syed Budder Uddeen Hossun Hissa Syed Babool Hussun and Goulsulhosun		687 6 0 0
	Noor Ullahossunnagur - - -	1	Nurnarain Ghose - -		1,031 0 0 0
			Cawns & S.Rupees -	2,34,633 12 16	65,083 4 8 3

Sylhet, 30th Nov^{r} 1801.

(E. E.) (Signed) J. Ahmuty,
Collector.

No. 1.—part 2.

Answers by the COLLECTORS.

Zillah Tipperah, 20 April 1802.

(Zillah Tipperah.)

To His Excellency The Most Noble RICHARD Marquis WELLESLEY, K.P.
Governor General.

My Lord,

ENCLOSED, I have the honour to lay before your Excellency the several Replies to the Interrogatories, transmitted to me by the Secretary to the Government in the Judicial and Revenue Departments.

I have the honour to be,
My Lord,
Your Excellency's most obedient humble servant,
(Signed) John Ryley,
Collector.

Zillah Tipperah,
20th April 1802.

QUERIES.—1.—Are the crops of the present year expected to be productive?

ANSWER.—The crops in this district of the present year are expected to be productive.

2.—What is the amount of the balances in your district on account of the past year, and what is the state of the collections for the present year?

The net balance of this district on account of the past year, amounts to S.R^{s} 4,604. 10. On account of the present year, the sum of S.R^{s} 10,06,049. 9. 9. 1. has been collected, and the remainder in course of payment.

3.—What is the amount of the jumma of the lands which have been or are expected to be sold in your district, for realizing the balances of the past year; and have the lands disposed of, sold at a favourable price or otherwise; and if the latter, what is the cause of the unfavourableness of the sale?

The amount of the sudder jumma of the lands that have been sold for the realization of the revenue of the past year, is S.R^{s} 7,120. 11. 19. 3. and the jumma of those expected to be sold, is S.R^{s} 557. 10. 14. 3. The lands have sold rather at favourable prices than otherwise.

4.—Are the existing Regulations for collecting the revenue of Government, from the zemindars and other proprietors of lands, with whom a permanent settlement has been concluded, well calculated to secure the punctual collection of the public revenue, without, at the same time, affecting the security or value of landed property?

The 7th Regulation of 1799 and the 1st of 1801, are well calculated to secure the punctual payment of the revenue, without affecting the security or value of landed property.

5.—Are the existing Regulations for collecting the revenue of Government, from persons holding lands in farm immediately of Government, calculated to secure the punctual collection of the public revenue from the farmers?

I am of opinion that the existing Regulations for collecting the revenue from farmers holding lands immediately of Government, are well calculated to secure the punctual payment of the public revenue; due attention being of course paid to the responsibility of the farmers security.

6.—Are the existing Regulations for enabling the zemindars and other proprietors of land, and farmers of land holding their farms immediately of Government, to realize their rents from their under farmers and from their ryots, well calculated for the purposes intended, without, at the same time, affording to the proprietors and farmers of land the means of oppressing their under farmers and ryots?

I think the existing Regulations for enabling the zemindars and other proprietors of land, and farmers of land holding their farms immediately of Government, to realize their rents from their under farmers and ryots, well calculated for the purposes intended; and, in this part of the country where the talookdars are so numerous, and in a great measure independant of the zemindars, do not afford the latter the means of oppressing either their farmers or their ryots.

7.—When were you appointed Collector of the district; and has its cultivation been improved and extended since the first year of the Decennial Settlement, and in what degree. What proportion does the uncultivated land in your district bear to the cultivated land?

I was appointed to officiate as Collector of this district on the 30th October 1800, and was confirmed in the appointment on the 14th March following. I am of opinion that the cultivation of this district has been extended and improved (at least if I can venture to form a judgment from general information) since the first year of the Decennial Settlement, in the proportion of one to four; and I estimate the uncultivated land to bear a proportion of about one-eighth to the cultivated land.

8.—Do the proprietors of estates, in general, derive a profit exceeding the 10 per cent. on the jumma; the profit estimated to be left to them on the conclusion of the Decennial Settlement?

I am of opinion that the proprietors of estates, in general, derive a profit exceeding 10 per cent. on their jumma.

9.—What

9.—What is the state of the embankments in your district?

The embankments are in general in an indifferent state of repair; but previous to the ensuing rains, the labourers now at work upon them will, I expect, have made them so secure as to do away any apprehensions on this account.

10.—Do the proprietors of land, in general, attend to the permanent improvement of their estates, by the making embankments, digging of tanks, and establishing such other works as are calculated to increase the produce of their lands?

I am not of opinion, that the proprietors of lands in this district attend in the least to the improvement of their estates in the manner mentioned in the Query annexed; the zemindars themselves, generally, not being in the habits of extending their views to a more distant period than the harvest of the ensuing year.

11.—Have the proprietors of land conducted themselves with more moderation, and with greater attention to the principles of good faith, in their transactions with their ryots, since the establishment of the permanent settlement, than was observed by the proprietors of land in general, previously to the conclusion of that settlement; and is the situation and condition of the ryots, or immediate cultivators of the soil, in every respect, as comfortable as can be expected?

The proprietors of land have certainly conducted themselves with more moderation, and with greater attention to the principles of good faith, in their transactions with their ryots, since the conclusion of the permanent settlement; and the situation of the ryots (in this part of the country) is, I am of opinion, in every respect, as comfortable as can be expected.

12.—What is the state of the roads in your district? Are there any parts of the district, the making of roads through which would be particularly beneficial to the country; and what would be the expense attending the work?

The roads in this district are generally in an indifferent state of repair, particularly one from this station through the center of the district to Noacolly, the residence of the salt agent of Bhulwah and Chittagong. This road being kept in repair would prove highly beneficial to the district, by the communication that would in consequence become more general, and which would be greatly facilitated, particularly at the periodical season of the rains, by a canal being cut from Commillah to Bangmana, a distance of not more than four coss, and through which the road above alluded to passes: the proposed canal would open a communication with the Dekoytey and little Fenny rivers; the former of which, running nearly through the center of the zillah, empties itself into the Megna, a little above Luckipore. The road from this station to Chittagong, and which is necessarily the route of the troops on their march from Dacca to that place, is very materially injured, and in some places rendered almost impassable, by cuts made across it by the ryots for the purpose of cultivation. If brick bridges were constructed over these cuts, the road would remain passable, and the ryots might either open or shut up the arch of the bridges, as occasion might require: it would be necessary to construct about sixty bridges of the above description, from this station to the river Fenny, which is the boundary of this district and Chittagong: upon an estimate, the aggregate expense of the bridges would amount to about S.R^s 24,000.

Should his Excellency the Most Noble the Governor General in Council deem it expedient to employ the convicts in the above works, the completion of them might be effected at a very trifling expense; little more than the erection of straw sheds for the security of the convicts during the night.

13.—What is the estimated number of the inhabitants of your district; and what proportion is it supposed the Mahomedans bear to the Hindoos?

The number of inhabitants of this district is estimated at 750,000, and the Mahomedans bear a proportion to the Hindoos as four to three.

14.—What are the most valuable articles of produce in your district; and has the cultivation of them particularly increased of late years? What is supposed to be the cause of that increase?

Cotton, rice, beetle-nut, salt. The cultivation of the former has, of late years, considerably increased in this district, as also the manufacture of the latter article. The cause of the increase in the cultivation of the former is to be attributed to the encouragement given by the European settlers in this district to the manufacture of cloths, and the cause of the increase in the latter article is to be attributed to Government having taken into their own hands the exclusive mangement of the salt lands.

15.—Are the stamp duties becoming more productive; and what sum do you expect those duties will produce in your district, in the present year?

The stamp duties are becoming more productive, and I expect they will produce in this district, in the present year, the sum of sicca rupees 9,000.

16.—Are the abkarry collections increasing or decreasing?

The abkarry collections are considerably increasing.

17.—Are there any articles in your district on which a productive tax might be levied without oppression to the people; name the articles, the rate of tax, and the manner in which you would propose it to be levied?

I am not aware of there being any articles in this district, on which a productive tax could be levied, without oppression to the people.

No. 1.—part 2.

Answers by the COLLECTORS.

Zillah Tipperah, 20 April 1802.

18.—What are the descriptions of rent-free lands in your district; and what proportion does the produce of the rent-free lands bear to the jumma of the lands which pay revenue to Government?

The following are the descriptions of rent-free lands in this district: Birmotre, Daovuttre, Bishenpentre, Chakeran, Nankar, Buty, Ootsungou, and Osary. I estimate the produce of the rent-free lands in this district to bear a proportion of one-sixth to the jumma of lands paying revenue to Government.

19.—Which of these descriptions of lands are in general in the best state of cultivation; the rent-free lands, or the lands which pay revenue to Government?

The lands which pay revenue to Government are in the best state of cultivation: this, I do not conceive, is to be ascribed so much to the inferior quality of the rent-free lands as to the indolence of the natives, who, roused from their inactivity by the demands of Government, find it absolutely necessary, in order to enable them to liquidate the demands upon them, to cultivate those lands which, if exempt from the payment of revenue, would be waste.

20.—What description of old rupees are current in your district?

Arcot rupees are the only description of old rupees current in this district.

21.—What is the reason these rupees continue in circulation, and how are they replaced, as they become worn and diminished in value; the 19 sun sicca rupee being the only description of rupee struck in the provinces, and that being the only rupee in which the public revenue ought to be paid?

I attribute the continuance of these rupees in circulation in a great measure to the inhabitants of the interior parts of the country, from the inconsiderable extent of their concerns, not considering it worth their while to effect an exchange into the sicca currency; although, if the rupee offered by them in payment for purchases be light of weight, they are obliged to admit a deduction in the quantity of the article required; which, I am informed, is a more prevalent custom than paying a batta upon the rupee. I do not find that the rupees which are much worn are ever replaced, the quantity of the article purchased being regulated by the quality of the rupee offered in payment.

22.—What rules would you recommend to be adopted for the purpose of introducing the 19 sun sicca rupee into general circulation, and of rendering it advantageous to all persons to reject any other description of rupee?

As, notwithstanding the repeated orders of Government, and Regulations passed, extending the periods for the legal currency of the Arcot rupee, yet still that coin is very general in this district; and as it is so much the object of Government and the public at large, that the impositions practised by the shroffs should be counteracted; I beg leave to propose, that a period of twelve months be allowed (to be published at the different Courts of Adawlut and Cutcheries of the Collectors) for the continuance of treasure in the Arcot specie in the hands of the different bankers; that after the expiration of that period a certain proportion, say an eighth or sixteenth of the whole amount that may be found in their houses, should be confiscated, and paid into the treasury of the nearest Collector, as a fine to Government; and that the remainder be conveyed by the Magistrate of the city or zillah in which such money may be found to the nearest public treasury, and the Collector required, in such instances, in lieu thereof, to deliver immediately, in the sicca specie, the value of such illegal coin, to the person in whose house it may be found, or some person duly authorized by him to receive it.

23.—Do gold mohurs circulate in your district; to what extent, and do they pass at par, that is, for the value of 16 sicca rupees, when tendered for the purchase of goods; in payment of private debts and public demands, it is, of course, received at the rate which the law requires?

The circulation of the gold mohur in this district is pretty general. Of the sum of S.R^s 10,25,158. 7. 16. the amount of the collections of the past year, the sum of S.R^s 2,08,000. was received in the gold mohur specie, which passes at par throughout this district.

24.—Has the establishment of the currency of the gold mohur, in the interior of the country, operated beneficially, or otherwise?

I am of opinion that it has operated beneficially.

25.—What progress has been made by you in preparing the Quinquennial Register of lands paying revenue to Government, and the Quinquennial Register of the lands held exempt from the payment of revenue?

The Quinquennial Register of lands paying revenue to Government, and the Quinquennial Register of lands held exempt from the payment of revenue, for the Bengal year 1207, as well as of the Pergunnah Register, I hope shortly to be enabled to report the completion of.

26.—What descriptions of persons are in general the purchasers of the land disposed of by public sale in your district; and is the management of those purchasers regulated by principles better calculated for the permanent improvement of those estates, than the system of management of the former proprietors?

The officers of the Zillah Court and the vakeels of the Court are as frequently the purchasers chasers of estates, sold by public sale in this district, as the zemindars; and if a judgment can be formed from a very few estates of such purchasers having been again sold for arrears of revenue, I am induced to draw the conclusion, that the system of management adopted by such purchasers has been better calculated for the improvement of those estates than that of the former proprietor.

27.—Are you of opinion that any of the proprietors of lands in your district would purchase of Government the permanent remission of any part of the fixed jumma assessed upon their lands (suppose a proportion of 10 or 20 per cent. of that jumma) and how many years purchase do you suppose the proprietors would offer for such remission?

I am not of opinion that any of the proprietors of lands in this district would purchase of Government a remission of any part of the assessment fixed upon their estates.

28.—What is your opinion, as to the effect which the disposal of a proportion of the jumma, in the manner proposed in the preceding Question (supposing the arrangement to be carried into effect to the greatest practicable extent) would produce on the general improvement of the country?

I am not of opinion, that the disposal of a proportion of the jumma assessed upon the zemindars at the period of the Decennial Settlement, in the manner proposed in the preceding Question, would operate towards the general improvement of the country.

(Signed) John Ryley,
Collector.

Zillah Tipperah,
20th April 1812.

(Zillah Tirhoot.)

To N. B. EDMONSTONE, Esq.

Secretary to his Excellency the Most Noble the Governor General.

SIR,

IN compliance with the orders communicated to me in Mr. Secretary Dowdeswell's Letter of the 3d December last, accompanying, I have the pleasure to transmit a Copy of my Answers to the papers of Questions forwarded with your Letter of the 21st October last, which I request you will have the goodness to lay before his Excellency the Most Noble the Governor General, for his consideration.

I am, &c.

(Signed) G. P. Ricketts,
Acting Collector.

Zillah Tirhoot,
12th February 1802.

1.—Are the crops of the present year expected to be productive?

Owing to the overflowing of the rivers Gunduck and Ganges, and likewise the breaking down of the bunds, the landholders in pergunnahs Hajepore, Rutty, and Imadpore have experienced considerable loss in their buddovee crops; but, from the favourable appearance of the crops at present, there is every reason to suppose that the rubby harvest will be very productive, which will make up for the damages they sustained at the commencement of the present year. The lands in the other parts of this district are in the highest state of cultivation.

2.—What is the amount of the balances outstanding in your district on account of the past year; and what is the state of the collections for the present year?

The outstanding balances on account of the past year amount to sicca rupees 74,880. 4. 17. and the sum collected for the present year amounts to sicca rupees 2,33,950. 12. 2.

3.—What is the amount of the jumma of the lands which have been or are expected to be sold in your district for realizing the balances of the past year; and have the lands disposed of sold at a favourable price, or otherwise; and if the latter, what is the cause of the unfavourableness of the sales?

The jumma of the lands which have been sold, on account of balances due for the past year, amount to sicca rupees 9,064. 0. 17. 2. and the amount of further lands, which are expected to be sold, is sicca rupees 11,604. 3. In some instances, the lands disposed of have sold at a very high price; and where the sales have proved unfavourable, it has been owing to the neglect of the landholders, who have suffered their estates to go to ruin, by which their value has decreased, and the produce has not been adequate to discharge the revenue assessed upon them; but the purchasers are in hopes, by assiduity and good management, to improve the lands, and render them more productive.

4.—Are the existing Regulations for collecting the revenue of Government, from the zemindars and other proprietors of lands with whom a permanent settlement has been concluded, well calculated to secure the punctual collection of the public revenue, without, at the same time, affecting the security or value of landed property?

The existing Regulations, in my opinion, are well calculated to secure the punctual collection of the public revenue from the zemindars and other proprietors of land, with whom a permanent settlement has been concluded, without injury to the security or value of landed property.

No. 1.—part 2.

Answers by the COLLECTORS.

Zillah Tirhoot, 12 February 1802.

5.—Are the existing Regulations for collecting the revenue of Government, from persons holding lands in farm immediately of Government, well calculated to secure the punctual collections of the public revenue from the farmers?

The Regulations likewise are well calculated to secure the punctual payment of the revenue demandable from persons holding farms immediately of Government.

6.—Are the existing Regulations for enabling zemindars and other proprietors of land, and farmers of land holding their farms immediately of Government, to realize their rents from their under farmers and from their ryots, well calculated for the purposes intended, without, at the same time, affording to the proprietors and farmers of land the means of oppressing their under farmers and ryots?

The Regulations are well adapted for the purposes intended in the first part of this Question; they do not afford the proprietors and farmers of land the means of oppressing their under farmers and ryots.

7.—When were you appointed Collector of the district; and has its cultivation been improved and extended since the first year of the Decennial Settlement, and in what degree? What proportion do you suppose the uncultivated land in your district now bears to the cultivated land?

I was appointed Collector of this district on the 3d April 1800, and from the different enquires I have made, and from my own observations, the cultivation has considerably increased since the first year of the Decennial Settlement. With regard to the proportion the cultivated land bears to the uncultivated, I cannot exactly state the quantity; but, from the information I have gained on this subject, I am led to suppose the former bears a proportion of three begahs to two.

8.—Do the proprietors of estates, in general, derive a profit exceeding the ten per cent. on the jumma, the profit estimated to be left to them on the conclusion of the Decennial Settlement?

The proprietors of estates in some parts of this district derive a profit far exceeding the 10 per cent. left them on the conclusion of the permanent settlement; and in others, again, they do not realize, I understand, a profit exceeding the 10 per cent.

9.—What is the present state of the reservoirs in your district?

The greatest part of this district is plentifully supplied with water from the various small rivers which run through it; and where the inhabitants do not derive this advantage, there are reservoirs or tanks from whence they are supplied, and which are in a good state of repair.

10.—Do the proprietors of land, in general, attend to the permanent improvement of their estates, by the making of embankments, digging of tanks, and establishing such other works as are calculated to increase the produce of their lands?

The landholders, for the most part, no doubt, exert themselves in increasing the produce of their lands and improving their estates. With regard to digging tanks, there is scarcely any necessity, from the circumstances mentioned in the preceding paragraph. The making of embankments has been very little attended to by them; from this inattention their losses chiefly originate.

11.—Have the proprietors of lands conducted themselves with more moderation, and with greater attention to the principles of good faith, in their transactions with their ryots, since the establishment of the permanent settlement, than was observed by the proprietors of land, in general, previously to the conclusion of that settlement; and is the situation and condition of the ryots, or immediate cultivators of the soil, in every respect, as comfortable as can be expected?

The proprietors of land are so much restricted by the Regulations, that, since the formation of the permanent settlement, they have conducted themselves with more moderation and attention in their transactions with their under farmers and ryots, than they did prior to the above settlement; and I believe their situation to be as comfortable as can be expected.

12.—What is the state of the roads in your district? Are there any parts of the district, the making of roads through which would be particularly beneficial to the country; and what would be the expense attending the work?

The roads in this district are in a very bad state; the repairing of which, and the making of some new ones, would be highly beneficial to the country. One, in particular, viz. the road from Muzzufferpore to the city of Patna, would be of great benefit, as it would induce a greater number of merchants to come and purchase the produce of this district, and enable them to transport their merchandize with facility. The making of this road would not cost less than S.R^s. 16,000, owing to several pucka bridges which it would be necessary to build.

13.—What is the estimated number of the inhabitants of your district; and what proportion is it supposed the Mahomedans bear to the Hindoos?

It is out of my power to state precisely the number of inhabitants there are in this district; but, from enquiry, I understand there are about 2,000,000. The Hindoos bear a proportion to the Mahomedans as four to one.

14.—What

14.—What are the most valuable articles of production in your district, and has the cultivation of them particularly increased of late years; what is supposed to be the cause of that increase?

The most valuable productions in this district are, tobacco, pawn, turmerick, ginger, opium, saltpetre, indigo and sugar-cane; the cultivation of them has been much increased of late years, owing to the great consumption and ready sale of these articles.

15.—Are the stamp duties becoming more productive; and what sum do you expect those duties will produce in your district, in the present year?

The sale of the stamp papers is becoming more productive; and I should imagine they would produce this year a sum of above 14,000 R°.

16.—Are the abkarry collections increasing or decreasing?

When I took charge of this collectorship, the abkarry mehal yielded a revenue of S.R° 16,126. 11. which I have increased to R° 26,578. 9.; and I have every reason to suppose that it will become more productive.

17.—Are there any articles in your district on which a productive tax might be levied, without oppression to the people; name the articles, the rate of tax, and the manner in which you would propose it to be levied?

I know of no article on which a tax could be levied, which would not be oppressive to the inhabitants.

18.—What are the descriptions of rent-free lands in your district; and what proportion does the produce of the rent-free lands bear to the jumma of the lands which pay revenue to Government?

I have the honour of transmitting, on a separate sheet, a list of the various descriptions of rent-free lands in this district. With respect to the proportion their produce bears to the jumma of the lands that pay revenue to Government, the latter is to the former as four to one.

19.—Which of these descriptions of lands are, in general, in the best state of cultivation; the rent-free lands, or the lands which pay revenue to Government?

The rent-free lands, and those lands which pay revenue to Government, are equally well cultivated, and without any sensible difference.

20.—What descriptions of old rupees are current in your district?

The rupees that are current in this district, are the phooleya rupee, and the 19 sun sicca rupee.

21.—What is the reason that these rupees continue in circulation, and how are they replaced as they become worn and diminished in value; the 19 sun sicca rupee being the only description of rupee struck in the provinces, that being the rupee in which the public revenue ought to be paid?

The 19 sun sicca is the only rupee which is received in the treasury for the payment of revenue; and the reason why the phooleya rupee remains in circulation, is, on account of its being used by the under farmers and ryots, for discharging their kists to their principals. This money is changed in the bazar by them for the 19 sun sicca (on their giving batta) which is paid into the treasury.

22.—What rules would you recommend to be adopted for the purpose of introducing the 19 sun sicca rupee into general circulation, and of rendering it advantageous to all persons to reject any other description of rupee?

The only method of preventing the circulation of these rupees, and introducing entirely the 19 sun sicca, and making it advantageous to people to reject all other rupees, would be, to authorize the Collectors to receive them in payment for revenue as equal to the 19 sun sicca, and remitting them immediately to Calcutta, to be recoined. By adopting this plan, in the course of a few years they would totally disappear.

23.—Do gold mohurs circulate in your district, and to what extent; And do they pass at par; that is, for the value of 16 sicca rupees when tendered for the purchase of goods; in payment of private debts and public demands, it is, of course, received at the rate which the law requires?

The gold mohur is in general circulation throughout this district; and the average sum received in gold into this treasury, for these last three years, amounts to sicca rupees 27,55,528. When gold mohurs are tendered for the payment of the revenue, they are received at par; that is, for 16 sicca rupees; but when for the purchase of goods, if they are in the least worn, a certain batta is demanded.

24.—Has the establishment of the currency of the gold mohur, in the interior of the country, operated beneficially or otherwise?

From every information I have received, I find that the currency of the gold mohur, in the interior part of the country, has operated beneficially.

25.—What progress has been made by you in preparing the Quinquennial Register of lands paying revenue to Government, and the Quinquennial Register of the lands held exempt from the payment of revenue?

I have nearly completed the Quinquennial Register of lands paying revenue to Government, and the Quinquennial Register of rent-free lands, in the Persian language; and I am now translating the registers into English.

No. 1.—part 2.

Answers by the COLLECTORS.

Zillah Tirhoot, 12 February 1802.

26.—What description of persons are, in general, the purchasers of the lands disposed of by public sale in your district; and is the system of management of those purchasers better regulated for the permanent improvement of their estates, than the system of management of the former proprietors?

The purchasers at the sales are people of respectability, and chiefly proprietors of land. Their system of management, for the permanent improvement of their estates, is similar to that of the former proprietors.

27.—Are you of opinion that any of the proprietors of lands in your district, would purchase of Government the permanent remission of any part of the fixed jumma assessed upon their lands (suppose a proportion of 10 or 20 per cent. of that jumma); and how many years purchase do you suppose the proprietors would offer for such remission?

I have spoken to several of the proprietors of lands, with respect to purchasing of Government the permanent remission of part of the fixed jumma assessed upon their estates; but they do not seem inclined to meet the wishes of Government, which renders a reply to the latter part of this question unnecessary.

28.—What is your opinion, as to the effect which the disposal of a proportion of the jumma, in the manner proposed in the preceding question (supposing the arrangement to be carried into effect, to the greatest practicable extent) would produce on the general improvement of the country?

In the event of the disposal of a proportion of the jumma, and supposing the same to be carried to the utmost extent, I am not aware that it would tend much to the improvement of the country.

(Signed) G. P. Ricketts,
Acting Collector.

LIST of various MINHYE LANDS, in Zillah Tirhoot.

Altumgah, Jageer, Aymah, Soorigepreet, Bishenpreet, Bermooter, Aynamaut, Kawrij Jumma, Fukeeranah, Sungooter, Doorgahpreet, Khyraut, Naunkar, Shewpreet, Sirshaker, Madadmaush, Koosh Beert, Janookeepreet, Hunoomaunpreet, Ozoodapreet, Neyage, Juggernautpreet, Mafee, Naaz Takeeah, Bukseesh, Beert, Nannok Baury and Sunguth Baury, Seerraud Dawn, Samaun Dawn, Gungapreet, Modud Khurch Fakeeraun, Naauz Allah, Taubeh Mutt, Naauz Dergah, Naauz Mukdoom.

(Signed) G. P. Ricketts,
Acting Collector.

No. 2.

—No. 2.—

COPY of a LETTER from Mr. J. D. Patterson, Judge of Dacca Jellelpore, in Bengal, to the President and Members of the Police Committee; dated 30th August 1799.

EXTRACT Letter from Mr. J. D. Paterson, Judge of Dacca Jellelpore, to the President, &c. Members of the Police Committee; dated 30th August 1799.

Paragraph 2.

TO give the Board a true account of the Police of this District, it is necessary, in the first place, to make them acquainted with the manners and morals of the people, especially the lower sort.

3. As a picture of human degradation and depravity can only give pain to a reflecting mind, I shall be as brief as possible, consistently with the necessity of furnishing the required information.

4. Their minds are totally uncultivated; of the duties of morality they have no idea; the possess, in a great degree, that low cunning which so generally accompanies depravity of heart; they are indolent, and grossly sensual; they are cruel and cowardly, insolent and abject; they have superstition without a sense of religion: and, in short, they have all the vices of savage life without any of its virtues. If we look a step higher, we find the same total want of principles, with more refined cunning; no attachment but what centers in self: for the ties of relationship seem, in general, only to render inveteracy more inveterate.

5. I do not mean to say, that these people are in that state of ignorance as not to know the difference of good and bad conduct, and that they ought to practise one and avoid the other; but it is the total want of that moral instruction which impresses the young mind with a dread and shame of doing evil, and which encourages them to acts of propriety; that fear of the superintendence of a Deity, which every religion professes to have for its object, and which ought to influence their conduct through life. In all ages there have been abandoned profligate characters, who have committed depredations on the public, and their numbers have been greater or less according to the wisdom or weakness of the Government.

6. Under the Hindoo dominion, the ranks and professions of men were classed into 36 castes; and the individual of each, was obliged to learn and follow the profession of his ancestors; by this establishment, each individual of a caste had the means of support in his own profession. These castes were under the direction of their pundits; and the Punchaut, or General Assembly of the caste, used to examine the conduct of the members of their society, and the consequence of their censure was, sometimes a total exclusion of the guilty individual from the community.

7. No Brahmin was supported by the public who was unlearned, or who did not contribute his assistance in forming the minds of the lower classes, and teach them morality, and the duties enjoined by laws; under such an establishment for the instruction of the lower classes, it was not difficult to form an efficient police.

8. But the cruel reverse, which the invasion of the unprincipled and bigotted Mussulmauns introduced, may account for the wide torrent of corruption that has overflowed this country.

9. They considered the conquered Hindoos as infidels, and treated them with unrelenting persecution and cruelty; they thought, or affected to think, that every injury and insult upon them, were acts pleasing to God and their prophet. Their destructive bigotry attacked the books and learning of the Hindoos; and the Brahmins, persecuted with incessant atrocities, ceased to exercise their functions. The rising generation were left to themselves, and fell into all the excesses which the example and conduct of their conquerors had pointed out to them. The spirit of despotism completed the corruption of morals; and, in process of time, the human mind in this country was completely revolutionized. In this manner, for some centuries, under the Patan government, they continued, from want of the ancient discipline, to fall from degradation to degradation, the scorn and contempt of their despoilers. Many of the lower ranks became converts to the Mahomedan faith, without conviction of its being more rational than what they professed before, because it sheltered them from the persecuting bigotry they had suffered under, but the mind experienced no rise; the stern despotism of their rulers still kept it down: and their ignorance of the language in which their new tenets were locked up, confined the practice of religion to the mere exterior forms of devotion. The Mussulmaun conquerors finding it, however, impossible to root out the religion of the country entirely, were at last under the necessity of abating their zeal, and suffering it to remain. Unprotected, however, and unsupported by the authority of the Government, the Brahmins themselves, sinking under centuries of oppression, were too much involved in the general wreck to think of renewing the ancient discipline; their learning fell into neglect; and, in course of time, the Brahmins came to want that instruction themselves which it was their duty to afford to others. Mixing in all the selfish squabbles of common life, they gradually lost, by their own example, in the eyes of the Hindoos, that respect, which was so necessary to give force and energy to instruction.

No. 2.

Letter from Mr. J. D. Paterson; 30 August 1799.

10. Under the Mogul government, the Persian delegates of the Emperor, being Sheahs, seemed to pay little attention to the minutiæ of the Sunnee laws. Their procedure was summary; their punishments cruel and capricious: they thought terror alone sufficient to suppress and prevent crimes, but they neglected the discipline, which might render such procedures unnecessary.

11. The Persian rulers and their retainers, were Sheahs and strangers in the land; the subjects were either Hindoos or Sunnies; the first, in their ideas, infidels, and the latter, incorrigible heretics. To enforce instruction in tenets so hostile to their own faith, must have been, in their opinion, blasphemy and profanation.

No. 3.—(The 15th and 35th INTERROGATORIES, proposed by the Governor General in Council of Bengal to the Judges of Circuit and the Zillah Judges)—having been printed under Order of 30th April, is not here inserted.

—No. 4.—

EXTRACT containing Paragraph 4. of Report from Mr. E. Colebrooke, Second Judge of the COURT of CIRCUIT for the Division of Patna, on the completion of the Gaol Delivery of the extra Sessions of that Division; dated Patna, 21st April 1804, to the Nizamut Adawlut.

EXTRACT BENGAL JUDICIAL CONSULTATIONS;
10th May 1804.

EXTRACT from the Report of Mr. Edward Colebrooke, Second Judge of the Patna Court of Circuit, on the completion of the Jail Delivery of the extra Sessions of that Division addressed to the Nizamut Adawlut; dated Patna, 21st April 1804.

Paragraph 4.

ANOTHER not less heinous offence attaching to these affrays, is perjury, to which recourse is invariably had both for the prosecution and defence of such charges. To such a pitch of shameless audacity has this crime long since reached in this province, that a total distrust of human testimony, on every occasion, is the consequence. No rank, no caste, is exempt from the contagion; a zemindarry dewan, a brahmin, who had circumstantially sworn to the nature and number, and to the authors of the wounds on two of his cutcherry amla, alleged to have been murdered in an attempt to dispossess him from the cutcherry, scarcely blushed when the two men were produced alive and unhurt in Court; and merely pleaded in excuse, that had he not sworn as directed, he should have lost his employ.

—No. 5.—

EXTRACT of Judicial LETTER from the Court of Directors of the East India Company, to the Governor General in Council of Bengal, dated the 25th of April 1806; Paragraph 24.

EXTRACT JUDICIAL LETTER TO BENGAL;

Dated the 25th April, 1806.

Para. 24.—THE nefarious and dangerous crime of perjury, we are much concerned to find, continues to prevail in all the divisions, and even increases to such a pitch as to baffle and perplex the judicial proceedings of the Courts; so that the Judge receives all oral testimony with distrust, and is frequently obliged to investigate the character of the witness more closely than that of the criminal. A most flagrant instance of this nature is stated by the Judge of the Patna Court of Circuit, in his Report on the completion of the extra Sessions of that Division, in February 1804; where, on a trial for murder, after a brahmin had deliberately, in the most solemn form, sworn to and described the number and nature of the wounds inflicted on two persons, whom he had also sworn to have been murdered, these two persons were produced in Court alive and unhurt. The little obligation attached by the natives to an oath, seems to proceed, in a great degree, from the nature of their superstition and the degraded characters of their deities, as well as the almost entire want of moral instruction among them; and this points to the necessity of other remedies, as well as the most rigorous punishment of a crime so hurtful to society as perjury.

— No. 6.—

EXTRACT of a LETTER from the Court of Directors of the East India Company, to the Government of Fort St. George; dated the 23d January 1805; Paragraph 16.

EXTRACT PUBLIC LETTER TO FORT ST. GEORGE;

Dated 23d January 1805.

Para. 16.—THE Society for promoting Christian Knowledge, who support the Protestant mission on the Coromandel Coast, have communicated to us an Extract of Advices from their Missionaries, in which it is stated, that the native converts to Christianity in the district of Tinnevelly, had been exposed to very severe persecution from their heathen neighbours, and from some of the native officers employed in the collections. This account we do not understand to have been transmitted in the nature of a complaint to be prosecuted here, but to be made part of the details which are usually given by the Missionaries; still less was it intended to reflect on the European servants of the Company; because it adds, that on a representation of the grievances of the native Christians to the Collector, he interposed his authority to stop the injustice and malevolence exercised towards them. Mr. Lushington, now in England, who was then Collector, and appears to have maintained just sentiments against persecution, on the score of any religion existing under the Company's Government; though he ascribes the animosity towards those who became Christians partly to other causes, also asserts, that he issued positive injunctions not to disturb them on account of the faith they embraced; but the Society, alarmed lest similar instances of persecution should hereafter occur, have expressed a hope, that we will give orders which may prevent every thing of this kind, and protect the persons and the labours of their Missionaries in the discharge of the important duties with which they are entrusted.

No. 6.

Extract of Letter from the Court of Directors to the Government of Fort St. George; 23 January 1805.

Satisfied that there has been no intention in our Government to act otherwise, we think it requisite only to state, that as we have never countenanced any species or degree of religious intolerance in the countries subject to our authority; and Mahomedans, Parsees, Hindoos, in all their varying sects, have been permitted to follow their separate persuasions without molestation; so it can be no question, that all who profess the Christian faith, whether of European, Armenian, or Indian race, should enjoy the like privilege and protection; therefore officers of every rank, Europeans and natives, employed in the administration of our affairs, should conform themselves to these general principles, from which any deviation, past or future, must excite our disapprobation; and whilst those officers are careful to secure the obedience and the revenue due to Government, they should be the defenders of every subject against injurious treatment on a religious account; and with regard also to the Missionaries, so long as they conduct themselves in a prudent and upright manner, as they appear hitherto to have done, we cannot doubt that their persons will be duly respected.

—No. 7.—

EXTRACT of a LETTER from Lieutenant Colonel Wilks, Acting Resident of Mysore, to the Chief Secretary of the Government of Fort St. George, dated 4th of March 1807, on the subject of the HINDOO RELIGION.

EXTRACT, FORT ST. GEORGE, PUBLIC CONSULTATIONS;
13th March 1807.

EXTRACT from Letter of Lieut. Col. Wilks, acting Resident at Mysore, to the Chief Secretary to the Government of Fort St. George, dated Mysore, 4th March 1807.

THE religion of the Hindoos is usually represented as unchanged and unchangeable. Perhaps the religious history of Europe is scarcely less pregnant with revolutions, and unhappily (contrary to another erroneous opinion) no country on earth furnishes the records of such sanguinary persecutions as those which have been achieved by the brahmins of India.

—No. 8.—

EXTRACTS, or so much of the CORRESPONDENCE of the Governor General in Council of Bengal, with the Court of Directors of the East India Company, as relates to the Abolition of the Practice of SACRIFICING CHILDREN at Saugor and other places.

EXTRACT BENGAL JUDICIAL CONSULTATIONS;
the 18th February 1802.

(Criminal.)

(No. 2.)

Calcutta Magistrates,
To the Honourable G. H. BARLOW, Esq. Vice President in Council.

HONOURABLE SIR,

WE think it our duty to submit to your consideration the enclosed Copy of a Deposition, delivered at the Police by Mr. C. Sterling.

2. The

2. The deponent, in substance, states, that being at Sagor, on the day of the full moon, in the month of November last, he was a witness to several human sacrifices offered, as he represents, to the sharks; and that the victims consisted of old men, old women, and children.

3. Other depositions have been taken, some on oath, and some without an oath, to the same effect.

4. Having made the circumstances above-mentioned an object of our particular attention, it appears that the sacrifices are, as stated in the depositions, of two descriptions; of aged persons, of both sexes, which are voluntary, and of children, which, of course, are involuntary; and that the periods fixed for the performance of them, are at the full moon in November, and in January.

5. The custom of sacrificing children is confined to the people of the eastern districts. The practice arises from vows made by their parents, who, when apprehensive of not having issue, had promised, in the event of their having five children, to devote the fifth, in its infancy, to the Ganges.

6. It might be supposed, that superstition could not be carried further: the following, however, is an incident in which the dictates of bigotry appear to be still more strongly opposed to the sentiments and feelings of nature. Apprehensions being entertained, lest these sacrifices might, at a future period, be prevented by the police, a boy of about twelve years of age, who, we have reason to believe, was not the fifth child, and who, consequently, according to the strict letter of the vow, was not liable to be sacrificed, was thrown into the Ganges. The boy having saved himself by swimming, a Gosayn endeavoured to extend to him his protection; but, singular and unnatural as it may appear, he was again seized, and committed to destruction by his own parents *.

7. We have before stated, that the above sacrifices take place at Sagor, which island is held to be peculiarly sacred, from its being considered as the termination of the Ganges, and as the junction of that river with the sea. The spot where these rites are administered, is described in Major Rennels's map, under the title of 'The Place of Sacrifice.'

8. Sagor is not the only place where rites of the above nature are performed. The same practice prevails at Illahabad, at Baumsbarid in the zillah of Hooghly, and at Chogdah in the zillah of Nuddeah. We have reason to believe, however, that at those places it is become, for the most part, a mere ceremony; and that the children, though thrown into the Ganges, in conformity to the vow of their parents, are, generally, if not uniformly, rescued from destruction.

9. It does not appear that sacrifices of this nature are sanctioned by any tenet of the Hindoo code. What, however, has the force of a religious dogma, is the vow itself, and usage; which, in the opinion of the Hindoos, is equally binding as a written law.

10. The practice appears to be little countenanced by the religious orders, or by the great body of the people; who, on the contrary, think it a pious and meritorious act to rescue a child from destruction, and afterwards to adopt and maintain it at their own expense.

11. Not having been in possession of any information regarding the sacrifices in the month of November last, the sacrifices took place at that period without any interference on the part of the Police; when the number of victims destroyed amounted to no less than thirty-nine. In the past month, however, we sent a party to prevent a repetition of these barbarous rites; and are happy that the duty was effectually performed, without any disturbance or opposition whatever.

12. In considering the means best adapted for preventing a practice so repugnant to nature and humanity, we observe, that it would be consistent with precedents already established, to propose a regulation for the prevention of such sacrifices in future; but as we have no reason to suppose that the practice was authorized under the Mogul Government, as it was never sanctioned under the British Government, and as the parties concerned are liable to be tried and punished according to the established laws, we presume it would be sufficient to issue a proclamation, notifying, that any persons who may be parties to such sacrifices, will be tried and punished for the offence, according to the general laws and regulations of the country.

13. The foregoing remarks and suggestion are applicable only to the involuntary sacrifices of children. With respect to the self-devotion of the aged and infirm, in the Ganges, the practice prevails so generally, and is considered by the Hindoos, under certain circumstances, so instrumental to their happiness, in a future state of existence, that we doubt whether any rules which could be adopted would prevent a practice rooted in the most remote antiquity, and sanctioned by express tenets in their sacred books.

14. We take this opportunity of recommending, that the island of Sagor be declared subject to the jurisdiction of the Magistrates of the 24 Pergunnahs; it appearing to us, that

* The above circumstance serves to shew how erroneous the account was which was published regarding these sacrifices, in the India Gazette of the 21st December 1801.

No. 8.

Extracts of Correspondence relating to the Sacrificing Children.

that although the distance from Calcutta is considerable, yet that the communication ca be more easily maintained by means of the river, from Calcutta than from Midnapore; to which zillah it is at present considered to appertain. On the same grounds it may possibly appear to you expedient, that the civil jurisdiction of the island should be annexed to the zillah of Hooghly.

15. We beg leave to add, that a dispute having arisen among the Gosayns, regarding the partition of the amount collected from the pilgrims, the money was deposited with the police officers; and as the same differences still exist, we are at a loss in what manner to dispose of it. We shall, therefore, refer the parties to the Adawlut to establish their claim, or shall make such other appropriation of the money, as you may be pleased to direct. These contributions are levied from the pilgrims and shopkeepers resorting to Sagor for the performance of the above and other religious ceremonies, by the Gosayns, who derive their title thereto from a sage named Capila, who is supposed to have lived two thousand years before Christ,

We have the honour to be,
&c. &c.

Police Office, Calcutta,
17th Feb. 1802.

(Signed) C. Dowdeswell,
C. F. Martyn,
W. C. Blaquiere,
A. Macklew,
Edd Thoroton.

(No. 3.)

THE Information and Deposition of Charles Starling, a mate in the pilot service, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the Town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the nineteenth day of December 1801; who, on his oath, saith, That on the day of the full moon in November last, this deponent, and Edmund Bartlett, branch pilot, went from the Philip Dundas schooner on shore to the Pagoda Creek on Saugore island, where the people, as this deponent is informed, go annually to worship. That after this deponent and the said Edmund Bartlett got on shore, they walked up to the huts of the natives, and after being on shore for an hour, they saw the entrails, as they supposed to be, of a human body, floating on the water; and at the same time they also saw about three thousand natives on the beach, as near as this deponent can guess. This deponent further saith, That a fakeer, who was standing close to this deponent and the said Edmund Bartlett, this deponent asked him, the said fakeer, the reason why a number of the natives were ordered to be put into the water; he answered, that the head fakeer had ordered them to go to the water, to be devoured by the sharks, for the prosperity of their respective families. He, the said fakeer, also informed this deponent, that if a woman had four children, she ought to put one of them into the water, to be devoured by the sharks, with the hope that the three other children should live. This deponent further saith, That while this deponent was on the beach, and during the time that he was in the boat going to the shore, this deponent saw altogether eleven men, women, and lads, destroyed by the sharks. This deponent further saith, That while they, this deponent, and the said Edmund Bartlett, were in the boat, they heard that a boy was to be put into the water, to be destroyed by the sharks: they waited there with an intention to save the boy, but he was not put into the water while the boat was there; and this deponent is informed and believes, that as soon as they returned to the schooner, the boy was also put into the water, and was destroyed by the sharks.

(Signed) Cha, Sterling.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me,

(Signed) C. F. Martyn.

Resolved, That the following Letter be written to the Nizamut Adawlut.

(No. 4.)

To T. H. Colbrooke and J. H. Harington, Esq.
Puisne Judges of the Nizamut Adawlut.

Gentlemen,

THE Vice-President in Council has the honour to transmit to you a Copy of a Letter, and of its Enclosure, from the Calcutta Magistrates, reporting a practice which prevails at the island of Sagor, of offering human sacrifices to the Ganges.

2. The Vice-President in Council, deeming it necessary that the most effectual measures should be taken for preventing the observance of this inhuman and criminal rite in future, requests that you will take the subject into your consideration, and that you will transmit to him the draft of a regulation for preventing the sacrifice of children at Sagor, or at any other place where the same practice may prevail.

We have the honour to be, &c.

Fort William,
18 Feb. 1802.

Ordered, That the Magistrate of Midnapore be directed to report, whether he is aware of any objection to the island of Sagor being separated from his jurisdiction, and annexed to the 24 pergunnahs.

Ordered,

No. 8.

Extracts of Correspondence relating to the Sacrificing Children.

Ordered, That the Calcutta Magistrates be informed, That the necessary measures will be adopted for preventing the inhuman and criminal practice of sacrificing children at Sagor in future; and that they will hereafter be furnished with orders, upon their suggestions regarding the jurisdiction of that island.

EXTRACT BENGAL JUDICIAL CONSULTATIONS,

20th August, 1802. (No. 18.)

(Criminal; Nizamut Adawlut.)

To His Excellency the Most Noble RICHARD Marquis WELLESLEY, K. P. Governor General, &c. &c. &c.—Fort William.

My Lord,

IN compliance with the desire expressed by the Honourable the Vice-President in Council, in his Letter of the 18th February last, we have prepared, and have now the honour to transmit, the draft of a Regulation for preventing the Sacrifice of Children at Saugor and other places.

We have the honour to be, with respect, &c.

Fort William, the 20th May 1802. (Signed) H. Colebrooke, J. Harrington.

A. D. 1802. REGULATION VI.

A REGULATION for preventing the Sacrifice of Children at Saugor and other places. Passed by the Governor General in Council, on the 20th August 1802; corresponding with the 5th Bhadoon 1209 Bengal era; the 7th Bhadoon 1209 Fussily; the 5th Bhadoon 1209 Willaity; the 8th Bhadoon 1859 Sumbut; and the 20th Rubbee us Saanee 1217 Higeree.

IT has been represented to the Governor General in Council, that a criminal and inhuman practice of sacrificing children, by exposing them to be drowned, or to be devoured by sharks, prevails at the island of Saugor, and at Bansbaryah, Chaugdah, and other places on the Ganges. At Saugor, especially, such sacrifices have been made at fixed periods, namely, the day of full moon in November and in January; at which time, also, grown persons have devoted themselves to a similar death. Children, thrown into the sea at Saugor, have not been generally rescued, as is stated to be the custom at other places; but the sacrifice has, on the contrary, been completely effected, with circumstances of peculiar atrocity in some instances. This practice, which is represented to arise from superstitious vows, is not sanctioned by the Hindoo law, nor countenanced by the religious orders, or by the people at large; nor was it at any time authorized by the Hindoo or Mahomedan governments of India. The persons concerned in the perpetration of such crimes, are therefore clearly liable to punishment; and the plea of custom would be inadmissible in excuse of the offence. But, for the more effectual prevention of so inhuman a practice, the Governor General in Council has enacted the following Regulation to be in force, from the promulgation of it, in the provinces of Bengal, Behar, Orissa, and Benares.

The offence of destroying persons not arrived at maturity, by throwing them into water, declared murder, and punishable with death. Trials of principals and accomplices in the offence to be referred to the Nizamut Adawlut. That court how to pass sentence. To report to Government prisoners esteemed deserving of mercy.

II. If any person or persons shall wilfully, and with the intention of taking away life, throw or cause to be thrown, into the Sea, or into the river Ganges, or into any other river or water, any infant, or person not arrived at the age of maturity, with or without his or her consent, in consequence whereof such person so thrown into water shall be drowned, or shall be destroyed by sharks or by aligators, or shall otherwise perish; the person or persons so offending, shall be held guilty of wilful murder, and, on conviction, shall be liable to the punishment of death; and all persons aiding or abetting the commission of such act, shall be deemed accomplices in the murder, and shall be subject to punishment accordingly. The trials of prisoners convicted as principals or accomplices of the crimes specified in this section, shall be referred to the Court of Nizamut Adawlut; which is to pass sentence thereupon, according to Section 75. Regulation IX. 1793, whatever may be the futwah of the law officers of that court; or report to the Governor General in Council the case of any prisoner who may appear to that court to be a proper object of mercy; in conformity with Section 79. Regulation IX. 1793.

In cases where the persons thrown into the water shall escape death, the offence deemed a high misdemeanor, and punishable by [temporary imprisonment, to be adjudged by] Courts of Circuit.

III. If a child, or any person not arrived at maturity, be thrown into water, as stated in the preceding section, and be rescued from destruction, or by any means escape from it, the persons who shall have been active in exposing him or her to danger of life, and all aiders and abettors of such act, shall be held guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, on conviction, shall be liable to such punishment as the Courts of Circuit, under the futwah of their law officers, may judge adequate to the nature and circumstances of the case.

Magistrates to be vigilant against the practice, and to proclaim the provisions of this Regulation.

IV. The Magistrates of districts, wherein the sacrificing of children may have been hitherto practised, are required to be vigilant to prevent the continuance of the practice; and shall cause the provisions of this Regulation to be from time to time proclaimed at the places, and in the season, where and when such sacrifices have hitherto been effected.

No. 8

Extracts of Correspondence relating to the Sacrificing Children.

EXTRACT JUDICIAL LETTER FROM BENGAL;

dated 30th September 1802.

Para. 43.—HIS Excellency in Council has the honour to forward to your Honourable Court, ten printed copies of the under-mentioned Regulations, passed during the course of the present year.

REGULATION VI. 1802.

A REGULATION for preventing the Sacrifice of Children at Saugor and other places.

EXTRACT JUDICIAL LETTER TO BENGAL;

dated September 14th 1803.

Letter from dated 30th September 1802.
43. Forwarding printed copies of Regulations.

28. WE are not aware of there being any objection to the several Judicial Regulations described in this paragraph; but feeling a general interest in the cause of humanity, and a particular one in whatever respects the natives of India who are subject to the British Government; we deem it incumbent upon us to express our entire approbation of the 6th Regulation of 1802, which has for its object the prevention of the criminal and inhuman practice, which prevails at the Island of Saugor and other places, of sacrificing children at certain periods, by exposing them to be drowned, or to be devoured by sharks. We rely upon the most vigilant attention on the part of the officers of the Police for carrying the Regulation into complete effect.

—No. 9.—

EXTRACTS of the CORRESPONDENCE of the Governor General, and of the Governor in Council of Bombay, with the Court of Directors of the East India Company, so far as relates to the Abolition of the Practice of INFANTICIDE in the Districts of Juanpore, Guzerat, and Kutch.

BENGAL REGULATION XXI. 1795.

EXTRACT REGULATION for preventing Brahmins, in the province of Benares establishing Koorhs, wounding or killing their Female Relations or Children, or setting Dhurnah; and for preventing the Tribe of Raujekoomars in that province killing their Female Children.—Passed by the Governor General in Council, on the 28th August 1795.

Preamble.—THE reverence paid by the Hindoos to Brahmins, and the reputed inviolability of their persons, and the loss of or prejudice to caste, that ensues from proving the cause of their death, have in some places in the province of Benares, and more especially in the pergunnahs of Kuntit and Budhoee, being converted by some of the more unlearned part of them, into the means of setting the laws at defiance, from the dread and apprehensions of the persons of the Hindoo religion, to whose lot it must frequently fall to be employed in enforcing against such Brahmins any process or demands on the part of Government. The devices occasionally put in practice, under such circumstances, by these Brahmins, are, lacerating their own bodies, either more or less slightly, with knives or razors; threatening to swallow, or, sometimes actually swallowing poison, or some powder which they declare to be such; or constructing a circular inclosure called a Koorh, in which they raise a pile of wood or of other combustibles, and betaking themselves to fasting, real or pretended, place within the area of the koorh an old woman, with a view to sacrifice her, by setting fire to the koorh, on the approach of any person to serve them with any process, or to exercise coercion over them on the part of Government or its delegates. These Brahmins likewise, in the event of their not obtaining relief within a given time, for any loss or disappointment that they may have justly or unjustly experienced, also occasionally bring bring out their women or children, and causing them to sit down in the view of the Peon, who is coming towards them on the part of Government or its delegates, they brandish their swords, and threaten to behead or otherwise slay these females or children on the nearer approach of the Peon; and there are instances, in which from resentment at being subjected to arrest or coercion, or other molestation, they have actually not only inflicted wounds on their own bodies, but put to death with their swords, the females of their families or their own female infants, or some aged female procured for the occasion. Nor are the women always unwilling victims; on the contrary, from the prejudices in which they are brought up, it is supposed, that in general they consider it incumbent on them to acquiesce cheerfully in this species of self-devotement, either from motives of mistaken honour or of resentment and revenge, believing that after death they shall become the tormentors of those who are the occasion of their being sacrificed. On similar principles, these Brahmins, to realize any claim or expectation, such as the recovery of a debt, or for the purpose of extorting some charitable donation, frequently proceed either with some offensive weapon or with poison, to the door of another inhabitant of the same town or village, and take post there in the manner called Dhurna; and it is understood, according to the received opinions on this subject, that they are to remain fasting in that place until their object be attained, and that it is equally incumbent on the party who is the occasion of such Brahmin's thus setting, to abstain from nourishment until the latter be satisfied. Until this is effected, ingress and egress to and from his house are also more or less prevented; as, according to the received opinions, neither the one nor the other can be attempted, but at the risk of the Brahmin's wounding himself with the weapon, or swallowing the powder or poison with which he may have come provided. These Brahmins, however, are frequently obliged to desist, and are removed from setting dhurna by the officers of the Courts of Justice, without any ill consequences resulting; it having been found by experience, that they seldom or ever attempt to commit suicide or to wound themselves or others, after they are taken into the custody of Government. The rules and measures adopted for putting a stop to these abuses, and for preventing the revival of the still more savage custom, which until within these few years had been generally prevalent amongst the tribe of Raujekoomars, inhabiting the borders of the province near Juanpoor, of destroying their infant female children, by suffering them to perish for want of sustenance, are hereby enacted, with modifications, into a Regulation.

Section XIII.—In the month of December 1789, the tribe of Raujekoomars having bound themselves to discontinue the practice of causing their female infants to be starved to death; it is now accordingly ordained, That from the establishment and opening of the City and Zillah Courts, and of the Court of Circuit in Benares, if any Raujekoomar shall designedly prove the cause of the death of his female child, by prohibiting its receiving nourishment, as set forth in the preamble to this Regulation, or in any other manner, the Magistrate, on receiving information thereof upon oath, or such other information or proof as he shall deem sufficient to render the charge highly probable, shall cause such Raujekoomar to be apprehended in the manner prescribed, and make the enquiry ordered in Section 5. Regulation IX. 1793; when, if it shall appear to the Magistrate that the crime has been actually committed, and that there are grounds for suspecting the prisoner to have been concerned in the perpetration of it, the Magistrate shall cause him to be committed to prison, to be tried before the Court of Circuit, and shall at the same time take all the other precautions required in the Section and Regulation last quoted, relative to securing the attendance of the original complainant or informant, and of the witnesses; and the prisoner shall be tried accordingly, in the manner directed in Regulation IX. 1793, and Regulation XVI. 1795, with respect to other cases of murder.

EXTRACT BOMBAY POLITICAL CONSULTATIONS;

20th May 1806.

EXTRACT of Letter from the Governor in Council of Bombay, to the Governor General in Council; dated 15th May 1806.

Para. 52.—ANOTHER object, which the expedition might have in view, would be, an attempt to reform the manners of several of these chieftains, who, in common with the Jerajah tribe in the contiguous country of Cutch, put their female children generally to death as soon as they are born. Of this fact we have received too many concurrent testimonies, to admit of hesitation in the belief of its prevalence; and the accompaniment marked in the margin will be found to contain such official proceedings as we have hitherto held, respecting a discovery so deplorable and humiliating to the human race. (No. 10.)

EXTRACT of Letter from Major Walker, Resident at Baroda, to the Governor in Council of Bombay; dated 27th May 1805.

Para. 5.—IT may not be superfluous to observe, for the information of the Honourable the Governor in Council, that both these families came originally from Boojee, but have been established, from a remote period, in Kattywar; the Imaum is a title or surname assumed only by the elder branch; and that both are distinguished by the no less extraordinary than barbarous practice of putting their female children to death in their infancy.

No. 9.

Extracts of Correspondence relating to the abolition of Infanticide in Juanpore, Guzerat, and Kutch.

With respect to the usage above adverted to, of female Infanticide, it is known to be equally practised among all the Jarajahs, or those who are of the same caste with the family of the present Rajahs of Cutch, besides being probably diffused more or less amongst several other classes on the borders of that country; into all which Major Walker is to be desired to cause full enquiry to be made, with a view to ascertain whether these people might not, by persuasion, be restrained from a practice so abhorrent of all principle and natural feeling; particularly in as far as the same may be found any where to exist within the Gnicawars or the Paishwas, or our own part of Guzerat, in which a beginning might be made, by inducing the parties to sign to such an agreement as our President took in 1789, from a like race of Infanticides called Ranjee Koomars, in a remote district of the division of Benares then under his charge: of which some account, and a copy of the said deed or writing, will be found in a deputation from Lord Teignmouth, in one of the volumes of the Asiatic Researches, of which the Resident is to be furnished with a manuscript copy, desiring him thereon to communicate with Sunderjee Sheojee, of Mandavee in Cutch, now on his way to Baroda, and endeavour to gain his assent to becoming our agent for effecting the abrogation, in that quarter, of so detestable and atrocious a custom.

EXTRACT from the Proceedings of the Honourable the Governor in Council of Bombay, in the Political Department; under date the 1st of November 1805.

[READ the following Letter from the Resident at Baroda; with two Enclosures.]

To F. WARDEN, Esq. Secretary to Government, Bombay.

SIR,

1. I HAVE the honour to enclose, for the information of the Honourable the Governor in Council, a translation of a Letter, received from Sunderjee Saujee of Cutch; communicating some particulars relative to the practice of female Infanticide among the tribe of Jarajahs, and some information on the state of affairs among the chieftains bordering on the gulph of Cutch.

2. The Honourable the Governor in Council will observe with regret, that so large a number of innocent children annually suffer, from the prevalence of the barbarous custom of female Infanticide, among the caste of Jarajahs; but the custom seems limited to that tribe who inhabit Cutch and Kattywar, as I have not been able to trace its existence among any other people of Guzerat.

3. I have the honour to enclose a copy of a Letter, written to Sunderjee on the subject of this custom; but I fear the humane attempt of the Honourable the Governor in Council will not be successful, to any great extent, in restraining the superstitious and religious prejudices of a tribe, which are so far removed from the authority of the British Government, and so little acquainted with the principles of improved society.

I have the honour, &c.

Baroda, 1st September 1805.

(Signed) A. Walker, Resident.

TRANSLATION of a Letter from Sunderjee Saujee of Cutch, to Major Walker; dated the 17th Jemodurlawa, or 13th August; received in Baroda the 13th.

YOUR favoured Letter, relative to ascertaining the sentiments and designs of the Chieftain of Dherole, as the views of the Company are directed towards him; as also relative to the establishment of the fact of the caste of Jarijahs drowning their daughters in milk on their birth, and why they do not permit them to live; and concerning your health; arrived in due time: its contents were understood.

After visiting Dherole, and ascertaining the circumstances above mentioned, according to your desire, I will write the same in detail, and dispatch them for your information; for I am obedient to your orders, and will not deviate.

The drowning of the daughters of the Jarijahs proceeds from this cause. In this country there is no one who can marry into the tribe of Jarijahs; wherefore they drown their daughters; and there may be annually five or 600 births among the Jarijahs, in as much as the Chieftains of Moorbee, Holder, Gendul, Wagen, Cutch, and Kutchacot, are all Jarijahs, and are all related; and among relatives it is not customary for Hindoos to marry: except relatives, there are none of their own tribe.—Such is the custom of the Jarijahs.

From Major WALKER to SUNDERJEE.

I HAVE been favoured with your Letter of the 17th of Jumaduilawell; communicating your intentions of proceeding to the Dherole country, whenever the season for purchasing horses arrives, and detailing some customs of the caste of Jarijahs.

I have to request, that on this interesting subject you will, in your next Letter, be more particular, and detail every circumstance relative to the inhuman custom, which is practised by the Jarijahs, in putting their female children to death in their infancy.

The

No. 9.

Extracts of Correspondence relating to the abolition of Infanticide in Juanpore, Guzerat, and Kutch.

The prevalence of such a barbarous custom must be a subject of regret to all the friends of humanity, and the more so to the British Government, whose views being ever directed to promote the happiness of their own subjects and neighbours, cannot learn without horror, that five or 600 innocent children are annually put to death; who, if suffered to live, would contribute so much to increase the population, and the consequent prosperity of the country in which they abide.

This custom is the more extraordinary and reprehensible, as it is expressly forbidden by the Hindoo laws, and in the Brimha Bywant Poorant is called a great crime. In the Pooran it being written, that killing even a fœtus is as criminal as killing a brahmin, and condemns the perpetrators to suffer in the hell called Nerk, for as many years as there are hairs on the child's body.

It would therefore be a very acceptable service to humanity, highly gratifying to Mr. Duncan and the British Government, and honourable to yourself, if you could exert your influence to put a stop to such a barbarous custom.

When the Honourable Mr. Duncan was in charge of the province of Benares, he put a stop to the custom, which was then practised by a caste called Raujee Koomars, by getting the caste to sign an agreement, by which any one, who committed this crime, should be expelled from the tribe, and neither eat, drink, or sleep, with the members of it; besides suffering the punishment denounced in the Pooran. If such an agreement could be executed in Cutch, it would probably be effectual.

To Mahomed Seth you may return an answer of civility, but give him no assurances. I am anxious to hear from you about the business between Molive Mahomed Ali and Hunsraj Sa.

(Signed) A. Walker.
Resident.

Baroda,
1st Sept. 1806.

REPORT from the SUPERINTENDENT of POLICE.

DAMAJEE CUTCHERAJ, a respectable merchant of Cutch, informs me it is very true that the Jarejah tribe, in the district of Cutch, do very generally put their female infant children to death the instant they are born; the Rajah of Cutch follows this practice in his family, as also the Rajah of Jamnuggur, the Rajah of Moorbee, and the others in general; some, however, amongst this tribe, from a sense of the wickedness of the crime, and being good moral men, preserve their female children, but these are few in number. Their reason, as he has heard, for this abominable practice is, that the fathers do not wish their daughters to obey their husbands, being of a bold, domineering, proud spirit. On being asked, where the men of this tribe get wives, he informs me, from the other Rajapoot tribes. On being asked, how their infants are destroyed, he says, he has heard, that when a woman is in labour, a large pot of milk is brought and placed in the room, and if an unfortunate female is produced, the nurse immediately puts it into the pot of milk, and drowns it. That he has frequently asked the poorer class of this tribe, how they put their female children to death, and they have always answered, by making them drink milk; alluding to their being thrown into the pot of milk. The midwives are the only persons accessary to this horrid deed, and this is their language. He has never known any Jarejah families in Bombay. They have little or no trade, seldom go abroad, and live principally by the produce of their lands, and as soldiers. Dhunbhoy, an old nurse from the district of Cutch, informs me, that she never was employed as a nurse in any of the Jarejah families in that district, but her grandmother was, and she has heard her often declare, that whenever a female child was born, the unfortunate infant was put into a cudjeree pot of milk, with its head uppermost, along with the afterbirth, and thus immediately destroyed; on the contrary, when a son was born, great rejoicings were made, by feasting their friends, &c. She declares she knows no cause how this extraordinary custom arose, but has heard, that being a tribe of the Rajapoot caste, they do not wish that their females should obey any one: independent of this, no one likes to take a female of this tribe into their family, as it is reckoned very unlucky to have any thing to do with them, and in general it is but too often verified.

This is the result of my enquiries.

(Signed) S. Halliday.

RELATION by SUNDERJEE SHEUJEE, of the part of Mundavee in the country of Cutch.

IT is notoriously known to be the established practice among those of the Jarejah tribe, in the country of Cutch, and adjoining districts of Kattywar (in the peninsula of Guzerat) not to bring up their daughters, but to put them to death at their births. The legend that I have heard, as accounting for this strange practice, is as follows:

In former times, it so happened, that to one of the head men of these Jarejahs several female children were born; and as, among the Hindoos, it is incumbent to provide husbands for their daughters, whilst these latter are yet in their nonage, the Jarejah chieftain abovenamed, applied accordingly to his family brahmin to pursue the necessary measures for getting the said Jarejah's female children contracted in marriage, with the sons of his equals in the tribe, and of like valour and power, as he possessed.

The brahmin, after making every enquiry, and going about to every place in quest of suitable matches for these children, returned without effecting his object; reporting thereon to the chieftain in question, that although he had exerted all his endeavours to find proper alliances for his female children, still he (this brahmin) had not traced any one who was of competent qualifications to be his son-in-law; wherefore (added the brahmin) since to retain these your female offspring in the family house, after their arriving at the age of womanhood, is contrary to the rules of religion, I will take them with me, and burn them in the fire, on condition that it be stipulated on your part, to destroy at their birth all issue of the same sex, that shall hereafter be born in your family; laying hereon, as I now do, my solemn malediction, both here and hereafter, on you and yours, if you fail to perform the same, in such manner, that if you shall preserve any of your future daughters, they shall pass their lives in penury and want; nor shall good attend the father or the mother of such children.

No. 9.

Extracts of Correspondence relating to the abolition of Infanticide in Juanpore, Guzerat, and Kutch.

It is further reported, that after thus speaking, that brahmin took away those innocent girls, and consumed them in the flames; and that, in conformity to the stipulation and denunciation aforesaid, the people of the Jarejah tribe, dwelling in the country of Cutch, and in the pergunnahs of Hallar and other places within the contiguous peninsula of Guzerat, have, to the present day, continued to adhere to the practice in question; whereby, whenever a daughter is born to them, they do forthwith put these helpless babes, without compassion or pity, to death, placenta supernares os que incumbente, without allowing of their surviving for the shortest space.—Examination thereon of Sunderjee.

2. It has been understood, that Adeeba, the daughter of Ralahajee, a former Rajah of Cutch, was married to one of the Guicowar Rajahs; whence it is to be concluded, that the practice of the Jarejahs killing their daughters is not without exception.

Answer. That is true; and Adeeba is still surviving at Booje, the capital of Cutch; yet there are, nevertheless, but few exceptions, such as in this instance, to the general rule, because, from the effect of the malediction pronounced, no good ensues from their preservation; in so much that if any daughters of this tribe get married into other houses, the gain in such houses becomes less plentiful; nor do such women produce sons, but are the occasion of feuds arising in the families into which they are thus transplanted. Throughout all the country of Cutch there may be six or eight houses wherein the Jarejah masters of families bring up their daughters, or otherwise the practice is general; and besides what happens within the limits of that country, the Jarejah chieftains of Mooroee (written also Moorbe) Goondul and Jamnagurs, in the peninsula of Guzerat, do also kill their female infants.

There is an instance of Neesagee, the Kakerwalla chieftain of Cutch, having given his daughter in wedlock to Gholaum Shek, one of the former Mahomedan rulers of Sciardee, of the Kollera tribe, an event that must have happened forty years ago. But, at this period, this Kakerwalla family do not bring up their female infants: those who occasionally do so, are induced to it by the consideration of thereby acquiring the merit of having sons born to them; as, for instance, when a man has a succession of female children produced in his family, he will, at the suggestion of any one, be induced to believe, that by sparing and bringing them up, sons will also be acquired to him; whence, chiefly, Jarejah daughters are sometimes met with; of which there is, within my recollection, another instance in the case of the Rose Chieftain of Cutch, by name Vizragee, who has married a daughter of his to the son of Attabye, the Rajah of Bhownaghurs. That lady may now be about 20 or 22 years of age; but I have not heard that she has yet had any male issue, but that, on the contrary, her husband and she do not agree.

EXTRACT POLITICAL LETTER TO BOMBAY;

Dated 30th August 1809.

Para. 6.—WE cannot quit this subject of the Kattywar expedition, without expressing our entire approbation of your having instructed Major Walker to prevail upon the several chieftains in that district to renounce the horrid practice of destroying their female infants. We have the consolation to observe, that in consequence of Major Walker's interference, several of these chieftains have, by the execution of a most solemn deed, renounced this shocking custom in future.

EXTRACT BOMBAY POLITICAL CONSULTATIONS;

6th January 1810.

[Read the following Letter from the Resident at Baroda, with Enclosures.]

Honourable Sir,

1. DURING the recent expedition into Kattywar, I was not unmindful of enquiring into the success of the humane arrangements introduced under the influence of the Honourable Company's Government for the abolishment of Female Infanticide among the Jahrajah Rajpoots, and I am happy to report, that this reform has completely taken root.

2. I have

No. 9.

Extracts of Correspondence relating to the abolition of Infanticide in Juanpore, Guzerat, and Kutch.

2. I have the honour to enclose a list of those Jahrajahs who have preserved their female children, which fell under my own direct observance. On my halt at Dherole, I had all those in the immediate neighbourhood, who were capable of attending, brought to my tent, and many were too young to be brought to any distance. It was extremely gratifying on this occasion to observe the triumph of nature, feeling, and parental affection, over prejudice and a horrid superstition; and that those, who but a short period before would, as many of them had done, have doomed their infants to destruction without compunction, should now glory in their preservation, and doat on them with fondness.

3. The whole of the instances submitted in the accompanying list, have occurred since the execution of the engagements renouncing the practice of Infanticide; among these the Honourable the Governor in Council will observe the name of the Rajah of Moorhee, Kooer Dadajee, of Rajcote, and Kooer Wuctagee, of Dherole, and of several other men of rank and influence, whose example must have a most beneficial effect.

4. The list of lives which have been saved to the community by the humane interference of the Company's Government, might be very considerably increased by extending the enquiry into the Jahrajah villages, but this will be sufficient to shew that the preservation of female children has now become general. There is no reason to doubt of the final abolishment of this inhuman practice, when once the natural emotions of parental affection have resumed their sway: it may be reasonably expected that this cruel and barbarous prejudice will be condemned by those who formerly most strongly supported it.

5. As every anecdote relative to Infanticide is deserving of notice, it may be worthy of remark, that in Cutch there is a village inhabited by Jahrajahs, who have for many generations abstained from the universal custom of the caste, and preserved their female offspring.

6. This reformation has been produced in their manners by the influence of religion, and the presence of a temple of Vishnee in their neighbourhood. It is unnecessary to notice that the tenets of this sect inculcate a regard to animal life, and which have, in this case, extended their influence to the support of humanity.

7. I respectfully beg leave to submit to the consideration of the Honourable the Governor General in Council, a memorandum of disbursement made in presents to those Jahrajahs who had preserved their daughters, and who visited me at Dherole. The fund whence this disbursement is to be defrayed, is from the nuzzeranah exacted from the chieftain of Gondul, and which the Honourable the Governor in Council is already apprized included an amercement for the destruction of the female infant of that chieftain's son.

8. This arrangement is in conformity to the instruction of the Honourable the Governor in Council, and I respectfully trust it will be honoured with their approval and sanction.

I have, &c.

(Signed) A. Walker,
Resᵗ.

Baroda,
25th December 1809.

TRANSLATION of Memorandum, specifying those Jahrajahs who have preserved their Female Children.

Talooka Dherole.

1. Kooer Wuctagee.
2. Dadah Abegee.
3. Dadah Jetagee of Dherole Byaad.
4. Jarahjah Jetahgee of Jywah.
5. Dᵒ - Poonzajee of Lealah.
6. Dᵒ - Muckindjee of Sunsora.
7. Dᵒ - Mailajee of Dᵒ.
8. Dᵒ - Mootogee of Roofee Anna.
9. Dᵒ - Holajee of Dangur.
10. Dᵒ - Maroojee of Waogoodur.
11. Dᵒ - Bangee of Goolgaan.
12. Dᵒ - Punchanjee of Lealla.
13. Dᵒ - Desogee of Dᵒ.
14. Dᵒ - Jaymuljee of Razpoora.
15. Dᵒ - Jugoojee of Maigpoor.
16. Dᵒ - Byjee of Veperdee.
17. Dᵒ - Bharajee Dᵒ - Dᵒ.
18. Jarahjah Ajobjee of Anondpoor.
19. Dᵒ - Hallafu of Ajamchera.
20. D - Dosahjee of Bajorka.
21. D - Khaandajee of Babarah.
22. D - Dhooljee of Tulone.
23. Dᵒ - Jatajee of Dagarah.
24. Dᵒ - Mudlojee of Sunasooza.
25. Dᵒ - Jogajee of Dungra.
26. Huldore Marejee.
27. Jahrajah Imtajee.
28. Dᵒ - Jehajee of Rajcote.
29. Kooer Dudajee of Rajcote Byaad.
30. Jahrajah Jehajee, the Rajah of Moowee. a daughter just born.
31. Jalerajeh Jessagee of Jallia.
32. Kooer Dosajee of Kotaana Moorvee.

(Signed) A. Walker,
Resᵗ.

No. 9

Extracts of Correspondence relating to the abolition of Infanticide in Juanpore, Guzerat, and Kutch.

LIST of Enams and Presents to the daughters of the Jahrajahs; Talooka Dherole and Byaad.

Jarajah Wuctagee	- - - - - -	Rupees 300
D° - Bowagee's brother's daughter	- - - - -	250
- - - Dada Walojee	- - - - - - -	150
- - - D° - Jetajee	- - - - - - -	150
Jarajah Mailajee	- - - - - - -	150
D° - Pourzajee	- - - - - - -	200
D° - Jettajee	- - - - - - -	200
		1,400

(Signed) A. Walker,
Res^t.

Minute, 6th Jan.—We have read with interest and sympathy the preceding Report of the successful progress in the abolition of Female Infanticide, and we entirely approve of the measures which Colonel Walker has adopted, with a view to the advancement of that salutary and desirable object.

The acting Resident at Baroda to be also advised of these sentiments, for his future guidance in respect to the measures to be hereafter adopted, with reference to the future depression and ultimate extinction of this horrid practice among the Jarajah tribe in Kattywar.

EXTRACT PUBLIC LETTER TO BOMBAY;
Dated 26th October 1810.

Para. 5.—YOUR instructions to Lieutenant-Colonel Walker, to endeavour to prevail upon the several chieftains of Kattywar to renounce the horrid practice of Female Infanticide, have already had our entire approbation, as expressed in the 6th para. of our Political Letter to you, of the 30th August 1809; and it is with the deepest interest that we have perused Lieutenant Colonel Walker's Report, of the 25th December 1809, referred to in the 40th para. of your Political Letter, of the 31st January 1810; wherein we find, that the arrangements adopted by Lieutenant Colonel Walker, for the prevention of this barbarous custom, have been attended with success, and that the reform in the habits of the people, among whom the practice obtained had completely taken root, and that natural affection and parental feelings had so far begun to take place of prejudice and superstition, as to leave no doubt of the abolition of this inhuman practice being finally effected; and we cheerfully acknowledge Lieutenant Colonel Walker's merits, in having so successfully exercised himself in the general interests of humanity.

EXTRACT POLITICAL LETTER FROM BOMBAY;
Dated 31st January 1810.

Para. 40.—YOUR Honourable Court will peruse with interest and sympathy Colonel Walker's Report (dated 25th December) of the successful progress that has been already made in the abolition of the practice of Female Infanticide among the Jahrajah tribe in Kattywar; and we entirely approve of the measures which he has adopted, with a view to the further prosecution of this salutary and desirable object.

—No. 10.—

Copy of a REPORT made by the Reverend Dr. Kerr, Senior Chaplain of Fort St. George, to the Right Hon. Lord William Bentinck, dated Madras, 3^d November 1806; together with the Proceedings had thereupon.

EXTRACT FORT ST. GEORGE PUBLIC CONSULTATIONS;
the 27th June 1806.

The Right Honourable the President records the following MINUTE.

WE have a general knowledge that various sects of the church of Christ have been long established, and in great numbers, upon the western coast of the Peninsula. The first introduction

No. 10.

Reverend Dr. Kerr's Report, dated Madras, 3d November 1806; with Proceedings thereupon.

introduction of Christianity into India, is one of the most interesting objects of historical research, and comes peculiarly within the description of information which the Court of Directors required in their dispatch, under date the

The actual state of these sects is, perhaps, our more immediate care. In the universal toleration of all religions allowed by the British Government, as to use a more proud expression, in the universal protection and support which has been given to all religions, we seem called upon, in the strongest manner, to take under our particular charge the whole Catholic Church of Christ. When we consider the broadly marked and essential distinction of the Mahomedan and Hindoo religions from Christianity; and when we consider the comparatively trifling divisions between the various sects of our own church, our first wish must be to see the followers of Mahomed and of Bramah embrace Christianity: their adherence to this or that church, is a point, in my opinion, of secondary consideration. The precepts of our own religion, not less than the real interests of that religion, and, as a Christian, I must also add, the real interests of the great population, require that all Christian sects shall live in charity one with the other; that they should abstain from those impious persecutions which, in the Western world, have so much injured the cause of religion, and which, more than any other cause, perhaps, established the success of Mahometanism: in short, that they should mutually support and befriend each other.

The residence of Dr. Kerr, in the Mysore, would seem to present a favourable opportunity of obtaining the requisite information; I would, therefore, beg leave to propose, that this gentleman should be requested to proceed, when the state of his health and the season may permit, to the other coast; and report to Government all such information, as he may be able to collect, of the first introduction of Christianity into India; of the arrival of the different sects who have been or may be in existence; of their general history; and of the persecutions to which they may have been exposed; of their success in making proselytes; of their church establishments, and of the sources from which they are maintained; and all other circumstances connected with this subject.

Fort St. George, 27th June 1806. Approved; and Ordered accordingly.

(Diary 28th.)

To the Reverend Dr. KERR, Senior Chaplain of Fort St. George.

REVEREND SIR,

THE Right Honourable the Governor in Council, being desirous of availing himself of your vicinity to the Malabar Coast, to obtain every possible information in regard to the establishment, &c. of the Christian religion in that part of the peninsula; I am directed, by his Lordship in Council, to desire, that so soon as the state of your health and the season will permit, you will proceed to the provinces on that coast; and that you will forward to me, for the information of Government, such accounts as you may be able to collect, of the first introduction of Christianity into India; of the arrival of the different sects who have been or may be in existence; of their general history, and of the persecutions to which they may have been exposed; of their success in making proselytes; of their church establishments; and of the source from which they are maintained; with all other circumstances connected with this important subject.

I have the honour to be, &c.

Fort St. George, 28th June 1806. (Signed) G. G. Keble, Sec^{y} to Government.

EXTRACT, FORT ST. GEORGE, PUBLIC CONSULTATIONS;

7th November 1806.

To the Right Honourable Lord W. C. BENTINCK, Governor in Council, &c. &c. &c.

MY LORD,

WHEN at Mysore, I was honoured by the receipt of Mr. Secretary Keble's letter, dated the 28th of June last, and finding my general health much improving, I resolved to proceed to the Malabar Coast, in search of the information required by your Lordship in Council, regarding the Christians inhabiting that part of the peninsula; an investigation which I have found as interesting, as it is important, whether it regards humanity at large, or as it it connected in a political view, with the British interests in this country.

To examine the extensive field pointed out for my enquiries minutely, would require much more of my time, than could be well spared from my other public avocations; and as I learned, that the Rev. Dr. Buchanan was nominated by the Government of Bengal to travel over the same ground for purposes somewhat similar, I did not think it incumbent on me to take up more than a general view of the subject, and I directed my attention accordingly, not so much to details, as to matters of comprehensive import.

The first object to which the orders of Government refer, is, to an account of the introduction of Christianity into this country.

There can be no doubt whatever, that the St. Thome Christians settled on the Malabar

No. 10.

Reverend Dr. Kerr's Report, dated Madras, 3d November 1806; with Proceedings thereupon.

Coast at a very early period of the Christian Church, from whence they at one time spread, in various directions, as far even as Mileapore and St. Thomas's Mount; but to derive authentic information as to the time of their arrival, is at present no easy task.

From the confusion arising from the imperfection of Hindoo chronology, from the desire which these Christians have to derive their origin, from the earliest possible times (which may perhaps have introduced false traditions amongst them) and as all their authentic records are reported to have been destroyed during the persecutions of the Church of Rome; from all these circumstances, whether we refer to the Hindoo accounts, to the St. Thome Christians themselves, or to their persecutors the Roman Catholics, we are not likely to arrive at any certain conclusion as to the exact time of their establishment in Malabar. Some circumstances, however, may be collected from undoubted authority, by which it may be inferred, that they have been for nearly fifteen centuries established in India; for we find in ecclesiastical history, that at the first Council of Nice in the year 325, a bishop from India was amongst the number composing that memorable synod; and in the creeds and doctrines of the Christians of Malabar, internal evidence exists of their being a primitive church. For the supremacy of the Pope is denied, and the doctrine of transubstantion never has been held by them; and they regarded and still regard the worship of images as idolatrous, and the doctrine of purgatory to be fabulous. Moreover, they never admitted as sacraments, extreme unction, marriage, or confirmation; all which facts may be substantiated on reference to the acts of the synod established by Don Alexis De Moneses, archbishop of Goa at Diamper, in the year 1599.

The history of this Council will be found most ably detailed in a work printed in French, and entitled, The History of Christianity in India, published at the Hague in the year 1724, by La Croze, the celebrated librarian to the king of Prussia.

The object of this work was to deduce from authentic materials, the rise, progress, and establishment of Christianity in the East, and to hold up to disgrace and to merited indignation, the bigoted and unworthy conduct of the Roman Catholic church, in the persecution set on foot by her emissaries, under her avowed sanction, against the primitive Christians, who were found settled on the coast of Malabar; and La Croze has discharged his duty to the public, in a most faithful, interesting, and able manner.

When the Portuguese first arrived in this country, in the beginning of the 16th century, they found a Christian church, using the Syrio-Chaldaic language, established in the neighbourhood of Cranganore; and though it was published to the world many centuries before that period, that such a church existed, yet we find their ignorance expressed in the wonder which it excited. These Christians met the Portuguese as natural friends and allies, and rejoiced at their coming; but the Portuguese were much disappointed at finding the St. Thome Christians firmly fixed in the tenets of a primitive church, and soon adopted plans for drawing away from their pure faith this innocent, ingenuous, and respectable people. However, after using for nearly a century, all the customary arts and abominable persecutions of the Church of Rome to no purpose, Don Alexis de Moneses, the archbishop of Goa, appeared amongst them, and by his commanding influence, his zeal, and his learning, and on the authority of what he called the Council of Diamper, forced the Syrian metropolitan, his priests and people, into the Romish pale. The archbishop, however, had not long quitted the scene of this triumph of bigotry, ere the people sighed for their old religion, and cherished it in private; but on the 22d of May 1653, they held a congress at Alrigattee, and great numbers, headed by their metropolitan, revolted publicly from the Romish communion; nor has all the interest of the Roman Pontiff and the Kings of Portugal been able to draw them away again from their old faith.

Leaving the history of this interesting people; which is affectingly delineated in La Croze's book, I shall, in this Report, confine myself more particularly to the existing state of Christianity in Malabar; and in order that your Lordship may have the subject clearly before you, I shall consider each sect of Christians by itself, under the head of—1st, St. Thome, or Jacobite Christians; 2dly, The Syrian Catholics, who have been forced from the Jacobite church into the Romish pale; and 3dly, The Latin Church.

St. THOME, or JACOBITE CHRISTIANS.

THESE people, who still retain their ancient creed and usages, consider themselves as the descendants of the flock established by St. Thomas, who is generally esteemed the apostle of the East. Their ancestors appear to have emigrated from Syria, and the Syrio-Chaldaic is the language in which their church service is still performed. They admit no images within their churches but a figure of the Virgin Mary, with the child Jesus in her arms, which is considered merely as an ornament, and not a subject for idolatrous worship. They are generally denominated by the country people Nazaranee Mapillis. Nazaranies is obviously derived from Nazareth, but the origin of the word Mapillah is variously accounted for; by some, it is ingeniously supposed to refer to the Virgin and Child, the only image admitted within their churches; as Ma implies mother in various languages, derived from the Sangscrit, and pillah, child: others again construe the term, to indicate the rank originally conferred on these Christians by the sovereign of Malabar; Poolah signifies a class in a state synonimous with our secretaries; Ma, or Maha, signifies great or superior. The term Mapillah is indiscriminately applied to Jews and Mussulmen, as to these Christians; distinguishing each by the prefix of Jew, Syrian or Nazaranee, or Mussulman.

It is certain, that grants of honours and emoluments were formerly possessed by these Christians, given to them by a king of Malabar named Premaul, engraven on copper; five of

No. 10.

Reverend Dr. Kerr's Report, dated Madras, 3d November 1806; with Proceedings thereupon.

of which engravings are still in existence, a fac simile of which, I have seen in the possession of the Resident of Travancore.

It has been long believed that these Christians held the tenets of the Nestorian heresy, and that they were obliged to leave their own country in consequence of persecution; however, it appears that the creed which they now follow, denies that heresy, and seems to coincide in several points with the creed of St. Athanasius, but without its damnatory clauses.

Baron Von Wredé has written a memoir on the subject of these Christians, which appeared in the 7th volume of the Asiatic Researches, and which has the merit of calling our attention to these people; though it is no better than a tame transcript of information, which may be fully and satisfactorily obtained in La Croze's book, from whence every material part of that memoir is obviously taken; indeed wherever the Baron departs from his author, he becomes less interesting, or misleads his reader. That the Christians of Malabar were early taught the tenets of Nestorius, is proved by La Croze, on the direct authority of Casmas, an Egyptian merchant (himself a Nestorian) who published his voyage to India in the year 547. It seems, however, not improbable that Christianity had been planted on these shores long before the time of Nestorius; and I am inclined to regard the tradition of its having spread hither in the age of the apostles, as very far from fabulous*.

With respect to their religious tenets, writers may and will disagree. Upon such subjects human reason avails nothing. The disputes which on these points appear to have agitated the world, are, in general, no better than the perverse offspring of verbal differences.

The following is a faithful Version of the present Creed of these people, being a written communication from the Metropolitan to the Resident at Travancore.

"In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, we the Christians, believers in the "Religion of Jesus Christ, subject to the jurisdiction of Mar Ignatius, patriarch of Antioch, being loyal Jacobites,† hold the following creed:"

"We believe in the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, three persons in one God, neither "confounding the persons nor dividing the substance, one in three and three in one."

The Father, Generator; the Son generated, and the Holy Ghost proceeding.

"None is before or after other; in majesty, honour, might and power coequal; Unity in "Trinity and Trinity in Unity."

"We do not believe, with Arius and Eunomius, that there are three different and "separate substances."

"We do not believe, as Sabellius believes, by confusion of substance."

"We do not believe, as Macedonius said, that the Holy Ghost is less than the Father "and Son."

"We do not believe, as Mawney and ‡ Marcianus said, that the body of Christ was "sent down from Heaven."

"We do not believe, as Julianus § said, that Christ was only man."

"We do not hold, as Nestorius, the doctrine of two natures and two substances in the "Messiah; we do not believe, as the Chalcedonians said, that there are two natures in the "Messiah. But we believe, by the doctrine of the Trinity, that the Son is coequal with "the Father, without beginning or end; that in the appointed time, through the disposition of the Father and Holy Ghost, without disjoining from the right side of the Father, "he appeared on earth for the salvation of mankind; that he was born of the Virgin Mary, "through the means of the Holy Ghost, and was incarnate God and Man; so that in the "union of the divine and human nature, there was one nature and one substance."

"So we believe."

The service in their churches is performed very nearly after the manner of the Church of England, and when the metropolitan was told, that it was hoped that one day an union might take place between the two churches, he seemed pleased at the suggestion.

---

* Eusebius informs us, that there were Christians in India as early as the year 189; who had the Gospel of St. Matthew in Hebrew, which they declared was received from St. Bartholomew.

† Mosheim. Vol. IV. Section 11. Page 257. The Eastern Christians who renounce the communion of the Greek Church, and differ from it both in doctrine and worship, may be comprehended under two distinct classes. To the former belong the Monophysites or Jacobites, so called from Jacob Albardai; who declare it as their opinion, that in the Saviour of the world, there is only one nature; while the latter comprehends the followers of Nestorius, frequently called Chaldæans from the country where they principally reside, and who suppose that there are two distinct persons or natures in the Son of God. The Monophysites are subdivided into two sects or parties, the one African and the other Asiatic. At the heads of the Asiatic is the patriarch of Antioch, who resides for the most part in the monastery of St. Ananias, which is situated near the city of Meridden, and sometimes at Merdin, his episcopal seat, as also at Amida, Aleppo, and other Syrian Cities. The government of this prelate is too extensive, and the churches over which he presides, too numerous to admit of his performing himself all the duties of his high office; and therefore a part of the administration of the pontificate is given to a kind of colleague, who is called the Mapheian or Primate of the East, and whose doctrine and discipline are said to be adopted by the Eastern Church beyond the Tigris. This primate used formerly to reside at Tauris, a city on the frontiers of Armenia; but his present habitation is the monastry of St. Matthew, which is in the neighbourhood of Mousul, a city of Mesopotamia. It is further observable, that all the patriarchs of the Jacobites, assume the denomination of Ignatius.

‡ These I suppose might be Manes and Marcian.

§ Perhaps Julian, Bishop of Halicarnassus.

No. 10.

Reverend Dr. Kerr's Report, dated Madras, 3d November 1806; with Proceedings thereupon.

The present metropolitan, Mar Dionysius, is now old and infirm; but a very respectable character, and of the most venerable and prepossessing appearance. A person has been sent from Mousul, a city of Mesopotamia, to succeed to his station, in the event of his decease; but this stranger, ignorant of the language of the country, with the character of being violent in his temper, and not averse, as it is supposed, to the views of the Romish Church, it is to be hoped will be prevented from ever taking charge of this precious remnant of a pure and valuable people.

The metropolitan has several archdeacons and deacons under him, who act as vicars general. They have fifty-five churches; and the number of their people, as given in to the Resident, is estimated at 23,000.

The residence of their metropolitan is at Canderratter, twelve or fourteen miles inland from Cochin. In some of their churches divine service is performed in the Syrian and Latin ritual, alternately, by the priests of the Christians of St. Thome, who have adhered to their ancient rites; and those who have united to the Church of Rome *. When the latter have celebrated mass, they carry away their images from the church, before the others enter.

The character of these people is marked by a striking superiority over the Heathens in every moral excellence, and they are remarkable for their veracity and plain dealing. They are extremely attentive to the religious duties, and abide by the decision of their priests and metropolitan in all cases, whether in spiritual, or, as I heard, in temporal affairs. They are respected very highly by the Nairs, who do not consider themselves defiled by associating with them, though it is well known that the Nairs are the most particular of all the Hindoos in this respect, and the Rajahs of Travancore and Cochin admit them to rank next to Nairs. Their numbers, it is conjectured, are under-rated in the statement given to the Resident, as it is generally supposed that they may be estimated at 70 or 80 thousand. They are not persecuted; but they are not permitted to make converts by the governments under which they reside; and it is supposed, that many respectable Hindoos would be happy to join their sect, were it not for this circumstance; but at present they suffer, as far as I can learn, no other hardship.

If good men from Sysia could be obtained, not as parish priests, but to superintend and regulate their concerns, I conceive it would be a great blessing to these good people.

The direct protection of the British Government has been already extended to them, but as they do not reside within British territories, I am somewhat doubtful how far it may be of use to them.

To unite them to the Church of England, would, in my opinion, be a most noble work; and it is most devoutly to be wished for, that those who have been driven into the Roman pale, might be recalled to their ancient church; a measure which it would not, I imagine, be difficult to accomplish, as the country governments would, it is supposed, second any efforts to that purpose.

Their occupations are various, as those of other Christians; but they are chiefly cultivators and artizans, and some of them possess a comfortable if not a splendid independence. Their clergy marry in the same manner as Protestants. Their residence is entirely inland.

SYRIAN ROMAN CATHOLICS.

THESE people as stated above, were constrained to join the Latin Church, after a long struggle for the power of maintaining their purity and independence, and still appear a people perfectly distinct from the Latin Church; being allowed to chant and perform all the services of the Church of Rome in the Syrio-Chaldaic language, by a dispensation from the Pope. They live under the authority of the metropolitan of Cranganore, and the bishop of Verapoli, and dress differently from other priests. They wear a white surplice, while the priests of the Latin communion wear black gowns, like the capuchin friars of Madras. The Roman Catholic Syrians, it is thought, are much more numerous than the members of the original church. Their clergy are spread through the ancient Churches, and by retaining their language, and acting under the direction of the Church of Rome, they leave no means unessayed to draw over their primitive brethren to the Latin communion. It appears to me, that they are allowed to use their original language, and to frequent the original church, entirely with this view; and, as far as I can learn, their numbers are gaining ground. There are said to be 86 parishes of Roman Catholic Syrians subject to the dioceses of Cranganore and Verapoli. Their priests, to the number of 400, are styled Catanars, which is a Syrian appellation. Their congregations are reported at 90,000, of old and young included, agreeably to the last returns transmitted to Rome. There is an inferior order of priests, who are called Chiamas, in number about 120. The Hindoos have, as far as I can learn, a much greater respect for the Christians of the original church, than for the converts of the Latin communion; which may be accounted for, by their not associating with the lower orders of people. Attached to each church is a convent, where the catanars reside in community, there being three, four, or five to each church. The service is performed weekly in rotation. There is a seminary at the college of Verapoli, for the education of the Syrio-Roman Catholics, and also one for the Latin Church. The Syrio-Roman Catholics are chiefly engaged, as already mentioned, in drawing their ancient brethren

* This shews a spirit of toleration and Christian liberality, very different from the bigotry of the Romish Church.

No. 10.

Reverend Dr. Kerr's Report, dated Madras, 3d November 1806; with Proceedings thereupon.

brethren within the Romish pale; but it appears that some of them had been employed formerly, in extending the general object of conversion over the Peninsula. I saw one of their churches at a village near Pillimbaddy, about 30 miles on the Madras side of Trichinopoly, and I heard of several others. They had at this village adopted the use of a sammy cooch, like that of the heathens, with the Crucifix and the Virgin Mary in it, instead of the Hindoo sammy. Their church was much out of repair; and the ignorance of the few Christians remaining in charge of it, sticking the letters I. N. R. I. over the figure of our Saviour on the cross, being absolutely inverted, nor did the priest, who visits them, ever notice the circumstance. They read prayers in Malabar, according to the ritual of the Church of Rome. The church appears to have been once respectable; but it is now fallen into decay.

LATIN ROMAN CATHOLICS.

Within the provinces of Travancore and Cochin there are one archbishop and two bishops; the archbishop of Cranganore, and bishops of Cochin and Verapoli.

The two former have sees, the latter is titular. The archbishop of Cranganore and the bishop of Cochin are nominated by the Queen of Portugal, after the following manner. Three names are sent (when either of these sees become vacant) by the sovereign of Portugal, to the Pope, and the Roman Pontiff is bound to select the name that stands first, and to issue his brevet or patent accordingly.

They are subject in all spiritual concerns to the primate of Goa, who has also the power, during a vacancy, of sending from Goa a locum tenens, who is styled Padre Governador. Both sees are at this moment filled by such.

The titular bishop, who resides at the college of Verapoli, is appointed directly by the Pope, and is subject to no jurisdiction, but that of his Holiness or the Propaganda at Rome. This mission, being more susceptible of controul and regulation than the others, had been countenanced by the Honourable Company, as the following copy of a Proclamation, issued by the Government of Bombay, will shew.

PROCLAMATION.

" The Honourable the Court of Directors of the Honourable English East India Com" pany having been pleased to order, that the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the Roman " Catholic churches under this Government shall be withdrawn from the archbishop of Goa,
" and restored to the Carmelite bishops of the apostolic mission; the President in Council
" has accordingly Resolved, That the said restitution shall take place on the 1st of the ensuing
" month; from which time he hereby enjoins all the Catholic inhabitants in Bombay, as well " as at the several factories and settlements subordinate thereto, to pay due obedience in " spiritual matters to the said bishops, on pain of incurring the severe displeasure of " Government.

" By order of the Honourable the Governor in Council.

" Bombay Castle, (Signed) " William Page,
" 2d August 1791." " Secretary."

The priests attached to the college of Verapoli are all Carmelites, united to the apostolic mission at Bombay, but not subject to it. The jurisdiction of each bishop is not marked by distinct bounds; the parishes and churches being so intermingled, that it is difficult to form a right notion of their extent. The bishop of Cochin, however, may be said to have a controul over all the Romish churches situated on the sea coast, immediately (with few exceptions) from Cochin to Ramnad, and thence round the whole island of Ceylon. The churches are numerous, but as they are in general poor, and are obliged to be supplied with priests from Goa, it would appear, that one vicar holds upon an average five or six churches. The number of Christians composing these churches must be great, as all and every of the fishermen are Roman Catholics. The bishop of Cochin resides usually at Quilon. There are very few European clergy, not above seven or eight, under the three jurisdictions, and none of them men of education; and it cannot be expected that the native priests, who have been educated at Goa, or at the seminary of Verapoli, should know much beyond their missals and rituals. The Latin communicants in the diocese of Verapoli, are estimated at 35,000. The catechuman suffers no persecution on account of his religion, when once converted; but the country governments are excessively jealous upon this point, and do their utmost to discountenance any conversion.

The converts are from various castes, viz. Chegas or Teers, Muckivas and Pullers; and there can be no doubt but that many of the higher castes would be baptized, if they did not dread the displeasure of their governments.

It is well known, that the Roman religion was introduced by the Portuguese, at the commencement of the 16th century; the number converted in each year, upon an average, reach to nearly 300. The number, of course, naturally diminishes. The morality of the converts is very loose, and they are generally inferior, in this respect, to the heathens of the country.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS.

Reflecting on the whole subject, several suggestions present themselves to my mind; and I think I shall not be considered as deviating from the line of my profession, or the intention of your Lordship, in calling for my Report, by offering some opinions to Government, which, in a moral and political view, seem of the highest importance. It appears from the foregoing statement, that pure Christianity is far, very far from being a religion for which the highest caste of Hindoos have any disrespect, and that it is the abuse of the Christian name, under the form of the Romish religion, to which they are averse. We have, my Lord, been sadly defective in what we owed to God and man, since we have had a footing in this country, as well by departing most shamefully from our Christian profession ourselves, as in withholding those sources of moral perfection from the natives, which true Christianity alone can establish; and at the same time we have allowed the Romanists to steal into our territories, to occupy the ground we have neglected to cultivate, and to bring an odium on our pure and honourable name, as Christians. The evil would be less, were it not well known, that many of the Romish priests and their people, who have thus been allowed to grow numerous under our authority, are supposed to be far from well affected to the Government under which they reside. Indeed, in many instances, the Romish clergy are the natural subjects of nations at enmity with ourselves, at the same time that they are eminently qualified by their influence in their profession to do us the greatest mischief, by spreading disaffection throughout every part of this extended country. The Roman Catholic religion, my Lord, I believe, I may say, without offence to truth or charity, has almost always been made a political engine in the hands of its Governments; and we must be blinded indeed, by our own confidence, if we do not calculate on its being so used in this great and rich country, where it has established a footing amongst an ignorant people, especially when it is so well understood that our Eastern possessions have been a subject of the greatest jealousy to all the rival nations of Europe. In my humble opinion, my Lord, the error has been, in not having long ago established free-schools throughout every part of this country, by which the children of the natives might have learned our language, and got acquainted with our morality. Such an establishment, would ere this, have made the people at large fully acquainted with the divine spring from whence alone British virtue must be acknowledged to flow; this would have made them better acquainted with the principles by which we are governed; they would have learned to respect our laws, to honour our feelings, and to follow our maxims; whereas they appear to me, generally speaking, at this moment, as ignorant of their masters, as on their first landing on these shores. I speak not of interfering with their religious prejudices, or endeavouring to convert the natives by any extraordinary effort on the part of the British Government. Conversion, in my opinion, must be the consequence which would naturally flow from our attention to their moral instruction, and their more intimate acquaintance with the English character.

No. 10.

Reverend Dr. Kerr's Report, dated Madras, 3d November 1806; with Proceedings thereupon.

I do not mention this as an experiment, the result of which might be considered problematical; the experiment has been already made, and the consequences have proved commensurate with the highest expectation which reasonable men could entertain. The Danish mission, united with the Society for propagating the Gospel, have sent some good men into this country, with the laudable view of spreading true Christianity throughout our Eastern possessions; and the names of Swartz, Gerricke, and others, will ever be remembered by numbers of our Asiatic subjects, of every caste and description, with veneration and affection; and there are happily still living some amongst us of the same character.

It is true that the object they had more particularly in view has in some measure failed; and few good converts, it is generally imagined, have been made; but let it be remembered also, that they have laboured under every possible disadvantage: they have scarcely enjoyed a mere toleration under our Government, and received no kind of assistance whatever; that they were few in number, and perhaps I may say, without injustice, that they erred (as the best might err) in the means which they adopted. But that they have done much good by the purity of their lives, and by their zeal in spreading instructions, this, I imagine, will admit of no denial; and I doubt not that I may say, without danger of contradiction, that few and poor as these men have been, without authority or power to support them, a greater and more extended portion of heart-felt respect for the European character has been diffused by their means throughout this country, than by all the other Europeans put together. We have, in my humble opinion, my Lord, kept ourselves too far from the natives; we have despised their ignorance, without attempting to remove it; and we have considered their timidity (the natural result of their being trampled upon by one race of conquerors after another) also as an object for our contempt, at the same time that we have viewed the cunning of their character (which is ever the natural resource of ignorance and weakness) as the completion of all that is vile and deceitful. Thus have we continued a system of neglect towards the interests of our native subjects, in points the most essential to their very happiness, throughout the whole of our Governments in this country. Fain, my Lord, would I see a change in this particular; and I seize the opportunity which the present moment affords, to press the justice and policy of the measure on the attention of your Lordship's Government.

I have the honour to remain, &c. &c.

Madras,
Nov. 4, 1806.

(Signed) J. H. Kerr,
S[r] Chaplain.

EXTRACT

No. 10.

Reverend Dr. Kerr's Report, dated Madras, 3d November 1806; with Proceedings thereupon.

EXTRACT PUBLIC LETTER FROM FORT ST. GEORGE;

Dated 21st October 1806.

Para. 369.—LORD William Bentinck having recorded a further Minute, explanatory of his reasons for wishing that the Rev. Dr. Kerr, who was at that time in the Mysore country for the recovery of his health, should proceed to the Malabar Coast, for the purpose of obtaining every practicable information, in regard to the first introduction of Christianity into India; the arrival of the different sects, who have been or may be in existence; their general history; the persecutions to which they may have been exposed; their success in making proselytes; their church establishments, and the source from which they are maintained; with all other circumstances connected with this important subject:—We have the honour of forwarding to your Honourable Court, a copy of his Lordship's Minute, and of informing you, that Dr. Kerr is at present employed on the above duty, and that we expect, in a short time, to receive some interesting information from that gentleman, on the points referred for his investigation.

EXTRACT PUBLIC LETTER FROM FORT ST. GEORGE;

Dated 6th March 1807.

Para. 125.—IN our last general dispatch from this Department, we informed you, that the Rev. Dr. Kerr had been instructed to proceed to the Malabar Coast, for the purpose of enquiring into the state of Christianity on that coast, its first introduction into India, and other points connected with that important subject; and we have now the honour of referring your Honourable Court to our proceedings noted in the margin, for the Report which was received in consequence from Dr. Kerr.

Para. 125. Pub. Gen^{l} Letter to England, 21 Oct^{r}. Par. 369.

In Cons. 7th Nov^{r}.

EXTRACT PUBLIC LETTER TO FORT ST. GEORGE;

Dated 11th Jan. 1809.

Letter from 21st Oct. 1806.

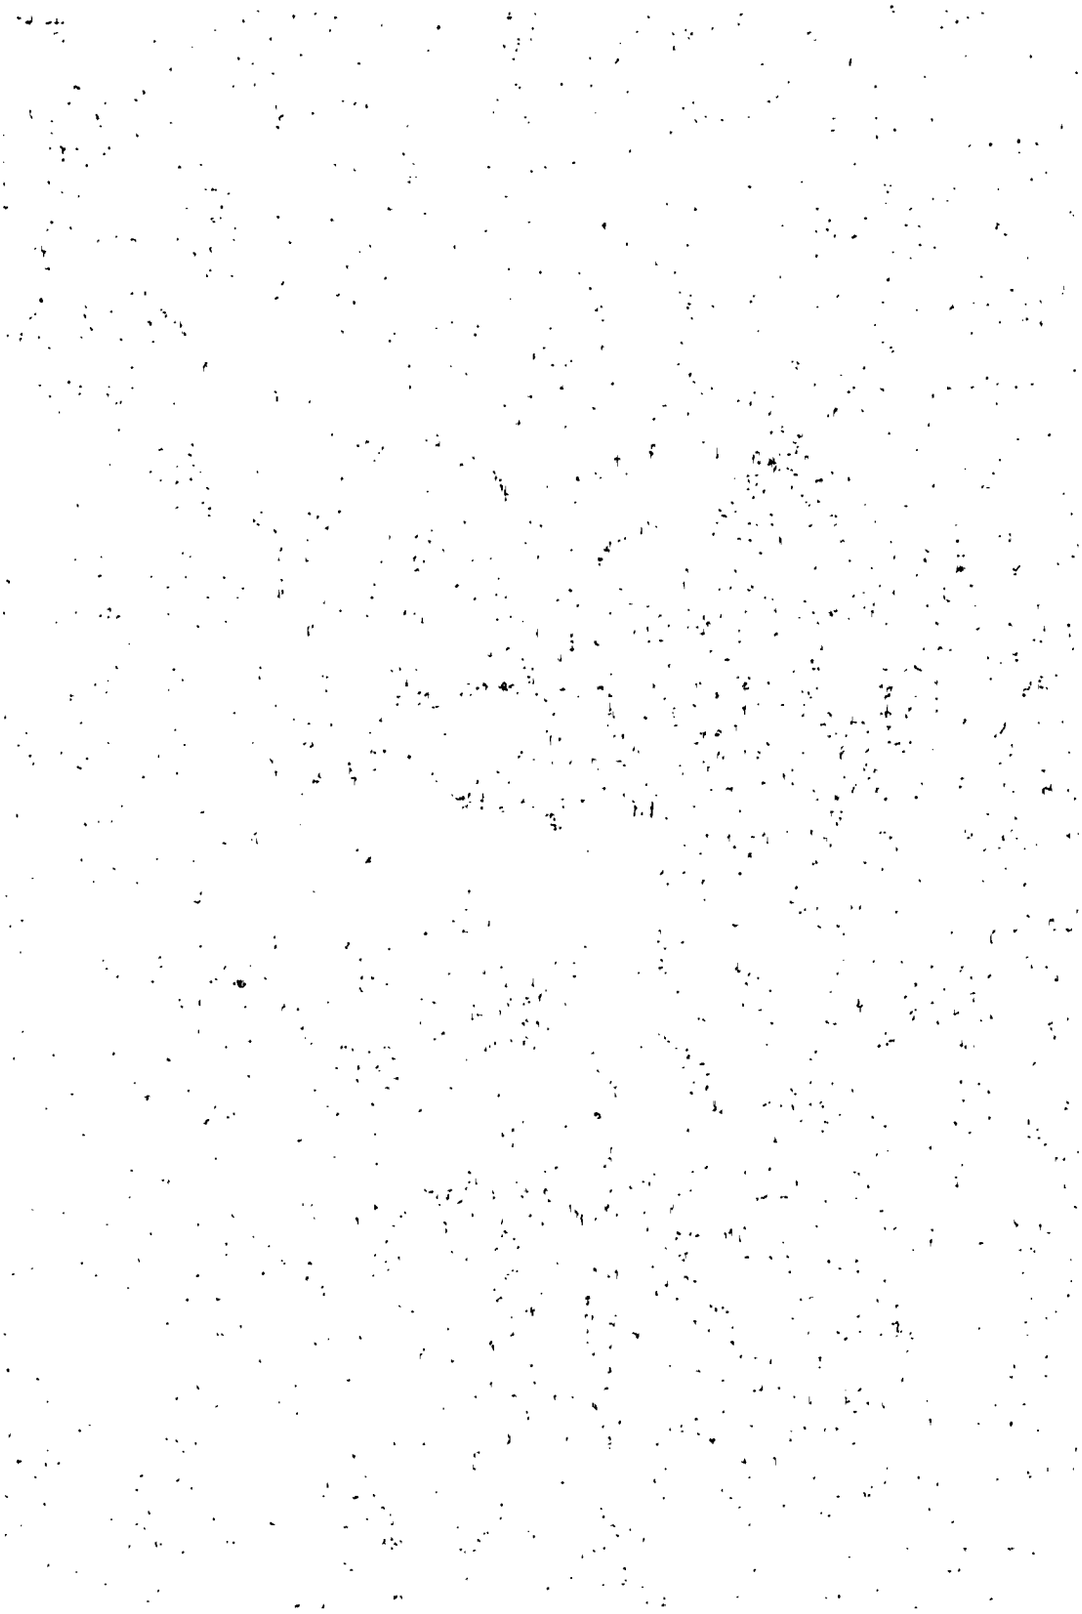
Para. 369. Stating, that Dr. Kerr had been directed to proceed to Malabar, for the purpose of obtaining every practicable information on the past and present state of Christianity in India.

Para. 84.—THE researches which, as we are informed, the Rev. Dr. Kerr was employed to make, related to objects that very properly and naturally claimed your attention, both from their general importance, and as being particularly interesting to our Government. It is hence rather surprising, that accurate information concerning them should not have been sought earlier, especially as our Letter to Bengal, of the 25th May 1798 (copy of which was forwarded to you in June 1800) directly pointed to similar enquiries.

85. On these grounds, the sentiments delivered by Lord W. Bentinck on this occasion, in his Minute of the 27th June 1806, and the consequent directions given to Dr. Kerr, have our general approbation.

86. The Report of that gentleman, stating the result of the investigation on which he was thus sent, has been brought under our notice by the 125th paragraph of your subsequent Letter, of the 6th March 1807. It appears to contain many curious interesting facts, particularly respecting the native Christians of Malabar; and the account is, in general, so clear and intelligent, as to do credit to the zeal and ability of Dr. Kerr. In thus acknowledging the general merit of Dr. Kerr's Report, and the value of the information contained in it, we must not be understood as meaning to concur in every opinion and suggestion to be found in that paper.

It is particularly important at this time, to the tranquillity of our Eastern dominions, that our subjects, of every religious denomination, as well those who are of a different Christian persuasion from our own (and who, from the circumstances adverted to by Dr. Kerr, may be considered as having some connexion with a foreign European power) as Hindoos or Mahomedans, should be persuaded that the British Government has no intention of molesting them in the exercise of their religious worship or opinions, while they shall conduct themselves with fidelity to the State, and shall do nothing to disturb the peace and good order of Society.



PAPERS

RELATING TO

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

Growth of Hemp, and Cotton.—General Revenues of India; and Mr. Rickards's Finance System in part of Salsette.—Permanent Settlement in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces.—Mr. Rickards's proposition for establishing a General Bank.—Revenue of Broach and Surat.—Jumma or Rental in Guzerat.—Political State of the Travancore Territory; and Treaty with the Rajah of Travancore.—Revenue of Malabar.—Occurrences at Quilon in Travancore.

Ordered, by The House of Commons, to be printed,
22. June 1813.

LIST OF PAPERS

Presented to The Honourable House of Commons, pursuant to Orders, dated 1st—3rd—16th—18th—and 21st June—1813.

— No. 1. —

Copy of a MEMORIAL presented to the Court of Directors of the East India Company, by Robert Rickards, Esq. dated September 9th 1812, together with Copy of the Answer thereto, from the said Directors, signed by, Mr. Assistant Secretary Cobb, dated February 26th 1813.

— No. 2. —

Copy of PARAGRAPHS N° 2. to N° 27, both inclusive, of a Letter from the Court of Directors of the East India Company, to the Government of Bombay, dated February 22d 1811, relative to the Cotton Trade.

— No. 3. —

Copy of PARAGRAPHS 2 to 8 of a Letter in the Revenue Department, from the Governor in Council of Bombay, to the Court of Directors, dated the 14th October 1808, with Copies of the Papers referred to therein; and Copy of the Reply of the Court of Directors, under date the 10th of January 1810, to the said Communication.

— No. 4. —

Copy of a MINUTE recorded by Mr. Colebrooke, on the Revenue Consultations of Bengal the 20th June 1808, respecting the extension of the Permanent Settlement, to the Ceded and Conquered Provinces.

— No. 5. —

Extract of a LETTER from the Governor General in Council of Bengal in the Public Department, dated the 30th June 1809, Paragraphs 109 to 117, both inclusive, together with the Papers referred to therein.

— No. 6. —

Copy of PARAGRAPHS 31 to 38 inclusive, of a Revenue Letter from the Governor in Council at Bombay, to the Court of Directors of the East India Company; dated 20th February 1808.

— No. 7. —

Copy of PARAGRAPHS 49 to 54 inclusive, of a Revenue Letter from the Governor in Council at Bombay, to the Court of Directors; dated 14th April 1810.

— No. 8. —

Copy of PARAGRAPHS 113 to 142 inclusive, of a Revenue Letter from the Court of Directors, to the Governor in Council at Bombay; dated 10th January 1810.

— No. 9. —

Copy of a LETTER from the Court of Directors in the Political Department, to the Governor in Council at Fort St. George; dated the 29th September 1809.

— No. 10. —

Copy of the TREATY with the Rajah of Travancore; dated the 28th January 1793.

— No. 11. —

Copy of a PARAGRAPH 226, of a Revenue Letter from the Governor in Council at Fort St. George, to the Court of Directors of the East India Company; dated the 21st October 1807.

(No. 12.)—Copy of a LETTER from John Bebb, Esq. (a Director of the East India Company) to the Court of Directors, dated the 31st May 1813; respecting the 13th Proposition, submitted to the House of Commons on the renewal of the Company's Charter.—[This Paper being on a subject different from the matters in this Collection, has been printed, and delivered separate; and is not therefore here inserted.]

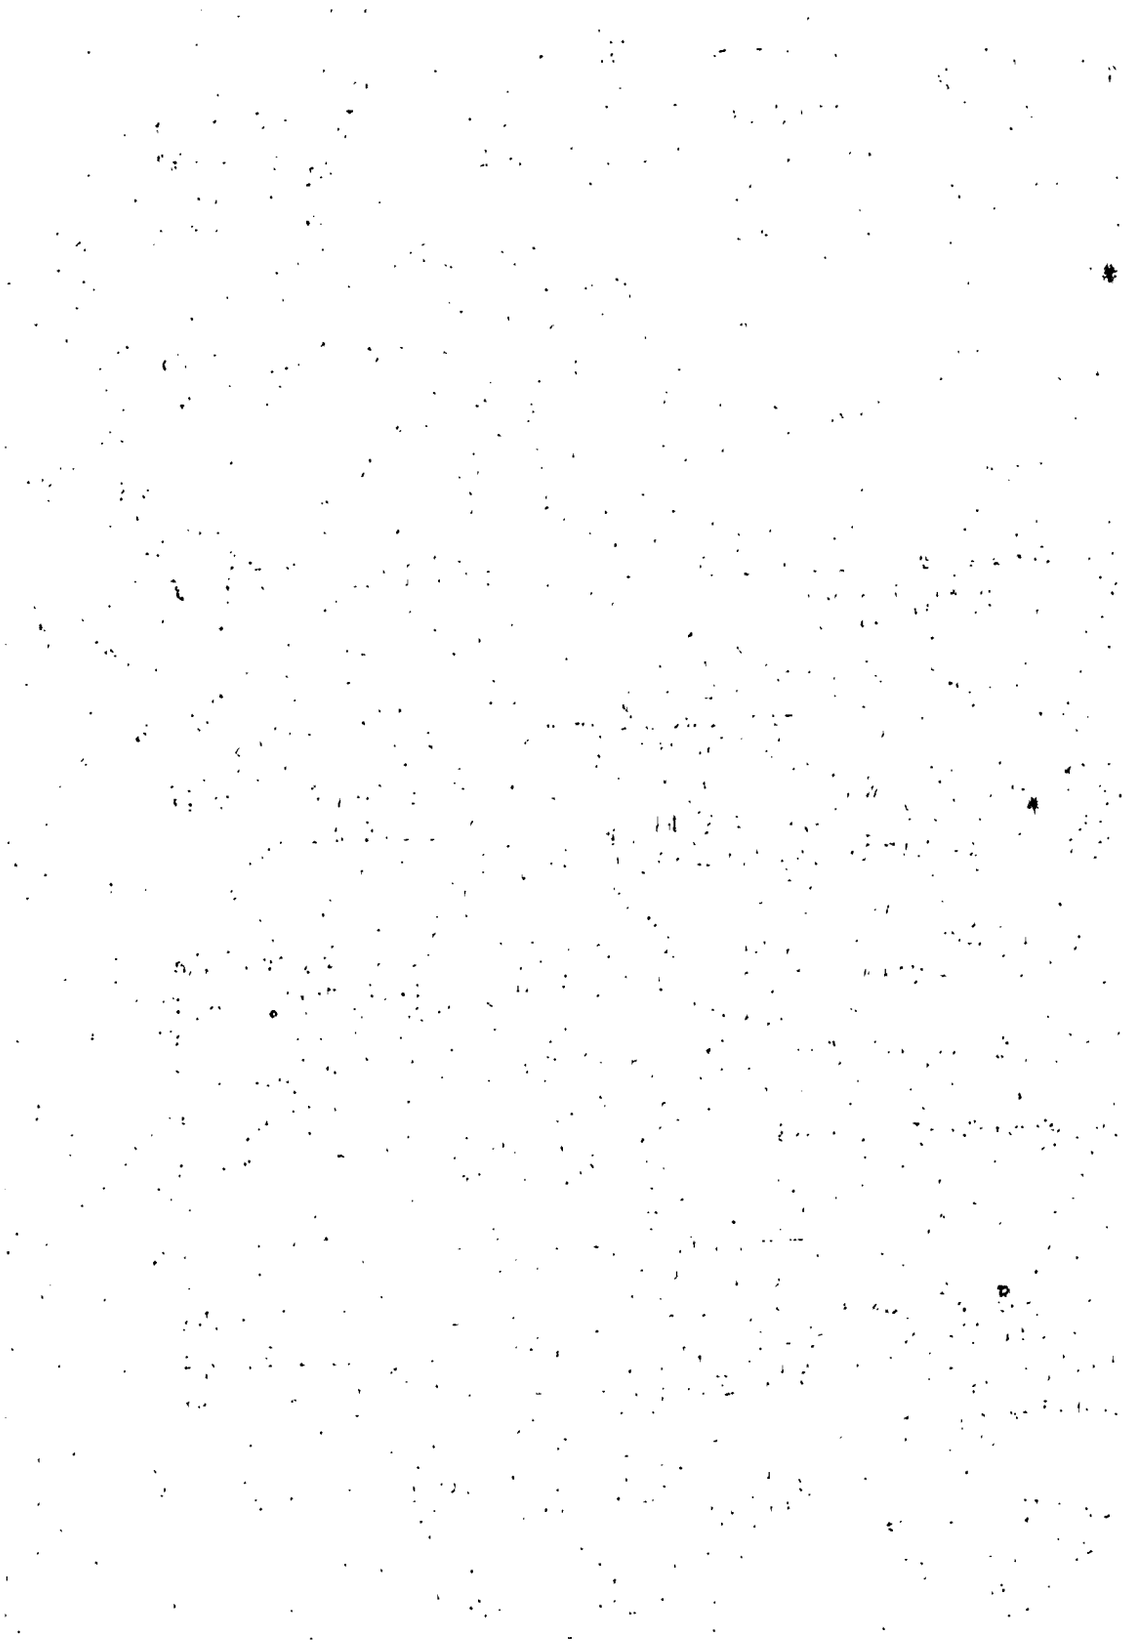
— No. 13. —

Copy of the 2d and 3d Paragraphs of the MILITARY LETTER from the Governor in Council at Fort St. George, to the Court of Directors of the East India Company; dated the 1st July 1812, relative to the late occurrences at Quilon in Travancore.

East India House,
22d June 1813.



No. 1.

Copy of a MEMORIAL presented to the Court of Directors of The East India Company, by ROBERT RICKARDS, Esq. dated September 9th, 1812;—together with Copy of the Answer thereto, from the said Directors, signed by Mr. Assistant Secretary Cobb, dated February 26th, 1813.

To the Honourable The COURT of DIRECTORS for the Affairs of The Honourable East India Company, &c. &c. &c.

HONOURABLE SIRS,

No. 1.
Mr. Rickards's Memorial, of 9 Sept. 1811.

1. I TAKE the earliest opportunity, after my return to this country, to solicit your consideration of a few facts connected with the subject of your orders of the 22d February 1811, which removed me from your Council at Bombay, and declared me unworthy of your future confidence.

2. After a residence and service of twenty-six years in India, and with a conscious sense of zealous and uninterrupted efforts to promote your real interests in that quarter, it is no small pain to a feeling mind, to one that disclaims every other motive than honesty of intention, to be thus accused and condemned. Could I plead guilty to the charge, I should not presume to intrude on your further notice: but I address myself to your honourable Court, in the confidence of conscious innocence, and respectfully appeal to that justice and liberality which have so frequently distinguished your public acts, where there was injury to be repaired, or merit, however humble, to be compensated.

3. The orders of the 22d February 1811, being of course well known to your honourable Court, I shall only refer to them generally here, begging to offer such explanations as may probably not have been before your honourable Court at the time these orders passed, and which may be yet necessary to a full understanding of the two questions therein discussed.

4. The first object of censure in the orders above mentioned, was a cargo of hemp consigned to England on the country ship Cambrian.

5. In April 1807, the Bombay Government were instructed that the honourable Court considered it an object of national importance to be able to supply India hemp for the use of the royal navy, and general consumption in England. Our particular attention to this object was enjoined at this time; immediate importations were not wanted; improvement of quality, more than quantity, was to be considered; and extension of culture, with improved methods of cleaning and dressing it, seemed to be the chief objects the honourable Court had then in view.

6. In December 1807, circumstances are represented to have materially changed; and that in consequence of a pressing demand for hemp, the honourable Court had agreed to supply his Majesty's Government for three successive years, viz. 1809—10—11, with the produce of India, at the rates at which this supply should bonâ fide cost the Company in its provision; purchases were now enjoined, with advances to cultivators in the Company's districts; immediate supplies were required; and we were directed to extend the quantity of Salsette, or Rajepore hemp, in particular, which we might be enabled to procure "to its "utmost practicable limits," consistently with due attention to the quality, and to the price not being materially enhanced.

7. These anxious orders were repeated to Bengal in 1808, with intimations that not only the produce of the Company's commercial factories, but whatever could be purchased in the Bazars, of proper quality, was to be sent without any unnecessary delay. The engagement with his Majesty's Government was stated to extend to a supply of 20,000 tons in three years. The Bengal Government sent a copy of these orders to Bombay, expressing their inability to furnish any thing near the quantity required from that side of India; adding, that they "considered the spirit of these orders equally applicable to the other presidencies, "and directed us immediately to adopt such measures as should appear to us best calculated "to promote the wishes of the honourable Court, and of his Majesty's ministers.

No. 1.
Mr. Rickards's Memorial, of 9 Sept. 1811.

8. These orders were expressly stated to have been founded on the then existing circumstances of the political state of Europe, which from every account, public and private, was that of a decidedly hostile disposition on the part of Russia, an entire stop to all commercial intercourse between that Power and England, and distress to the navy from want of the usual supplies of hemp, which if continued (and it then seemed probable) was expected to be attended with serious national inconvenience. Private letters in 1808 and 1809, received in India, stated the price of Russia hemp at from £.80. to £.110. £.115. and £.120. per ton, in the London market. A clear and able pamphlet, entitled, "Observations on the Sunn Hemp of Bengal," written under the sanction of the honourable Court, and found by me in the records of the Secretary's Office at Bombay, stated the price of Bengal Sunn at £.66. in 1808.

9. This pamphlet urges with great force of argument the policy of relieving ourselves by every possible resource from a dependance on Russia for hemp, "upon a due supply of which "depends the equipment of the British navy in as eminent a degree as on a due supply of "timber for the construction of the ships. Bengal, Bombay, and its dependencies, are "looked to for the means of enabling us to defy the enmity of Russia with that of her con-"federates during war, and to make her on the return of peace sensible of her mistaken "policy, by inducing us to open other channels for those articles of commerce she has "hitherto furnished."

10. The same pamphlet, stating that the Company in their public spirited efforts to supply the country with Sunn hemp in 1796-7-8 had sacrificed upwards of £.45,000, it seemed highly desirable they should know, by experience of facts, whether the object they contemplated could possibly be accomplished without subjecting them to a repetition of such enormous loss.

11. Under these circumstances, every effort was made by the Bombay Government, and chiefly by the Governor himself, the proper organ of Government, to meet the expressed wishes and orders of the Court of Directors in respect to supplies of hemp. Guzerat was ascertained to afford but little of any kind, and none of a quality fit for consignment to Europe. In Malabar the cultivation of hemp afforded for a moment a hope of supply, but disappointed at length our expectations. Orders were transmitted to every known quarter for hemp; an attempt to grow it on the Company's account on Salsette was made, and wholly failed; advances were made to cultivators on Salsette, who only returned one-third of a ton, and that at the average prime cost of £.51. 15s. to £.57. 10s. per ton. In short, every exertion that the most anxious, yet often misguided zeal, could suggest to supply the honourable Court's indent proved abortive.

12. It will be seen in the accompaniment, No. 1, that all that the authority, influence and zeal of the Bombay Government could collect together in three years, did not amount to 200 tons, to meet a demand for 20,000; and this costing the honourable Court in England not less on a moderate computation than £.86. to £.88. per ton.

13. When the tender therefore of Bruce, Fawcett and Co. to send home 700 tons of Rajépore hemp came before the Board in July 1809, the impression, I believe, of every one of us was, that our past efforts had been little better than complete failure, and that our future ones were likely to be attended with as little success. The tender was accordingly hailed as opportune, and cordially acceded to by all, under the belief that it would prove what our orders prescribed, equally calculated to promote the wishes of the honourable Court, and of his Majesty's ministers.

14. The Court's orders, however, express a great degree of irritation at the whole transaction, and are principally levelled at me, exculpating the Governor, who was its prime supporter altogether. The accompanying letter, No. 2, sufficiently testifies this fact. In the public proceedings on this subject, the Governor, it will be observed, dissents to no part, except a slight intimation after the majority had given their votes, that "he apprehended "Government is not authorized to guarantee any price to Bruce, Fawcett and Co." This is to be explained by a practice, common to the Governor in matters involving any responsibility. As President of the Council he gave his vote last; and wherever he had secret, yet partial scruples, after the majority had decided a measure generally according to his wishes, he would endeavour to shelter himself against possible censure, in respect to particular parts, by a half record of his doubts, without openly expressing them in the first instance, for the equal and candid consideration of the other members. The late Commander in Chief of Bombay can give a few notable instances of this practice by our late Governor. Were I to detail them, it might be ascribed to motives which I certainly feel not towards the deceased. The honourable Court, however, having I apprehend, never fully understood the real terms of this agreement, their anger towards me alone continued. They re-appointed Mr. Duncan Governor of Bombay, and dismissed me from their Council.

15. The honourable Court are pleased, in the first place, to accuse me of a positive breach of both the letter and spirit of their former orders; which were, they say, to provide hemp from their own territories, by advances for the cultivation of it, through the agency of their own servants; looking less to immediate than to gradual and progressive supplies of hemp; an extensive scheme, it is observed, requiring time and gradual meliorations of culture. In one of the same paragraphs (the 5th,) it is notwithstanding distinctly admitted, that purchases chases of hemp were also ordered to be made, and that they did not mean to exclude the produce of Concan, which is not their own territory.

16. I have already stated, and the papers of record prove, that every effort which the zeal and influence of the Bombay Government could suggest to supply the hemp required, both from the Company's territory, and the Concan, had failed. The Bengal Government had informed us that the provinces in that quarter could not furnish any thing near the quantity required, and directed us to adopt such measures as should appear to us best calculated to promote the wishes of the honourable Court, and His Majesty's ministers. It was not therefore till after the Company's districts were exhausted, till after every hope of adequate supply from them, or through the agency of the Company's subordinate servants, had vanished, that we acceded to the tender of Bruce, Fawcett and Co. for a cargo of Concany hemp; and, as this hemp was known to be of the best quality in all India, far superior to the Bengal Sunn, equal in some specimens of it at least to the produce of Russia, tendered at a rate cheaper than it was possible for us to make the supply through the medium of the Company's shipping; and the produce of the Concan, which the honourable Court admit, was not meant to be excluded; nay, precisely that description of hemp, which the Court's order to us of December 1807, desire may be sent in any procurable quantity, provided the price be not much enhanced. I can confidently add, that so far from any intention to violate either the letter or spirit of their orders, the Bombay Government conceived they were actually fulfilling both.

17. As to the scheme requiring time and gradual meliorations of culture, it is only necessary to repeat, that all the experiments of this kind in Salsette had decidedly failed; whilst, as if anticipating disappointment from this source, our orders still required a supply of Salsette or Concany hemp "to its utmost practicable limits," and peremptorily restricted us to a period of three years to make it, with a fourth year to clear off the remains on hand.

18. It should also be remembered, that the orders of April 1807, relating to gradual supplies, and improved cultivation, expressly refer to "a state of amity between His Majesty "and the Powers of the North," whereas in December 1807, when circumstances had changed, and the demand was more urgent, we are as expressly instructed, that "if whilst "this business (cultivation, &c.) shall be in progress, you can, from the usual produce of "the country, purchase any quantity of Salsette hemp (the same as Concany or Rajepore) "on account of Government, we direct you to do so, taking care that the cost be not "materially enhanced above the usual rate."—It is also added, "we expect with confidence "that nothing will be wanting to ensure the supply of some considerable quantity of Sal-"sette hemp being received by us in the course of the year 1809." The tender of Bruce, Fawcett and Co. was made early in 1809; by accepting it we were enabled to fulfil; by rejecting we should most certainly have disappointed, this confident expectation of the honourable Court.

19. The honourable Court say, they "do not perceive any suggestion to enter on a pro-"vision of hemp on account of the Company;" yet in my explanatory minute, 14th May 1810, to which I respectfully beg leave again to refer, the attempts made in this view, and their failure, are distinctly noticed; together with our report thereof to the Bengal Government. These explanations, it would seem, were not then satisfactory to the honourable Court. The failures, however, they refer to, impressed persons on the spot differently; and were deemed indeed so decided and complete, as only to leave the Bombay Government in despair of being able to comply, in any material degree with the honourable Court's indent.

20. The honourable Court next allege the Company's agents could have procured this Rajepore hemp as cheap, and in as large quantities at least, as any private merchant; that all the allegations to the contrary seem to them entirely groundless; and that our adoption of Bruce, Fawcett and Co's. offer went, on the contrary, decidedly to prevent the designs of His Majesty's ministers and the Company.

21. The recital already given, together with the inclosed paper, No. 1, prove in the fullest manner, how little our direct efforts had been able to effect. It may be further added, that previous to the tender of Bruce, Fawcett and Co. the Governor, as before observed, had despaired, in common with his colleagues, of procuring any but petty supplies of hemp, and we reported accordingly to Bengal. The fear, however, of a private effort succeeding, when all his own exertions, backed by the strong hand of power, had so decidedly failed, would seem to have animated him to fresh exertion. The result of this further effort is given in the enclosure, No. 2, on which it is not for me to comment, further than to submit to your honourable Court on which side obstructions to the supply of hemp really lay.

22. The honourable Court seem much displeased that the house of Bruce, Fawcett and Co. should be secured, as they understand, in a profit on this transaction, animadvert on a fixed price being guaranteed to them; and continue to believe, that an unqualified option was left with the owners of the Cambrian to sell this hemp in the market on their own account, so as thereby to disappoint His Majesty's Government altogether, and to disappoint the Company from being the agent and medium of supply.

23. It is not usual, I believe, for private merchants to engage in very distant speculations, without a certainty, or probability nearly tantamount to it, of profit. Even if willing to incur a certain loss, it would be unjust, as well as unwise, in Government to encourage projects so incompatible with the best principles of mercantile enterprize. Nothing too is more common than, sometimes from policy, and sometimes from necessity, to guarantee reasonable expectations of profit in infant undertakings.

No. 1. Mr. Rickards's Memorial, of 9 Sept. 1811.

24. In the present case, however, the guarantee price had no reference to profit. £.65. per ton was estimated as barely sufficient to secure the speculators against positive loss, whilst a chief object with them in this undertaking, as avowed in their own letter, was to find employment for their shipping, during a general and very distressing stagnation of the trade in India. I can add now, from knowledge of the facts, that, in consequence of the interference above explained, of the Governor of Bombay, in the purchases of Bruce, Fawcett & Co. in the Concan, the guarantee above mentioned has not, after all, nearly reimbursed the costs and charges of the Cambrian's cargo.

25. Of the act of guaranteeing this price, and of the alledged unqualified option above referred to, I shall briefly state what I conceived the papers and explanations sent home would have been long ago sufficient to illustrate. If they have not done so, the fault is not with me, but with those entrusted with the preparation of the official dispatches, which are always superintended by the Governor himself, but which the Members of Council do not sometimes even see, except to annex their signatures. The tender then of Bruce, Fawcett & Co. was a supply of 700 or 800 tons of hemp, to be sent home on a teak-built ship, in the same way as hemp on the same account had been sent home from Bengal, viz. through the medium and agency of the East India Company, for the use of his Majesty's Government; but with this material difference and advantage, that in respect to this particular cargo, neither the King nor Company had to incur the smallest degree of risk. For this the merchants aforesaid were to receive the market price of the day on its arrival in England; provided nevertheless they were insured £.65. per ton, as otherwise they repeatedly and unequivocally declared they could not even commence the undertaking. There was thus an option reserved to the East India Company, in the first instance, either to retain and deliver to Government, or to reject this hemp at any higher market price than £.65. per ton, and a further option to reject, under any circumstances, every parcel thereof, which should not turn out, on examination in England, to be of the very first quality of Concany, Rajepore, or Salsette hemp, of which the honourable Court were to be the sole judges. The merchant owners had clearly no option in respect to this hemp, until the whole or any part of it, according as the terms of the agreement sanctioned, should be thrown on their hands by the honourable Court. They certainly, therefore, had no power to disappoint his Majesty's Government and the honourable Court altogether.

26. This contract, it is true, was not drawn out in due form of law; but these are the plain terms of it; which the house of Bruce, Fawcett & Co. have always avowed, and to the last of my stay in India, invariably confirmed; and these, and these only, are the terms which I acceded to.

27. In judging of the expediency of the guarantee price, I respectfully request it may be considered, that it was granted to encourage an infant undertaking, of vital importance to the interests of Great Britain, when every other means had failed of procuring, in adequate quantities, this so highly desired and particular species of hemp; that without this guarantee, the undertaking would positively not have been commenced, and that 700 tons of excellent hemp would have been lost to our native country, at a time when the demand for it was considered in India to be most urgent; that Bengal Sunn (an inferior species) was selling at the time at £.66. per ton; that it was probable His Majesty's Government would not have scrupled giving a higher market price, if necessary, to encourage an infant undertaking of so much national importance, or if they did, that they had still, through the medium of the Company, the power of rejecting it; that if the price fell, His Majesty's Government would still be furnished with the best material, (for to none other did the guarantee extend, every thing short of it might be thrown back on the owners,) at a rate far cheaper than it was possible for the Company to furnish it to them in any other way; that in making sure of this inferiority of cost, reference was had to the honourable Court's orders, which so confidently anticipated a supply of Concany hemp to its utmost practicable limits, without any material enhancement of price; whilst the rate of the guarantee had so far further reference to the same orders, being only the estimated prime cost and charges that were thus secured to the owners; and finally, that the whole of this transaction in England was, by positive stipulation, to be carried on through the medium and agency of the honourable Court alone.

28. In respect to the market price being left open to the owners of the Cambrian, it should be remembered, we had only the option of acceding to the offer as made, or to lose so much good hemp at a period of the greatest distress, altogether; £.65. per ton was estimated as the lowest price at which hemp could at that time be sent home by the private merchant. Had we bargained for a fixed price, Bruce, Fawcett & Co. would have expected a higher one; but as they were willing in this respect to take the chance of the market, it seemed better for the Company to do so too, for whilst on the one hand the market price was not likely to reach that of the hemp freighted on the Company's ships (£.86. to 88.) they had on the other hand the chance of getting it at or near the price of the guarantee. If, again, the market price fell below the guarantee, as the latter was the lowest rate at which Salsette hemp could at that time be conveyed to England, it was still an advantage, unless it can be proved to be better for the King or Company to pay for it at £.86. than at £.65. at which it was at length procured.

29. The

No. 1.
Mr. Rickards's Memorial, of 9 Sept. 1811.

29. The honourable Court are pleased to say, that His Majesty's Government had rejected this hemp, thereby throwing it, with all consequent loss, on the Company's hands. I have since learnt, that the Navy Board afterwards took the whole cargo, with the exception of a small quantity damaged on the voyage, and which of course, by the agreement, reverted to the owners. It is also worthy of remark, that by the arrangement adopted the King got this excellent material at £.65. per ton, when a few months afterwards the price of the same commodity rose to £. per ton in the London market.

30. In respect to the honourable Court's alledged apprehensions of loss, it is quite obvious, I respectfully submit, that the Company could incur none. By agreement with the Navy Board, the Company were to be reimbursed in the full cost and charges of their importations of Indian hemp. The guarantee had reference to this part of the agreement, as I have already shewn that it was only the estimated cost and charges that were so guaranteed, whilst that cost was considerably lower than if the supply had been made through the medium of the Company's shipping. It was not to be supposed however, private merchants would engage in an expensive speculation, without a prospect of advantage; and when they stipulated for the chance of a higher market price in London, we readily acquiesced, deeming it no unfair compensation for all the risks of loss and damage which they incurred, as well in the provision of the cargo as in its conveyance to England. This, too, was evidently better for the King; for here he incurred no risk; whereas on the hemp conveyed in the Company's shipping, the risk was apparently all his own, the honourable Court's orders of December 1807, requiring all losses incurred in India on parcels of hemp, to be added, as a general average, to the consignments of the season. The agreement for the Cambrian's cargo also stipulated, that neither the King nor Company should be burthened with hemp of inferior quality. I do not observe any such provision in respect to the consignments in the Company's ships from Bengal; a consideration which must be admitted to give the consignment of hemp per Cambrian, a further decided advantage over the Bengal supplies.

31. These, at all events, are the considerations which influenced the bargain made by the Government of Bombay for the Cambrian's cargo of hemp. Of the motives which actuated the measure, I can further solemnly declare, that I ever conceived it, not simply, but eminently calculated to meet the wishes of His Majesty's ministers, and of the honourable Court.

32. The next occasion of the honourable Court's displeasure, was a representation by the house of Forbes and Co. and Bruce, Fawcett and Co. in January 1810, of the ruinous price which cotton had attained in 1809, begging Government to withdraw its competition for a season from the market, and offering to supply, at its actual cost, the quantity of cotton they might require to purchase for the Company's China trade in the current year, a proposal in which Government then thought it expedient to acquiesce.

33. On this head it will only be necessary to premise, that the Company take the cotton of their own districts in Guzerat in kind, partly as revenue, and partly otherwise, at a reduced price; and that for any additional quantity wanted, they enter the general market as purchasers; in which view the merchants thought that the Company's competition was at least one cause of the high prices of which they complained, and solicited that the effects of its removal might at all events be tried.

34. In the honourable Court's animadversions on this transaction, they are pleased to assume the following, as facts, viz.—That the Company exercise no monopoly in their own cotton districts, or throw the least obstruction in the way of private buyers; that their servants only take from these districts the amount of the established revenue in cotton; that this is accounted for to the ryots, at a price equivalent to the general market rate of the season; and that they do not exercise power or influence to get the commodity at a less price, "than the said market rate, or than the owners are content to sell it at." Admitting at the same time, that if this were really the case, "there would then be at least a consistency be-"tween the alledged cause and the alledged effect." Their competition in the general market is also supposed to be attended with no injury whatever in its effects.

35. From some of the more partial statements entered on the public records, it is possible these inferences may have been deduced; and I have no doubt that these are both the conviction and intention of the honourable Court, as well in reference to their own ryots, as to the merchants residing under their authority in India. But the real state of the case is widely different; their records contain unequivocal proofs of the following facts, as I pledge myself if necessary, to exhibit in the official reports of their servants, and an uninterrupted series of orders by the local government.

First; That the Company monopolize the cotton in their own districts, or at least of the tulput or government lands, taking not only the whole revenue of these districts in cotton, but the "surplus" produce at the reduced price fixed by their servants. Thus, let us suppose the whole produce of a tulput district to be as 10, of which the grain produce is 2, and the cotton - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - 8

The Company's share of revenue will be in all 5, but of cotton only - - - - 4

The remainder of the revenue is grain convertible, according to established usage, into a money payment; but for this, cotton in kind is also substituted, and therefore takes another share or - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - 1

No. 1.
Mr. Rickards's Memorial, of 9 Sept. 1811.

There then remains a "surplus," the unquestionable, exclusive and allowed right of the cultivators of - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - 3
Over which the Company can have no possible claim but that of absolute force; yet this is also taken from the ryots at the reduced price fixed by their servants, making - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - 8

Or the whole cotton produce of the district, without leaving any portion of the avowed share of the ryots at their own free disposal.

The produce of the tulput lands of the Broach collectorship in cotton is estimated on record at 12,000 or 14,000 bales; that of the free lands at 3,000; so that the Company monopolized in this collectorship, in the first instance, 4-5ths of the whole produce; the remaining 5th belongs to the actual proprietors of estates called grassias and wuzeefadars; and whose rights, as such, are undisputed. Of these it is recorded in 1808, that the commercial resident attempted to take their produce on the same terms as that of the tulput lands. The wuzeefadars strenuously resisted; the commercial resident loudly complained. A reference was made by orders of Government to the judge of the district, and through his interference the wuzeefadars conformed to what was called the common practice of the pergunnah. It would seem from the record, that the wuzeefadars only submitted to the system in 1808, though the orders of Government, as seen in their proceedings, uniformly required the whole produce to be appropriated to the use of the Company.

Secondly; That this monopoly is a continuation of that established in 1791, under Scindia's government; and retaining some of its features, is thereby calculated to keep up the original sense of its injustice, and to level our Government in the estimation of the natives, with the despotism which preceded it. The plea of perpetuating the practice of the old government, is only good in relation to usages whose proved utility may have rooted them in the attachment of the people, but no justification of the rapacious exactions of a Mahratta fouzdar; and the more especially, where even the pretence of antiquity cannot be advanced to lay claim to our respect.

Thirdly; That this monopoly has been uniformly authorized, and even required, by the orders of Government, from the first of our footing in Guzerat, to the positive exclusion of all private buyers from the Company's districts, though such a measure is now declared to be contrary to the intention and understanding of the honourable Court.

Fourthly; That this monopoly has had the effect of nearly doubling the price of cotton in Guzerat.

Fifthly; That if the Company were now to relinquish this monopoly, and the trade were thrown open, the price would materially fall, whence it follows, that the Company's interference not only rises the market price of the article to buyers, generally, but that the Company's agents still withhold from the ryots that market price which their own competition has materially contributed to enhance.

Sixthly; That this cotton is taken from the cultivators, in the first instance, without any price being either fixed or intimated; the reduced price is only pronounced at the close of the season, after all the cotton has been disposed of, and sent off to Bombay; it not being right, as the report observes, "to fix it at the commencement of the season, when the "price is high, and expectation great, lest it might perhaps create some degree of discon-"tent among the ryots."

It follows from this rule, and the orders of Government on which it is founded, and the price of cotton is fixed by the agents of the buyers alone, i. e. by the judge, the collector, and the commercial resident, who exercise the whole civil authority of the district over, generally speaking, a slavish, patient, and forbearing people; and that the sellers are in reality allowed no voice in the value of their own commodity, or even suffered to know what they shall get for it, till after it has been far removed from their reach, and the country, by previous exportations to Bombay.

Seventhly; That orders were issued for a further reduction of price, if practicable; and that the servants to the northward, thought it their duty, in pursuance of these orders, to offer it as their opinion, that a further reduction of 10 or 12 per cent. might be unobjectionably effected.

Eighthly; That the further reduction of price was not meant to be attended with a corresponding diminution of revenue, although the payers of this revenue are avowed to be the only sufferers by the reduced price of their cotton.

Ninthly; That Government in this very report, and in reference also to the honourable Court's orders of the 30th April 1806, expressed in December following their expectation, always tantamount in its effect to an order, to the northern servants, that the price of the Company's cotton to the ryots should be fixed at 10 or 12 per cent. lower than the same class of people get for it in the neighbouring Mahratta pergunnah. The Company's price to the ryots has consequently been always under, and in 1809 was 30 rupees per candy or 25 per cent. under the general market rate. Whatever may be said of the Company's right to the revenue cotton at this reduced price, it is for the honourable Court to judge how far it should also be applied to the "surplus cotton," which the ryots have certainly an avowed and exclusive right to dispose of, if they please, in the general market; but which, contrary to the declared intention of the honourable Court, it is thus seen they are positively restrained from selling.—And,

the

Finally, That though the honourable Court's orders of the 30th April 1806, evidently refer to a general reduction of the price of cotton, to save a branch of trade to the western side of India, which it was otherwise expected to lose, yet the views of their servants in India never extended beyond reducing the cost of that portion, which was intended to constitute the Company's annual investments to China. It is remarkable, that the object of the honourable Court's orders was thus wholly defeated. They intended good, but produced in their operation a material aggravation of the very evil which the Court proposed to remedy. By their servants withdrawing a large portion of cotton from the ryots, or sellers, at a reduced price, and the other means recurred to give effect to these orders, the residue of the commodity became materially raised in price in the general market.

36. I have thought it best to state these heads generally; were I to detail all the proofs by which they may be supported on record, it would extend this address to an irksome length, and would, I fear, wear the appearance of a controversial discussion with the honourable Court, which I feel particularly anxious on the present occasion to avoid. As I pledge myself however, to prove these facts, and as the records which contain the proofs are at hand, there may be less difficulty in admitting them to justify any expressions I may have used in reference to the injuries I thus knew to be sustained, and which my recorded minutes specifically state were only intended to be applied locally, that is, exclusively to the internal trade of the country and government of its subjects, and to have no reference whatever to the honourable Company's exclusive privilege, which as sanctioned by the Legislature, and myself a Company's servant, I never had the slightest intention to comment upon or disturb. I ever considered it however, as much the study of a faithful servant, as the wish of the honourable Court themselves, that they should be fully apprized of important facts connected with the prosperity of their Indian territories; and in what I recorded, as well as what I would have continued to explain, on these subjects, I certainly meant no more than a respectful disclosure of truths material for the honourable Court to know; and which, after submission to their notice, it would of course rest with them to act upon, or otherwise, as they might deem most conducive to their own true interests.

37. Several other injuries might be adduced, as resulting from this little understood state of the cotton trade; but the preceding are probably sufficient to answer all the purposes here intended.

38. These facts may also, I trust, serve to justify the disposition I have occasionally evinced to promote, where it seemed to require it, the internal trade of India generally, but which I find has been unaccountably construed in this country into an improper concurrence in the interested views of the two houses so frequently mentioned in this address. I should really think it beneath me to offer even a single explanation on so degrading a charge, did I not perceive it to have been artfully impressed on persons I sincerely respect; and it is not a little mortifying to be obliged to deny an accusation at which the principles of my public conduct actually revolt. It is perfectly well known in Bombay, that I never was on terms of intimacy with either of these firms; that no intercourse passed between us but that of ordinary civility; and that for a long time previous to the proceedings here treated of, and during the whole course of my subsequent continuance in office, I had not a pecuniary transaction of any description with either. In what respects therefore, these houses could have influence over me, remains to be explained by those who have clandestinely preferred so base a charge. No civilized or enlightened government would surely withhold its fostering care and protection from the legitimate trade of its subjects; and in speaking of the merchants of India, I have always had in view that general body, which it is as much the policy as the duty of the governing power to favour equally; a principle which the honourable Court have, in their instruction to India, frequently enjoined, but which partiality to particular merchants or houses would effectually violate and defeat.

39. On the head of competition in the purchase of cotton, I shall, for the same reason as adduced in the 36th paragraph, say but little. All I ever advanced on this head was, that the Company's competition was one, though not the sole cause of the high price which cotton had attained in Guzerat; the undue competition of the private merchants another. The honourable Court however insist on the latter fact, and deny the former altogether, on the authority of a report to this effect by the commercial resident at Surat; yet if the honourable Court will be pleased again to refer to the records of 1809, they will find the same commercial resident avow, in the very same year, and when not personally accused himself of injudicious acts or heedless purchases, that "on the 14th March he had every hope of "purchasing cotton at moderate rates," whilst on the 25th following he adds, "it has been "unfortunate however, that the honourable Company's views were publicly known at "Broach before he received his orders; and the consequence was such an immediate influx "of competitors, as to occasion a considerable rise in the market price. By withholding for "a day or two, I however was enabled to conclude engagements for about fourteen hundred "bales packed, at 150 or 151½ R^{s} per candy, being 1 to 1¼ less than it had risen to at "first; but it immediately afterwards obtained 155 and 156 R^{s}, at which it has since "continued."

40. In 1798 the commercial resident at Surat was first employed to purchase cotton (I believe about 2,000 bales) for the Company. If the honourable Court will please to refer to their diaries of that period, they will see a series of mysterious proceedings, with injunctions to the strictest secresy, in this trifling purchase; and merely that the price of the article might not be affected by the Company's competition, or obstacles thrown in the way by a knowledge of their intentions.

No. 1. Mr. Rickards's Memorial, of 9 Sept. 1811.

41. Just before I quitted the Council Board a letter was received from another commercial agent, ordered by Government to purchase timber, in which he remarks, "I have, in "consideration of the tendency which the Company's wants always have to raise the "market, entrusted this business also to Mr. Crookenden's management, and he has "sent trusty people, fully instructed to make such arrangements as they may find "practicable."

42. To multiply proofs of this description, is however quite superfluous, for the records are full of them.

43. Some years ago it was stated, on good authority, that 70 R^s per candy of cotton to the grower, was equal to the average which grain yielded. In 1808 the judge of Broach observes, that 30 R^s per bhar, i. e. 79$\frac{1}{2}$ R^s per candy, would afford a good profit to the cultivator. At this rate the ultimate exporter might expect to get cotton at 100 R^s to 110 R^s per candy to the northward, and therefore 120 to 130 rupees in Bombay, at which rate it would admit of consignment to China; but when the northern price is so high that the average of the season gives

---

D^r - - STATEMENT of an Adventure in Cotton from Bombay to China, 1809.

April 1.	To cost of 4,000 bales, or 2,000 candies of cotton, at the average price of the last 5 years, (or since the Company have renewed their adventures in cotton) or R^s 150 per candy, rupees - - -	300,000
	Charges of packing, screwing, shipping, &c. at R^s 10 per candy -	20,000	320,000
	Insurance on the above, to cover in case of loss from Bombay to China R^s 360,000. at 6 per cent, being the lowest terms of the Bombay Insurance Office, including harbour risk while lading - - - -		21,600
		R^s	341,600
December 1.	Ditto on the returning funds from China to Bombay, covered as above, on R^s 488,000. at 5 per cent. d^o d^o - - - - - - -		24,400
1810.
April 1.	Interest on rupees 341,600. for one year, and on R^s 24,400. for 4 months, at 8 per cent. per annum, being the Company's rate of interest, but which is 1 per cent. less than the mercantile rate - - - -		27,978
		R^s	393,978
	The expenses of the ship for the voyage, viz. Interest for one year on rupees 200,000, the lowest value of the block of a ship of 1,000 tons, at 8 per cent. - - - - - - - - -	R^s 16,000
	Insurance thereon to China at 6 per cent. -	R^s 12,000
	D^o D^o from China at 5 per cent. - -	10,000
	Interest on premium paid - - -	1,226
		23,226
	Wages to the commander, officers and crew, provision, wear and tear, &c. say for 10 months at R^s 4,000. per month - - - - - - - - - -	40,000
	Ship's measurement in China (a harbour duty to the Chinese Government) say at least - - - - -	15,000
			94,226
		Rupees -	488,204

N. B. As no more than one China voyage can be performed in the year, the adventurer must in all cases defray the full year's interest on block; but in order to state the expenses as low as possible, only 10 months wages are supposed in this statement to be actually paid.

---

46. To the sources of extraordinary competition above mentioned must be added the state of the seasons, and the limit thereby placed to commercial speculations in Guzerat. Generally speaking, no boats laden with cotton put to sea after the end of April; and every purchaser is anxious to complete his bargain in time, to convey his cotton to Bombay before the monsoon, in order to avoid the damage the additional expence of warehousing it to the northward, and the disappointment of not being able to send it in due season to China. The cotton gives, as in 1800, 175 rupees per candy on the Bombay green, there is an end of all profitable speculation to China by private merchants.

44. The honourable Court, in their orders of the 22d February 1811, seem to think there is no proof of the price being too high; yet all the facts I have adverted to are on record, inclusive of their own letter of the 30th April 1806, in which a much lower price than that of 1809-10 is considered by them as fraught with alarming consequences to this trade. Neither is it probable the merchants themselves would have wantonly represented this increase of price in such strong terms to Government, if ruin had not actually stared them in the face.

45. In Bombay I was at pains to collect an accurate account, taken from the books and correspondence of the first mercantile houses, of the selling prices of cotton in China, from 1804-5 to 1809-10 inclusive. This price I can assure the honourable Court does not average more than 12 tales, 7½ mace per pecul; the Company get more, but theirs is so far a nominal price, that is carried to account, without interest, with the Hong merchants, on which the latter now owe the Company I apprehend a heavy sum. The money prices of China, consequently the real selling prices, are no more than what I have stated.

The merchants can at all events get no higher. On these grounds the following statement will be found to exhibit a correct view of the out-turn of a speculation in cotton to China, in a private ship navigated in India, which I believe the strictest scrutiny cannot controvert.

on a Country Ship of 2,000 Candies, or 1,000 Tons burthen. - - Cr

1809. October.	By sale of 2,000 candies of cotton, or 11,760 peculs, at 13 tales per pecul, (being higher than the average price of the last 6 years*) are tales 152,880, or R$ - - - - - - - - - -	458,640
	Deduct landing charges, wastage and agency in China, say in all, 5 per cent. - - - - - - - -	22,932
	Net proceeds - - - R$	435,708
	Or at 216 R$ per 100 D$ Spanish d° - - - - -	201,716
	Take off exchange on new D$, at 1½ per cent. shroffage and shipping charges in China, and landing charges at Bombay, say in all 1½ per cent. - - - - - - - -	3,025
	Spanish D$ - - - -	198,691
	Which invested in new dollars, as the greater part of the returns from China have of late years been, and returned to Bombay, will realize there at the most 219 rupees per 100 dollars (the rate obtainable from the Company's mint), by the 1st of April 1810 - - - - R$		435,133
1810. April 1.	Probable freight from China to Bombay, allowed in this statement, but which is seldom earned by more than one or two ships of each season, say - - - - - - - - - - - - -		15,000
		Rupees	450,133
	Balance, or net loss on the adventure - - - - - -		38,071
		Rupees	488,204

Bombay, 1st April 1811. (Errors excepted.)

* The sales in China for the last six years only average 12 tales 7½ mace per pecul; but I have purposely assumed this higher rate of sale to obviate objection against this statement.

cotton dealers take advantage of these circumstances, to keep up a price which the purchasers are thus pressed by more than ordinary causes to acquiesce in. Among the injuries sustained in the cotton trade, it is as well known in Bombay, as the bankruptcies of a Gazette are in London, that the causes of disorder which are thus shewn to have long existed, have actually ruined and expelled from the trade a horde of petty merchants in Bombay, who used formerly to engage in it annually to China, and that none but the richer and

No. 1.
Mr. Rickards's Memorial, of 9 Sept. 1811.

greater houses, have been able of late years, to support the losses constantly attending it, occasioned by higher buying prices in Bombay and Guzerat, than the selling price in China was sufficient to cover. There are persons of the highest respectability now in England, who can attest the last mentioned fact, from an intimate knowledge of all the circumstances of these distressing failures.

47. The proposal made by Bruce, Fawcett and Co. and Forbes and Co. in January 1810, was in perfect consistence with the views thus given of the state of the cotton trade. Cotton had been raising in price from the causes above explained, till in 1809, it attained the rate of from 173 to 180 rupees per candy in Bombay, with a few hundred bales at 184 rupees. With no prospect of abatement of price in the following year, the merchants represented the ruinous consequences of such a state of things to their own interest, and entreated Government to withhold, at least, their own competition, as an experiment for one year; offering to supply them with any quantity they wanted of good China market cotton at the bonâ fide cost of the commodity to themselves.

48. On this proposal, when in circulation for the consideration of Government, and before the meeting of Council to decide on it, I recorded a short minute, adducing very concisely the reasons which led me to think, as well in view to the public good, as the commercial interests of the Company, that the proposal "might merit consideration." The Council afterwards met, were unanimous in their opinion of the advantage, if not necessity, of the proposal; and all I did was to concur in this unanimous resolution. Yet, hard to say, the whole blame of this transaction is again attached to me. I alone am accused of betraying the Company's interests, and my own trust; of siding with their declared enemies against them, of exposing and publishing their secrets to the world; and of not taking the proper means of communicating my sentiments to the honourable Court. When this heavy censure first reached India, the humble and harmless minute against which it was levelled, had so long lain in oblivion and obscurity, that I had actually forgotten its existence. I can safely add, that at this time, no human being, excepting the Members of Government, the Court of Directors, and their respective Secretaries and Assistants, had to my knowledge seen it. If therefore it has been published to the world, it must be through some mischance, at the India House; for at Bombay, it was in profound rest, and nothing but the electric orders of the honourable Court, would ever have caused it to rise again from its official dust. As to the mode I have always adopted of imparting my sentiments to the honourable Court, permit me to ask in what other way I could have done it. The mode adopted was in the strict official line of my duty. It was a confidential communication, on records only open to the inspection of their Government in India, and of the honourable Court at home, and involving no kind of publicity that was not indispensible to a free discussion, between masters and servants, of things intimately connected with the former's interests.

49. To the arguments of the honourable Court, accusing us of throwing, on this occasion, the worst, and most injurious of all monopolies, into the hands of Forbes and Co. and Bruce, Fawcett and Co. it is only necessary to oppose a statement, taken from the Custom-house records, of the imports of cotton into Bombay in the season in which the monopoly, as it is supposed, was granted to the houses aforesaid. The other merchant importers (exclusive of the honourable Company, and the two monopolizing houses) are no less than 70 in number; all importing their usual quantities of this commodity; whilst I am authorized to say, and ready to prove, that the aforesaid misnamed monopolists only imported their usual supplies also, in addition to what they purchased for the Company. Neither were the purchases of these houses made jointly, as asserted by the honourable Court, so as thereby to reduce these two principal purchasers into one; they were actually made by separate agents, and even charged at different rates to the Company, Forbes and Co's. cotton costing R' 156. 2. 18. per candy, and that of Bruce, Fawcett and Co. R' 153. 3. 14.

50. As to the secresy of this transaction, it must be obvious to every one, that if Government had proclaimed their employment of these merchants to purchase cotton, it would have defeated the object in view. Had the sellers known that the Company were still in the market, their motives for demanding a high price would have continued in equal force. Whether A. or B. were the agents of that buyer would have been a matter of perfect indifference to them.

51. Though the honourable Court are pleased to term a proposal, whose object was to narrow excessive competition, in a small degree monstrous and extraordinary, and incompatible with the principles of commerce, there is yet nothing in it at variance with the ordinary usage of Government, as the public records abundantly testify.

52. Previous to 1798, the Government always bought their cotton in Bombay, and employed no agent to compete in the Guzerat market.

53. In 1801 they purchased cotton again, in Bombay, from the merchants.

54. In 1802 they were pleased to approve a plan which narrowed the competition still more effectually than any thing that has been since adopted. A committee was then formed, consisting of a member of council, as resident, and a deputy from each commercial house, to make a joint purchase of the cotton required by the parties respectively. The plea for instituting this committee was also the enormous price to which, under competition, had raised the cotton in Guzerat, and the adulterations which are so fully explained in the honourable Court's letter; and the object in view was then also to lower the price, and improve the quality, of the commodity. As the committee employed only one agent to make their purchases to the northward, there was then, in fact, no competitor in the market. Yet a scheme thus more than barely narrowing the competition, was at this time acquiesced in without objection.

honourable

No. 1.
Mr. Rickards's Memorial, of 9 Sept. 1811.

55. In 1804, on a strong representation from the same houses as in the present instance, coupled with that of Adamson (since dead), as to the very same evils experienced in this trade, Government agreed to withdraw from the Guzerat market, and to receive the quantity of cotton they required, about 12,000 bales in that year, through the agency of the merchants, at the bonâ fide cost of the season.

56. The merchants, on this occasion, impressed in the most urgent manner on the attention of Government, that nothing but a perfect union of measures on the "part of Government and the merchants, not only in the present but during several succeeding years, could "preserve to the settlement of Bombay the benefits of this extensive, and, they added, its "almost only commerce." This proposal further stipulated, "that Government shall withdraw from the market, on the merchants engaging for the provision and delivery in Bombay, of a quantity of cotton equal to the lading of the honourable Company's tonnage "expected from Europe, for which payment shall be made at the average rate of their "purchases. In either case, however, it was to be understood that Government will, as in "the season of 1801-2, by every reasonable means in their power, promote the object "which the merchants had in view; namely, to prevent the adulteration, and reduce the "price of cotton."

57. Government in acceding to this proposal, "adverted to the 98th and 99th paragraphs of the general letter from the honourable Court of the 24th June 1803, whence it "appeared to be consistent with the opinion of the honourable Court, that this Government "should, under the circumstances set forth by the merchants, continue its endeavours towards counteracting the combination of dealers to the northward, for enhancing its price, "and debasing the quality of the cotton."

58. This proposal, dated in February 1804, makes no particular mention of the Company's interference in the trade, because the effect of their competition, coupled with the monopoly of the cotton of their own districts, had not yet been felt. It was the first season of their entering the market, since the acquisition of Broach, and February was the commencement of that season; but in April following the collector of Broach having secured from the ryots 4,000 candies of cotton, by which it was withdrawn from the general market, and therefore from fair competition, and having tendered it to the merchants for sale at a high price, these complained of it loudly, as a breach of the original engagement with Government; adding, "this injudicious interference in the Broach market would be of the less consequence, if its "effects were confined to that district, but it had produced the prejudicial consequence of "enhancing the price over the whole country to a most serious extent."

59. This, then, is an exact precedent. The proposal in both cases is the same; the houses are the same, with the addition of Adamson; the object is the same; the mode of execution the same; and the policy which sanctioned both measures equally clear and urgent. The only discernible difference in their main features is in the adverse sentiments of the honourable Court, who are pleased to punish with extreme severity in 1811, what in 1804-5 they saw no reason to disapprove.

60. It is proper to mention, for the sake of entire accuracy, that Government, for want of funds to pay for it, finally returned this cotton to the merchants; but this does not affect the strict analogy of the two cases; for the surrender of the cotton did not take place until after the purchase had been completed, and the cotton arrived in Bombay, and therefore not till after all those supposed causes of evil, which the Court now ascribe to the transaction, had had their full effect.

61. There are also reports on record from the northern servants, actually recommending all competition in the Guzerat markets to be suppressed. One of these, in addition to a proposal for suppressing all competition, as equally conducive to the advantage of the Company and the merchants, recommends "that the whole cotton of the year might be purchased by the Company; and such a proportion appropriated to supply the demands "of individuals, as upon enquiry, or the experience of former years, might be found "equitable."

62. Whilst measures and propositions like these were known to be on record, and favourably received, there was certainly little reason to apprehend that suggestions proposing the same end by milder methods could be disapproved.

63. Nay, if reference be had to the orders of the honourable Court of 30th April 1806, it will be seen that they anxiously pressed on the attention of Government the necessity of recurrence to effectual measures for reducing the prime cost of Surat cotton generally, to prevent the annihilation they otherwise apprehended of this branch of trade. At the time these orders were issued, the price of cotton was much lower than in 1809-10. When, therefore, the evil had increased in magnitude, and the necessity for reduction became more manifest and urgent, it is submitted to the honourable Court's justice, whether a simple concurrence in the only immediate means of accomplishing it, and in which the whole

No. I.
Mr. Rickards's Memorial, of 9 Sept. 1811.

Board unanimously voted, should draw down on me alone the utmost severity of their censure and punishment.

64. As to the alledged disrespect of the merchants representation in 1810, and the censure cast on Government for not resenting it, the letter will be found to vary but little in substance from the similar representation above noticed in 1804. It appeared to me to contain nothing more than what the merchants had frequently represented before, both verbally and on record. The grounds of this representation were true, and being fraught with extreme injury to their interests, might be allowed to justify some warmth of expression; but even if this had passed the proper limits of decorum, it would yet remain to be proved, whether quickness in anger was more consistent with the dignity of Government, than that calm composure which, to inflexible steadiness in right actions, adds the charity of forbearance towards minor offences.

65. I can add, from my own knowledge, that no member of the Board, when this proposal was before us, entertained an idea of offence being intended; indeed insult or disrespect were incompatible with the object of the representation. Men of sense seeking a favour of great importance to their interests, would hardly clothe it in language fatal to the success of their request.

66. On the honourable Court's objection, that the arrangement with the houses above mentioned in 1810, went to prevent the export by the Company of cotton to Europe, when necessary, it will be sufficient to observe, that the cotton sent to Europe on account of the Company is always toomil, with the addition of the best picked bales of the other cotton, to make up a cargo. All this is invariably the produce of the Broach purgunnah; with which the purchases of Forbes and Co. and Bruce, Fawcett and Co. could not, and were not intended to interfere; wherefore not a single pound of the Company's cotton could possibly have been prevented going to Europe, by the arrangement in question.

67. Finally, it will be seen in the honourable Court's own records, that the average price of the Company's purchased cotton in 1809, was 175 rupees per candy, exclusive of interest. There was every probability as aforementioned, of the price continuing in 1810, but for the arrangement we adopted with the merchants. Under this arrangement, the Company were supplied with about 4,000 candies of cotton in 1810, at the average cost from both houses, and made up with interest to the 1st August 1810, of 155 rupees per candy. The Company must therefore be said to have saved by this transaction, more than 20 rupees per candy, and therefore on the whole purchase of the year (near 4,000 candies) about 80,000 rupees, or £10,000 sterling.

I have the honour to be, with the greatest respect,
Honourable Sirs,
your very faithful, and obedient humble Servant,
(Signed) R. RICKARDS.

London,
9th September 1812.

Sir,

The Court of Directors of the East India Company have considered your letter, referring to their orders of the 22d February 1811, which removed you from your seat in Council, and, as you state, "declared you unworthy of the Court's future confidence," and appealing to that justice and liberality which have so frequently distinguished the Court's public acts, when there was injury to be repaired, or merit, however humble, to be rewarded—

It appears to the Court, that there is an error in the above quotation made by you, of the Court's having declared you unworthy of their future confidence, as will be evinced by the concluding paragraph of their orders of February 1811, paragraph 27, which is as follows: —"With respect to Mr. Rickards, although he has incurred our displeasure in the instance "above-mentioned, yet, as we entertain a favourable opinion of his abilities in general, we "shall not object to his being employed in any situation under your presidency, to which "he may be eligible from his rank in the service." And the Court having referred to the orders of the 22d February 1811, paragraph 24, which state, "upon those grounds, and in "consideration of the conduct of Mr. Rickards in the hemp transaction, we feel it impos- "sible to continue our confidence to him in the situation of a Member of our Council, and "are therefore under the necessity of removing him, as we hereby do, from that office."

I am directed to acquaint you, that upon a mature consideration of the whole of your case, they cannot depart from the resolution expressed in the said orders.

I am, Sir, &c.
(Signed) JAMES COBB,
Assistant Secretary.

East India House,
26th February, 1813.

Robert Rickards, Esq.

No. 2.

Copy of PARAGRAPHS, No. 2 to No. 27, both inclusive, of a LETTER from the Court of Directors of the East India Company, to the Government of Bombay, dated February 22, 1811;—relative to the COTTON TRADE.

EXTRACT PUBLIC LETTER TO BOMBAY, dated the 22d February 1811.

Paragraph 2.

No. 2. The Court of Directors to the Government of Bombay, 22 Feb. 1811:—on the Cotton Trade.

THE engagement entered into by a majority of your Council, with the house of Bruce, Fawcett & Co. for a cargo of hemp deliverable in London, and the mode of reasoning by which Mr. Rickards supported certain proposals of the private merchants relative to the cotton trade, appeared to us so highly objectionable, that we thought it incumbent upon us to take the earliest occasion to convey to you the impressions made upon our minds by these proceedings, and accordingly our sentiments on them were immediately communicated to you in our commercial letters of the 5th January and 10th October 1810 respectively.

3. It was our meaning then to follow up these communications with our further determination upon the subjects in question; and having since maturely deliberated upon them, we come now to give the final opinions and orders which they call for from us.

4. The extremely exceptionable and improvident nature of the hemp transaction was set forth in our letter of the 10th January 1810, above-mentioned. The answer given by Mr. Rickards in his minute of the 14th May 1810, to the strictures contained in that letter, appear to us quite unsatisfactory, and indeed according to his own account, his explanation, only "leads him to hope that the guarantee may yet appear to contain some advantages, "and not to be so complete a dereliction of the public interest, or neglect of the honour-"able Court's orders, as at first sight pronounced."

5. Our primary object in relation to the provision of hemp was, as our orders to our different Governments stated, both to make the territories of the Company available for the service of the nation in a most important article, and to that end to afford the agency of the Company gratuitously, so as to bring the Indian hemp into the stores of Government here, at no other expense than the prime cost and actual charges disbursed. This was an extensive scheme, requiring time and gradual meliorations of a culture, still in its infancy in India. Our instructions to you were conformable to this idea. You were to make purchases of hemp, and advances for the cultivation of it, on account of the Company in a series of years; and to use all proper means to extend the growth, and improve the quality of the article. In employing the term of "Salsette hemp," we meant to prefer what we understood to be the best hemp; but not to exclude the produce fit to be exported, of any part of our territories, nor consequently the hemp of the Concan, which Messrs. Bruce and Co. furnished; and for this sense of our orders, Mr. Rickards himself contends.

6. Assuredly the Company's agents must have been at least capable of procuring the hemp of Rajahpore from the first hands, as the agents of any private merchants; nor do we see the smallest reason to believe that our servants could not have provided it on as low terms, and at least in as large a quantity. All allegations to the contrary seem to us to be entirely groundless; and we can have no doubt that the best, indeed the only way to accomplish our design, was to employ the servants of the Company, whose agency must equally at least with that of any other description of persons, have encouraged cultivation; and the publicity of their proceedings (a publicity indeed which, Mr. Rickards says, followed the first operation commenced in a silent way of the agents of Messrs. Bruce and Co.) must have contributed to that encouragement. The orders of the Bengal Government to you, which Mr. Rickards pleads, had they differed from those of the Court of Directors, should not have superseded them; but they only enforced a compliance with our instructions to that Government, of which they transmitted you a copy, enjoining you "to adopt such "measures as should appear to you to be best calculated to promote the wishes of the "Honourable Court of His Majesty's Ministers." Certainly, this language afforded no countenance to a scheme which went directly to pervert the design both of the Government and the Company.

7. Mr. Rickards, in his minute above quoted, pleads for the allowance and the exercise of some discretion in our Governments abroad, "situated at such a distance from the con-

No. 2.
The Court of Directors to the Government of Bombay, 22 Feb. 1811;—on the Cotton Trade.

"trouling authority in England, and in circumstances when they might conceive the "Court's wish or the public good to be thereby promoted." But a deviation from plain and positive orders, which always incurs responsibility, and requires a strong justification, can only be acquiesced in under one or more important circumstances, essentially different from those in the contemplation of the Court, when the orders were given. No such essential difference can here be alledged. Indeed we looked less to an immediate than to a gradual and progressive supply of hemp; and we looked to that supply only by the means we pointed out; and if such a latitude of construction and alteration as Mr. Rickards contends for were allowed, very many of our orders might be nullified, and the controul at home greatly weakened.

8. The very measure in question may be taken as an instance. Messrs. Letchmere and Rickards adapted it upon the alledged ground of our orders, and those of the Governor-General in Council; but it went as before intimated, in letter and spirit, entirely to contravene and defeat them. Instead of a great public undertaking, conducted solely upon patriotic disinterested principles, they substituted the private speculation of a mercantile house for one cargo of hemp, a speculation, the prominent feature of which most evidently is not the certainty of any accommodation or supply to Government, but the certainty of gain to that house; because as remarked in our former letter, the house stipulated for, and Messrs. Letchmere and Rickards granted a guarantee of £.65. per ton for the hemp in London, with an option to dispose of it otherwise than to the Company or Government, if they thought fit; so that they were secured not only from loss, but in a profit, if the market here should prove ever so unfavourable; and if the price of hemp should be high, and Government consequently in want of that commodity, they were then at liberty to dispose of their cargo to the best bidder, to disappoint Government, the supply of whom was the original object, and to disappoint also the design of the Company to be the agent and medium of that supply; a supply, that to a certain extent, would have been commenced and found by the Company themselves, but for the interposition of this scheme, which went to turn the provision into the channel of the private merchants, for we do not perceive any suggestion on the part of the majority of Council to enter upon a provision on account of the Company.

9. The issue of this business has been, that the cargo of hemp arrived here when the article was abundant, and the price low. The house of Messrs. Bruce and Co. therefore called on us in virtue of the guarantee, to take the hemp from them at £.65. per ton. We have been obliged to do so; Government have refused to receive it from us at that rate, as indeed, the hemp was not at all provided in the manner we had undertaken it should be; and the article being still low, the cargo yet remains upon our hands; Messrs. Bruce and Co. having alone received any benefit by it.

10. In proceeding to consider the line of conduct adopted by Mr. Rickards, in the particular question brought before you, respecting the Company's trade in cotton, we shall advert generally to the circumstances in which the Company stand in relation to that trade.

11. The district of Broach, part of the lands ceded to us in Guzerat, pays a portion of its revenue in cotton. This practice did not originate with the Company, but was transmitted to them from the Mahratta government, whom they succeeded in the possession of that district; and it is indeed, derived from a principle very ancient in Indian taxation, that of a division of the actual produce of the soil, between the sovereign and the cultivator.

12. The sovereign's share is in modern times commonly converted into a money rent, and such in fact is the case with respect to the cotton produce in question; the cultivator is charged for the whole of his assessment or rent in money, but pays a certain portion of it in cotton, at a money rate agreed on by both parties. The first question that arises here, is whether the interest of the cultivator be properly secured in such a practice; and we are glad to receive satisfactory information on this head from the judge and magistrate of Broach; for agreeing with the sentiment expressed to that officer by our Governor, in his letter of the 4th of July 1808, we would not have the object of commercial advantage pursued to the prejudice of the just claims of the cultivator of the soil. Mr. Prendergast, however, the judge and magistrate above alluded to, states, that whilst the farmers can get for copass or uncleaned cotton, at the rate of 30 rupees per bhar, it will be decidedly more profitable to them to cultivate it than the most valuable grain, but that they are sure both of 40 rupees per bhar from the Company, and a certain sale. And Lieut. Colonel Walker, the resident of Baroda, in an instructive paper recorded in your Proceedings on the Cotton Trade of Guzerat, after stating that when there is a moderate competition, the price is from 32 to 35 rupees per bhar; but that when purchasers are more numerous, it rises much higher, and observing further "that great care should be taken not to reduce the price of the article too "much, which would discourage the cultivation;" nevertheless, estimates the price which might be given by purchasers, at 35 rupees per bhar. This he does too in a plan for correcting many frauds and abuses in that trade, of which he has given an account, as they are practised by the various classes of natives employed in it, between the first grower and the last purchaser, for exportation, both of whom suffer by the misconduct of the intermediate men, whether acting as sellers or as agents for the exporting merchant. From this account, which has reference not so much to the limited district of Broach, which pays a part of its cotton produce in kind to the Company, as generally to the other cotton districts, including those still under the Mahratta government, it appears that "the moment the amount of the "jummabundy is determined, the securities whom the ryots give for their assessment, "proceed in communication with the ryots, but often at their own discretion, to settle the "price of the copass with the patells, and the patells and tultaties account with the "cultivators." The securities termed manotudars, are the monied men of the country, and the amuldar being commonly of their fraternity, they have the support of his authority. The manotudars, or securities, usually sell the cotton in the state of copass, the purchasers from them are the banians resident in the districts, who either sell it again on the spot, or deliver it to the banias to be cleaned.

No. 2. The Court of Directors to the Government of Bombay, 22 Feb. 1811;—on the Cotton Trade.

13. It is with the cleaning of the cotton that frauds begin to multiply. Every stage thenceforward is marked by trick and dishonesty; the article is mixed with one of an inferior sort, or packed when only imperfectly cleaned; it is removed from the cleaning wheels without being teased, in order to separate any remaining leaves or seeds, put into darkened damp warehouses, which are cow-dunged to keep them moist; and the cotton, to preserve it humid, is almost daily sprinkled with water, the deceit being covered by putting dry cotton on the outside of that which has been wetted. The night before the purchaser means to begin weighing, the setter exposes his cotton to the heavy dews, spreading it on the ground to receive as much moisture as suits his purpose; the wind at the same time assisting his object, by blowing into the cotton a quantity of dust, sand, or other impurities, and all is deposited in warehouses again, moistened, some hours before the agents of the purchaser appear. Frauds still more gross are practised. The cotton is sometimes wetted with a mixture of salt and water, to increase doubly the weight; and even leaves, dirt, and stones are purposely mixed with it. The native agents employed in the district on the part of the exporting merchants of Bombay, to examine, weigh, and pack the cotton, are suspected of being parties in all these impositions; and from the detail of their conduct given by Major Walker, it seems difficult to believe that they are not both negligent and corrupt*.

* Major Walker's account of the Cotton Trade at Guzerat, recorded in Council.

14. The cotton dealers too, it appears from Major Walker's account, take advantage of a season of brisk demand, to put in practice all their arts to adulterate the article and enhance the price; and they sometimes also treat the purchaser with an insolence which reduces him to the dilemma of either taking a bad article on their terms, or running the hazard of losing the advance he had made. Hence, when the foreign market is unfavourable, and the demand for cotton but small, the dealers, afraid the article should remain on their hands, lower its price, and improve its quality. From the whole of this curious account, it is evident, that where the cultivators of cotton are under the power of monied men, the dealers in the districts, so utterly insensible to the true principles of trade, to a character, and to common honesty, and whilst the agents of the exporting merchants combine with those native dealers in their dishonest practices, real freedom of trade is not to be looked for. We, therefore, see no reason to doubt that the cultivators of cotton, who pay in kind to the Company, are better off than any other persons of the same class in Guzerat; and, in such a state of society, we think, that the community, instead of being injured by the Company's practice, of receiving a certain portion of uncleaned cotton at a fair or rather liberal rate, may be benefited by the example of equitable attention to the interest of the ryots, which is exhibited in the mode of conducting this business.

15. Besides the cotton thus acquired, the Company also purchase in the general market, through the medium of their European servants, a certain quantity of that article, chiefly with a view to aid their important commercial operations in China. This purchase is not carried on to the exclusion of any other buyers, nor to the disadvantage of the owners of cotton; for, on the contrary, the Company or their agents are accused, by the houses of Bruce, Fawcett, and Co. and Forbes and Co., of having, by their purchases, raised the market price of cotton to an immoderate degree; a charge, however, which Mr. Wren, the commercial resident at Surat, defends himself from, and retorts upon them. But certain it is, that the Company do not exercise power either to monopolize the market, or procure the article below its just value. It is now, and has been long, well understood, that it is not the interest of the Company to do so; and the proprietor of an estate, who has a lasting concern in its prosperity, may be expected to be less disposed to take advantage of the tenants than a stranger, unconnected with them. The houses above-mentioned, however, have ventured publicly to complain to you "of the ruinous consequences which the competition "of Government in the cotton market has unfortunately entailed on its own subjects;" their appeal, they say, "is founded on the principle, that the interference of a government in "any market is destructive of fair competition, and necessarily tramples under foot all the "collective interests of its subjects:" and the remedy they propose is, that the Company shall not otherwise engage in the cotton market, than for the purpose of receiving revenue in kind from the Broach pergunnahs, in which case these merchants offer to supply the Company with 4,000 bales of cotton for China, under a requisition, however, that the engagement may be kept secret.

16. A more extraordinary proposal, we are persuaded, does not stand upon our records. The Company is the oldest European trader now in India; it has opened the ports of the East to other British subjects, who, fostered solely under its protection, have come at length to share in all its extended commerce, Indian and European; and particularly to enjoy advantages in the inland trade of India, to which they could not have had access in the time of the native sovereigns. But these two houses, now in effect, claim for the private merchants the whole of the trade, Indian and European; because the principle on which they ground their appeal, however they may have meant to apply it, goes fully to that extent. In the name of those who could not have had a residence in India without the permission of the Company, and who have risen to commercial consequence under the auspices of their government, we are plainly told that they are not contented with being partakers in the commercial privileges of the Company, the whole should be left to them.

No. 2. The Court of Directors to the Government of Bombay, 22 Feb. 1811;—on the Cotton Trade.

17. Although no proof is attempted of the assumed principle which involves this proposition, or of the justness of its application, some notice will nevertheless be hereafter taken of it; but it may suffice to observe now, that the proposition contends for fair competition and an equitable regard to the interests of all the subjects of a state; consequently, we persevere for the principle of freedom of trade. The Company are represented as violating all these; a scheme is proposed for the prevention of such violations, and what are the means it adopts?—A secret combination between buyers to narrow the competition. The two houses who brought forward the scheme must before have agreed to act together as one buyer; because as such they offer to act for the Company also; thus they would reduce three principal purchasers into one; and that one is to enter the market with all the advantage of knowing how much the competition will be narrowed, and with what certainty he can make his own large provision, whilst he offers only diminished prices.

18. Thus, you were required on the principle of fair competition, and of shewing an equitable regard to the interests of all the subjects of a State, to form a species of monopoly and combination in favour of two purchasers against the sellers universally; such is the practical result, in this case, of a high sounding criminating appeal to public principles; it is a project of self-interest, directly at variance with those principles. Too much accustomed as we have been to such perversion and abuse, in discussions relative to the commerce of the Company, we should not have dwelt so long upon this instance, (though certainly the extreme indecorum of such an attack from persons living and flourishing under the protection of our Government, might naturally have led to particular observation,) if a member of our Government had not sanctioned it in so remarkable a way.

19. Mr. Rickards not only appears to adopt the reasoning and scope of the letter from the two houses, but endeavours to support their proposal with additional arguments. The first argument, which is directed to the propriety of reducing the selling price of cotton in the districts, is founded very much upon the principle, that if the return of cotton to the grower were equal to the return of grain, it might be sufficient. We apprehend this principle of equalizing the profit on all other articles of culture to the profit on grain, to be unwarranted and unsound; and we can have no doubt that any Government which should attempt practically to establish it, would widely depart from the line of its duty. Besides, Mr. Rickards ought to have known, that the enhanced price at which the exporting merchant stores his cotton, is not to be ascribed to the rate paid to the cultivator, but to the passing of the article through different hands, each of which obtains a gain that swells the ultimate cost. To the intermediate dealers between the grower and the exporter, and to the competition for the purchase of the article, the rise of price to the final purchaser is chiefly to be ascribed. The price thus produced by the number and concurrence of buyers, Mr. Rickards, by a singular misuse of language, calls "a monopoly price;" whereas, wherever a real monopoly is exercised to exclude other buyers than the monopolist, it procures the commodity cheap; and when used to exclude other venders, it sells the commodity dear. On the contrary, nothing is better known, than that competition in buying has the effect of raising the price, and in selling of lowering it; in both ways the effect may be excessive; but it is only the nature of competition which is now in question. To counteract "a "monopoly price," which Mr. Rickards has so indefensibly assumed, he recommends a measure in its nature partaking, as has been already shewn, of real monopoly; a measure which he seems to think the more allowable, because few of the cotton sellers are our own subjects; and though it might have been natural for a servant of the Company, who thought the principle of reducing the competition just, to propose that some of the private merchants should withdraw, in order to be served by the Company, rather than that the Company should withdraw, to become dependent on them; yet Mr. Rickards points solely to the latter; because, according to him, the Company's purchases is one of the causes of the "monopoly price;" it being manifest, he says, that "their agents go into "the market backed with all the influence and authority of office, and the knowledge of a "competitor in the market, who must at all events be served, is only calculated to make "sellers hold back, until their demands, perhaps exorbitant, be fulfilled."

20. Now, if the charge had been, that the Company's agents had by power and influence obliged the owners to sell cotton to them, whether they were willing or not, that they got the commodity at a less price than the usual rate of the market, or than the owners were content to sell it at; or had not permitted other purchasers to come into the market, or had forcibly taken from them any article they had bought there, would at least have appeared a consistency between the alledged cause and the alledged effect; but what is the thing complained of? it is excessive price, and that price produced by the Company; but is force or influence necessary to induce a seller to take the highest or even the fair price of the market for his commodity? The effect of force and influence, properly so called, must be to depress produce and competition and high prices; but here another complaint is, that competition is too great, which is the sure consequence of great demand and a free market. In such a demand, and such a market, the best price and largest capital give the only power and influence, influence, excepting the confidence which we believe the Company have established from general honour in their commercial dealings. Under such circumstances, what is the meaning of the knowledge of a competitor in the market, who must at all events be served. From the connection in which this passage stands, and its general aspect, it might seem that it alluded to force; but from the scope of the complaint, it can only import, that the known ability and determination of the Company to buy, must have the effect of raising the price. But so in its degree must the price fall of every other competitor in such a market. Mr. Rickards himself admits, "that there is no other real, ostensible, or even assigned cause for the "high price, than the too urgent competition of the buyers." Any merchant however among those competitors would revolt at an attempt to restrict him in the use he should make of his capital; and may not the Company expect the same privilege as other merchants in a discretionary use of theirs? Yet this is opposed sometimes in the way of direct argument, and as it is here, by representing the influence of capital and character as the influence and authority of office.

No. 2.
The Court of Directors to the Government of Bombay, 22 Feb. 1811;—on the Cotton Trade.

21. Objections, early derived from the very peculiar constitution of the Company, which has connected territorial dominion with commerce, have continued to be represented in a state of things extremely different from that under which they were first advanced, and the principles of political economy have been alledged in their support. The just application of general principles, even where they are well understood, is known to be a matter of difficulty. That science, which is itself very much built on fact and experience, may be supposed yet capable of improvement by further knowledge; and the constitution and system of the Company, instead of being judged by principles adopted before any sufficient experience was acquired of the effects of such a constitution and system, may afford new and useful data for enlarging the boundaries of the science.

22. In the course of the last twenty-five years, a legislative code in many essential respects new, has been formed by the Company, for their territories in India. Let that body of regulations be consulted, both as to the matter and tenor of them, and as to their practical effects, in order to determine whether they have been formed under the influence of a commercial spirit, or dictated by enlarged and true principles of policy and government; having for their grand object the welfare of the whole community, and every class of it. Certain commercial factories and prescriptive commercial rights, were long enjoyed by the Company, under the native sovereigns in India. These have been indeed retained, but under such modifications and regulations as not to interfere with the general trade of the country, or the interest of those whom the Company employ; and further than to secure the right to advances and performance of engagements to which every private trader is entitled, no authority is allowed. Force and compulsion, as far as we understand and intend, are not used either to carry on the commerce of the Company, or obstruct that of other persons. And, as already intimated, in such a state of society as the great continent of India presents, where, from old inveterate habits, there is a disposition in every native, whether a trader or of any other class, to oppress those inferior to him with whom he has to act; the general example of fair dealing and punctuality to engagements, which the commercial branch of of the Company's affairs has exhibited, may be beneficial to the people, and rather lead them to improved notions of commerce, which among such a people, and where the subordinate details of administration must be trusted to natives, can never be well learned, while the moral habits are so corrupt. In fact, as the great objection against the Company, founded in the idea of their uniting the contracted selfish spirit of traffic with the character of a sovereign, and using the latter to serve the views of the former, proceeds in the first place upon a supposition that no liberal just views in matters of government, are consistent with commercial pursuits, a supposition which the experience of this country sufficiently contradicts, so the large system of commerce which the Company have conducted in India since their acquisition of territory, may serve to shew that it is possible for Government to manage a commercial department, without abandoning either the principles of government, or those of commerce.

23. That at present our Government employs no force to carry on the commercial pursuits of the Company, or to hinder any individual from buying and selling, and that no unfair influence is exercised in their commercial affairs, we take to be perfectly established, because otherwise, we cannot doubt that particular instances would have been pointed out. Theorists hostile to the Company, object to the union of the commercial character with that of sovereign, from the nature of the thing assuming that it must produce ill effects; practical men like the two mercantile houses in question, availing themselves of this prejudice, advance the same objection as if the actual bad consequences of this union were known and indisputable; but those houses give no particular fact, and we cannot help expressing our surprize, that you should have passed over such assertions as they have advanced, which indeed extremely implicate your own conduct, without calling for explanations and animadverting on the most unbecoming terms in which they are delivered. But if we have reason to complain of the unfairness with which the combination of government and commerce in the system of the Company is used by those whose prejudices or interests are in opposition to the Company, what shall we say of a servant of our own, a member of our Government placed by us in a confidential and honourable situation, who lends his influence to confirm the prejudices just mentioned. If indeed, the union of the commercial with the political character had been productive of inconveniences, was it the province of Mr. Rickards to join the accusers of our system in holding it up to censure. Was there no other mode in which, if he entertained the sentiments he has expressed, he might might have communicated them to us? Far from wishing to repress free communication, we are desirous to encourage it on all occasions, when becomingly made; but the occasion which Mr. Rickards has used to bring before us his opinion upon a very important subject, is certainly not happily nor respectfully chosen; and we think, that before he entered upon the subject, introduced as it then was, he should have been careful to have proceeded upon solid grounds; but he quotes no fact to shew that what he calls "the heterogeneous union "of the commercial and tutelary character," has produced inconveniences and injuries; nor does he seem to know of any; he only "apprehends that they cannot fail to ensue;" and on this presumption, coinciding with the evidently hostile accusation of the mercantile houses in question, he arraigns to the world the constitution of the Company, and gives to the opponents of the Company all the weight that can be derived from the opinion and authority of a member of our Government, who thus does us an injury which an open enemy could not inflict, not only unnecessarily, but as we conceive, against the real truth and facts of the case; and all this in support of a speculation which has for its immediate object the private benefit of particular parties; and which militate against the true principles of political economy and of commerce; and as it is also in our opinion contrary to that judgment and that sense of duty and propriety, which ought to have guided the conduct of Mr. Rickards on such an occasion.

No. 2.
The Court of Directors of the Government of Bombay, 22 Feb. 1811;—on the Cotton Trade.

24. Upon these grounds, and in consideration of the conduct of Mr. Rickards in the hemp transaction, we feel it impossible to continue our confidence to him in the situation of a Member of our Council; and are therefore under the necessity of removing him, as we hereby do from that office. Upon the same considerations, we remove from our Council Mr. Lechmere, who has concurred with Mr. Rickards in the measures and reasonings in question; but as we understand that his arrival in England may be shortly expected, we do not think it necessary to enlarge further upon his conduct.

25. It being necessary therefore, in consequence of these removals, that we should proceed to a new arrangement for the Bombay Council, we have resolved that the Council shall consist of the following persons; viz. Jon^{n} Duncan, Esq. President and Governor; Lieutenant General the Honourable Jn^{o} Abercromby, Commander in Chief, and Second in Council; George Brown, Esq. Third in Council; Jn^{o} Elphinstone, Esq. Fourth in Council; and a Commission of Government, under the Company's Seal, embracing that arrangement, will accordingly be forwarded to you by the extra ship Northampton, now under dispatch.

26. We are aware that Mr. Nathan Crow succeeded to a seat in Council on the 3d November 1809, in consequence of our appointment, from whence he retired on the arrival of General Abercromby, the 25th of the same month. By the orders contained in the 114th paragraph of our Letter of the 27th June 1810, a person, under such circumstances, is not considered as entitled to succeed to Council upon any future vacancy, without a fresh appointment by the Court of Directors. We continue to have the same opinion of the merits of Mr. Crow, which at first induced us to appoint him a provisional Counsellor; but being informed that the state of this Gentleman's health is such as to render him inadequate to the active duties of that important station, we have not included him in the present Commission.

27. With respect to Mr. Rickards, although he has incurred our displeasure in the instances above mentioned, yet, as we entertain a favourable opinion of his abilities in genera', we shall not object to his being employed in any situation under your Presidency, to which he may be eligible from his rank in the service.

No. 3.

Copy of PARAGRAPHS, No. 2 to 8, of a LETTER, in the Revenue Department, from the Governor in Council of Bombay, to the Court of Directors, dated 14 October 1808, with Copies of the Papers referred to therein;—and Copy of the Reply of the Court of Directors, under date the 10th of January 1810, to the said Communication.

PROCEEDINGS of the Governor in Council of Bombay, on Mr. Rickards's Observations on the Revenue System of India; and on his Minutes relative to a General Reduction of Expences in the Establishments under the Presidency of Bombay.

EXTRACT of REVENUE LETTER from BOMBAY; dated 14th October 1808.

Paragraph 2.

IN availing ourselves of the eligible opportunity that presents itself, of forwarding our records in this department, by the honourable Company's ship Wexford, we have only to submit to the consideration of your honourable Court, in pursuance of the promise made in the 3d paragraph of that dispatch, the minute recorded by our colleague Thomas Lechmere, Esq. on the subject of the documents delivered in by Robert Rickards, Esq. and our President, in respect to the prevailing Revenue Systems of India.

3. Your honourable Court will observe, that on recording Mr. Lechmere's minute, we determined, pursuant to the sentiments of the majority of the Board, to avoid making any innovation, without a previous reference to your honourable Court on the system and principles of settlement, for the island of Salsette; which having been originally sanctioned by the Supreme Government, has since been approved and confirmed by your honourable Court; this Resolution not, however, extending to such part of that island, as is not under cultivation, and as such occupied by parties to whom a proprietary title has been announced, our preceding determination was accordingly qualified under the motives adverted to in our President's remarks of the 8th of July, by a latitude to Mr. Rickards, to make trial of his financial system, on those parts of Salsette that were thus open to the experiment; in respect to which, we expressed our readiness to concur in such measures, as Mr. Rickards might, in consistence with the preceding general exception, suggest for that purpose.

4. And inasmuch as the inhabitants of Caranja appeared to have requested Mr. Rickards system of finance to be introduced among them, we intimated to that gentleman, that we were very desirous that he should immediately proceed with the experiment in that island, such as might also tend to facilitate the attainment of Mr. Rickards objects in deeming thereon practicable a further reduction in the charges of collection.

5. Mr. Rickards was at the same time invited to bring forward, for our consideration, those reductions of expense on the islands of Bombay and Salsette, and generally throughout the honourable Company's possessions under this presidency, which had occurred to him to be available, and which the present exigencies render most expedient to realize to the utmost limits of prudence, sound policy, and justice; at the same time, that the Governor has in his remarks of the 7th July, stated his belief that the aggregate charges of revenue establishments under this presidency (however from local circumstances, varying in different collectorships) are already to the full as moderate, or rather more so, than under either of your other presidencies in India.

6. Mr. Rickards having delivered in a further minute, explaining at length the motives which impel him to decline all management in the proposed reduction of the native establishment on Salsette, and the settling of wealthy capitalists on the waste lands of the island, in consideration chiefly to the latitude tendered to him, admitting but of a partial operation to his plan; we beg leave reſpectfully to refer your honourable Court to that Gentleman's conſequent minute, and to a further one delivered in by our Preſident on the occaſion, in whoſe opinion Mr. Lechmere entirely concurs.

7th. We take this occaſion to inform your honourable Court, that we have under conſideration, ſeveral applications from wealthy inhabitants of Bombay, to become landed proprietors on Salſette, on the ſame principles and conditions as had been conceded before Mr. Rickards' arrival to Ardaſſeer Dady; but as the ſeveral applications have not yet been matured and finally arranged, we refrain from entering into particulars by the preſent diſpatch, the more eſpecially as the general ſubject will ſoon be brought again under your conſideration, in a fuller point of view; and meanwhile, we beg leave to refer to the minutes; the preſent ſlight notice of the contents of which, are to be viewed as merely indicatory of the outline of the courſe in which this important ſubject has been hitherto conducted.

8. Duplicates of Mr. Rickards, and of the Governor's firſt minutes on the ſubject, (the originals of which were ſent on the 9th of July laſt, by His Majeſty's ſhip St. Fiorenzo), accompanying this.

EXTRACT BOMBAY REVENUE CONSULTATIONS, 9th July 1808.

THE Governor delivers in for record, the following Letter, and Papers accompanying, which, having been addreſſed to Government by Mr. Rickards, previouſly to that Gentleman's taking his ſeat in Council, have ſince remained with the Reſident, under the circumſtances hereafter noticed.

No. 3. Mr. Rickards (24 Sept. 1807) on Taxation and Revenue.

Honourable Sir,

I take the liberty of laying before you a few remarks on the ſubject of Taxation in general, and of the prevailing Revenue Syſtems of India; which I reſpectfully hope may appear to you, as well as to the Honourable Court of Directors, to merit conſideration, in view to the future proſperity of this country.

If I conceive that proſperity to be incapable of any conſiderable permanent increaſe, under the ſyſtem of land taxation now in force, I have, in advancing that opinion, cautiouſly endeavoured to avoid, as I ſhould be much concerned in, giving the ſlighteſt offence.

With ſome experience in the revenue adminiſtration of India, and actuated by no motive but that of the public good, I hope to be exempt from the charge of arrogance or inconſiderate preſumption: an humble opinion can, at all events, do no harm; and calm diſcuſſion and ſober inveſtigation are, in all ſpeculative queſtions, the only ſure road to the attainment or confirmation of truth.

In the Eſſay now ſubmitted, I have applied the principles with which I am impreſſed in the form of an arrangement for Salſette, where, if approved, a trial may be made without riſk of the leaſt particle of loſs to the honourable Company; and where proofs will ſoon be given, from the peculiar ſituation of the iſland, of the merit or demerit of the theory adduced. Failure in Salſette muſt determine its inapplicability to other parts of India; while ſucceſs may perhaps ſanction the more general adoption of the ſame principles; and though the ſame degree of ſucceſs cannot be expected to follow the general introduction of ſuch a ſyſtem every where, ſince the progreſs of improvement in all great countries muſt be gradual, and ſlow; yet unequivocal proofs of their efficacy in one favoured ſpot, are reaſonable grounds for anticipating ſimilar conſequences in others, as the courſe of induſtry and wealth ſhall gradually, yet ſimilarly, be extended to them: if, in ſhort, the principles are proved to be good, they may be conſidered as the ground-work of great and extenſive proſperity, which, it is humbly apprehended, is not a conſtituent feature of our preſent revenue ſyſtems.

Should any thing urged in these ſheets induce you, Sir, to make the propoſed experiment in Salſette, permit me to beg your particular attention to that part of the plan, which ſuggeſts the immediate conſtruction of reſervoirs, and points out the practicable ſaving in the native eſtabliſhments.

The advantages of the former are too manifeſt to need further comment, whilſt of the latter it may be obſerved, that under a plan of revenue ſo ſimple as the one I have recommended, it is by no means improbable but the eſtabliſhments may admit of ſtill further reduction; but if only the ſame principle of collection be extended to the other collectorſhips under this Government, there may be anticipated an annual ſaving of conſiderable amount, (as exhibited in Voucher, No. 9,) ſince, from actual experience of the ſufficiency of ſuch an eſtabliſhment for realizing revenue, even on the old ſyſtem, with perfect ſecurity, I cannot for a moment doubt, but that, with the good will of the collectors, it might be every where, and advantageouſly, acted upon.

In the preceding arrangements I had intended to include the iſland of Bombay; but finding the whole ſyſtem, which has been long in force here, ſo complicated; the nature of landed tenures ſo uncertain, yet ſo important to be accurately known; and much other matter requiring deep and probably long reſearch, ſatisfactorily to elucidate, I thought it better

better to compreſs all that related to this particular iſland into another ſeparate treatiſe; and I ſhall accordingly continue my inquiries in this view, if it meet the approbation of Government.

As Bombay, Salſette, and Caranjah, with the ſubordinate ſmaller iſlands, only conſtitute one collectorſhip, and that by no means an extenſive one, there is certainly no reaſon why one cutcherry under the collector ſhould not be ſufficient for the duties thereof.

In the preſent plan, I have therefore declined framing the neceſſary eſtabliſhment for this cutcherry, until the Bombay arrangements ſhould be completed; but I ſtill truſt there are ſufficient data given to judge, with accuracy, of the annual ſaving in that part of the collectorſhip treated of, and which, in Salſette and Caranjah, will be about 20,000 rupees per annum, or more than two-thirds of the preſent amount.

It will not eſcape the obſervation of the honourable Board, that the accompanying petitions from Salſette and Caranjah, contain many repreſentations beyond thoſe adverted to in the eſſay, and which may require local adjuſtment previous to the adoption of any arrangement, whatever it be, for the permanent adminiſtration of these iſlands.

Among other requeſts, the inhabitants of Caranjah have particularly ſolicited the introduction of the ſyſtem here recommended. It was explained to, and fully underſtood by them; but it has not been communicated to thoſe of Salſette; though, from the frequent and detailed diſcuſſions I have had with men of influence and property connected with Salſette, I have reaſon to be aſſured it would prove equally acceptable to the inhabitants of that iſland.

I muſt finally apologize for any errors that may be diſcovered in the accompanying treatiſe. It has been only begun ſince my late arrival in India, and neceſſarily finiſhed in more haſte than is perhaps conſiſtent with the importance of ſo grave a ſubject. Still, if the principles are good, trifling omiſſions or overſights may be pardoned, and however fond the ſuppoſed partialities of a man for his own productions, I ſhall be amply ſatisfied, if this only leads, in abler hands, to the aſcertainment of truth.

I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) R. RICKARDS.

Bombay,
24th Sept. 1807.

ESSAY ON TAXATION:

Containing Principles attempted to be deduced from the Laws of Nature, and applied to the Revenue Syſtem of India, with Propoſals for an experimental Amendment on the Iſlands of Salſette and Caranja; and a Plan of Collection, on ſimple principles, by which the Revenue Charges (excluſive of European Allowances) on thoſe Iſlands, are capable of reduction in at leaſt two-thirds of their preſent amount.

1. IN the different branches of ſcience and art, theories, or firſt principles, ſeem to be univerſally uſeful; they are often, indeed, derided and placed in diſadvantageous compariſon with the ſuperior utility of practice; and bad theories deſerve it; but it muſt be recollected, that all practice has its appropriate theory; the pupil, or apprentice, equally imbibe the firſt principles of their profeſſion or art, as they advance in habits of experimental ſkill; and in all obſervations wherein the mind is concerned, that execution is moſt perfect where good theory and good practice are combined.

2. A celebrated modern author has obſerved, that there is no ſcience in which firſt principles are more neceſſary than in that of political economy. There is, perhaps, none where eſtabliſhed maxims are in execution, ſo often neglected. In civil government, the road to permanent proſperity is, like the aſcent to the temple of virtue, ſtrewed with many difficulties, and many temptations to ſtray: the mind is dazzled with a view of advantages, which a ſlight deviation from the preſcribed track ſeems capable of attaining; they are greedily graſped at by the hand of miſguided political zeal, on the plauſible pretence of public good; and in the diſappointment, or accumulated difficulties which enſue, we might uſefully learn, were not prejudice predominant, that durable proſperity is only to be found in the ways of eternal juſtice; that perſeverance therein is indiſpenſable at whatever temporary ſacrifice or forbearance it may require; and that deviations, under the fallacious hope of collateral benefits, are often ruinous, or at beſt yield but partial good, at the heavy loſs of a diſproportionate degree of laſting evil.

3. The envious deſire of excluſive advantage, coveted at the expenſe of ſtrict juſtice, perhaps of a neighbour's right, would ſeem to be the foundation of that ſyſtem of rivalry and intrigue, in which courts and miniſters ſo vainly aſpire to excel: diplomatic ſkill degenerates into artifice and cunning, and cuſtom throws the veil of ſufferance over the moſt unrighteous acts; when theſe fail, violence is recurred to, and then follows the greateſt of all political evils— the ſcourge of horrid war.

4. How often too is the pretended honour of a nation, like that of a duelliſt, made to conſiſt in blood and ruin; revenge is the moving cauſe; eſtabliſhed principles are diſregarded; and honour and benefit perverſely ſought in the indulgence, rather than in the controul, of the moſt odious paſſions.

5. To a ſimilar deviation from the broad path of juſtice and forbearance, to the indulgence, in fact, of paſſion, at the expenſe of reaſon, may alſo be aſcribed moſt of the internal diſorders of all political inſtitutions. The avarice, the vanity, and ſometimes the ſeverity of power, eſtabliſh, between a ſtate and its ſubjects, two diſtinct intereſts, which, in view to national proſperity, ought ever to be inſeparably united.

No. 3. Mr. Rickards (24 Sept. 1807) on Taxation and Revenue.

6. It is thus that power may be ſaid to involve itſelf both in foreign broils and domestic difficulties, tempted by the flattering ſuggeſtions of human craft to forſake the unerring maxims of infinite wiſdom.

7. There are ſundry points in the ſcience of political economy, concerning which the learned are ſtill at variance, and on which, therefore, it would be preſumptuous in an humble individual to intrude an unlearned opinion; but there are others ſo obviouſly right, that we cannot be wrong in their aſſumption; the only difficulty lies in their due adaptation to the ſtate of things in this country.

8. Nature is the ground-work of all ſcience; and it is from the laws of nature alone, or the revealed will of God, that we can hope to derive principles of infallible excellence. If, therefore, we can diſcover thoſe laws, by which nature regulates her ſocieties on earth, no man will ſurely preſume to deny the policy, or even the neceſſity of their adoption, or to think the expedients or ingenuity of his own fallible reaſon a better guide; and the conſtitution of the human mind, its natural powers, and its paſſions, bear ſo ſtrong a ſimilitude in all countries, that the ſame immutable laws of nature may be found equally efficacious, and equally prevalent among all the various races of civilized life.

9. It is generally admitted, that one of the moſt univerſal laws on which the fabric of human ſociety is formed, is that of ſelf-love. It pervades the whole race of man, and even the virtues and energies of the mind are attributed to this ſource. We do good becauſe it is a gratification to ourſelves, or becauſe we expect benefits in return; we labour to ſupply the wants, or promote the conveniences and luxuries of others, becauſe we are ourſelves benefited by the exertion, in fortune, or in fame, ſelf-love, or ſelf-intereſt, in here the fundamental ſource of good to every branch of the ſociety, and ſelf-intereſt is only a modification of the ſame. Orig.

10. To give greater force and efficacy to this radical principle of human ſociety, nature, all-wiſe and all-conſiſtent, has implanted in man a correſponding motive to action, in which the human is found eſſentially to differ from the reſt of animal creation. Every animal in nature beſides, has no wants but what its own power can ſupply. Man alone (excepting perhaps the loweſt ſavage) is a purely dependent being; he is unable to ſupply the hundredth, nay, the thouſandth part of his own wants; and whilſt labouring, within a limited ſphere, to furniſh thoſe of others, thouſands and ten thouſands are ſimilarly employed to contribute to his own. Civilized man thus owes the enjoyments and comforts of life to the aſſiſtance of his fellows: it is a common cauſe, in which the wants of all call forth the exertions of all; and each finds his own advantage in conducing to the general demand.

11. Self-intereſt is therefore the law of nature, which prompts to this univerſal labour, for the benefit and uſe of others; and the natural dependence of man, or in other words, thoſe numerous wants which others only can ſupply, give activity to the paſſion, and call it into full exertion. The extent of theſe wants is therefore the meaſure of public proſperity in every ſociety; for it is the profitable ſupply thereof, that occaſions the proſperity of individuals, and what is public proſperity but that of every individual combined.

12. Self-love or ſelf-intereſt, is now diſplayed in the garb of univerſal induſtry; profit, or as before obſerved, the profitable ſupply of men's wants, is its only natural ſtimulus, and the general good of the whole community is the natural reſult. To reſtrain theſe wants, or to ſhare too deeply in the profits of induſtry, are conſequently impolitic acts of power, from being evident counteractions of thoſe very laws, by which alone ſociety can be expected to proſper: and we accordingly find thoſe ſtates to be moſt remarkable for internal wealth and ſtrength, for the general ſpread of the comforts of life among all claſſes of the community, where the laws on which induſtry and profit are founded, are allowed to operate with the greateſt efficacy and freedom.

13. Look, on the other hand, to the ſtate of our Indian poſſeſſions; and with the exception of our chief commercial towns, and ſome few other favoured ſpots, we are preſented with a view of what, comparatively ſpeaking, may be called univerſal poverty, in one of the fineſt countries of the world; and the cauſe does not appear to me to be hid in impenetrable obſcurity. Agriculture being, more eſpecially in extenſive and fertile continents, the moſt natural employment of man, is here productive of at moſt but little profit: the actual annual produce of the ſoil is taxed, on the principle of Government being entitled to one-half of that produce; or in caſes where the lands are made over in proprietary right to individuals, to upwards of eight-tenths of the net rent of ſuch ſtates. The rate of this tax is enormous, compared with that of any known flouriſhing country; and it is aggravated in very many inſtances by the exactions of native ſervants: it is laid on the immediate employments, and ſhares in the immediate profits of induſtry, and alſo falls directly on the moſt important of the neceſſaries of life, all and each of which, are ſerious political evils.

14. But were the ſuperfluous produce of agriculture, or the major part thereof, left in the hands of thoſe who raiſed it, it is eaſy to conceive how it would ſet in motion mechanical induſtry, for the ſupply of wants which every poſſeſſor of this ſuperfluity would then naturally feel, and by diſtribution among the various workmen in trades and profeſſions, contribute to encreaſe the comforts and the wealth of every part of the ſociety; for, when the poſſeſſors and cultivators of land realize wealth, to be expended in the gratification of wants and wiſhes, mechanics, &c. by the ſupply of thoſe wants, increaſe in wealth and numbers alſo, ſo as to require (in addition to the wealthy, idle conſumer of every ſociety) more and more of the produce of their own, as well as of agricultural labour; the increaſing funds on both ſides occaſion a mutually increaſing demand.

encreaſe

15. But where the major part of this ſuperfluous produce (or, which is the ſame thing, the proceeds thereof) is abſorbed in a government tax, and then expended in purpoſes foreign to the ſupport and encouragement of induſtry, it is equally clear that the wants of ſociety can neither increaſe, nor the funds from which they originate.

16. Let us conceive, for example, the effect of a heavy land-tax, raiſed to ſupport a large ſtanding army in a country of no commerce, ſuch a tax as the one under diſcuſſion, viz. half the groſs produce of lands, or 8-10ths of the rent of eſtates, can only be ſuppoſed at beſt to leave a bare maintenance to the payers; their means of ſupporting labour and mechanical induſtry muſt therefore be very limited. Conceive next, the diſtribution of this tax among the component members of the army, who are all idle conſumers, or perſons not engaged in lucrative employments: here alſo it only affords a bare maintenance. In this progreſs of the limited circulating wealth of a country, there are no viſible grounds of augmentation or improvement of any thing, there is no increaſing fund for the ſupport of induſtry; no more food required in one year than the preceding, no greater ſupplies of the neceſſaries and comforts of life; all is ſtationary, becauſe all are equally poor; a people having attained the limit of its food, may thus exiſt from year to year, but can never advance in durable proſperity.

17. Now, if a capital does by its employment, ſay, for example, in one year, produce a greater fund for the re-employment in the next year, of a greater quantity of labour to that originally employed, the induſtry of a country is manifeſtly advancing: if it re-produces an equal fund, induſtry is ſtationary; but if it re-produces a leſſer fund, i. e. a fund only equal to the employment of a leſſer number of labourers, artificers, &c. than before, the induſtry and proſperity of a country are manifeſtly declining.

18. In India however, the circulating agricultural capital can only be ſaid, in the preſent ſtate of the country and under the ſyſtem of taxation above ſpecified, to re-produce at beſt in each ſucceeding year, but an equal fund, whence it may reaſonably be concluded that our induſtry is ſtationary, and our population and our poverty alſo: and the immoderate wants of Government, under ſuch circumſtances, may be feared to be more likely to caſt the body politic into incurable decline, than their paternal care to advance it to a ſtate of growing vigour.

19. On this part of the ſubject it would be unneceſſary to enlarge, did not the ſyſtems and local practice of India leave reaſon to ſuppoſe, that in fixing the amount of a tax contributable by any people, it was deemed immaterial from what ſource it were levied, or on what funds it were aſſeſſed, whether on conſumption, profits, lands, &c. &c. ſince, in all or either caſe, the people were only required to pay a fixed revenue, and no more.

20. In oppoſition to this opinion, the illuſtrious Dr. Smith would teach, that all taxes ſhould, in the firſt inſtance, be equal; that is, contributed in proportion to men's abilities, and ought therefore equally to affect rent, profit, and wages, the only ſource of revenue to individuals. If they fall on one only of three ſorts of revenue, they are unequal, and therefore oppreſſive.

21. Secondly; They ought to be certain, not arbitrary; that is, clearly and plainly defined, ſo that the payer of the tax may know exactly what he has to contribute. The uncertainty of taxation encourages the inſolence and favours the corruption of tax-gatherers (and no country has experienced this effect more ſenſibly than India), whence Dr. Smith conceives, that even a conſiderable degree of inequality is not ſo great an evil as uncertainty.

22. Thirdly; Taxes ſhould be ſo contrived as to take as little as poſſible out of the pockets of the people, over and above what is paid into the public treaſury. A great number of officers, whoſe ſalaries may eat up a great part of the tax, and whoſe perquiſites may impoſe another additional tax on the people, are bad.

23. No man acquainted with an Indian ſyſtem, and the number of native ſervants which ſo complicated a ſyſtem requires, will need any comment to feel the full force of this maxim, as applicable to our Eaſtern poſſeſſions.

24. Fourthly; Taxes, and particularly high ones on the neceſſaries of life, are objectionable; and all taxes generally, "which obſtruct the induſtry of the people, and diſcourage them "from applying to certain branches of buſineſs, which might give maintenance and employ-"ment to great multitudes."

25. Can any obſtruction or diſcouragement be more effectual, than a tax which abſorbs a lion's ſhare of the profits of induſtry, as ſoon as ever individual labour ſhall have acquired them?

26. Fifthly; Taxes on conſumable goods, particularly luxuries, are probably the leaſt oppreſſive, becauſe they are naturally, and without the interference of inquiſitors and aſſeſſors, proportioned to the means of a conſumer, paid in a manner moſt convenient to him, by little and little, as he buys goods; and he is left to buy, or not to buy, as he pleaſes.

No. 3. Mr. Rickards (24 Sept. 1807) on Taxation and Revenue.

27. The tax, moreover, which is paid on the price of a commodity, is ſeldom adverted to, and it conſtitutes no part of a man's view of his profits: he labours with the cheering proſpect before him of indefinite advantage, therefore with every poſſible incitement to the exertion of human induſtry, and with the further privilege of exerciſing his own free-will in the purchaſe, or otherwiſe, of the taxed commodity, according as he may find himſelf poſſeſſed of the means of gratifying his wants.

28. In applying theſe maxims, and ſubjoined remarks, to the rate of land-taxation in India, it will not be requiſite to ſay much on that which takes, under the permanent ſettlement, upwards of eight-tenths of the annual net rent of eſtates as the ſhare of Government. The tax, I imagine, ſpeaks for itſelf, and is ſurely an evident violation of the preceding principles; from its inequality, its amount, and the particular effects of "deſtruction" and "diſcouragement," it is likely to perpetuate. The plea of waſte lands being attached to each eſtate, which the proprietor may cultivate free of further tax, is, I humbly apprehend, illuſory; for waſte lands require capital to bring into a ſtate of cultivation, whoſe produce, moreover, is, until tried, always doubtful; and to cultivate on borrowed capital, therefore, precarious. Whence then is this capital to originate? not ſurely from the generality of landlords, who already pay upwards of eight-tenths of their profit from the cultivated part of their eſtates. A few rich individuals may extend their cultivation; or a portion of commercial capital, in the vicinity of towns, may be partially applied to this purpoſe; but it is very difficult to diſcover in this ſyſtem, the ſeeds of any great degree of improvement, or how agriculture is to become a productive ſource of general wealth.

29. Want of effectual demand for the ſuperfluous produce of ſuch waſte lands is another and inſuperable bar to their cultivation: when the other branches of a community are too poor, or too limited to conſume this ſuperfluous produce, agriculturiſts would only raiſe it to their own loſs; and this loſs would be inevitable, if foreign demand were at the ſame time fully ſupplied.

30. The land-tax in England, though nominally four ſhillings, varies in different diſtricts, from four ſhillings to one ſhilling in the pound, and in ſome leſs; and this is calculated on a very moderate value of eſtates, framed in 1692, in the reign of King William III.

31. But even this tax is not free from complaint, as well in reſpect to amount as to the mode of aſſeſſment, and the partial diſtribution thereof, in each ſubdiviſion or diſtrict; and of late years, or in 1798, it was rendered ſubject to redemption and purchaſe, under the avowed view, as ſtated in the preamble of the Act, of "ſtrengthening and ſupporting the "public credit, and augmenting the nation's reſources."

32. The land-tax, or contribution, (foncière,) in France, is ſtated in their own reports, to have been univerſally complained of as heavy, and to have fallen very unequally, although only a profeſſed fifth of the net produce. Indeed, the evil of inequality would ſeem to be incident to every ſyſtem of land-taxation that profeſſes to levy a ſpecific portion of actual produce, from the very great difficulty, if not total impoſſibility, of correctly aſcertaining or fixing its amount or value for any length of time together. In very light taxes this inequality may not be much felt or complained of; but in heavy ones it can hardly fail, I apprehend, to fall with the weight of oppreſſion on a conſiderable part of the agricultural community.

33. In the ancient dominions of the King of Pruſſia, the land tax is ſaid to be aſſeſſed at the rate of 20, 25, 38, 33, 40, 45, and 50 per cent. of the revenue of proprietors, according to their different ranks or privileges, and this country is conſequently far behind England in point of proſperity.

34. In Arthur Young's account of Lombardy, a very minute detail is given of the groſs produce, rent, and taxation of land.

$3\frac{1}{6}$ pertiche are ſtated to be equal to an English acre. 20 ſoldi, one livre.

35. Taking 100 pertiche in the Milanese, he ſtates its groſs produce in corn, wine, and ſilk, at 1836 livres, of which the proprietor's net ſhare is 785 livres, excluſive of tax. Land of this rent and value pays conſimento (tax) $15\frac{1}{2}$ ſoldi per pertica, or 77 livres on the hundred. The tax is paid by the farmer; but, if it were not, it would form part of the landlord's ſhare, making this latter 862 livres. The tax, therefore, to the proprietor is 77 livres, on 862 livres, which is $8\frac{30}{861}$ or £. 8. 18*s.* per cent. or 1*s.* 9*d.* in the pound.

36. Only half this contribution of 77 livres goes to the Sovereign, the other half is retained for roads, bridges, and other parochial charges, and, in ſome caſes, the partial ſupport of the curees is included.

37. "But (as Mr. Young adds,) though the burden is nothing compared with thoſe which "cruſh us," (alluding to the land-tax, tithe, and poor-rates, all of which he eſtimated equal to 8*s.* or 10*s.* in the pound,) "in England, yet 1*s.* 9*d.* in the pound is too heavy a land-"tax; it is throwing too great a burden upon landed property, and leſſening too much the "profit which ſhould ariſe from inveſting capitals in it. Were 8 3-fourths per cent. to be "laid on new inveſtments, not one livre would be inveſted."

38. If Mr. Young, a man of the firſt experience in matters of this nature, deems this tax a heavy burden, what would he think of one nearly ten times its weight.

39. On the lands above deſcribed (which are alſo ſaid not to be rich) there ſeems to have been laid a capitation tax equal to about $22\frac{1}{2}$ livres the 100 pertica.

40. Watered

40. Watered dairy lands, yielding a net rent to the landlord of 10 livres per pertica, and two livres five saldi, as censimento or tax; this latter equals 18 $\frac{9}{17}$ per cent. or 3*s.* 8*d.* in the pound. In other parts he found the tax equal to 12 per cent. or 2*s.* 4*d.* in the pound.

41. Throughout the whole Duchy of Milan, the land tax is computed at something less than one livre per pertica, which according to Mr. Young's given admeasurement of the pertica, may be said to make in English money and measure, about 2*s.* per acre (supposing the livre 8$\frac{1}{2}$ d. English) or about 1 s. 9*d.* per acre, supposing it 7$\frac{1}{2}$ d. *

42. In the ecclesiastical state of Bologna, the land tax is computed at only 2*d.* the English acre.

43. In Parma at about 9*d.* per acre,† and in Modena, the common calculation is, that all taxes whatever, only equal a fifth of the gross produce of land.

44. In Tuscany the land tax is in many places redeemed. That part of it which is paid to communities for roads, &c. and is not thus redeemable, amounts to more than one-tenth of the net rent. From the general tenor of Mr. Young's observations, I should conclude, therefore, the whole of the land-tax, previous to redemption, to have been one-fifth of the net rent.

45. Numerous other examples might be produced; but these perhaps are sufficient; all these rates are much lower than the one adopted in India. Indeed, I believe we can find no other country in the world, under the rule of an enlightened government, whose lands are subject to so heavy an imposition.

46. With regard to our other tax, as referrible to the actual produce of the lands, and purporting to be one half of that produce, it may be briefly observed, that Dr. Davenant states the land-rents of England, generally, to be to the gross produce as nine to twenty-one, or three-sevenths, and the rents of corn-lands (which are the chief fund of taxation in India) as two-ninths only of the produce.

47. Dr. Smith (a later writer) says, that "in the present state of Europe, the share of the "landlord seldom exceeds a third, sometimes not a fourth of the whole produce of the land."—It is therefore very clear, that in Europe, were there no landlords in the way, the lands generally could never pay a tax to the state of half produce.

48. In China, the land-tax is said to consist of one-tenth of the produce. Even under the Mahomedan governments in Bengal, it is only said to have been a fourth or fifth of the produce; in ancient Egypt the same. In the province of Malabar, a mode of assessing lands from time immemorial, has been discovered, whereby the rents to proprietors are estimated according to the fertility of different soils, and as these are exceedingly rich in Malabar, an average of the whole, according to a table thereof framed in the year 1803, gives about a third of the produce generally as the proprietor's share.

49. But it may be safely alledged, on the grounds of experience, that though some lands may be sufficiently rich to yield half their produce to a landlord or government, the other half being sufficient to defray the charges and reasonable profits of cultivation, yet this is not the case generally; in the majority of lands it will require from six to eight tenths of the produce, and sometimes more, to defray the charges and profits abovementioned; and it thence follows, that a tax, regularly and correctly assessed at half the actual produce of lands, would not leave to the inhabitants of any extensive country under heaven, a sufficiency to subsist on.

50. The system of metaying or letting out lands at half, which is often a third or fourth of the produce, prevailed in France, and in some parts of Italy; as far as regards the division of produce, its analogy to the Indian system is striking, and like that too, it has been every where observed by agricultural travellers and writers, (vide Mons. Turgot, Mr. Arthur Young, &c.) to be attended with wretched poverty and distress to the cultivators of the soil.

51. But there was a public tax under the ancient government of France, similar, in many respects to the one here treated of, both in its nature and operation, though not so exorbitant in its amount; the taille was properly a land tax, chiefly laid on farmers, or the actual cultivators of the soil; in some districts it was assessed on the value of lands held in perpetuity by ignoble tenures, but in others (and I believe most generally) on the supposed profits of those employed in agriculture, both of which were in their effect ‡ similar to the Indian assessment, more especially in the important circumstance of direct interference, and sharing too deeply in the first fruits of agricultural industry; for it bore a heavy proportion to the actual produce of lands; like the Indian tax it professed to be an assessment proportioned to the

* N. B. Mr. Young attaches both these values to the livre of Lombardy.

† It is a common rule in Salsette to estimate the average produce of a begah of land at one morah of Batty; a begah is about three-fourths of an acre. The morah of Batty is rated at 20 rupees, one-third of which is the Government share, or somewhat less than seven rupees per begah. At this rate even the reduced land-tax on Salsette would average upwards of a guinea per acre.

‡ The profit of agriculture arises out of the produce, whence a tax on the profits and a tax on the produce are pretty nearly the same thing; a certain portion must always be allowed for the expences of cultivation; whence the net produce, which is the profit, is in fact the only taxable fund.

No. 3.
Mr. Rickards (24 Sept. 1807) on Taxation and Revenue.

the real abilities of diſtricts to pay; and, like that too, it was liable not only to the ignorance and miſinformation, but the partialities, private reſentments, and prejudices of aſſeſſors. Theſe are evils incident to every aſſeſſment of this nature; it is utterly impoſſible, and has been found ſo in all countries, to make an accurate ſurvey, which requires years to accompliſh, of the produce of lands, which is yearly varying. Irregularity and uncertainty, involuntary error, and wilful fraud; oppreſſion on the one hand, and corruption on the other, are therefore the invariable characteriſtic marks of ſuch a ſyſtem of taxation, and no country preſents a more accurate proof than India, of the melancholy exiſtence of theſe effects.

52. Dr. Smith, in ſpeaking of the effects of the taille, draws a picture ſo ſtrikingly applicable to very many Indian diſtricts, and their ſtate of agriculture, that I ſhall here ſubjoin it. In the countries, where, " the perſonal taillé takes place, the farmer is commonly aſſeſſed in " proportion to the ſtock which he appears to employ in cultivation. He is upon this " account, frequently afraid to have a good team of horſes or oxen, but endeavours to " cultivate with the meaneſt and moſt wretched inſtruments of huſbandry that he can; ſuch " is his diſtruſt in the juſtice of his aſſeſſors, that he counterfeits poverty, and wiſhes to " appear ſcarce able to pay any thing, for fear of being obliged to pay too much. By this " miſerable policy, he does not, perhaps, always conſult his own intereſt in the moſt effectual " manner, and he probably loſes more by the diminution of his produce than he ſaves by " that of his tax. The public, the farmer, the landlord, all ſuffer more or leſs, by this " degraded cultivation. That the perſonal taille tends in many different ways to discourage " cultivation, and conſequently to dry up the principal ſource of the wealth of every great " country, I have already had occaſion to obſerve," &c.

53. Mr. Arthur Young remarks, on the ſame tax :—" One would naturally have ſuppoſed, " from the groſs abuſes and cruelty of this method of taxation, that the object in view " was as much to keep the people poor, as to make the king rich. As the taille was pro- " feſſedly levied in a proportion to every one's ſubſtance, it had the miſchievous effect of all " equal land taxes, when levied even with honeſty, for a farmer's profit, his ſucceſs, his " merit was taxed exactly in proportion to the quantum, a ſure method of putting a period to the " exiſtence of either profit, ſucceſs, or merit. The farmers are really poor, or apparently poor; " ſince a rich man will affect poverty to eſcape the arbitrary uſe of a tax, which profeſſes to " be in proportion to his power of bearing it."

54. The preceding intimation reſpecting land taxes, I believe to be perfectly juſt, as I may have occaſion, at ſome future time, more fully to elucidate. Our buſineſs here is to reduce a tax deemed exorbitantly high, rather than to diſcuſs the merits and operation of land taxes generally.

55. There were other taxes in old France, obſtructive of private induſtry, and therefore, checks to national proſperity, inſomuch that Dr. Smith, in comparing the ſyſtem of taxation in France and England, ſhows that England, even then, paid twice as much as France, in compariſon to their reſpective population, though the ſoil and climate of France, he adds, are better, the country longer in a ſtate of improvement and cultivation, and therefore, better ſtocked with thoſe things which it requires time to raiſe and accumulate, ſuch as great towns, convenient well-built houſes, &c.

56. These natural advantages, however, were ſo much more than counterbalanced by the effect of the French ſyſtem, and its immediate preſſure on the purſuits of induſtry, that Dr. Smith concludes with the remarkable obſervation, that the people of France, it is " generally acknowledged, are much more oppreſſed with taxes than the people of Great " Britain," notwithſtanding, as above ſtated, the French did not, relatively to their population, pay one half as much in aggregate amount.

57. But, if the experience of other countries, and the arguments of our beſt writers, againſt a heavy land tax, ſhould ſtill be thought inapplicable to this, let the matter be placed in another point of view, and the merits of the queſtion tried by the calm deductions of reaſon from poſitive facts.

58. In Sir John Sinclair's Hiſtory of the Public Revenue, a curious and intereſting circumſtance is ſtated, viz. That from Michaelmas 1787 to Michaelmas 1788, the net produce of the perpetual exciſe upon malt was £.724,786.; the annual exciſe £.603,317.; the duties upon beer £.1,666,152., upon Britiſh ſpirits £.509,167., ſo that barley yielded a clear revenue of £.3,503,422.

59. Now, the whole land-tax of England does not produce annually more than about £.1,900,000., of which no great proportion can be conſidered as at all referable to the produce of barley lands; but if, according to the Indian principle of laying the whole tax at once on the produce of land, theſe 3½ millions were attached, in the firſt inſtance, to the cultivation of barley, and the people of England were told the tax (like unto the Indian practice) was ſimplified and fixed for ever at this amount—" You ſhall have your malt, " beer, and ſpirits free :" Can any man, for a moment, ſuppoſe that this cultivation would not be immediately and effectually checked? Would capital be any more employed in a line where profit was at once annihilated, or ought but hungry neceſſity drive a people, under ſuch circumſtances, to the cultivation of their ſoil?

60. Is it not evident that a firſt tax on ſuch principles, even though capable of payment, muſt be oppreſſive, and obſtruct the progreſs of future improvement? Is it probable the ſame quantity of malt, beer, and ſpirits, could ever be brought into being? Is it not evident too, that the aggregate amount, to which the above mentioned taxes thereon are, or might be carried, is by this means utterly incapable of realization? Is it not, in fact, a queſtion between confirmed poverty and abundant wealth? And can we, therefore, heſitate as to the preferability of the ſyſtems here contraſted, or, for an inſtant, doubt that the conſolidation of taxes on lands, to the amount, at leaſt, practiſed in India, has thus a clear and manifeſt tendency to defeat its own object.

ſame

61. But the ſyſtem of uniting all the impoſts of a country in one ſingle land-tax is the great principle of the French economiſts, though not carried to ſo ruinous an exceſs as in this country. A moderate tax on the "produit net of eſtates taken from exiſting accounts, "contracts, or leaſes, and without any pretended reference to the actual produce of the "ſoil," may be entirely unobjectionable. Arthur Young, however, would ſeem to combat even this principle; and, though he may not be allowed to have ſucceſsfully confuted it, he yet adduces a remarkable fact, which may be admitted to demonſtrate the monſtrous impolicy of ſuch a tax as would abſorb, like that of India, all, or almoſt all, the net produce of lands, leaving little or nothing but a bare maintenance to proprietors and cultivators. It ſhews, I think, ſatisfactorily that, under a heavy ſyſtem of divided taxation, wealth may continue to exiſt, nay, to increaſe, and to be expended advantageouſly, whilſt, by abſorption of the net rent of lands, it is utterly extinguiſhed.

62. After pointing out the ſuppoſed error of the French principle in forcible terms, Mr. Young ſupports his argument with the following example; which is ſo ſtriking, I ſhall give it in his own words.

63. "Relative to the utter impoſſibility of extending land-taxes in England to ſuch "a degree as to include all others, I have it in my power to refer to an inſtance of our "taxation moſt correctly given. I have inſerted in the Annals of Agriculture, No. 86, an "account of all the taxes I pay for my eſtate in Suffolk; and in that account it appears "that the tract of land which pays me net £.229. 12s. 7d. pays to the burthens of the "public £.219. 18s. 5d.; deducting from fifteen millions and a half (the net revenue of "Great Britain) thoſe taxes which enter into that ſum of £.219. 18s. 5d. there remain ten "millions and a half; and as the preſent land tax, at two millions, burthens me £.40. "a year, an additional one of ten millions and a half would conſequently lay the further "burthen of five and a half times as much, or £.220., that is to ſay, it would leave me the "net receipt of £.9. for the whole clear income of my eſtate. Perhaps the economiſts "never received directly from facts ſo convincing a proof as this inſtance offers, of the "utter impracticability of their prepoſterous ſchemes." Vide, A. Young, Vol. I. p. 592.

64. From the contemplation however of theſe facts, all I ſhould attempt to deduce is (and the concluſion ſeems to me inevitable), that a heavy conſolidated tax on the firſt exertions of any ſpecies of induſtry, abſorbing the whole, or nearly the whole, of its profits, is ruinous and impolitic, from being an effectual bar to the creation of that produce, on which future exertions might be profitably employed; and through the medium of which, individual wealth and public revenue ſeem capable of being increaſed to an almoſt inconceivable extent. A land-tax, more eſpecially of this nature, blaſts the very production of that wealth, which induſtry would otherwiſe bring into being.

65. It is not intended to be denied that taxes on conſumption have their inconveniences and objections; but merely to prove, that a divided ſyſtem is leſs ruinous and oppreſſive in operation, than the enormous conſolidated land-taxes diſcuſſed in theſe ſheets.

66. The exceſſive amount of our Indian tax, and the peculiar mode of its operation, by falling on the immediate employments, and ſharing in the immediate profits of induſtry, and of that ſpecies of induſtry the moſt important to man, the production of food, are therefore evidently ſo many reſtraints on the wants of ſociety, and checks to the increaſe of capital, which in the unobſtructed courſe of nature's laws would univerſally expand. If however, the neceſſities of Government will not admit of an immediate reduction of the preſent taxes, they may, at all events, be removed from thoſe ſources where induſtry is blaſted in the bud, to others where their deadening and diſheartening influence will, it is hoped, be leſs ſeverely felt; and ſome idea in practice of the utility of the change may be formed by a local application of theſe principles to the iſland of Salſette.

67. The land revenue of Salſette, as per Abſtract (A.), including the angdena or coolery tax, may be ſtated at rupees 145,850. Though much ſimplified by Mr. Rivett Camac, it is ſtill drawn from fourteen different ſources (excluſive of ſeven farms) liable to vexatious irregularities; which are, in many inſtances, accordingly felt and locally complained of, as preventive of extended cultivation and improvements. The main principle of Mr. Camac's ſyſtem was a conſolidation or abolition of many vexatious taxes, and a reduction of the batty revenues from one-half of the produce to a nominal third. The Government of Bombay, actuated by a further humane regard to the intereſts of the natives, propoſed on the preceding principle to grant the tenants of batty lands cowles, making over the ſaid lands to them in proprietory right, ſubject to the ſaid tax of one-third of the groſs produce, in perpetuity; as the cowles contained an objectionable clauſe, they have only been taken out by a few. The principle, however, has been acted on in the collection of the revenue; and in this reſpect the people of Salſette are certainly more favoured than our other diſtricts, where the principle of half produce ſtill prevails.

68. With

No. 3. Mr. Rickards (24 Sept. 1807) on Taxation and Revenue.

68. With deference to ſuperior judgment, it is nevertheleſs humbly ſubmitted, whether a tax, abſorbing one-third of the groſs produce of land, is not higher than the landlord of an eſtate ought in ſound policy to pay in perpetuity? Whether, as the other numerous taxes are ſtill continued, the ſame complicated ſyſtem of revenue will not be perpetuated, liable to the ſame reſtraints on the inhabitants, and the ſame vexatious interference and exactions of native ſervants; and whether, in ſhort, the preſent cowles go the full length of that encouragement, which, according to the beſt eſtabliſhed and moſt generally admitted principles of political economy, ought to be granted to the purſuits of induſtry?

69. If theſe be anſwered in the negative, I would next humbly ſuggeſt, as well with a view to more effectual relief from high taxation, and the interference and exactions of native ſervants, as to the complete ſimplification of the revenue ſyſtem.

B. on G.

70. Firſt.—That all the various land-taxes now in force be conſolidated into one general tax, and wholly transferred from the lands and their produce to the houſes, which, according to the accompanying population tables, are about 11,500 in number; each houſe to pay at a certain proportionate rate, to be hereafter fixed in money, which I will myſelf, with the approbation of Government, ſettle on the ſpot; and which, to the preſent occupiers of land, muſt neceſſarily be regulated by the amount of their land-tax, as more fully explained in the accompanying Abſtract, A.

71. Let all others now paying tax to Government, have, for the ſake of conformity, that tax ſimilarly fixed on their houſes.

72. And as ſhopkeepers, who now pay nothing, may very reaſonably be included in the propoſed houſe tax, whatever be levied from this new ſource may, I ſhould hope, be allowed, in the firſt inſtance, to be ſet againſt a correſponding deduction in the amount of the tax on the occupiers of land, and the more eſpecially, as the Company are throughout the whole of the plan effectually guarded againſt loſs.

* Note—Angdina is a kind of Capitation or Body Tax.

73. The coolies, who now pay * Angdina, are ſo well off, in comparison with their neighbours, that it is imagined no deduction of their tax, after being fixed on their houſes, will be found neceſſary, at all events not immediately.

74. The tax thus fixed on each houſe reſpectively, may be painted thereon in large letters or figures, as the only, or rather utmoſt tax to be for ever afterwards demanded thereon. The lands having been previouſly made the private property of the preſent occupants, free of all expense for cowls, &c. may then be declared by ſolemn proclamation to be for ever free from all tax; the produce, whether of thoſe now in cultivation, or to be hereafter cultivated, to be wholly and entirely at the diſpoſal of each proprietor, ſubject only to ſale of the ſaid lands (not their produce) by public outcry for arrears of houſe-tax, in caſe of neceſſity; and to be wholly exempt from every other ſpecies of interference on the part of the officers of government.

75. Secondly.—Let proclamation be alſo made, that waſte lands will be granted in proprietary right to any extent that may be demanded or applied for, on condition of immediate cultivation, and under the ſame ſolemn engagement of being equally free from all tax for ever, except the relatively ſmall one, which may be now paid, where there are productive trees.

Orig.

76. Thirdly.—As capitaliſts and men of property may be expected to take lands on theſe conditions, the object ſhould be encouraged by further proclaiming, that no houſe-tax will be collected from new ſettlers cultivating waſte lands, for the firſt fifteen or twenty years of their occupancy, and that at the expiration of that period, they ſhall only be ſubject to the ſame houſe-tax as may be in force among the old ſettlers, and which it is intended to reduce from its preſent amount, as other unobjectionable ſources of equivalent taxation may be diſcovered to one moderate uniform ſtandard throughout the iſland. This ſtandard, as more fully explained in the Abſtract (A.) it is anticipated, may be ere long fixed at a certain rate, ſay 5 per cent. ad valorem (or any other Government may in preference decide on), without any reference whatever to the produce of land.

77. But whether or not it be the mode in force generally for houſes on the iſland, at the expiration of the ſaid fifteen or twenty years, as it is the principle to which the plan ultimately tends, it ſhould be applied, to the new houſes and new ſettlers, whenever they become liable to the impoſition of the ſaid tax.

78. Fourth.—On the revenue ſyſtem now in force, if additional batty grounds be deſired to be cultivated, or preſent cultivation to be improved, if dry grains or other products be raiſed on the high grounds, or more trees planted, neither can be effected without ſubjecting the ſpeculator to an additional proportionate tax; beſides (what may not be always ſo capable of direct proof) the neceſſity of certain preſents to the local native ſervants, for permiſſion to undertake the projected improvement, and the probability that the further annual exaction of theſe ſervants will be proportionately augmentated. Theſe are ſo many checks to extended cultivation, which the plan endeavours at leaſt to remove; ſince by confining the land-tax to one ſource, and fixing it for ever, all the profits of improved or extended cultivation are the proprietor's own, unſhared by any one, and the tax is moreover confined to a houſe, or it may be laid on any other preferable article of dead ſtock, on which induſtry is not either conſtantly or annually employed.

79. There

79. There will alſo be fewer native ſervants, as will be ſeen in the concluding ſheets of this eſſay, to exact the price of their ſanction or acquieſcence; and the impoſitions of the remainder may be reſtrained by tranſporting ſuch as are convicted of the crime.

80. Fifth.—Another improvement, and one that I believe will be truly acceptable to the inhabitants, is propoſed in the plan, as follows: the cowles contain a ſtipulation, that though the actual amount of tax be fixed for ever, its money value is liable to alteration at the expiration of a certain number of years, to guard againſt the depreciations which time and circumſtances may ſuperinduce in the intrinſic value of the precious metals. This clauſe is a ſource of doubt and uncertainty to the inhabitants, who fear leſt future governments or collectors may take advantage of the clauſe, to raiſe the actual amount of the tax hereafter; and I believe it may be difficult, if not impoſſible, to eradicate theſe fears from the number of people wholly ignorant of the principles of money, and long habituated to ſee increaſe of revenue, not its diminution, an object of deſire and neceſſity with the ſtate.

81. The houſe-tax propoſed in the plan is, however, intended to be fixed in money, for ever, that is, never to riſe; and as the gradual diminution of this particular tax (without loſs to the Company) is one of the moſt important avowed objects of the plan, every depreciation in the value of money, or permanent riſe in the value of grain, will then be an actual reduction thereof; whilſt Government may always guard themſelves from loſs, by increaſing in proportion the tax on articles of conſumption, as for example, in the preſent cuſtoms and forms.

82. But the value of money cannot be ſuppoſed to alter much in the courſe of 20 or 30 years; and it is hoped, that in a much ſhorter period than this, the tax may be every where reduced to the uniform ſtandard propoſed, of a rate ad valorem on houſes, and then it is perfectly immaterial, conſidered in reſpect to the revenue, how the value of money alters; for a revenue aſſeſſed on this principle may be augmented at pleaſure and without objection, as the value of money is reduced; another advantage, I apprehend, which the cowles do not poſſeſs.

83. Sixth.—The poorer claſſes, including the more lazy, are now alarmed at the amount of the tax being fixed in its annual amount, leſt the produce of their lands in ſome years be unequal to pay it. Here, however, all uncertainty is removed for ever; the tax is not only limited, never to riſe, but on the contrary, ſubject to gradual reduction; whilſt by the cowles it is intended to be continued for ever to be fixed at a high rate, preventive (if theſe principles be juſt) of the progreſs of improvement.

84. As the lands, under theſe circumſtances, will be more valuable to their poſſeſſors, the produce being all their own, and the tax ever leſſening, either poſitively or relatively in amount, an arrear need occaſion no alarm, for money might be more eaſily raiſed, by mortgage on lands ſo circumſtanced, or they would fetch a readier ſale; whilſt the ſame motive to their cultivation remains to ſtimulate the indolent, ſince it is only from the produce of their lands, that the propoſed houſe-tax can be expected to be diſcharged.

85. The cowles ſtipulate for the ſeizure of lands, and all the goods and chattels of every defaulter for arrear of revenue. The plan confines it to the lands alone; the one might reduce an unfortunate ſufferer to deſperate and helpleſs poverty; the other, with adequate ſecurity for the public revenue, leaves the means of temporary maintenance, till other employments offer.

86. Seventh.—The arrack and tobacco farms, particularly the former, are at preſent ſources of heavy complaint, as may be ſeen in the accompanying petitions (D & E); on enquiry I find there is ſome ground for the repreſentation; the price of the arrack does not here altogether fall on the conſumer. In the ſeaſon of cultivation, the proprietor or occupier of land muſt purchaſe the requiſite quantity of arrack for his labourers, for they refuſe to work without; ſo that thus far, it clearly operates as an additional tax on agriculture. With a view therefore, to reconcile the inhabitants to its preſent price, (which appears to be an object with Government, conſidered relatively to the morals of the people), I would propoſe, that in proportion as the revenue from arrack and tobacco increaſes beyond its preſent amount, a correſponding deduction be allowed to the old ſettlers, in the commuted land or houſe-tax.

87. This may greatly expedite the much wiſhed for reduction of the ſaid tax, which is conceived to be an object of the higheſt importance and neceſſity.

88. The other complaints of the inhabitants as to bad liquor and enhanced prices, even beyond that ſtipulated in the farmer's contract, may eaſily be obviated by aboliſhing the preſent farms, and licencing ſhops in each village, taxed at ſo much per diem, which ſhops will be mutual checks on each other, for if one ſhopkeeper ill uſes the inhabitants, either in the quality or price of the liquor beyond that of his agreement, they have their remedy by dealing with another.

89. A plan on this principle has, I underſtand, been already carried into effect in Caranja, for the ſale of liquor, with good ſucceſs, and is more ſatisfactory to the inhabitants than the late farm.

90. Eighth.—In aſſeſſing the houſe tax, a diſtinction is preſerved between the old and new ſettlers, which it is preſumed, is ſtill reconcilable to ſtrict juſtice; the whole have their ſituation improved by the conſolidation, commutation, and gradual diminution of the tax; they are veſted with the excluſive property in lands, already in a ſtate of full produce, and therefore juſtly liable to a heavier tax than the new ſettlers, who will have to expend capital in the cultivation of waſte lands, yielding perhaps, but a ſlow return, and therefore requiring greater encouragement, whilſt the whole tax tends, with the progreſs of improvement, to ultimate equalization, and will at length be equally light to all, without any intermediate ſacrifice on the part of the Company; the lands will then be every where relieved of thoſe burdens which are now conceived to check the progreſs of univerſal proſperity, and the great encouragement is in the interim given, as it ſhould be, to thoſe who have the greateſt, if not the ſole means of promoting it.

No. 3. Mr. Rickards (24 Sept. 1807) on Taxation and Revenue.

91. From a late report of the collector, the waſte lands on the iſlands of Salſette are ſtated at 1,739 morahs capable, beſides 312 morahs incapable of cultivation, i. e. I preſume incapable to the preſent poor and indolent race, total 2,051 morahs or 4,102 beggahs; beſides, "thoſe waſte ſpots ſituated on the hills," which the collector admits to be very capable of cultivation, with ſome expenſe, "adding, that a conſiderable quantity of hemp might be "produced therefrom."

92. Although my experience in revenue matters leads me to believe, that revenue accounts ſeldom, if ever, are correct ſtatements of landed produce, or of admeaſured quantities of land, or ever can be ſo on our preſent ſyſtem; and knowing, as I do, that pattells who furniſh the accounts on Salſette, have a manifeſt intereſt in concealing the extent of waſte lands, with a view of reſerving much more of them than is neceſſary, for the paſture of their own cattle; yet admitting, in the preſent inſtance, that the accounts are nearly correct, there is ſtill a conſiderable quantity of batty ground admitted to be waſte, beſides thoſe higher ſpots above mentioned by the collector, capable of cultivation, and which may perhaps, without exaggeration, be ſtated to include one half at leaſt of the ſurface of the whole iſland.

93. Now, it is the whole of theſe lands, batty and high grounds incluſive, that the plan here ſuggeſted, would propoſe to bring gradually into a ſtate of cultivation, that at laſt "every nook and corner of Salſette" (as Dr. Scott expreſſes himſelf) "may be as eagerly "bought up, and ſecured, as it is in Bombay," but which the very ſame report proves, I think to be unobtainable under the preſent checks to agriculture; Dr. Scott's own report is alſo a further proof of what new ſettlers might effect on the iſland, poſſeſſing capital, and a diſpoſition to incite the inhabitants to greater labour.

94. Ninth.—If, after all, it be objected that the plan favours the rich at the expence of the poor—the new and wealthy ſettler at the expence of the impoveriſhed old one—that even an ultimate houſe tax, ad valorem, will be more felt by the lower than the higher orders, and that theſe taxes are therefore diſproportioned to the reſpective means of the contributors, I anſwer:—

95. Firſt.—That the grand object of the plan is ultimately to reduce all to the ſame uniform ſyſtem of moderate taxation, without ſubjecting the Company to any intermediate loſs in the amount of their annual revenue.

96. Secondly.—That the ultimate houſe tax will be ſufficiently moderate for the meaneſt labourer to diſcharge, and muſt in fact be paid in the amount of his wages, by the richer man, who employs him. And

97. Thirdly.—That, in reſpect to want of proportion, however plauſible at firſt ſight ſuch objections may appear, yet, to eſtimate them properly, they ſhould be conſidered in relation to the nature of human ſociety.

98. As providence has been pleaſed to conſtitute this world, it is utterly impoſſible for every member of any large ſociety to be rich; the major part muſt neceſſarily have no other means of ſubſiſtence, than what the different varieties of labour, bodily and mental afford: the object of wealth is the gratification of wants and wiſhes; labour alone ſupplies them; and if all were too rich to work, where would be the uſe even of the largeſt poſſeſſions? Gold and ſilver are not in themſelves either food or cloathing, or capable, without labour, of ſupplying a ſingle luxury, comfort, or neceſſary of life. Without labour they are more uſeleſs to their poſſeſſors than the very ſoil they tread on. Without labour, wealth, in the common acceptance of the term, would be abſolute poverty.

99. It is among the able, the induſtrious, or the favoured few, that the acquiſition of wealth is conducive to the proſperity of ſociety at large; for when acquired, it is infallibly circulated. Its liberal circulation in the employment of labour, is the only natural means of diſtributing the comforts of life to the inferior claſſes; and this diſtribution is generally proportioned in all ſtates to the degree of civil liberty they may be bleſſed with. It is thus only that wealth is uſeful or contributive to the happineſs of mankind; and its natural utility and peculiar mode of operation ought to be the guide of all governments in promoting its acquiſition.

100. To tax the members of a ſociety in proportion to their means is certainly an equitable rule; but it is thought by many reſpectable authorities, that there are no more equitable or certain means of obtaining this end than by taxes on individual conſumption; the generality of mankind conſume, in proportion to their income, from whatever ſource it ariſes, and therefore, taxes on the price of commodities are proportioned to people's means, through the the medium of their expenditure. But taxes which bear immediately and heavily on individual profits, cannot fail to be oppreſſive; they check the acquiſition of wealth, confirm general poverty, and therefore obſtruct the only poſſible means by which the laborious, i. e. the major part of every ſociety, can be expected to proſper.

101. If, therefore, taxes affecting the poor fall eaſily within their limited means of payment, or occaſion no forced riſe in the wages of labour, and that the other taxes of a ſtate leave the field of induſtry free and unobſtructed, the ſocial body has then all the benefit which government is capable of extending to it. To ſecurity and protection is added proper encouragement; the lower benefit by the wealth of the higher claſſes; their utility and dependence on each other are reciprocal, and the good of all is promoted by its beſt means of attainment, that of mutual advantage and aſſiſtance.

102. Though there is an evident limit beyond which the wealthy few cannot paſs, or would ceaſe to be productive of further good, yet it may be impoſſible to define the preciſe number in any ſociety that would be moſt beneficial to the whole. But there is a natural property in wealth in proportion to its own increaſe, to increaſe alſo the laborious hands deſtined to ſupply its wants; the liberal recompence of labour enables the poorer claſſes to live in greater comfort, to rear larger families, and, conſequently, to increaſe in numbers; or it invites additional hands from abroad; ſo that the proportion between rich and poor, if left to itſelf, will always balance itſelf. It is a caſe that would only bewilder human governments to define, and is referable to the laws of nature alone, by obſtructing which, we can never be right; by following which, we can never be wrong.

103. Unlimited encouragement therefore, to all who chooſe to adventure in the purſuits of induſtry, ſhould be the policy of thoſe who rule, ſince the acquiſition of wealth, by the few, is the ſource of univerſal proſperity; and the expenditure of it, among the many, the only practicable method of ameliorating the condition of the lower orders.

104. Tenth.—From an arrangement, therefore, on theſe principles, or with ſuch modifications as local circumſtances may, on carrying the plan into effect, require, it is humbly hoped that the ſpirit of induſtry, which is ſaid to have diſappeared with the great Portugueſe ſettlers, may again revive on the iſland of Salſette. Without it, every hope of improvement is vain. The preſent inhabitants are certainly better off in ſome reſpects ſince the introduction of Mr. Rivett Camac's ſyſtem of revenue than they were before; but neither have their numbers, their cultivation, their energy, or their wealth increaſed; long habituated to a ſtate of hopeleſs poverty, it is manifeſt, that with the means, they loſt alſo the inclination to better their condition beyond the reach of ordinary encouragement to relieve; and ſuch are the habits of lazineſs ſtill prevalent, which poverty and oppreſſion have long tended to perpetuate, that were the whole revenue of the iſland ſurrendered to its preſent tenants, it might be longer before it ſtimulated to greater energy among themſelves.

N. B. The accompanying population tables, taken from the public records, ſhow the numbers to have decreaſed ſince the year 1802.

105. Capitaliſts are therefore indiſpenſably neceſſary to recal into activity the deadened powers of this degenerate race; but, without adequate profit, it cannot be expected that capital will ever be devoted to ſo deſirable an end. The preſent plan however, propoſes this encouragement, by holding forth to its acquirers all the profit which the employment of agricultural capital is capable of affording, ſubject, ultimately, to a moderate tax at the utmoſt, wholly unconnected with, and independent of, the amount of profit in queſtion. The tax being ever limited, though the profit be for ever increaſing.

106. The introduction of capitaliſts into the iſland muſt neceſſarily bring about an improved and extended cultivation; the lower claſſes will hence find conſtant employment, and enjoy greater comforts; their numbers increaſe, and, with the further addition of new lands to be employed on the preſent waſte grounds, occaſion an increaſed conſumption of liquor, tobacco, &c. The old will thus be better reconciled to the new ſettlers, not only from the improvement of their own circumſtances, but from the effect of their augmentation in reducing the rate of the old tax. Capitaliſts will alſo, in many inſtances, purchaſe productive lands from the old ſettlers, to the great advantage of the latter, who may find more comfort and profit in being the well paid farmers, or even labourers of a wealthy landlord, than as the needy poſſeſſors of, to them at leaſt, unproductive eſtates.

107. Eleventh.—An abundant ſupply of water is ſo well known in this country to be one of the moſt eſſential requiſites in agriculture, that it may be needleſs to dwell on all its advantages. The impoſſibility of any extended cultivation, without it, the extraordinary capacity of land in this country to produce, uninterruptedly, with it, and often, ſeveral crops in the ſame year; and the means which large reſervoirs of water would conſequently afford to mitigate the calamities of dry ſeaſons, render it an object highly deſerving the attention of Government.

108. From the generally impoveriſhed ſtate of our agricultural population in India, it is not to be expected that works requiring a conſiderable expenditure of money, however deſirable, can be undertaken by them. Even tanks, already in exiſtence, are ſuffered to go into ruin and decay, from the inability of agriculturiſts to clean and repair them. The aid of Government is perhaps indiſpenſable; and there is no doubt but it would operate as a moſt important encouragement to agriculture, if only prudently and judiciouſly employed.

109. On the iſland of Salſette, for example, there are numerous ſpots in the vicinity of the hills, where water might be dammed up, and thereby reſerved for the uſe of cultivators throughout the year; the beds of rivers, now dry very ſhortly after the rainy ſeaſon, afford, by means of dams, another ſource of eaſy ſupply; and reſervoirs, I imagine, might be formed of any required capacity in the places here alluded to, at a comparitively ſmall expence to Government; and this expence admit, without inconvenience, of ſuch arrangement with the inhabitants as to be gradually reimburſed to Government, by an annual moderate tax from thoſe in whoſe favour and at whoſe deſire the outlay ſhall have been made.

No. 3. Mr. Rickards (24 Sept. 1807) on Taxation and Revenue.

110. I confeſs that I am no advocate for the premature conſtruction of public works in an impoveriſhed country, or one likely to continue ſo: public canals or high roads, for example, in a deſert would be uſeleſs; they are little better in a country of confirmed poverty, where the inhabitants themſelves may be inſenſible of their advantage, or deſtitute of the means of turning them to account. In theſe caſes, the expence incurred is always diſproportioned to the reſulting good. A canal or a road, cannot of themſelves create population, or excite the induſtry of the confirmed poor, any more than a market-place can attract ſupplies for which their is no demand. In all theſe caſes I ſhould prefer awaiting a general ſenſe of the uſes and benefits of ſuch a work, previous to the expenditure of any conſiderable ſum in the execution; but in the caſe here recommended, of reſervoirs, the benefit is ſo obvious, and the uſe ſo immediate and certain, as to juſtify, it is hoped, this ſuggeſtion of the work to the favourable conſideration of Government.

111. The ſpeculations on this ſubject, it may be added, are far from merely theoretical ones. The incalculable benefits of large reſervoirs have been actually experienced in the agricultural practice of many nations; numerous proofs may be adduced of it, but I ſhall only trouble the Board with the accompanying extracts (F. G. H. I.)

112. The animated deſcription, by Mr. Townſend, of the wonderful effects of the pantano on the beauteous valley of Huerta in Spain, cannot be read without admiration. The effects of the reſervoirs mentioned by Neibhur, and the proſperity and decay of the population and countries therein referred to, which ſeemed to follow as conſequences of the abundant ſupply and failure of water, as well as of change of government, are alſo ſtriking; and, above all, the numerous obſervations and poſitive practical facts adduced by the celebrated Arthur Young, of which, however, to avoid prolixity, I have only extracted a few ſtriking inſtances, will, I truſt, be found to merit the particular attention of Government.

113. In the vicinity of Surat the reſult of irrigation is ſtill more wonderful. From the accompanying ſtatement received from Surat Deſſoys, now in Bombay, it would ſeem that ſome of the well-watered lands are worth about ſeven and ten times as much, in groſs produce, as the beſt of thoſe that are only watered by the monſoon, and the revenue derived therefrom alſo proportionably greater. As theſe lands are under the Company's authority, the fact is capable of correct aſcertainment, and it is of importance ſufficient to merit minute inveſtigation, if this ſtatement be only an approach to accuracy.

114. I have by me a jummabundy of the diſtrict of Ahmednugger, for Fuſlee 1214, wherein the revenue, on an average per begah and per acre, is ſtated at from four to near ſix times as much, on conſtant watered as on monſoon watered lands.

115. In Baſſeen, cloſe to the northern boundary of Salſette, a moſt beautiful and rich cultivation is alſo eſtabliſhed, with the aid of irrigation, and one that affords a ſtriking but mortifying contraſt with the agriculture carried on cloſe to it, within our own frontier; but where the ſame effects might undoubtedly be produced, if to a ſpirit of induſtry were only added the ſame means of increaſing, through irrigation, the productive capabilities of the ſoil.

116. In Malabar, Corgo, and Wynaad, I have ſeen ſimilar effects produced in valleys abundantly watered; but it is needleſs to multiply examples of facts ſo well eſtabliſhed in this, and perhaps every other part of the world.

117. I believe I may confidently add, from a ſuperficial knowledge of the laws of hydroſtatics, that whoever, as a profeſſional man, is acquainted with that well known and fully eſtabliſhed principle of the preſſure of water, in proportion to the height of its column, not to its actual bulk, might conſtruct theſe reſervoirs on Salſette at a very moderate expenſe; another ſtrong recommendation in favour of the experiment.

118. Another object in the eſtabliſhment of theſe tanks or reſervoirs, though perhaps ſomewhat more diſtant, yet not leſs important, is, that they may hereafter prove a ſource of very conſiderable revenue to the ſtate. Whenever this may be, it is preſumed they will be found unobjectionable ſources of taxation, at the ſame time that it may be prudent to reſtrict the taxes thereon, under preſent circumſtances, to the mere reimburſement of their original coſt, i. e. until their great utility and advantage be very generally felt, or until a ſpirit ſhall be excited on the iſland to extend its agriculture beyond the limits to which it is now very generally reſtricted by an annual ſupply of water from the heavens.

119. At ſome future period therefore, and that not very diſtant, it ſeems to be by no means viſionary to calculate on a clear revenue from this ſource, which I would earneſtly recommend, in the firſt inſtance, as a further ſubſtitute for the preſent land-tax, or to aid in the reduction thereof. And when this tax ſhall be ſufficiently reduced to be no longer an impediment to the progreſs of general proſperity, it may be difficult to foreſee to what extent the the propoſed houſe-tax and reſervoir-tax may be carried. A reſervoir-tax is moreover, in my humble judgment, as unobjectionable as a houſe-tax, from its not interfering, as before obſerved, with the immediate purſuits, or ſharing in the immediate profits of induſtry. A fixed annual tax for a ſupply of water, will conſtitute no part of a man's view of his profits from the ſale of an untaxed produce; the tax is fixed while the produce may be any thing; and the principle already repeated in the courſe of this eſſay, of holding forth to the induſtrious the proſpect of indefinite profit, or of a profit extenſible to any practicable extent of his own exertions, is therefore equally adhered to.

120. Laſtly.—In ſhort, the whole plan proceeds on the principle of exciting univerſal induſtry, by holding forth its only natural incitement; and ſuch is the favourable ſituation of the iſland, from its proximity to a market capable and ready to abſorb its utmoſt poſſible produce, that induſtry and proſperity might be here carried to an incalculable and indefinite extent; and as general wealth increaſed, if more revenue were requiſite to anſwer the juſt calls of Government, there would then be found abundant ſources of unobjectionable augmentations.

121. In the interim, the Company, under any reſult, are effectually guarded againſt loſs; for their preſent revenue from the iſland is fully and cautiouſly ſecured to them throughout every ſtage of the plan, with no reduction of what is deemed the objectionable tax, until an unobjectionable equivalent is preſented; and if the plan be otherwiſe ſucceſsful, this muſt be admitted to be no ſmall additional advantage, in a country ſo poor and yet ſo highly aſſeſſed.

122. By the reduction of the new eſtabliſhments the Company will moreover be conſiderable gainers, as more fully ſhewn in the ſequel.

123. The preſent ſtate of Salſette exhibits a fact highly intereſting to political inquirers, and on which a few remarks may be uſeful, particularly if they ſhall be found equally applicable to other parts of our Indian territories.

124. In Mr. Rivett's able report of the 25th of June 1796, he aſſerts the iſland of Salſette to be equally populous, if not more ſo than ſome of the moſt proſperous known countries.

Recorded in the Revenue Department of the 19th Auguſt 1796.

Its extent is ſtated to be 240 ſquare miles, and its population 51,000 ſouls, which correſpond with the population tables accompanying this eſſay; with the facts, it is curious to compare the late ſtatements of the population of our mother country.

N. B. The population is rather diminiſhed ſince Mr. Rivett's time.

In the Encyclopedia Londinenſis, containing ſome of the lateſt ſurveys, the population of England and Wales is given at 8,400,000 ſouls; and the extent of territory 49,540 ſquare miles. This gives 169 inhabitants to every ſquare mile, whereas thoſe of Salſette are 212.

N. B. Theſe, I apprehend, are geographical miles, ſixty to the degree; for according to another computation now before me, the ſuperficial contents of England are ſtated at 66,348 ſquare miles, at the rate of 69½ miles to a degree; and even ſuppoſed to be as much as 73,306 ſquare miles; according to the firſt of theſe numbers, the population is about 126¾. and according to the laſt, about 114½ per ſquare mile.

125. If the ſituation of theſe two countries be only viewed by the moſt ſuperficial obſerver, it is impoſſible not to be ſtruck with the active energy of the one people, and the languid apathy and helpleſs indolence of the other; and thinking minds can hardly avoid the concluſion, that agriculture alone is not ſufficient to promote or ſupport a vigorous and efficient population; and that population, however extenſive, is inefficient and comparatively uſeleſs, unleſs it be ſtimulated to active employment. Without at all pretending, or even feeling qualified to engage in the diſputed points reſpecting agriculture and population, the example before us is too forcible to be invalidated by arguments derived from theory alone. We here clearly ſee, that farmers and cultivators will raiſe food for themſelves, but not gratuitouſly, for others; neither will thoſe others ſupply the extra wants of the agricultural claſs, without an equivalent value in exchange; extra exertions on both ſides muſt be rouſed by the application of proper incitements; if theſe be wanting, agriculture alone, its conſequent population, and the proſperity of the ſociety at large, have an evident limit, and that by no means an extenſive one.

It may be objected that Salſette is too limited a ſpot to compare with England and Wales as to relative population; but the average of Salſette, is alſo that of at leaſt a large proportion of our Indian territories. The Bengal provinces for example, are alſo computed to be peopled at the rate of about 200 per ſquare mile.

126. By theſe obſervations it is not pretended to deny, that agriculture is a ſource, and the original ſource of wealth, but rather to contend that its productions loſe their character of wealth, when confined to the uſes and conſumption of the actual producers; that wealth, in ſhort, conſiſts more in the ſurplus produce of agriculture than in the portion which cultivators immediately conſume; and that this wealth ſhould neither be checked in circulation by impolitic reſtraints, or drained from the pockets of its induſtrious acquirers by heavy taxation; for, in the hands of the latter, wealth, with filial regard, as it were, to its parental ſource, re-acts upon induſtry, by ſtimulating it to the ſupply of greater wants, the chief of which is food; and food for a flouriſhing population can only be procured by extended agriculture, which thus, and thus only, is enabled to paſs the abovementioned barrier that poverty and reſtrained wants would ſeem to preſcribe to it.

127. Without theſe ſtimulus indeed there may be even ſuperfluous produce in a country, if demanded by foreign conſumption, without conducing in the leaſt to its own abundance or proſperity; for if the proceeds of that ſuperfluous produce or the major part, be equally with the proceeds of home conſumption abſorbed by high taxation, we may be ſtill far removed from a progreſſive courſe of improvement. Internal wealth is ſtill wanting to excite the induſtry of the neceſſitous, in the other mechanical branches of civilized life; the price of labour is conſequently too low, and its produce yielding but a ſcanty ſubſiſtence, population becomes ſtationary, and at the ſame time feeble, inefficient, and comparatively uſeleſs. A country may thus be populous, as in Salſette; may even export a ſuperabundance of grain annually, annually, and yet be wretchedly poor; and many of our Indian diſtricts are perhaps exiſting proofs of this fact.

No. 3. Mr. Rickards (24 Sept. 1807) on Taxation and Revenue.

128. It is a common thing too in poor countries for the lands to be divided and ſubdivided into ſmall poſſeſſions or farms. Our Indian territories preſent abundant examples thereof; and wherever it is the caſe, an extenſive population may be ſupported; but as in Salſette, it muſt be proportionately poor and feeble, each ſubdiviſion being entruſted to the management of a ſeparate family; it follows, that the more ſubdiviſions, the more will be the families maintained, as long as each ſpot ſhall be capable of affording ſufficient produce for the maintenance of its occupiers.

129. Subdiviſion may be eaſily conceived therefore ſo minute, as that the whole produce, including rent and profit, ſhall at length be abſorbed in the maintenance in queſtion; there will then remain no ſuperfluity to excite employment in the other branches of the ſociety; the cultivators of the ſoil may be ſaid to labour almoſt for themſelves alone; and the poverty of ſuch a ſtate is irremediable, except by the conſolidation of ſmaller poſſeſſions, till the ſurplus bears a high and due proportion to the groſs produce, and by ſubſtituting rich proprietors and capitaliſts for wretched occupants, who, thus bordering on the condition of brutes, are reſtricted to the unnatural neceſſity of almoſt excluſively ſupplying their own wants.

130. This is the utmoſt limit of ſubdiviſion, and of conſequent population and poverty; but it muſt be remembered, that all approaches to it are only leſſer degrees of the ſame evil; and in the applications not unfrequently made on Salſette, for the circumſcribing of lands, from want of means to cultivate, at the ſame time that it is a proof of growing poverty. I would humbly recommend to Government this conſideration of the probable conſequences of preſent acquieſcence in the requeſt.

131. It would hence then ſeem to be impoſſible to encreaſe a people to any uſeful end, if the ways of active employment are obſtructed, or ſhut, and that kind of employment too, which renders them ſerviceable to each other. This employment only ariſes out of reciprocal wants; wants are only created or encreaſed wealth, and wealth is unattainable, or incapable of active circulation in a country like the interior of India, where the immediate ſources and employments of induſtry are ſo highly affeſſed.

132. "The political economy of government is brought to perfection, when every claſs, "in general, and every individual, in particular, is made to be aiding and aſſiſting to the "community, in proportion to the aſſiſtance he receives from it."

133. "That number of huſbandmen therefore is the beſt, which can provide food for all "the ſtate; and that number of inhabitants is the beſt, which is compatible with the full "employment of every one of them."

134. Thus too the plan propoſes to reanimate the Salſettetes to full and active employment, by opening wide the field for induſtry, by holding forth the certainty of great, and the proſpect of indefinite profit; and by the conſequent introduction of capitaliſts, with all their train of wants, to give life, energy, and activity to the whole. If the old houſe-tax prove for a time heavy, it is ſtill removed to a far leſs objectionable ſource, from one of the moſt important of human employments, and that employment no longer clogged with the diſheartening proſpect of its profits being about to be ſhared, nay diſproportionately ſhared, as ſoon as labour ſhall have acquired them; and it has been kept in view throughout, to give full operation to thoſe laws on which ſocieties are founded in nature, by removing the obſtructions which ſeemed hitherto to oppoſe the natural extenſion of wants, and to giving to ſelf-love, or ſelf-intereſt, a manifeſt advantage in ſupplying them.

135. The field of induſtry is not only opened to all, but freed alſo from interference or direction on the part of Government; and the free agency of man, his abſolute and unalienable right, left at full liberty to follow thoſe branches which he may himſelf find moſt conducive to his own benefit, and of which he alone is the fitteſt natural judge. Though this principle be generally admitted in theory, it is too often diſregarded in practical ſyſtems of taxation; for all taxes, whoſe operation is to check induſtry in its natural channel, or to force it into others leſs zealouſly, and therefore leſs advantageouſly purſued, are greater or leſſer violations of this natural right. Man, as a free agent, is properly amenable to no reſtraint, except in what may be abſolutely pernicious; in other reſpects the freeſt exercise of his own will is his undoubted privilege; made by his creator to proſper, rather than to pine on earth, his creator's laws are conſiſtently directed to the ſame end; they are according parts of one admirable whole, and muſt therefore evidently operate with moſt efficacy, where free agency is leaſt reſtrained. It is, in ſhort, that enviable ſtate of civil liberty, as much the happineſs of ſubjects to acquire, as it ſhould be the pride of Government to eſtabliſh.

136. Having in the preceding paragraphs intimated the practicability of reducing the native eſtabliſhments on Salſette, Caranja, &c. it will be proper to ſubjoin, that I propoſe this arrangement on the principles of a plan which I carried into effect ſome years ago, and with entire ſucceſs, in a much more extenſive territory, and of more difficult collection.

137. On Salſette, if the preſent ſimple plan of revenue be adopted, a ſtill ſmaller eſtabliſhment than what I now propoſe may very poſſibly be found to anſwer; but if it be deſired to extend it to other diſtricts where the old ſyſtem of revenue continues, an adequate idea will, will, I hope, be conceived from the enclosure K., wherein, with a view to more easy comprehension, I have adopted it to the present system and revenues of Salsette.

No. 3. Mr. Rickards (24 Sept. 1807) on Taxation and Revenue.

138. This island, already containing seven districts, is divided by the plan into as many patelships, to whom, with a proper number of peons, are entrusted the superintendence and controul of the sub-patels, and the responsibility of forwarding without delay the revenue, as collected to the cutcherry. The sub-patels are the immediate collectors of it (in districts where more than one patel is necessary) within circles of about six or seven thousand rupees each, having a writer under them to keep accounts, of which copies should be forwarded through the head patel, with every consignment of treasure, and three peons each, to aid in collecting, and when necessary to be allowed to call on the head patel with his peons, to grant their assistance. In Salsette, if the present revenues be commuted for the proposed house-tax, it is possible that one sub-patel, of capacity himself to keep a simple account, may do in each circle, under the orders of the district or head patel, without a writer under him; but in other countries, where the accounts are less simple, a writer may be necessary.

139. From the accompanying voucher (K), it will be seen that a sibbendy or village establishment, on this principle, falls considerably within the amount of 5 per cent. on the gross collections, so as to leave, I trust, an ample allowance for the cutcherry of the collector, without exceeding that per-centage.

140. In another country, where I have already tried the experiment, I found it abundantly satisfactory to the natives. The employment of these, in preference to foreigners, afforded them a gratification which enabled me to engage the services of men of the first respectability and influence in the country, at salaries nearly corresponding to those inserted in the voucher; and by ridding the country of a horde of foreign native servants, I not only eased the public of a heavy unnecessary expense, but the local inhabitants of the exactions of this foreign tribe, which from the total inability of a single European collector to controul, are very generally, perhaps universally, a most burthensome addition to the weight of the established taxes, and therefore a double bar to the means of improvement.

141. I do not pretend that by the employment of resident natives of influence, men of greater purity were introduced into office, but from identity of habits, and being long known and respected within their local spheres, their administration was more acceptable to the natives, and from paucity of numbers, and perhaps too a fellow feeling for friends and neighbours, less generally oppressive.

(Signed) R. RICKARDS.

Bombay, 24 Sept. 1807.

MEMORANDUM of the Number of TAXES, and their Amount, from which the LAND REVENUE of Salsette is at present realized.

1 Batty	104,841	2	98
2 Brab Trees	13,545	1	0
3 Mohoturfa (Artificers)	2,663	3	0
4 Baggai or Oarts	6,699	2	50
5 Dannar Cocoa-nut Trees in peoples compounds	558	3	0
6 Rents or Godowns	186	2	65
7 Cocoa-nut Oarts belonging to Sircar	0	3	0	This is the produce of the Oarts in kind.
8 Dongur Dhulley	108	0	0
9 Wuskeesor Hill cultivation of Gingitie, &c.	28	3	34
10 Maryse and Codjans	1302	3	66	Company's Property.
11 Sircars Salt-pans	434	2	08	Ditto let at outcry.
12 Fuzendars Salt-pans	777	3	72	pay $\frac{1}{6}$ of the produce.
13 Ground allowed for garden	16	1	25
14 Angdana or Cooley Tax	14,685	3	0
Total	Rs.1,45,850	3	68

LAND REVENUES	1,45,850	3	68
15 Tobacco Farm	28,825	0	08
16 Arrack Farm	67,300	0	08
17 Farm of Hay	400	0	0
18 Ditto Date Trees	395	0	0
19 Ditto Poonavem Flower	735	0	0
20 Ditto Stone Quarries	167	0	0
21 Ditto Duty on Junger	1,438	0	0
Total	Rs. 2,45,110	3	74

N. B. Of the preceding taxes that on batty alone, is intended to be included in the cowles, as now drawn out; and these cowles would perpetuate the said tax, at its present rate or rates, for ever, without any diminution in its amount to the present or old settlers. The rates of this tax now are a nominal third of the produce of white batty grounds, 4-3-2, and 1 parrah per beggah on private salt batty grounds; and half produce on salt batty grounds, the property of the Company. From the wording of these cowles being confined to the computed one-third of the rated gross produce of the soil, it seems doubtful whether the last mentioned tax on Company's salt batty grounds be intended to be included, it could not, without a fresh assessment, which would diminish the present amount of revenue. The tax, however, is payable in kind, but commuted into money at 20 rupees per moorah of white, and 16 rs. 2 qr. of black batty, liable to a future decennial adjustment. Both lands, and the goods and chattels of defaulters, are liable to seizure for arrears of revenue.

No. 3. Mr. Rickards (24 Sept. 1807) on Taxation and Revenue.

Bombay, 24th Sept. 1807. (Signed) R. RICKARDS.

HEADS of the propoſed New Plan.

1. THE preſent revenue being derived from fourteen different ſources (beſides ſeven farms), and many of the payers contributing from two or three different heads, with a view of ſimplifying the revenue both to payers and receivers, it is propoſed to conſolidate the whole of the different land-taxes into one general tax, to be removed from the land and its produce, and fixed on houſes in perpetuity.

2. Cowles to be granted to every landholder on the iſland of Salſette, making over the ſaid land to him which he now occupies and cultivates, after correct admeaſurement, in full and excluſive proprietary right.

3. The ſaid cowles to ſpecify not only the extent of the land thus made over to the proprietor, but the particulars of the different taxes now paid by him, the whole to be then conſolidated and commuted into one general houſe tax, fixed in money, never to riſe, though ſubject to diminution, as will be hereafter explained.

4. The tax being thus fixed on a houſe, will then have no reference whatever to the produce of land; a proprietor may then extend or improve his cultivation within the limits ſpecified in his cowle, without any interference on the part of the ſervants of government, or being liable to one or more pice of tax. The profit of every improvement will then be wholly and entirely the proprietor's own.

5. After the tax is thus fixed, any ſervant who interferes with a proprietor in his cultivation or improvements, to be puniſhed by tranſportation beyond ſea.

6. For the ſake of conformity, the houſe-tax ſhall extend to all thoſe now paying revenue on the iſland, and be proportioned in each caſe to ſuch payment; it ſhall extend alſo in due proportion as this ſource of revenue (which a new one) be productive; it ſhall be allowed to operate in diminution of the rate of houſe-tax to the preſent occupiers and cultivators of land; hence, no man will in any caſe pay more than he does at preſent, but evidently leſs, even in the firſt inſtance. Another advantage of the commutation is, that the tax will thus be one and permanently fixed; i. e. never to riſe, though individual profits may be perpetually increaſing.

7. Waſte lands, which require encouragement and much expenſe to cultivate, will be granted free of all tax for ever, excepting ſuch as may now be paid from trees or other articles thereon; any new houſes built on the iſland, to carry on the waſte cultivation, will be ſubject to no tax for the firſt fifteen or twenty years. After which period the proprietors, &c. will pay the ſame houſe-tax as the reſt of the iſland, which it is hoped may before this time be reduced to one uniform moderate ſtandard every where.

8. In the event of arrears of revenue, the lands of proprietors, but not their produce, will be liable to public ſale to make good ſuch arrear.

9. In order to expedite the great object of the plan, viz. the reduction of the preſent land revenue to the ſtandard above adverted to, I alſo propoſe, that in proportion as the preſent farms of tobacco and arrack ſhall, by ſome better management become more productive than they now are, a correſponding amount ſhall be given up in the commuted tax to the old ſettlers.

10. The plan alſo propoſes the eſtabliſhment of tanks or reſervoirs on the iſland, for the purpoſe of irrigation. It is propoſed to make theſe reſervoirs likewiſe a ſource of taxation; firſt, to reimburſe the expenſe of conſtruction; afterwards to be an equivalent for further reductions in the houſe-tax; and when theſe combined ſources ſhall be found ſufficient for the purpoſes now anticipated, it is finally propoſed, that the houſe-tax be converted into a tax ad valorem, and for ever; after collected on that principle from all the houſes of the iſland, without any reference whatever to the produce of lands*, and this rate to be applied to the houſes of new ſettlers, cultivators of waſte land, in fifteen or twenty years from the date of their poſſeſſion.

11. And laſtly, the plan propoſes a ſaving to the Honourable Company, by reduction of uſeleſs eſtabliſhment, and other charges of more than two-thirds the preſent annual amount.

Bombay, 24th September 1807. (Signed) R. RICKARDS.

---

* Note.—On theſe principles it will be perceived, that the houſe-tax to old ſettlers will only undergo gradual reduction, as other equivalents offer, whence alſo the Company will at no time ſuffer the leaſt actual diminution of revenue; and the ſaid houſe-tax will not be finally converted into a tax ad valorem, or an eſtimated rent thereof, until all the propoſed ſources of revenue be found productive of an equal amount to that now derived from the iſland.

ABSTRACT

No. 3.
Mr. Rickards (24 Sept. 1807) on Taxation and Revenue.

(ABSTRACT).

Houses and Population, &c. of the Island of Salsette, taken from the late Collector's "Inspection of Villages," framed in 1802.

	Land Revenues, Rupees.	Population.	Houses.
Mallar District	34,621	10,619	2,665
Daravie D°	11,415	4,285	739
Gorabunder D°	10,663	3,209	709
Tannah D°	23,883	12,996	2,728
Marole D°	23,561	5,407	1,365
Tromba D°	35,396	8,605	1,858
Bandora D°	12,070	6,986	1,406
Total	151,629	52,107	11,470

(Signed) R. RICKARDS.

(ABSTRACT).

Numerical List of Population and Houses of the Island of Salsette, taken from the Collector's Records for the Year 1807.

	Houses.	Population.
Tannah District	2,178	10,972
Gorebunder D°	652	3,244
Daravee D°	816	4,524
Marol D°	1,241	5,392
Tromba D°	1,888	8,692
Mallar D°	1,986	9,817
Bandorah D°	1,406	7,283
Total	10,167	49,924

The population of the villages under Doctor Scott, and Mr. Ashburner, is not registered in the collector's books. The numbers therefore may not be accurate; they are probably less than the truth, being taken from the table framed by the collector himself in 1802. Since these estates are perhaps the only part of the interior of Salsette where population encreases.

(Signed) R. RICKARDS.

TRANSLATE of a Repreſentation from the Patell Mattaras and Ryatts on the Iſland of Salſette, dated 11 Auguſt 1807. Sic Orig.

After Compliments;

Repreſenting that your honour wiſhed to know the reaſon of the ryatts being in poor ſituation, ſo in what manner they will become rich, as alſo to ſtate what hardſhip they bears, conſequently we now beg to propoſe as follows, viz.

1. That the late Mr. Rivett, chief of this iſland, having obſerved the indigent ſituation of the ryots, and have fixed one-third of the produce as ſircars toka allowed in the meantime to pay for it at rupees 20 for white, and rupees 16 per morah of black batty; beſides given up ſeveral baptus or taxes, which made greatly happy to the ryots, requeſting therefore to your honour (being in the place of Almighty) to fix the ſame price of batty to our poſterity.

2. That in the iſland of Salſette have leaſed two farms of arrack and tobacco, which is great deal prejudicial to the ryots, viz.

1. The ſircar have bind the arrack farmer in his leaſe, that he muſt ſupply to the ryots ſix half maunds of arrack (for each morah of land at the rate of rupees 1-1) per each half maund, which he, the farmer, according to the condition of the leaſe, never ſupplies to the individuals, but putting off from time to time for the delivery, till the fixed period of the leaſe is expired, and than offering at rupees 1-3 per each half maund, which is not even good, but like water, and ſome time ſour, which undoubtedly makes people ſick; and the perſon who accuſtomed to drink half ſeer of arrack in a day, he cannot ſatisfy himſelf even with three ſeers; beſides, the farmer purchaſing bad arrack from the bandarees, at under rate, as of half a rupee, and ſome time ſix annas per each half maund, and he diſpoſes the ſame to the conſumers at the ſircars fixed rate of rupees 1-3 per each half maund, even for

No. 3. Mr. Rickards (24 Sept. 1807) on Taxation and Revenue.

Sic. Orig.

the payment of ſuch decreaſed rate, at which he purchaſes the arrack from the bandaree, evades them from time to time, and, laſtly, don't diſcharge in full their due; however the bandarees in ſuch caſe ought to prefer their complaint before the judge; but the poor ryots fears, for they obliges to break their time from two to four days to attend for the juſtice; thus they cannot proceed by laying their work at aſide. Prior to the arrack farm is leaſed out, the ryots uſe to get from two to three quarters of a rupee per each half maund of arrack.

2. The tobacco retailers, without receiving any wages from the tobacco farmers, paying him rupees 5 per maund of tobacco, and carrying the ſame for the petty ſales, who do not ſell more than three quarter per a ſeer of tobacco; ſo, at medium rate, the ryots obliges to purchaſe at rupees 8 per maund, inſtead of rupees 5, as all ſort of people do not underſtand in the weight; beſides the tobacco which the farmer ſupplies is of inferior quality, no doubt he might, purchaſing it at under rate. The perſon who have expenditure in his houſe of one ſeer of tobacco, he do not ſatisfy even with four ſeer, being of bad quality, and it makes them ſick by coughing. Prior to the farm is eſtabliſhed, the ryots uſe to get from 2 to 2-2 rupees per maund of tobacco, which is of a ſuperior quality. Thus, Sir, the ryots labour under the detrimental ſituation owing to the aforeſaid two farms.

3. That in the iſland of Bombay no fees were collected from the ryots for the wedding permits. As in this iſland ſome people obliges to pay fee of rupees 2-25, from which article the ſircar do not reap much revenue, conſequently we the ryots requeſt to give up this trifling tax to them, that they may celebrate the wedding without note, or paid any fees agreeably to the rule obſerved in Bombay.

4. The ſircar wiſhes to give to the cultivators the deeds of property, but the toka and the rate of batty, which is fixed by the late Mr. Rivett's ſyſtem, as prayed in the 1ſt article, is to abide them by adding the ſame into the deeds of property, and then to deliver the ſaid deeds of property to the cultivators, yet if any cunumbees is unable from his ſituation to cultivate all the land now under his title, he may be at liberty to take out a cowle only for ſuch part as he may wiſh to retain, leaving the reſt at the diſpoſal of Government; beſides this, the brab trees, thoſe that ſtands upon their batty ground, the produce of which trees goes to the ſircar, and not to them, they wiſh to receive in the manner the trees were given in Mr. Rivett's time to the oart fazendars. Theſe ryots, therefore, ſuggeſt, that if this indulgence, as herein prayed, is given to them, the ryots will then readily receive the deeds of property.

5. That if any cultivator is failed from his ſituation, the ſircar ſhould make him reaſonable advance of money, which muſt be recovered in three years without intereſt, by inſtalments, which will greatly ſave the cultivators.

6. That in the iſland of Salſette, the coolies who never goes to fiſh, but cultivating the land, and they obliges to pay angdenah, which is very heavy to them.

7. That the cooley and other caſt people, from Marratta country, came and reſided in this iſland, who do not pay any more to the ſircar than one rupee per each houſe, and making or cultivating Dhuntteys in the Hill, the produce of which never enough to maintain themſelves, however in regard to theſe people, the accompanying will ſhew your honour the particular of it, and beg your honour will be pleaſed to make neceſſary arrangement about them.

We reſpectfully ſolicit your honour will be pleaſed to take the premiſes of the aforeſaid articles into your ſerious conſideration, and give the redreſs as your honour (is a father and mother to the ryots) wiſhing to promote their poor ſituation, which obliged them to ſubmit this petition. In granting the aforeſaid redreſs, it will keep the ryot in a happy ſituation; and pray Almighty for your health and happineſs.

The above petition is ſigned (the original) by upwards of 100 of the principal inhabitants for themſelves, and the other inhabitants of the iſland.

(Signed) R. RICKARDS.

TRANSLATE of a PETITION from the Patel and Mattaras, and Ryots, on the Iſland of Salſette; dated 11 Auguſt 1807.

A. C.

1. Reſpecting that the thieves and their ſirdars, inhabitants of continent country, came over one after another, and took their abode in this iſland, as alſo in Bombay, and ſhewing the appearance of their being maintaining themſelves by work, but they became qualified with the ſituation of the ſeveral character, people reſiding in this iſland, as well as with the rule of juſtice of the Britiſh Government.

2. That on the laſt dry ſeaſon, in the ſeveral villages, theſe thieves having plundered four or five houſes, and by flogging the people of the houſes, carried away ready caſh and jewels whatever they had, but they never touched for any cloths or copper ware, for the fear of being hereafter found; as the rule of the Britiſh juſtice is, that no enquiry were making into the funds thus robbed by the thieves, as alſo heretofore they might have plundered, conſequently quently the booty they acquires is safely remains for the use of their family; and in case if the ryots run after the said robbers in order to catch them, and they by their turn happen to murder them, as they sure themselves that they have no fear for their soul; on the contrary, the ryots if happened to kill the thieves, the justice takes pain to examine into the matter; yet if the thieves were caught by the ryots, the justice asks evidences on their part, still if satisfactorily proved the fact, in such case they, the robbers, don't meet with proper repriment. Thus the rule is with the justice, with which they, the robbers, became well known themselves, and have already plundered several houses, and we sure ourselves they will still continue in the same manner.

Sic. Orig.

3. In short, if any person's house is robbed, he and the village people for his help, takes great pain to find out the thieves, with hope that if they were caught, must be properly punished; but agreeably to the rule of the justice, the aforesaid trouble shews no effect, but increases the animosity and fear of the thieves, as we are well known with their conduct, for their friends and children even will endeavour to take the revenge by soul, wherefore no person shall or will offer help one to another hereafter.

4. Thus, Sir, is the perplexity under which these Petitioners labour; moreover, these Petitioners are inhabitants of this island from their forefathers, and the estate they possesses as houses, oarts, senotore, &c. &c. is appears now to them no more than poison, owing to the aforesaid job of the thieves; there is not any sort of prejudice or hurt to these ryots, excepted this of the thieves, in the British Government, consequently they have thus submitted their petition to your honours favourable decision, (being your honour is a father and protector of the ryots), and they in the mean time request, that according to the villages the number of garrison sepoy with arms, is to be allowed, in order that in conjunction of them, the ryots of each village will watch three times in the course of a night, and by that means they will save their lives.

5. The sircar never derive any much revenue from those robber people, consequently these petitioners request, that they, the robbers, should be banished from this island to their own, by which the ryots will remain quiet and happy, otherwise these ryots will oblige to quit their former place, and live where they will observe safe for them. It appears to these petitioners, that as soon as they quitted the place, the remainder poor ryots never will remain on the spot without them; consequently we respectfully beg your honour will be pleased to consider the premises of this petition, and make happy to the ryots. If your honour could not give decision on the subject, in such case, this petition please to refer for the favourable decision of the honourable the Governor in Council.

Original signed by upwards of 150 of the principal inhabitants, for themselves and the other inhabitants of the island.

True Copy of the Translation.

(Signed) R. RICKARDS.

The Humble PETITION of the undersigned Inhabitants of Caranjah.

Sheweth,

That your petitioners, with the greatest respect and humble submission, beg the liberty to represent their case. That the deeds of property proposed by the honourable the Governor in Council to be granted to the cultivators of land, your petitioners are willing to take, provided the following alterations be made therein, instead of the term of ten year already mentioned, by which your goodness shall be acknowledged by them and their families for ever.

Article 1. That in the deeds of property, the particulars of the toka of the ground on their titles in the collector's records, is to be specified in batty, and money revenue, at the present rate; and that these different taxes be made one, and fixed for ever payable to the sircar annually, the net amount in money; and which may be commuted as a tax on their houses, and the same be registered in some of the public offices; but your petitioners first request to be considered.

Article 2. That the tax of rupees 12, on a beggah of baggayet, or garden ground, levied on this island, is a very heavy one; and in Salsette they only collect it at 9 rupees per beggah on the similar ground, agreeably to which they request the rate to be at Caranjah.

Article 3. That ever since the introduction of new system on this island, your petitioners, deprived of their right of a rent of two annas per each brab trees, formerly they used to recover from the bhandaries or the drawers of the toddy upon every tree stands on the ground of which the cultivators are paying to the sircar a tax by beggah measurement; therefore they, requesting either to adopt the same custom here as in such cases practicable in Salsette, or to be continued an ancient custom prevalent among the bhandaries, that they used to pay a tax of six annas on every tree to the sircar, exclusive of the two annas rent to the possessors of the grounds.

Article 4. That the petitioners cultivating beetle leaves in their gardens, which they send to Bombay for sale, of which they pay customs to the sircar, both at Caranjah and Bombay; it may be therefore exacted at one of the places simply.

[No. 3. Mr. Rickards (24 Sept. 1807) on Taxation and Revenue.

Sic. Orig.

Article 5. That the price of tobacco at Caranja is fixed at the rate of rupees 6. 1. 60. per maund, and in Salsette at five rupees per maund; therefore you will be pleased to reduce the price of it at Caranja, agreeably to that of Salsette.

Article 6. That some years ago some of the cultivators absconded, who indebted to the sircar for certain revenues, in consequence of which an order was issued by the sircar, that the heirs of such persons absconded to make good the revenue to the sircar, and take in their possession the grounds cultivated by the emigrants, which accordingly been done; but those that left no heirs, the judge and the collector compelled the patells to make good the balances due by those that quitted this island, and ordered to make over to them the grounds held in their title, which orders are not yet put into execution; therefore your petitioners beg that the said ground will be transferred on their title in the collector's books.

Article 7. That the villages of Seven and Navern suffer a great hardship on paying the former toka on their high lands, which ought to be put on the same footing as the other different villages on this island, conformably to the new system introduced here.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, shall ever pray.

(Signed) I. Nellojer Patett, and Seventeen more.

Caranja, 15 August 1807.

(True Copy) (Signed) R. RICKARDS.

EXTRACT from Townsend's Travels in Spain, on the subject of Irrigation.

The country in the vicinity of Alicant is wild and broken; the mountains are lofty, rugged, bare, and little susceptible of cultivation; the vallies are mostly small, but remarkably fertile; the soil is sandy, with beds of clay and marle. The rock in general is calcarious; the city is partly fed by a valley to the north, and by the Huerta, a rich and extensive valley, but chiefly by the vale of Murcia. The carriers bring wheat, and load back with fish.

The Huerta is watered from a vast reservoir, called Pantano, constructed in the mountains, at the distance of above five leagues from Alicant. The governor had the goodness to carry me in his coach to view this artificial lake, formed between two high mountains by a wall, the dimensions of which, reduced to English feet, are as follow: one hundred and forty-seven high; two hundred and sixty-two wide at top, from mountain to mountain, and not more than twenty-four at bottom; the thickness of the wall is sixty-seven feet at top, and one hundred and twenty-one at bottom. It is very properly made miptual to sustain the lateral pressure of the water, but had the thickness of the wall been only seven feet at top instead of sixty-seven, there would have been more than sufficient, because the æra of any surface being given, the pressure of fluids on that surface is in proportion to its depth. The depth being given, it matters not whether the quantity of water be one acre or ten thousand acres, for the same expense they might have constructed many such reservoirs, one below the other; but when we consider the age in which this was made (A. D. 1542) we are not surprized to see so much labour lost.

When the stream comes near the Huerta, it is separated into four by the administrator, and each proprietor of land receives, or should receive, the quantity allotted to him, in proportion to his land, paying for this the stipulated price. To prevent violence and fraud A. D. 1739, the King, by his royal edict, established sixty-two regulations for the distribution of this water, and appointed a special court to enforce these regulations; yet notwithstanding, either through ignorance of hydrostatics in the managers, through their negligence, or through the influence of bribes, many obtained more than their just proportion, and others are left to murmur and complain. It is to be lamented that government does not construct more Pantano. The farmers in the Huerta could dispose of five times as much as they receive at present, and were the whole interval between the mountains occupied with reservoirs, they might all be filled. This Pantano, although vast, has been replenished by four hours rain.

Independent of the produce in all kinds of grain and herbage, Government derives a direct revenue of near two thousand pounds a year by the distribution of this water.

The rock is a fine limestone, covering schist; and as the country produces pines, juniper, and coscoja in abundance; fuel for burning lime is on the spot; so that the expense of constructing reservoirs would not be great. After having examined the Pantano, I visited, on the succeeding days, the Huerta, to get acquainted with the agriculture of that reak, well planted, and well watered valley. Orig.

Going eastward from the city, having ascended gradually for about a mile, you look down upon a wide expanse of nearly thirty thousand acres, every where inclosed by lofty mountains, excepting towards the sea, and covered with oranges, lemons, figs, mulberries, almonds, cherries, apricots, peaches, nectarines, plumbs, apples, pears, pomegranates, olives, alganobos, the more humble yet not less profitable vine, and the liquorice, with every species of grain, of liguminous plants, and of herbage for the cattle.

This vale is said to contain more than twenty thousand persons, and I can readily believe it; for wherever you pass, you see old and young men, women and children innumerable, all all buſily employed, ploughing, ſowing, reaping, treading out the grain with cattle, winnowing the corn, or conveying it to granaries, hoeing in the vineyards, diſtributing water to their crops, or digging their lands, and preparing it for freſh productions.

When I viſited this delightful vale, they had reaped their barley, and were engaged in treading it with mules. To theſe they added carts drawn backwards on the area, for the purpoſe of ſeparating the grain, and of cutting the ſtraw for fodder. Others were employed to wind off ſilk from the cones; their reel is five feet wide, and receives ſix compound threads, from thirty, thirty-ſix, or from forty-two cones, which ſwim in a furnace of boiling water; theſe threads are made to traverſe on the reels, that they may not agglutinate together.

I was much pleaſed with the reticulated fences round moſt of the little farms, compoſed of reeds in pairs, croſſing each other like a lattice frame, yet ſo as to form, not rectangles, but lozenges or rhomboidal figures, with the reeds not interwoven, but bound together by eſparto threads.

Every part of the Huerta is refreſhed with water once in fifteen days, during the ſummer; but in winter it may go three weeks or a month unwatered. Beside the refreſhing ſtream derived from the Pantano, they have ſome norias, the moſt remarkable of which, belonging to Mr. Arabit, is worked by wind, and raiſes the water forty feet.

The land never reſts; for no ſooner has it rewarded the farmer with one crop, than he begins to prepare it for another: In September he ſows barley, and having reaped it about the latter end of April, or the firſt week in May, he immediately puts in maize, which comes off about the middle of September; but before this ripens, he puts in Landias (the cucurbeta of Linnæus,) or ſome other eſculent, which yields him a third crop in the courſe of the ſame year. In November he ſows wheat, and in June he reaps; the produce both of wheat and barley is from fifteen to twenty-four for one, having ſowed of the former nearly two buſhels to an acre, of the latter between three and four. Flax is put into the ground about September, or the beginning of October, and comes off in May; but hemp, which is ſowed in April, continues on the land till Auguſt. Theſe, with cucumbers, melons, garbawzos (cicer artiſtinum,) peas, French beans, lettuce, alfalfa (medeiago ſaliva,) form a rich variety of crops, which, cheriſhed by a bright ſun, and fed by abundant ſtreams from the Pantano, prove a never failing ſource of plenty.

In the ſpring they abound with oranges and lemons; in ſummer they have plums, cherries, figs, apricots, and nectarines; in autumn they gather grapes; and in winter a rich variety of fruits ſupplies their tables. Thus Ceres and Pomona appear to be engaged in a never ceaſing conteſt, which ſhall moſt contribute to the wealth and proſperity of this favoured Valley.

One of the moſt valuable productions of this country is the barilla. For this they plough their land four or five times, dung it well, and then, having turned the earth twice more, they make it ſmooth with boards inſtead of harrows, and ſow their ſeed in the months of January and February, waiting always for wet weather.

(True Extract.) (Signed) R. RICKARDS.

EXTRACT from Niebuhr's Deſcription de L'Arabie.—Quart. Ed. page 240.

" Mareb eſt encore actuellement la principale ville de Dsjôf. Elle est á 16 lieues d'Allem. à l'eſt-nord-eſt de Sanà, & ne conſiſte qu'en 300 maiſons chétives; cependant elle a une muraille & trois portes. On prétend y avoir trouvé quelques ruines d'un palais de la reine Balkis, mais aucune inſcription; ainſi elles ne valent peut-être pas la peine d'être vues. Le Seigneur qui y reſide ſe donnoit en 1763 le titre de Scherif Mahammedibn Achmedibn Alojibn Khâletibn Hoſſejnibn Mahammedibn Nâſribn Mahammedibn Achmed; il étoit de la famille d'Abutáleb; hors de Mareb il ne poſſedoit que Höſnabrâd, Sahher & quelques autres petits villages. J'ai beaucoup entendu parler en Arabie du grand reſervoir de Sabéens, que les Arabes nomment Sitte Mareb, mais perſonne ne m'en donna des notions plus ſûres qu'un homme de Mareb tres conſideré, qui y étoit né & y demuroit. Il me décrivoit le reſervoir ancien comme une vallée entre deux chaines de montagnes, qui avoit preſque une journée en longeur (5 lieues d' Allem.) Dans cette vallée ſe réuniſſent ſix ou ſept petites rivières qui coulent de l'oueſt & du ſud, & qui viennent en partie du domaine de l'Imân; quelques-unes ſont poiſſonneuſes & ont de l'eau toute l'année. Ces deux chaines de montagnes qui renferment cette vallée de deux côtés s'approchent ſi pres l'une de l'autre á l'eſt, que l'on peut en paſſer l'entervalle dans 5 à 6 minutes. On diſoit, que cette ouverture avoit été fermée par une épaiſſe muraille, pour retenir l'eau ſuperflue pendant & apres les pluyes, & ſelon l'opinion de cet Arabe, pour la diſtribuer dans les champs & dans les jardins qui ſont à l'eſt & au nord, par trois portes pratiquees l'une ſur l'autre. La muraille avoit 40 à 50 pieds de hauteur, elle étoit bâtie de fort grands pierres de taille, & il en reſte encore des ruines des deux côtés. Mais elle ne retient plus l'eau qui s'écoule d'abord dans la plaine, & qui, ſuivant le plus ou le moins de pluyes, ſe perd à longue ou à courte diſtance dans les ſables & les champs voiſins.

" Ainſi le grand reſervoir près de Mareb, n' avoit rien de merveilleux. Ailleurs & meme en Yemen, ou il ne pleut que dans une ſaiſon fixe, on ménage ſoigneuſement l'eau, mais ces reſervoirs ſont petits auprès de celui-ci. Que de contrées par example en Egypte & dans la Paleſtine, autrefois tres cultivée, á preſent deſertes fautes de canaux & de reſervoirs! Toute comme un ſage adminiſtration a rendu fertiles beaucoup de bonnes terres, auxquelles il ne manquoit que de l'eau. Ces mêmes terres ſont redevenues deſertes dés que le gouvernement a changé, & ſurtout depuis qu'il n'y a plus eu d'union entre les habitans. Il ſeroit donc tres-poſſible par la nature du terroir, & auſſi profitable aux habitans, de retablir la muraille Sitte Mareb pour contenir l'eau, qu'il leur fut autrefois poſſible & utile de la faire conſtruire. Mais Mariaba étoit la réſidence d'un Roi, qui regnoit ſur une grande partie de l' Yemen & de l' Hadramant; & à Mareb il n'y a aujourd'hui qu'un pauvre Scherif, qui outre cette ville ne poſſéde que quelques villages, & qui, loin de relever une ſi grande muraille, peut à peine défendre ſon pays contres ſes voiſins (94 Queſt. de Mons. Michaelis.) Les reſervoirs qui fourniſſent l'eau à Conſtantinople, ſont conſtruits comme l'étoit celui de Mareb. Mais bien qu'ils ſoient de beaucoup plus petits, ils ont été bâtis par de grands Empereurs, comme ils ſont encore entretenus par les Sultans; non que les dépenſes excedederoient les forces des ſujets, mais á cauſe du peu d'ordre qui règne parmi eux, & parceque les orientaux mettent entre les devoirs du Prince le ſoin d'entreprendre, ou d'entretenir ces ſortes d'ouvrages publics. Lorſque cette digne des Sabéens fut rompue, Mareb n'etoit peut-être plus la reſidence dú Prince, peut-être même ce royaume autrefois ſi puiſſant etoit il diviſée en pluſieurs ſeigneuries. Il ne faut après cela point s'étonner, ſi ces ouvrages ſuperbes n'ont pas été continués, ou ſi l'on ne les a pas rétabli."

No. 3. Mr. Rickards (24 Sept. 1807) on Taxation and Revenue.

True Extract. (Signed) R. RICKARDS.

EXTRACT from Arthur Young's Travels, &c. Vol. 2. on the ſubject of Irrigation.

The celebrated Arthur Young, in the above-mentioned work, ſpeaks frequently of the great advantages of irrigation in agriculture.

In that of Lombardy he deſcribes the irrigation of the Milaneſe, by means of reſervoirs, canals, &c. as "perhaps the greateſt exertion of the kind that ever was in the world." The whole deſcription being too long to copy, a few extracts may ſuffice.

"Their greateſt exertions were in irrigation, which was ſo well known, that they ſold their "ſuperfluous water, transferring the uſe and property of ſome, by the hour, day, and week."

"There are authors who have aſſerted, that agriculture is improved in conſequence of great "trade or manufactures only; but the inſtance of the immenſe irrigation in the Milaneſe, "effected by theſe and many other canals, too numerous to mention, will not allow of ſuch a "concluſion being general; and to ſhew that my opinion is not without foundation, a very "brief review of the ſtate of Milan, as far as it reſpects theſe periods, will not be diſpleaſing "to a reflecting reader."

After this review, too tedious to enter, he concludes as follows:

"The concluſion of the whole ſeems fairly to be, that we are not to attribute the irrigation "of the country to wealth derived from foreign commerce; the fertility and excellent "management of the lands ſupported a great population, which proved as induſtrious as "public calamities and confuſions would allow; but it does not appear that this induſtry was "ever continued through a long ſeries of peace and happineſs."

"The ſame law, that has been ſo effectual in watering Piedmont, operates here alſo; and "has done even greater things; he who diſcovers a ſpring conducts it where he pleaſes, "paying a fixed compenſation for cutting through the properties of others; all rivers belong, "as in Piedmont, to the Sovereign, who ſells the waters to ſpeculators for the moſt beneficial "purpoſe of irrigation. In the diſtribution of it by ſale, they do not meaſure by the hour, as "in Piedmont, but by the ounce, 12 ounces are a bracido, or 22 inches; an ounce of water is "a ſtream that runs one bracico long, and one ounce deep; and the farther the water has "run, the higher is the price, as being more charged with manure."

"As an example of the beneficial influence of this law, I was ſhewn between Milan and "Pavia, a ſpring that was diſcovered two miles from the lands of the diſcoverer, the proper-"ties of many perſons lying between him and the ſpring; he firſt bought the property of the "perſon in whoſe land it was ſituated, which was eaſily done, as it was too low to be there of "any uſe, then he conducted it by a trench at pleaſure, the two miles, paying the fixed price "for cutting through his neighbour's lands; and having gained it upon his own, pre-"ſently changed poor hungry arable, into a very fine watered meadow."

"Near Milan a watered meadow ſells at 800 liv. the pertica (£.32. 15s. the Engliſh acre) "and the rent of ſuch is about 39 liv. (£1. 5s. the Engliſh acre); this muſt not however, be "claſſed high, for there are lands that riſe to 4,000 liv. (£.163. the Engliſh acre); in land at "800 liv. or 1,000 liv. water often makes half of the value, that is, the rent to the owner of "the land will be 15 liv. to 20 liv. and as much to ſome other perſon for the water."

"In viewing a great farm, ſix or ſeven miles from Milan, in the road to Pavia, I found "that all the watered meadow was mown four times; and that what was watered in winter, "prati di mercita, five times; ſuch is the value of water here, that this farm, which watered "is rented at 20 liv. the pertica, would not let at more than 6 liv. without water, the ſoil "being gravel. The irrigation of the mercita begins in October, and laſts till March, when "it is regulated like all other meadows. All in general begin in April, and laſt till September;

" tember; and if there be no rain, once in ſeven to fifteen days. An ounce of water running " continually from 24th of March to the 8th of September, is worth, and will ſell for 1,000 " liv. When arable crops want water, it is always given. At Cari, watered meadows are cut " thrice commonly, but in ſome ſeaſons four times."

LODI.

" I cannot but eſteem the twenty miles as affording one of the moſt curious and valuable " proſpects in the power of a farmer to view; we have ſome undertakings in England that " are meritorious, but they ſink to nothing in compariſon with theſe (meaning the canals, " &c. for irrigation in the duchy of Milan) great and truly noble works. It is one of the " rides which I wiſh thoſe to take, who think that every thing is to be ſeen in England."

" The meadows are commonly cut thrice, but the beſt four times; the produce of hay per " pertica 6 faſſi of 100 lbs. of 28 oz. at the three cuts. Price of the firſt 8 liv. per faſs; of " the ſecond 5 liv. of the third 4½ liv.; they water immediately after clearing, if there be no " rain. Without irrigation, the rent of the country in general would be only one-third of what " it is at preſent."

VERONA.

" The meadows here are cut thrice, and fed once; are never ploughed if good and well " watered. Water for irrigation here, as in all Lombardy, is meaſured with great care and " attention by what is called quadrata, which is a ſquare foot (the Verone foot is to the " Engliſh about as twenty are to twelve). Twelve quadrata are ſufficient to water five " hundred campi of rice grounds (about three hundred and eighty Engliſh acres); and the " price of ſuch a quantity of water is commonly about three thouſand zechine (£.1,425. " ſterling.) The wheels in this city for raiſing water for irrigating the gardens are very com- " plete; they receive the water as in Spain, into hollow fellies; there is one in the garden of " the Daniele Monaſtery, for watering about four campi, which are ſaid to yield a revenue of " three hundred zechin, which is one hundred zechin (of 95*s.* 6*d.*) per Engliſh acre, or " £.47. 10*s.* per acre—immenſe produce."

TURIN.

" The irrigation in all this vicinity is extenſive, and carried to great perfection. Water is " meaſured with as much accuracy as wine; an hour per week is ſold, and the fee ſimple " of the water is attended to, with the ſame ſolicitude as that of the land. Rich meadows, " without water, ſell for 1000 liv. and 1100 liv. a gianata; and arable worth 500 liv., " without water, is in many inſtances worth 2000 liv. with it. During the winter, as the " meadows are commonly fed with ſheep, they do not water at all. Thoſe who have water " enough, let it on to their land once a week during the whole ſummer; but if the weather " is wet, once a fortnight, and a day or two before cutting, if the water is perfectly clear. " In regard to the quality of the water, they make no other diſtinction than that from " mountains being cold, and that of the Dora, near Turin, being charged with ſo much " ſand as to be bad. They attend to the cutting of weeds in the canals, that they may " rot; and ſome good managers harrow the bottoms in the ſpring, to foul the water, which " then acts more powerfully as a manure. Another practice, which tends alſo to prove " what excellent farmers they are, in all that reſpects meadow grounds, is that of paring " and burning, which they perform on pieces that have a bad herbage or want improvement, " but do not ſow them with corn, or any other plant, except hay-ſeeds, in order to renew " the graſs with no other interruption; it is impoſſible to praiſe ſuch practices too much; " they call this huſbandry, Motara."

" The power of effecting the great works in irrigation, which are viſible over this whole " country, depends very much on the law, which ſuppoſes the right and property of all " rivers to be veſted in the King; conſequently all canals taken from them, are bought of " him; and this enſures another regulation, which is the power of carrying the water, " when bought, at the pleaſure of thoſe who buy it, where they think fit; they cannot, " however, cut acroſs any man's ground, without paying him for the land and the damage; " but the law does this by regulations known to every one, and no individual is allowed a " negative upon a meaſure which is for the general good. The purchaſers of water from " the King are uſually conſiderable land owners, or communities, that have lands wanting " water; and it is of no conſequence at what diſtance theſe lands may be from the river " whence the water is taken, as they have a right to conduct it where they chooſe, provided " they do not cut through a garden or pleaſure ground; nor can they carry the water under " that of others whoſe canals are already made, as they might in that caſe deprive them of " a part of their water; they are obliged to throw aqueducts over ſuch canals. The benefit " of water is ſo great and well underſtood, that nobody ever thinks of making objections; " and in caſe their lands are not already watered, it is no ſmall advantage to have a new " canal brought through them, as they have the opportunity of buying water of the pro- " prietors. It is ſold per hour, per week, and even half an hour, and down to a quarter; " the common price of an hour per week, for ever, is 1500 liv."

Mr. Young has many more remarks on the advantages of Irrigation, and in ſeveral parts of Lombardy compares the value of watered with that of unwatered land, the reſult being

No. 3.
Mr. Rickards (24 Sept. 1807) on Taxation and Revenue.

every where ſimilar to thoſe above given. After a long diſſertation on the commerce of Lombardy, he cloſes with the following pertinent obſervations:

Page 282. "There is but one concluſion to be drawn from this detail of the commerce of "Lombardy, viz. that eighteen-twentieths of it conſiſt in the export of the produce of "agriculture, and therefore ought rather to be eſteemed a branch of that art, than of "commerce, according to modern ideas; and it is equally worthy of notice, that thus "ſubſiſting by agriculture, and importing manufactures, theſe countries muſt be ranked "among the moſt flouriſhing in the world, abounding with large and magnificent towns, "decorated in a manner that ſets all compariſon at defiance. The country every where "cut by canals of navigation or irrigation, many of the roads ſplendid, an immenſe popu-"lation, and ſuch public avenues, that if Italy were united under one head, ſhe would be "claſſed among the firſt powers in Europe.

"When it is conſidered that all this has been effected generally under governments not "the beſt in Europe; when we further reflect, that England has for a century enjoyed the "beſt government that exiſts; we ſhall be forced to confeſs perhaps, with aſtoniſhment, that "Great Britain has not made conſiderable advances in agriculture, and in the cultivation "of her territory. The waſtes of the three kingdoms are enormous, and far exceeding in "proportional extent all that are to be found in Italy; while of our cultivated diſtricts, there "are but a few provinces remarkable for their improvements. Whoever has viewed Italy with "any degree of attention, muſt admit, that if a proportion of her territory containing "as many people as the three Britiſh kingdoms, had for a century enjoyed as free a govern-"ment, giving attention to what has been a principal object, viz. agriculture, inſtead of "trade and manufacture, they would at this time have made almoſt every acre of their "country a fertile garden, and would have been in every reſpect a greater, richer, and more "flouriſhing people than we can poſſibly pretend to be. What they have done under their "preſent governments, juſtifies this aſſertion; we, bleſſed with liberty, have little to exhibit "of ſuperiority.

Vide Sir John Sinclair's Hiſtory of the Public Revenue, Vol. 2, p. 98.

"What a waſte of time, to have ſquandered a century of freedom, and laviſhed a thouſand "million ſterling of public money, in queſtions of commerce! He who conſiders the rich "inheritance of a hundred years of liberty, and the magnitude of thoſe national improve-"ments which ſuch immenſe ſums would have effected, will be inclined to do more than "queſtion the propriety of the political ſyſtem which has been adopted by the legiſlature "of this kingdom, that, in the boſom of freedom, and commanding ſuch ſums, has not in "the agriculture of any part of her dominions, any thing to preſent, which marks ſuch "expenſe or ſuch exertion, as the irrigation of Piedmont and the Milaneſe."

In treating of the ſame ſubject in Spain, Mr. Young has the following further intereſting remarks:

"Every time we ſee any irrigation, we are ſtruck more and more with the importance "of water, even on ſoils which are apparently mere rock; and on the moſt arid deſerts it gives "at once the utmoſt luxuriance of vegetation.

"A journal, which is here alſo about an Engliſh acre, of rich land in the vale, not watered, "ſells for 500 liv.; watered, for 1,000 liv.

Page 324. "Leaving Barcelona, enter immediately on extraordinary ſcenes of watered "cultivation, and which muſt have given the general reputation to the province. Nothing "can well be finer; the crops in perpetual ſucceſſion, and the attention given to their "culture, great; not the idea of a fallow, but the moment one crop is off, ſome other imme-"diately ſown. A great deal of lucern, which is cut four, five, ſix and even ſeven times in a "year, all broad-caſt, and exceedingly thick and fine, from two and a half to three feet high "when cut; it is all watered every eight days. Advancing, the irrigated lands let from "24 to 40 Spaniſh livres, that not irrigated at 15 livres; water therefore, here, more than "doubles the rent of the land; and in other places we have found the difference yet "greater.

"Land near canals, well watered, ſells for 100 Spaniſh livres the journal; vineyards for "300 livres; they give in good years to 12 charges. Unwatered land 100 to 150 livres.

"Enter a flat vale, half a mile broad, not watered, hemp very poor; maize ſeven feet "high; vineyards under regular plantations of olives; corn cut in ſtocks, and the land "ploughed; a journal ſells for 200 livres, and further on, when irrigated, for 1,000 livres, "which is an aſtoniſhing difference."

Page 327. "While the mountains and waſte parts of the province preſent an unfavour-"able proſpect, the watered diſtricts are, on the contrary, ſcenes of moſt exuberant fertility. "To a perſon from the north of Europe there can hardly be a more ſtriking ſpectacle than "the effect of watering in theſe ſouthern climates; it converts an arid ſtoney waſte, which "would yield nothing but vines and olives, on which every ſort of grain would hardly return "the ſeed, at once into fields pregnant with the richeſt harveſts; on ſuch ſoil it gives "almoſt the whole value of the land; and on the richeſt it raiſes it at the leaſt "double, and in ſome inſtances five times; it enables the cultivator to have a ſucceſſion "of crops, more important than any thing we know in the North. The reaping one crop "is but the ſignal for immediately putting in another, in doing which they exert "themſelves with the utmoſt activity, ploughing univerſally as ſoon as the corn is cut,

"and

No. 3.
Mr. Rickards (24 Sept. 1807) on Taxation and Revenue.

" and are by this enabled to have conſtantly two crops a year. The extreme fertility of " theſe lands has, however, led many travellers into great or ignorant exaggerations; they " have aſſerted, that the land yields many crops at the ſame time, one under another, which " is both true and falſe; it is a fact, that corn, wine, oil, and ſilk, are produced by the ſame " field, in ſome few inſtances; but it is not from hence to be concluded that the goodneſs of " the land, or the importance of irrigation, is at all ſhown by that circumſtance. The fact " is, that it is impoſſible to raiſe one crop under another, without loſing in one nearly as " much as you gain in the other; the olive being a large tree, cultivation may be carried on " under it; but the crop gained is poor, and ſhows, that exactly in proportion to the ſhade, " is the injury ſuſtained by the produce which is ſhaded. If the trees are thick the corn " is hardly worth reaping; it is the ſame in other caſes; and I was well convinced, from " reviewing their grounds with this deſign, that the ſoil can carry, profitably, but one crop " at a time; ſeveral may be crowded on it, but nothing is gained: with graſs under trees, " this is not ſo much the caſe in a hot climate; but even graſs is damaged; and it is not the " queſtion at preſent, as they have none; a country to be ſupported, and in a hot climate, " without meadows or paſtures, ſounds very ſtrange to Engliſh ears, and it is among " the curious circumſtances of these parts, and I am told of the reſt of Spain, if they applied " to graſs the land that is proper for it, they could not poſſibly have bread to eat; ſtraw " here is given inſtead of hay, and entirely ſupplies its place; and the oxen and mules " which we ſaw, did not ſhow in the leaſt, by their looks, any deficiency in nouriſhment. " Lucerne is not at all common through the interior parts of the province, and where they " cultivate it, it is uſed green. Maize is ſometimes ſown merely for its herbage, as it might " be, I believe profitably in England, late in the Spring to avoid our froſts; it is one of the " moſt nouriſhing plants in the world.

" The conſequence of water being ſo apparent in the province, I could not but attend " particularly to their exertions in conducting it, and I conclude that not one acre in twenty, " perhaps in forty, is watered, that might be in the flat vales, where canals of irrigation " are made at a ſmall expenſe, a very good though by no means a complete uſe is made of " them; but on the declivities of the mountains, it is neceſſary to erect a mound of ſolid " maſonry acroſs the river, and to cut the canal partly out of rocks, and to ſupport it by " walls of ſtone, as I have ſeen in France; and having thus diverted a large portion of the " water of a river, to carry it on its level along the ſide of the mountain, as far as it will go, " ſuch exertions demand a much greater capital than is to be found upon the lands of " Catalonia; it could be done only by a great lord, who knew the importance of ſuch under- " takings, who reſided on his eſtate, and whoſe income was ſpent in ſomething elſe than " the taſte and pleaſures of a capital. But leaving ſuch exertions to individuals, who either " have not the money, or not the will to employ it, is to perpetuate waſtes; it is the king " only who can make theſe efforts: a monarch, who ſhould be determined to improve his king- " dom, would preſently find the means of doing it; the importance of water is ſo well known, " that if a canal is made to conduct it, the proprietors or farmers of the lands below would " readily and ſpeedily make uſe of it, paying proportionably for the quantity they took; this is " the ſyſtem in Lombardy, and the effect is great; it would be the ſame in Catalonia, but the " capital for the great work of the canal muſt probably be ſupplied by the king; if not the " whole, at leaſt a conſiderable portion; ſuch money ſhould be lent to undertakers at a mo- " derate intereſt; exertions of ſuch a nature, with a proper general attention given to theſe " objects, would make them faſhionable among the great lords of the kingdom, and fertile " provinces would ſoon be created out of barren and deſolate waſtes. Arbitrary power has " been exerted for ages in efforts of barbarity, ignorance, and tyranny; it is time to ſee it " employed in works that have the good of mankind for their aim. A beginning, and a " very good one, is made in the conſtruction of ſome great roads, on a ſcale of true mag- " nificence, which is never exhibited with ſuch effect as in works of public utility; and " whenever the importance of cultivation is well underſtood in Spain, and the right means " of advancing it clearly analyzed, irrigation will then receive an attention that has not " hitherto been given; ſuch is the neceſſity of water for various productions in this climate, " that rivers ought to be no more than infinitely multiplied channels, and collected in one " ſtream only, as a reſervoir for freſh and repeated deviations.

(True Extracts) (Signed) R. RICKARDS."

No. 3. Further Remarks (7 July 1808) by Mr. Rickards, on Taxation and Revenue.

READ the following Minute from Mr. Rickards:

MINUTE.

IN a former essay, delivered to Government on the 24th September 1807, I attempted to develop certain principles connected with the permanent prosperity of social bodies and states, founded on the laws of natural order, and applicable to the circumstances of all civilized societies, in whatever clime or region.

Man, it has been shown, is of necessity a social being; he has abundant wants which others only can supply, and a greater interest in co-operating with his fellows in the common advantages of reciprocal aid, than in the selfish pursuit of exclusively supplying himself: the greater benefits and comforts arising out of this general labour for the use of others, extend the sources of individual industry; industry creates wealth, and wealth again re-acts upon industry by an increase of wants, and the liberal recompense of the labour which supplies them.

The wise ordinations of nature, therefore, cause the greatest comforts and happiness of every society to arise out of the greatest possible use and employment on account of each other:

"In age, in infancy, from others' aid
"Is all our hope—
"That, Nature's first, last lesson to mankind."

It is the union of humanity in one fraternal bond, an universal contribution of mutual assistance, flowing from want on the one hand and supply on the other, and which the positive institutions of human government ought similarly to regard and encourage, as the surest, if not only basis of national prosperity. In this natural order, labour and wealth, the poor and the rich, are equally dependant on, as they are equally and indispensably necessary to, each other; equality of condition, or even that approach to it observable in the greater part of India, is consequently incompatible with the growing prosperity of any civilized community, from being positively adverse to the course and effects of Nature's laws.

It follows then, that encouragement to the acquisition, and security to the enjoyment of wealth, should be fundamental maxims in the practice of enlightened states; but the only encouragement required is entire freedom; direction, interference, participation, are positive restraints, and according to the degree in which they are exercised, check the production of that superfluity or abundant wealth which I have already remarked to be the only natural fund for the increase of industry, the only natural channel for distributing the comforts, or increasing the enjoyments of life, among the laborious and industrious, i. e. the major part of every society, as it is also the only fund from whose progressive increase the Government can or ought to expect any increase of its own resources.

The superfluity or abundance above mentioned is most conspicuous in the existence of great capitalists, and the expenditure of wealthy proprietors; but in all flourishing communities, lesser portions of the same abundance are universally distributed; its aggregate amount being always proportioned to the freedom of acquisition, as the sum of national prosperity is to its general distribution and expenditure.*

It is evident that acquisition alone is not sufficient; for if, as in this country, wealth be hoarded when acquired, from inability to employ it advantageously, or buried from the dread of arbitrary power, it can neither operate in promoting the comforts or industry of the laborious orders, or constitute a productive source of supply to the exigencies of the state.

It must be spent, as well as gained, but its expenditure is also a natural propensity; the possession of wealth is, generally speaking, the possession of so many wants which crave to be supplied, and there should consequently be as little obstruction to its expenditure or employment, as restraint in its acquisition: by free expenditure, the distribution of wealth is enabled to reach the obscurest retreats of society; it then supports, comforts, or enriches all who have the industry or the talent to acquire it, and is most useful to individuals, and most productive to the state, when most generally and abundantly spread.

"Plus les hommes sont en etat de consommer, plus ils sont utiles.————Quand on "recoit gros, et depense gros, tout va bien."—(Phil. Rurale.)

Under the impression of these principles, my own mind has been long habituated to ascribe the backward state of all the Indian provinces I have seen, to the want of that wealth, to the very scanty number of the possessors of that abundance by which alone industry can be invigorated, and the comforts of the community at large, or the resources of the state, augmented. I shall confine my present remarks to this part of the subject: other parts may be better separately treated; but in the opinions either now or hereafter advanced, I trust I may not be suspected of designing to reflect either on particular persons or particular acts of our local administration: I solemnly disclaim the intention: the general object of the British Government in India has been, I admit, to promote the prosperity of its subjects; all I would argue is, that encouragement has been hitherto too sparing, or the means of administering it at times mistaken: let me also hope that the agitation of this important question will not be deemed an officious act of public duty, tempted to it, as I am, not by the

* If the institutions of Government have a tendency to restrain the spread of human wants, and consequently the demand for supply, can they be said to be promotive of the order of nature?

No. 3. Further Remarks (7 July 1808) by Mr. Rickards, on Taxation and Revenue.

the vain expectation of doing it that justice which its importance demands, but from the conscientious conviction that the mere discussion of economical principles applicable to our Indian territories, and their treatment in abler hands, may be productive of vast advantage, as well to the Company's interests in this quarter as to those of their numerous native subjects *.

Having already submitted it as my opinion, that our system of Indian taxation, alias a heavy consolidated land tax, is the prevailing cause of this universal poverty, I shall briefly recapitulate the general principles of that taxation, and after a few remarks, founded upon existing facts, leave to the decision of the candid how far this opinion may be justly founded; and whether any material progress can be made in the improvement of individual prosperity, or of financial resource, whilst the same system of taxation be persevered in.

In Guzerat the principle of half-produce is known, alias, a tax equal to an actual half of the actual produce of the soil; I beg leave to be understood however as speaking of the principle only, for I believe it is not generally, as indeed it never can be reduced to actual practice in any great extent of territory.

In Salsette the same principle formerly prevailed, taken from our Mahratta predecessors; but very laudably reduced by the Bombay Government to one-third of the actual produce.

In Malabar it was also attempted to be enforced, first by the Mahomedan, and afterwards by the British Government; though the attempt operated most oppressively in many instances, as the records of that province will show.

In the provinces subject to the Madras Government, we have again the same principle. Authentic statements procured from that presidency, give the following rates of assessment:

" The gross produce of an acre of paddy land* may be, for example - -	100
" From 10 to 12 per cent. is supposed to be deducted for reaping, cooly, &c.;
" variety of small charges, say 10 per cent. however - - - - -	10
Remain	90

" Of this remaining produce the Government is sometimes entitled to 35, 40, 45, or 50 " per cent. according as custom has defined, under local circumstances, the right of the " ryots."

The Government share is commonly denominated the gross collections; and the permanent settlement at Madras is founded on these gross collections, or actual payments made into the public treasury on account of Government.

" From the gross collections, for an average of years, hereditary zemindars† have been " allowed one-third for charges, maintenance, profit; paying two-thirds to Government, " as a rent in perpetuity. Mootahdars, or those who purchase Government estates, or have " them bestowed on them, have, as before stated, a reduction of from 11 to 25 per cent. " made in their favour.

" When estates, from the recent repairs of tanks or other causes, are known to be susceptible of improvement, the reduction is small, viz. from 11 to 16 per cent.; but when " an estate is known to be fully cultivated, and to be capable of little or no improvement, " the deduction is greater, viz. from 20 to 25 per cent."

In the preceding statement, the gross collections constitute what may be termed in other countries the net produce of lands, or that portion which farmers or cultivators would be enabled to pay as net rent to their landlords. Of this net produce or rent, landlords, under the Permanent Settlement at Madras (with the exception, as above observed, of some few hereditary zemindars) are only allowed, it would seem, to retain from about one to two and a half-tenths, whilst the remainder, or from about nine to seven and a half-tenths, of that produce or rent, constitutes the Government tax.

In Bengal the Government tax is stated to have been originally calculated at ten-elevenths of the expected rents of estates,‡ leaving of course to the proprietors of such estates only one-eleventh. What pity these rates of division were not, in the first instance, reversed!

The principle of a tax of half-produce seems to have been in force in Bengal previous to the introduction of the Permanent Settlement. It is in fact the assumed basis of all our Indian land taxes; but even here, as elsewhere, the division of produce is stated to vary, and the cultivators to have been responsible for the payment, in some places, of one-half; in others, a fourth, two-fifths, &c.

Even

* " En effet quel danger peut-il y avoir d'agiter " et de discuter les matières économiques sous un " Gouvernement qui ne désire que le plus grand " bien? Que pourroit-on redouter de ces disputes " entre citoyens, et qu'en peut-il arriver qui ne " soit infiniment avantageux?"
Physiocratie, vol. 4. p. 45.

† " Paddy land is here taken, but all money " rents are founded on the right of Government " to a share in the produce. The share of Govern- " ment is less on dry grain than on wet grain, some- " times not more than 25 or 30."

† Some consideration having been allowed for their former manners and state.

‡ Vide Remarks on the Husbandry, &c. of Bengal, printed in Calcutta, 1804; re-printed in England, 1806.

No. 3. Further Remarks (7 July 1808) by Mr. Rickards, on Taxation and Revenue.

Even this variation is a proof that an actual half cannot be universally collected; and it also proves the inapplicability of a fixed rate of tax to a produce of indefinite diversity, independent of the other objections against it here intended to be advanced.

Whatever may be the actual local rates however of collection in different districts, arising out of the above-mentioned established principle, it is evident, and more especially from personal observation of the effect, that the land tax, added to the extortions of those who collect it, is universally exorbitant, and that the situation of the real cultivators is universally that of poverty and distress.* The division of produce leaves him a bare maintenance, Government absorbs the rest. It is consequently evident that no wealthy proprietors can, under such a system, arise out of the agricultural branch of the society; and that even commerce cannot open a very extensive field either to the acquisition or employment of capital, where the far major part of the population are wretchedly poor. It is in a few favoured or eligible spots only that commerce is accordingly found to prosper; the demand it has to supply being limited, its capital and the local employment thereof must be limited also; and it is still more injuriously restricted by the effectual exclusion of all its surplus from investiture in agricultural pursuits.

Encouragement to commerce, that is, a certain degree of freedom from restraint, and from heavy taxation, has therefore produced in India a partial and local accumulation of wealth, perhaps equally or nearly so, to what the impoverished state of the community at large is capable of yielding or supporting; but the possessors of it are comparatively few, in proportion to the very great population of which they are members; and the fatal obstruction to its employment in the purchase or improvement of land, presents us with the curious phenomenon of rich commercial towns situated in territory little better than a wilderness, or in a deplorable and wretched state of cultivation. The transition from the limits of mercantile wealth to the dreary bounds of agricultural poverty, is immediate, since the surplus wealth thus acquired is either hoarded, and therefore useless from want of expenditure, or it is less beneficially employed than the natural propensities of its possessors, and the best interests of society would naturally dictate.†

From what then can this proceed, but from our destructive system of heavy land taxation? Man naturally covets the possession of land, it is an innate principle which all the habits and wants of civilized life tend to strengthen and confirm; but in countries where half the produce of the soil is rated as the Government's share, there would seem to be no room for proprietors, rich or poor, either to enter or to arise; they are positively excluded by the operation of the tax, and of the tax alone Government itself takes the place of the class of proprietors, and by this impolitic act of power, supersedes all the benefits which they alone are

* In the work already quoted, the recompense of a cultivator, at half-produce, is stated to be positively worse than that of a common labourer in the cultivator's field at 2 annas per diem. Page 102.—The remarks throughout this work on the rates of taxation and division of produce, are very interesting and appropriate.

An accurate view of an Indian System of Revenue, is also given in the first part of Reg. I. 1808, of this Government; which, in addition to the division of half-produce, and other levies made by the Portuguese landlords from their tenants, sums up the aggregate of Mahratta taxes in the following words: "So that on the whole there were added by the Mahrattas to the former imposts (meaning the levies of the Portuguese landlords from their tenants) forty-six in money and twenty four in grain, several of which stand hereafter more particularly noticed;" and in a subsequent section these numerous levies are stated "unitedly to exceed in number 100 distinct heads of taxation," and mostly laid on the direct produce of land. The bare contemplation of this enormous list of taxes, is sufficient to account for the present deplorable state of Salsette, in despite of the better system introduced ten years ago by the present Government, and which was certainly a great and decided improvement of the Mahratta course of administration. In respect therefore to this island, whenever mentioned, I hope never to be understood as meaning to arraign the late measures adopted for its improvement; the principle of Mr. Camac's plan is good, and its effects, no doubt, must have been slowly and partially beneficial: all I would say in this respect, is what is now self-evident, that there has not yet been sufficient encouragement held out to draw to Salsette the overflowing surplus of the commercial wealth of Bombay, and I selected this spot for the experiment proposed to effect it in my former essay, from the advantage of its situation, and the opportunity it would afford to Government of personally witnessing its effects. The anticipated objects of the experiment, it will be remembered, are briefly these:—Permanency of tenure with removal of tax from the land, and its gradual diminution; consequent encouragement and success to agricultural pursuits—consequently the multiplication of wealth—consequently the improvement of our fiscal resources, and without the least risk of intermediate loss; a reduction of native establishments, the practicability of which is no longer speculative, but proved by actual experience: whence, not only immediate saving of expense, but a blessing to the inhabitants, as great perhaps as the reduction or removal of the consolidated heavy land tax. In short, the plan suggested, may be said to be rather an experimental improvement than a change of the system now in force: the same principles are recurred to as in 1798, only with greater encouragement to the employment and expenditure of wealth; all therefore that is proposed, according to the remarks thereon of a learned and distinguished critic, is only a larger dose of the same medicine, and which the patient may perhaps now be admitted to require. I am even authorized to add, that on the terms of the proposed plan, several natives of the first wealth and respectability in the settlement would immediately take waste lands on Salsette, and employ capital in their improvement. Might not this therefore be the best and most likely method of promoting the Court of Directors views in respect to the cultivation of hemp?

† Vide Appendix (A.) where the checks to commerce and manufactures, as supposed to arise out of our revenue system, are discussed more in detail than could conveniently be comprized within the limits of a note.

No. 3. Further Remarks (7 July 1808) by Mr. Rickards, on Taxation and Revenue.

are capable of distributing through the other ranks of life, and even cuts short the improvement of its own resources; since the revenue of the state must be necessarily limited by the wealth of its subjects; and taxation, under a system of confirmed poverty, be ever incapable of increase.

Although the principle of a tax at half-produce be very general in India, it may be difficult to state when and where it had its origin. It may, however, confidently be asserted, that it arose out of some violent overthrow of the natural order of societies, and is decidedly foreign to the ancient institutions of the Hindoos, under which, India is supposed to have long flourished; for, first, the erection of a class of landed proprietors, is according to the free course of nature's laws, as certain and evident a consequence of the cultivation of land, as the production of a plant from its seed. The more fortunate, the more strong, or the more industrious among the first cultivators, who were the first proprietors of the earth, would soon extend their possessions beyond their own individual means of tillage. Cultivation by tenantry would ensue; and land proprietors, properly so called, being thus established, would, in the ordinary progress of civilized society and population, naturally become more numerous, more extensive, and more wealthy. That these proprietors formerly existed, and perhaps universally in India, there cannot be the least doubt, it is equally certain that they must cease to exist where the ruling power would absorb all the produce of the soil beyond a bare maintenance to the wretched cultivators. That existence therefore must have been crushed at some later period, and landed proprietors swept away by the torrent of violence, from those countries where this principle of taxation was first enforced.*

Secondly, We are informed that the Mahabharata authorizes "the prince to levy a fifth "of the produce of mines, and a tenth of the corn." Menue and other legislators "authorize "the sovereign to exact a sixth, an eighth, or a twelfth of the grain, according to circum-"stances; and a sixth part of the clear annual increase of the trees†." The Institutes of Akber record, that former monarchies of Hindoostan exacted the sixth part of the produce of lands.‡ Under Akber the revenue was settled at a third of the average produce of lands; and in Mr. Grant's Observations on the Revenues of Bengal, the assessment is said to have been limited not to exceed in the whole a fourth of the actual produce of the soil.

In Malabar, we have the authority of the printed Report of the first Commissioners, a work distinguished for its useful and accurate information, to be assured that no land revenue was collected by its ancient princes;§ and that when expensive preparations become

* We have some pretty clear indications of this being the case in the history of the conduct of Hyder Ally and Tippoo Sultaun, towards the Poligars of Mysore and the Landholders of Bednore. (Vide Major Wilke's printed Report on Mysore, Fort William, 4th May 1805.)

† Husbandry, Bengal, page 61.

‡ Vide vol. 1. page 347.—The whole Section here referred to, "of tribute and taxes," is very interesting, and applicable to the present question: it states the rates in Tuckey, Iuran, and Iran, to be a sixth or fifth and a tenth of the produce, and gives a detailed account of the Akberian rates of collection from different descriptions of land. The subjoined account, taken from ancient Hindoo works of great repute, was furnished by a pundit in Bombay.

Translate of the coinscient of the twenty-fifth stanza, in section sixty-eight of the chapter Shantee Purua, a division of Mahabharat, written by Kiâs, which treats on the state policy, and wherein Bheestna tells Rajah Dhuram how much tribute a rajah should collect from his subjects. "One-sixth part of whatever the subjects will pro-"duce from their land, and the same to be applied "for their maintenance. Then whence shall the "rajah get money for his expenses?—I observe, "he is to receive one-sixth of the produce of land "from his subjects, after measuring the grains, "and no more; to levy fines on the offenders as "well as on those that become variously vicious, "and annoy others, or to conquer the kingdoms of "others by his own valour and thus gain wealth: "also, to collect customs from the merchants on "goods they import by ships, or on bullocks. "Through all these means he shall raise funds, "thereby to defray his charges and to protect his "subjects—not to become indolent himself in pur-"suing all these measures. The subjects also, with "willingness, are to pay the rajah's cess.

Nulcunt Bhat, son of Narayan Bhat, an author of a book, intituled, "Mayookh Darmashatra," or "Religious Institutions," in which he treats on the subject of policy, observes, "that the rajah "should show pride, and be compassionate, and "receive from his subjects, from year to year, one-"sixth part of the produce, and protect them: if "this be neglected, he shall be liable to share half "of whatever sins they may commit, because he "receives tribute from them."—Translate of the paraphrase of a stanza, the author called as inserted in the first chapter of a book written by him, intituled, "Raja Wounee (literally meaning, "Offspring of Maghoo)." "The rajah, for the "purpose of doing good to his subjects, shall collect "from them one-sixth of the produce." The author adds the following simily: "That the sun attracts "water, and pours down seasonably, a thousand "times more than the attracted quantity as the "people on the earth want; so the rajah, having "received a sixth part of the produce, ought to "expend a thousand times as much for the defence "of his subjects." Orig.

§ It is remarkable, that the practice of the Malabarians has in this respect a striking coincidence with a Jewish ordinance. The Malabar rajahs have from time immemorial possessed landed estates, from which to support the princely dignity; and, as noticed in the text, exacted no land tax from their subjects. In the divine commands, through Ezekiel, to the Jews, on their prophesied restoration to the land of their fathers, we find the following injunctions in respect to their princes, chap. xlv. verses 7 & 8: "And a portion (of the land) shall be for the "prince, &c. &c." (describing its situation and extent.)

"In the land shall be his possession in Israel: "and my princes shall no more oppress my "people; and the rest of the land shall they give to "the house of Israel according to their tribes."

Chap:

No. 3. Further Remarks (7 July 1808) by Mr. Rickards, on Taxation and Revenue.

come necessary against apprehended invasion, they only exacted from the landholders a fifth of their produce. This information is the more valuable, as the aboriginal laws and customs of the Malabarians seem to have been preserved unimpaired from time immemorial, down to the subversion of their principalities and government in 1766, by the power of Hyder Ally, and must have had some reference at least to the established usages of surrounding countries.*

In Guzerat it is also ascertained that no such principle was in general force, up to the period of the Mahomedan Conquest; and that even after the introduction of the Mussulman power, the Grassia landholders successfully resisted, as they do to this day, the payment of any such tax; and,

In Salsette, authentic records are still extant to prove, that it was neither adopted by the Portuguese Government. A statement now in my possession, procured from the records at Goa, exhibits the whole of the land revenue derived from the island by that government as amounting only to 20,000 purdaws, or about 10,000 rupees per annum; whilst the lands were given up in undisturbed and undivided possession to individual proprietors, who thus became numerous, respectable, and wealthy.

If therefore the principle here discussed, shall be neither found to be sanctioned by the old legal institutions of the country, or by the natural established order of societies; and if violence, or the effects of despotic power, be its probable origin; it will I hope be allowed no claim to the privilege of being perpetuated in the civil institutions of a just and moderate government, merely because preceding conquerors had enforced it. Precedent, prejudice or prescription, the common motives of human actions, may very properly sanction in established practice what is right; may even justify what is indifferent, but can never excuse what a candid examination at the shrine of reason would prove to be decidedly wrong. Unconsciousness of evil may indeed be some excuse for errors from precedent; but to err with our eyes open is an unjustifiable aggravation of injury †.

That the principle of a tax of half-produce owes its origin to violence, to conquest, or the more gradual oppressive exercise of despotic power, is rendered still further probable from the circumstance of our having several traces of the division of half-produce being the rate adopted between landed proprietors and their tenantry or cultivators: we know it existed on Salsette, during the time of the Portuguese; it still appears to obtain in the Bengal provinces under the Permanent Settlement; it is probable therefore the principle may have been formerly more general; and on the annihilation, or expulsion of proprietors, it would be but natural for the despot who took their place, to appropriate also to himself their share in the produce of the soil. This was actually the case on Salsette, when the Mahrattas took the island from the Portuguese. The conquerors adopting the principle of a tax at half-produce (which was before this the landholders share only, not that of the displaced Government) the class of proprietors soon disappeared, and in Malabar (independent of the violent expulsion of the whole class of landholders by the Mahomedan power) many instances came within my own personal knowledge, of landed proprietors, after their return under our Government, abandoning their estates to their farmers, desiring them to be responsible for the required revenue, in consequence of our local officers having been enabled partially to enforce the same tax.

But the rate of division between proprietors and their tenants, is a very fallacious ground of assumption in behalf of a Government tax, since the rent of an estate paid to a landlord, and a land revenue paid to a government, are entirely and essentially different both in their nature and effects; for,

First, Every contribution to a government is a gratuitous payment, whence the contributors of a tax give so much of their money for nothing; the payment of revenue therefore is in the first instance a dead loss to the contributors.

But

Chap. xlvi. v. 18. "Moreover the prince shall "not take of the people's inheritance by oppres- "sion, to thrust them out of their possession; but "he shall give his sons inheritance out of his own "possession: that my people be not scattered every "man from his possession."

It would seem from this latter verse, too, that the prophet clearly foresaw both the advantage and absolute necessity of restricting the prince and his posterity to their own prescribed inheritance, lest the scattering of the people from their possessions, should be, as he well knew, the infallible consequence of the sovereign becoming general or universal proprietor of the soil; and as is so clearly exemplified in most of the modern Governments of India.

* In Travancore, Canara, Coorg, Bednore and Bullum, we have at this day recorded knowledge of the existence of the same individual right of property in the soil, as in Malabar; and probably the same usage formerly prevailed in respect to taxation, though there is always this difference between the two; viz. that the right of property is more likely to be permanent, being only tangible under great revolutions, whereas the rates of taxation may be ever varying, according to the necessities of the prince.

† "Il y a des préjuges" (says the eulogist of Descartes, in allusion to this very subject, the then rising science of physiocracy) "non moins puissans "qu'universels, et il y a des coutumes et des "opinions funestes, et qui n'ont cessé de paroître "telles que par l'empire d'habitude. Les hommes "réfléchissent si peu, qu'un mal qui se fait depuis "cent ans leurs paroît presque un bien."

No. 3. Further Remarks (7 July 1808) by Mr. Rickards, on Taxation and Revenue.

But the payment of rent is a contribution for actual value received, it is the return in value for the use or loan of a valuable property; or it is the interest of a capital sum either paid in the original purchase, or subsequent improvement of an estate, and which sum has been actually sent abroad, or distributed in promoting the comfort, the industry, and the wealth of the society at large.

Secondly, The aggregate amount of revenue is chiefly divided into small stipends or salaries, the expenditure of which has very little influence on the industry, and consequently on the comforts and wealth of the society. Of those deriving large salaries, from which they still only accumulate fortunes in a long series of years: few or none remain to expend them in this country.

But the aggregate amount of rent contributes immediately to the elevation of a class of wealthy proprietors in the state, whose expenditure, as has been already repeatedly shown, is the only natural means of stimulating general industry, and of promoting the general wealth and comforts of the society.

Thirdly, The amount of revenue is often expended on purposes foreign to the promotion of industry, and at a distance from the place of its collection; not unfrequently, in foreign and even inimical countries.

But the rent of resident landed proprietors is always expended in the promotion of individual and domestic industry, and chiefly on the spot.

Fourthly, Proprietors and their tenantry are left to a reciprocal view of their own interests in arranging their respective terms of tenure. In the natural order of things, both the one and the other would of necessity be equally consulted.

But the division of produce between a Government and its cultivators, must as necessarily be almost always arbitrary; whence we find the interests of one party only considered, and those of the other almost wholly neglected.

Fifthly, The local experience of resident landed proprietors, and their own private interests, naturally suggest the most advisable measures for improving the produce of their estates, which is most effectually accomplished by improving the condition and resources of their farmers; and the natural impulses of humanity establish an intercourse of kindness and assistance between a lord and his dependants, which the latter can never experience or expect from personal intercourse with a government. Its local officers have no interest in local improvements, but a manifest one in local exactions for their own benefit: in the first case, the interest of the proprietors and tenant are co-operative to the same useful end, and the public good is promoted; in the latter case, the interests of the local officer and tenant are decidedly at variance, and the public good is effectually frustrated.

In short, it would seem to be impossible for a government in any way to occupy lands to any useful end; both the possession and the cultivation of the soil is the exclusive business of subjects, and should be surrendered to them, unrestrained interference on the part of the prince, is an infringement on their rights, their privileges, and their duties: in India it has even extinguished a class in the order of society, without which no society can materially improve*: it is foreign to the object of protection; a clear violation of the order of nature; and we need be no longer surprised at its militating no less against individual prosperity, than against the amelioration, when required, of the resources of the state.

Under the Permanent Settlement (I speak with deference to the distinguished and acknowledged abilities of its authors,) the case does not appear to me to be much altered; the lands are divided into private estates, and of the former gross collections, or of the Government's share of produce, an eleventh, a tenth, or some other minute portion, is either given up, or sold to a proprietor: on this principle no proprietor can be rich, without possessing an estate equal to a principality in extent. Those who have estates only suited to their own capacity of superintendence and controul, must still be poor, and poor proprietors can neither improve present cultivation or extend it to the waste lands of their estates, the more especially if the demand for produce be already fully supplied. The miserable modicum of a proprietor's share, will naturally drive him to seek the improvement of his own circumstances, by trenching on the portion or rights of his helpless cultivators; the proprietor may often be a harsher task-master to his tenant than even the local officer of Government; his object will be to gain the utmost farthing from his estates, that of the tenant to oppose it: there can here be no communion of interest, or any thing better than the cunning of weakness struggling against avarice and power; and instead of that confidence and mutual assistance, which a satisfied dependence on each other would inspire, we may too often find nothing but distrust, aversion, and hate.

That this is the case in districts where the Permanent Settlement has been introduced, I have seen vouchers of unquestionable authority to prove. The barramahl, for example, is represented to be in this state. In Bengal the same effects are also stated to be experienced. The land-holders paying ten-elevenths of the rent of estates to Government, rack-rent their lands to tenants, to the great injury of agriculture, and ultimately indeed of themselves; and that this is owing to the heavy land tax, can hardly be doubted, when we are informed by the same valuable author, that the tenantry of the "free lands, in the same provinces, are considerably better off.†"

* "En épuisant les riches vous affamez les "pauvres, que les riches seuls font vivre."
Phil. Rur. vol. 1. page 321.

† Vide work already quoted, chapters iv. & v.

That

No. 3. Further Remarks (7 July 1808.) by Mr Rickards, on Taxation and Revenue.

That Bengal may be in a state of slow progressive improvement, is very probable, and the respectable authorities from which this assertion has often proceeded, leave no room to doubt the fact; but it may be more difficult to admit the Permanent Settlement, on its present footing, as the efficient cause. The long-continued tranquillity of the Bengal provinces, their great fertility, the general security to property, and, in some cases, the freedom of its employment; a moderately taxed commerce; and though last, not least, the great extent of free lands in Bengal, said to be one-eighth of the whole cultivated area,* and the wealth thence produced; are all sources of energy that would lead to partial good, in despite of the restraints and obstructions arising out of a heavy consolidated land tax. But that the prosperity above admitted, is at all owing to the introduction of a permanent tax, averaging 10-11ths of the rent of estates, is utterly inconceivable to me.†

Indeed the reverse, from personal observation and experience in the revenue affairs of this country, is the impression of my mind; and it is the conscientious conviction thereof, and no other motive, that leads me to covet the present discussion. Under the heavy land taxes now in force, I repeat it to be impossible, in my humble opinion, for wealthy proprietors ever to arise in sufficient numbers to constitute a source of general prosperity. The system not only extinguishes one necessary class in society, but materially affects the condition of the other cultivators, who, reduced to a bare maintenance, are deprived of every spark of enterprize. Poverty, without a prospect of relief; bad husbandry, without the possibility of improvement‡; are the natural consequences. Tenants disheartened and depressed, yet prompted by necessity to the cultivation of the soil, naturally content themselves with portions of land sufficient, after the discharge of rent or revenue, for their own and families support: hence the origin of small farms, or tenures, and the deplorable subdivision of lands amongst a wretched inefficient population, to whom increase of numbers is only increase of misery. Here we may also see equality of condition exemplified, as perhaps it only can be, in equal poverty; a people of few wants, and those nearly supplied to each individual by his own exertions; of little use, and therefore as little dependent on each other; a poor and languid internal commerce, few comforts, little satisfaction, indifference to life itself, and no attachment to the Government, under which the far greater part may be said to drag on an approximation even to brutal existence.

Whatever may have contributed to this complication of evil, Government has at all events the power to remove it. It would be erroneous to say, that the natural indolence of the people is the cause of their degradation, for we have ample proofs, especially in the free commercial towns, that this imputed degree of indolence is not characteristic of their nature. If they are habitually idle, drunken, lying and deceitful, these qualities, it should be

* Vide same work, page 17.

† The numerous advertisements contained in the Calcutta Gazette, of estates to be sold to discharge revenue demands, cannot be deemed a proof of the prosperous progress of the Permanent Settlement, however much Bengal may be admitted to prosper in other respects.

According to the elements of the French economists, a "Nation Agricole," as Bengal certainly is, of 120 million arpens (Bengal, including Benares, contains, I apprehend, about 105 million acres) and containing 30 millions of inhabitants, as Bengal is supposed to do, ought, in a state of prosperity, to yield a gross produce (at 24 livres per pound sterling) of £. 265,300,000, of which £. 83,333,330 would be product net, or the net rent of landed proprietors and two-sevenths of the latter sum, or £. 23,809,524, would be the public revenue.

Whether Bengal, under the present system, is in a fair way of reaching this possibly attainable degree of prosperity (for the calculations of the economists have been too much respected for the last 50 years, to be now deemed altogether visionary,) those who are best acquainted with its local means, will best judge. In the work already so often quoted (vide, pp. 24, 25) the gross produce of lands in Bengal is estimated at Rs. 329,130,000, whether siccas or current is not mentioned; if the former, at 2*s.* 6*d.* we have £. 41,141,250 sterling; and if the latter, £. 32,913,000 only, as the gross produce of what is always represented as one of the finest countries on earth. The revenues of the same territory are, I believe, about eight million. According to these data, the gross produce of Bengal, supposing it at thirty-two millions sterling, is not one-eighth part, and the revenues about one-third of the sums calculated upon by the economists.

What is still more remarkable is, that on these data, the whole annual gross produce of the lands in Bengal, does not equal even the annual revenue of Great Britain, a tract not half the size of the former; inferior in natural fertility, and not containing probably more than one half of its population.

‡ There is no principle better established, than that agriculture is most effectually improved and promoted, both as to quantity and species of produce, by means of enterprizing farmers possessing adequate capitals of their own; of men in short capable of making those primitive and annual advances, according to the language of the economists, which a perfect cultivation necessarily requires. The vast observable difference between the cultivation of rich farmers, and that of the wretched metaying system in Europe, has been so often elucidated, as to require no other notice here, than merely to bring to recollection, that the system of India bears a resemblance to the latter, as before noticed; and that the similitude holds among other points, in the annual advances required to be made to the poor metayers and cultivators, who are often in this country alike unable to cultivate without them. In some districts, these advances are made by money-lenders, and are of a most ruinous description; cultivators have been known to borrow money for the season at 30 and 40 per cent. to be paid principal and interest out of the coming crop. The tuckavy advances of Government, to be returned with common interest, is another species, and proves likewise the want of adequate means to cultivate with due effect. The state of our cultivated lands exhibits in consequence, very generally, but a poor and imperfect husbandry, which cannot be expected to be improved under systems thus tending to confirm the poverty of the cultivating class.

No. 3. Further Remarks (7 July 1808) by Mr. Rickards, on Taxation and Revenue.

be remembered, are the peculiar vices of poverty, the natural consequence of helpless debility reduced to the daily necessity of opposing fraud and cunning to the unjust and unreasonable extortions of power. In morals as in physics, there is no effect without an adequate cause; and we have no authority from reason, from experience, or the history of the human mind, to ascribe vices, the apparent consequence of a vicious system, to innate and irremediable depravity. From contemplation of the Indian character, particularly that of the Hindoos, there is on the contrary every reason to anticipate their moral improvement, with the improvement of their physical situation, and the refinements both in manners and education, which this happy change would superinduce; but the first step towards this improvement must be taken by Government itself. Let the field of industry be thrown open to all: let the sovereign withdraw from all interference in the rights, or participation in the proper functions of his subjects, and patiently await the acquired wealth of the latter, ere he attempts to enrich himself: let him revert to the original dignity of his intended office, which consists more in protection than interference; and in estimating the nature and duties of his tutelary authority, let him remember, that the children of his care require no other protection than the security of their rights and properties, no other encouragement than the utmost possible freedom; and that the surest road to universal prosperity, is the most unrestrained course of nature's laws.

" La justice divine qui reprouve les mechans, n'a accordé qu'une autorité tulelaire aux " puissances qui gouvernent les nations. Si elles sortent des bornes et du resort de leur " institution, elles violent l'ordre naturel de la loi suprême, et ne sont plus que les " instrumens du disastre general et de leur propre dommage, toujours englobé dans le " dommage public."—(Phil. Rurale, Vol. 2. p. 106.)

Bombay, 7 July 1808. (Signed) R. Rickards.

Appendix (A.)

From the following view of the internal commerce of Bengal, an accurate judgment may be formed of its nature and extent in other parts of India:—" The languid state of internal " commerce, inferred from the circumstances above mentioned, is confirmed by the review " of the commodities which it exchanges, and by the estimate of their amount. The " exportation of grain from ear districts, and the return of salt, constitute the principle " object of this trade. The importation of cotton from the western provinces, and the " exchange of tobacco for butternut, together with some sugar, and a few articles of less " note, complete the supply of internal consumption. Manufactures are almost limited " to the wants of their immediate neighbourhoods, excluding from this consideration the " provision of the public investment, and the calls of foreign trade; piece-goods, silk, " saltpetre, opium, sugar and indigo, pass almost wholly through the Company's hands, " excepting only what foreign commerce, and the traffics of various ports in India, export " of such among these articles as the Company do not monopolize." (Remarks on Husbandry and Corn.—Bengal, page 168.) In a subsequent paragraph, this commerce is estimated at about 8 or 10 million per annum, we may add million for the external commerce, and this constitutes the state of productions and of wants of about 27 or perhaps 30 million of people, in avowedly the richest provinces of the British dominions in India.

It might lead to very useful results to compare these amounts with the estimated value of English commerce and produce, and more in detail than I have the means at present of accomplishing. One record states the value of exports and imports of Great Britain, in 1802, at about 79 millions; another record values the annual produce of the lands (which may give some idea of the value of the internal commerce of the country) at 70 millions. In India the annual revenue collected from at least 50 millions of subjects, is about 14 millions sterling; whilst in England the annual and permanent taxes of 1804, raised from 14 or 16 millions of people at the utmost, yielded upwards of 33 millions sterling. Even this imperfect picture exhibits a striking difference between a poor people of overgrown numbers and fettered industry, and an efficient population far less comparatively numerous, enjoying freedom of exertion, though still not altogether unobstructed in the course of nature's laws.

In viewing the progressive political state of both countries, the contrast is equally striking. The History of Great Britain, from the Revolution to the present day, exhibits a nation advancing in efficient population, in commerce, in agriculture, in arts, in science, and in the accumulation of vast wealth, in despite of the bloody and expensive wars of King William, Queen Anne, and the Georges, and in opposition to a heavy load of public debt, increasing in each reign with the national resources, till in our own times, exceeding 600 millions: it still leaves Great Britain the richest country of the same extent on earth, a population nearly doubled, and a revenue raised from 2 millions in the reign of King James, to more than 16 times that amount in present times, as the following Statement will evince:

STATEMENT.

	Value of Exports.		Revenue.		National Debt.
	£.		£.		£.
In - - - - - 1669 - - - - -	2,043,043.	King James II. Income up to 1688 -	2,061,856.	King Wm. borrowed -	44,100,795
Revolution - 1688 - - - -	4,086,087.	In - 1691 - -	4,249,759.	Repaid - - - - -	34,034,018
Last year of William III. 1760-1-2 -	6,045,432.	Average of King William's Income -	4,415,360.	Remained in 1702 - -	10,066,777
Wars of Queen Anne, 1709, 1712 -	6,868,840.	In 1707 - - - -	- - -	In 1711 first funded -	9,471,325
First of George I. 1713, 1714, 1715 -	7,696,573.	In 1708 - - - -	5,272,758.	On 31st Dec. 1714 -	50,644,306
First of George II. 1726, 1727, 1728 -	7,891,739.	In 1709 - - - -
Peaceful years, - 1736, 1737, 1738 -	9,993,023.	In 1710 - - - -	- - -	In 1728 - - - - -	51,028,431
War of - 1739-1740-1741 - -	8,870,499.	- - - - - - -	-	In 1738 - - - - -	46,661,767
Peace - 1749-1750-1751 - -	12,599,112.	- - - - - - -	-	In 1749 - - - - -	74,221,686
War of - 1755-1756-1757 - -	12,371,916.	- - - - - - -
First of George III. 1760 - - -	15,781,175.	- - - - - - -	-	In 1762 - - - - -	146,682,844

In 1783-4, the whole Revenue paid

- - - - - 1770 - - - - -	15,996,569.	Into the Exchequer	12,995,519.	In 1775 - - - - -	135,943,051
War - - - 1780 - - - - -	12,624,372.	1785-6, D° - D° -	15,397,471.	In 1783 - - - - -	212,302,429

1792, Net Produce of Annual

- - - - - 1790 - - - - -	20,126,120.	and Permanent Taxes about	17,000,000.	In 1793 - - - - -	227,989,148
- - - - - 1800 - - - - -	43,152,619.	1800 - D° - D° -	25,000,000.	In 1801 - - - - -	400,709,832
- - - - - 1802 - - - - -	48,500,663.	1803 - D° - D° -	31,000,000.
		1804 - D° - D° -	33,000,000.	In 1804 - - - - -	484,162,622
				In 1807 - - - - -	640,750,000

Whole Value of the Kingdom, according to Gregory King, in 1688 - - - - - - -	£. 650,000,000.	Estimate Value of the Capital of the Kingdom in 1804 - - - - - -	£. 1,200,000,000.
Yearly Income of the Nation - D° - D° -	43,500,000.	Mr. Pitt's Estimate of the Annual Income of Great Britain - - - -	102,000,000.
Population, according to - - D° - D° - in 1696 - - - - - -	Souls 5,500,000.	Latest Enumerations - - -	Souls 9,300,000.

The preceding Statement is compiled from various records, but chiefly Chalmer's Estimate. In the intervening years, which I have not given, it is both curious and satisfactory to remark; that whenever wars occurred to depress the exports of the kingdom, they invariably rose on the return of peace, to an amount exceeding that of former prosperous years, a fact that may be admitted to prove that the sources of prosperity pervaded every branch of industry, agriculture, manufactures and commerce, which thus rebounded, after every pressure, with redoubled strength of spring into fresh and increased vigour. Mr. Chalmer's Chronological Table of Exports is of itself an interesting and instructive document, not only from the striking contrast which it exhibits of the opposite effects of war and peace on national prosperity, but from showing also, when compared with the principles of national government, what incalculable wealth and strength are capable of attainment by a people of free exertions and pursuits, of free and unrestrained industry.

In India the scene is different, and the result less brilliant; a series of wars, far less expensive than an European contest, leaves nothing to the boast of pride beyond a dangerous, if not ruinous extent of overgrown dominion. In provinces long possessed, or subsequently acquired, no material improvement is observed of any thing deemed advantageous in civil polity; and no increase of resources, except what may be said to result from extended conquest: but increased revenues, still alarmingly short of that indispensable expenditure which conquest never fails to entail, can neither be esteemed a public or a private benefit; and a debt of 30 millions only, threatening the Government of at least 50 millions of people with irretrievable ruin, is certainly a proof of want of due encouragement, in other words, of sufficient freedom, to industrious pursuits; a proof that the land and labour of our Indian possessions have not been rendered so productive as those of the mother state at any given period here adverted to, and that the fault is not ascribable to nature, since our population is comparatively more numerous, and the fertility of our lands not to be exceeded by any other equal extent of the habitable globe. It is therefore inferable, though we have possessed extensive provinces for half a century, that a new era in India yet remains to be commenced, in which, as Judge Blackstone pronounces of the epoch of the Revolution, "prerogative and liberty may be better defined, the principles of "Government more thoroughly examined and understood, and the rights of subjects more "explicitly guarded by legal provisions." (vol. 1. page 213.)

No. 3. Further Remarks (7 July 1808), by Mr. Rickards, on Taxation and Revenue.

So true also is the remark of another celebrated author, that "by means of industry, the "heaviest burthens seem light; by the influence of sloth, the slightest duty appears "intolerable."

But if commerce, according to the economists, is nothing more than an exchange of the productions, natural or manufactured, of the earth, how can it be extensive when these productions are limited? Or, considering commerce to be regulated, as it really is, by the state of human wants, what internal commerce can there be amongst a people who have scarcely any wants at all? An agricultural population, paying a tax of half-produce, will dispose of their annual surplus to realize funds for payment of their revenue; the remainder, affording them a bare maintenance, requires but little aid from internal commerce, for being fed from their own cultivation, they have but little, very little left to exchange. This is evidently a state of very limited wants, in which commerce can hardly be expected to thrive.

The surplus produce, however, of cultivation, wherever it exists, constitutes wealth, and that wealth is yearly renewed; the question at issue, then, is, whether it be most for the public good, that this wealth should immediately pass into the hands of rich proprietors, or be distributed among the poor stipendiaries of a still poorer Government, overwhelmed with difficulty and debt. In the first case, it is evidently capable of incalculable increase, of incalculable improvement of the public revenue, and of incalculable advantages to the community at large, from its universal distribution and expenditure. But in the latter case, the wealth that is produced passes in its expenditure through various less useful and less productive channels, and is accumulated in certain proportions into the hands of commercial agents, where the aggregate amount, though it will continue to circulate and enrich various individuals, seems incapable of useful increase or advantageous distribution, with regard to India, and for these reasons; viz. because that class in the society through whom alone productions and consumption can be most effectually increased, is utterly extinct; much, probably the major part of the surplus wealth accumulated in commerce, quits the country never to return; and even the channel to the increase of productions, by means of that which remains, is obstructed.

Indeed, under the peculiar system here discussed, it is even probable that if the exported surplus were, from other circumstances, compelled to remain in India, it would absolutely stagnate from wanting means of lucrative employment; in other words, that it would be very difficult, if not impossible, to find employment, under the present state of things in India, for all the capital which a profitable external trade is capable of accumulating; and as this one fact, if true, may tend to elucidate more fully the various checks to progressive improvement, which are conceived to be in existence and in force, a little further digression on the subject may not be misplaced.

Doctor Smith has observed, that the principal improvements of agriculture, in all the modern states of Europe, though contrary to the natural order of things, owe their birth to the surplus accumulations of merchants, manufacturers, &c.; and the same effects, it may be inferred, ought to be produced in this country, from the similar overflowings of commercial gain; but there is this wide difference between the commercial and political state of Europe and India, separately considered. In Europe, the course intimated by Doctor Smith, is perfectly correct and clear, for, as he himself observes, "in all the great countries of "Europe, much good land still remains uncultivated, and the greater part of what is cul-"tivated, is far from being improved to the degree of which it is capable. Agriculture "therefore is almost every where capable of absorbing a much greater capital than has "ever yet been employed in it." As the policy of Europe does not, moreover, positively obstruct such employment, it follows that there has ever been a channel open for all, and even more than all the surplus capital of European commerce, to force the increase or improvement of agriculture. All the countries of Europe can boast a class more or less numerous of wealthy landed proprietors; they have all been more or less in a state of progressive improvement, the demand for labour has consequently increased, consequently efficient population, consequently consumption, consequently productions, consequently commerce and commercial capital. The freest and most industrious commercial nations (England and Holland for example) have been the greatest accumulators of the gradually increasing wealth thus produced either at home or abroad: their prosperity and resources have gone on to flourish, because there has been no positive obstruction to the employment of their increasing accumulations in any of the different branches of human industry; and the prosperous state of these, increasing the demand for productions, has of course forced agriculture to supply it. There has been no positive obstruction (although certainly more advantageous in some states than in others) to the direct employment of capital in agriculture itself, in which line it is admitted and proved that the same sum of capital will put in motion a greater quantity of productive labour, will add more to the annual produce of the land and labour of the society, than in any other. There has therefore been no positive obstruction to its employment in that very channel in which it is capable of promoting efficient population, consumption, productions and commerce, wealth and revenue, human wants, and the means of supplying them, in the highest possible degree.

of

No. 3. Further Remarks (7 July 1808.) by Mr. Rickards, on Taxation and Revenue.

This seems to be a clear connecting chain of causes and effects; but in India it must be kept in mind, that none of the different branches of human industry, external commerce excepted, either in our own countries or those around us, are in a state of progressive improvement, or if they are, it is so very slow as to be imperceptible; there is therefore, as far at least as regards those countries generally, no greater demand for labour in one year than in the former, therefore no increase of efficient population, or amelioration of the circumstances of that which exists, therefore no increase of consumption, therefore no increase of productions. Now if productions are not increased, commerce, which only circulates them, must in the aggregate be equally limited: it cannot circulate commodities which are not brought into being; the sum total of the capital employed in it, will therefore remain stationary also; the sum total will not increase, although the private capitals of individuals will, in those few, free, and industrious commercial towns where the productions that are annually brought into being, continue to be more and more accumulated: but in these few towns, it may be added, and must be admitted, that the demand for labour, efficient population and consumption, all increase; so far means are afforded for the employment of increased capital, and so far also may it indirectly force an increase of productions to supply extended wants, and doubtless does so: But these are very narrow limits, compared with the possible augmentation of wants throughout the whole extent and population of the territories of India; yet to these narrow limits is our increasing prosperity apparently confined, and consequently the means of employing increased capital, for the impediments to its employment beyond these bounds, would seem to be absolute, to be almost, if not wholly insuperable.

It cannot, for example, be employed in countries where the public tax absorbs all the produce of land, except what is barely necessary for the maintenance of the cultivating class: in such countries capitalists will not even attempt to force agriculture, at all events beyond the limited extent above adverted to, for they would rather bury their wealth than employ it to a loss. It is therefore evidently checked, if not wholly obstructed, in that very channel which of all others is most conducive to private and public prosperity.

They cannot employ it either in the increase of home manufactures, beyond the very limited increasing consumption of wealthy towns; the Indian demand for these manufactures being otherwise, I apprehend, as stationary as the apparent state of their annual produce and of the industry employed therein; while the European demand is supplied through other hands, and, according to the published statements of sale in Europe, is likewise stationary, or nearly so. Indeed in this branch of industry there would seem to be a deplorable want of capital every where; with clumsy wretched machinery, its commodities are almost universally supplied on advances from the immediate purchaser to the labouring manufacturers; and there cannot be a stronger proof of the poverty of the whole manufacturing class, if not of the internal traffic and population of the country generally. This too, be it remembered, is the second most advantageous channel for the employment of capital, which in India seems almost incapable of attracting any.

It has been already shown, that increased capital is unlikely to find employment in the internal trade of the country, or of the retail trade, except within the limits of the aforesaid commercial towns; for all without is stationary, and unconquerable poverty.

There only remains, then, the external commerce of the country, which is admitted to flourish partially; and if the capital accumulated therein should increase, as I apprehend it must do, beyond what is requisite to support the increasing prosperity of the few towns which engross this branch of industry, the overplus must, as before observed, either stagnate or seek employment in more distant and less fettered regions. If the obstructions to its domestic employment were removed, the same reasons which Doctor Smith gives for the capability of agriculture to absorb a much greater capital than has ever been directed to it, would apply with more force to this country than to any part of the European world; and if the agricultural channel only were but once freely opened, all the others would of themselves naturally and necessarily expand.

Should this reasoning thereof prove correct, it will satisfactorily account for a gradual increase appearing in the returns of the external commerce of Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, &c.; the result of wealth annually and locally accumulated therein; while the stationary state of our agriculture, manufactures, and internal traffic, proves the accumulation to be of little use to the community at large, from want of internal employment and expenditure, and of as little use to the state; which is still unable to relieve itself from the pressure of a comparatively trifling amount of public debt. It tends to verify another observation of the celebrated author above referred to; that capital, employed in the trade of exportation, has the least effect, of any of its aforesaid employments, in supporting productive labour, or adding to the amount of annual produce. It is peculiarly the case in this country, where the exported surplus produce of our different provinces, is not chiefly, as in European states, exchanged for other commodities more in demand: were it an exchange of commodity against commodity, it would be here, as elsewhere, beneficial in the support of productive industry to the extent of this exchange, and employ a proportionate extent of capital: but in India a very considerable proportion of this surplus, consisting principally principally of rude produce, is exchanged for money, wherewith to pay the Company's revenue; and this money, constituting for the most part a bare subsistence to a horde of poor public servants, is chiefly expended to procure the same rude produce for daily nourishment and support. So far therefore as this branch of commerce only goes to the exchange of rude produce for money, and of this money for rude produce again, it only sets in motion half as much industry (or perhaps less) as it is evidently capable of in other free countries; it gives employment only to a single, instead of a manifold capital, and exemplifies another striking check to the production of commercial wealth, and the consequent improvement of national resource, wholly ascribable to a vicious revenue system.

No. 3. Further Remarks (7 July 1808) by Mr. Rickards, on Taxation and Revenue.

Here then again is a state equally adverse with the former to the increasing prosperity of our internal affairs. Commerce, wealth, industry, agriculture and the public revenue, have a stationary limit, a barrier of most difficult, if not impracticable passage, and which plans, expedients or regulations, will in vain attempt to remedy, save only the simplest and best of all regulations,—entire freedom to every branch of individual industry, re-established at once the class of landed proprietors, effectually, not nominally; and when productions, the real riches of all countries, are thus freely called into existence by the wants of a wealthy people, and allowed at the same time the utmost liberty and facility of exchange, commerce, as the natural agent in the business of distribution and supply, will be found to require neither rules, prohibitions, or privileges, to promote its increase.

Bombay, 7th July 1808. (Signed) R. Rickards.

The Governor delivers in the following Minute, with three Accompaniments; on the subject of the Papers above recorded from Mr. Rickards.

PRESIDENT'S MINUTE.

1. The letter from Mr. Rickards, of the 24th of September last, together with that gentleman's Essay on Taxation, have lain by me thus long, chiefly because it became in consequence necessary to enquire into the progress of the settlement that had been authorized in the island of Salsette. Such have occupied during several months the short intervals of time I had to devote to that object, and which not being got through before the departure of the last ships, it was understood that the papers on this important subject, should certainly proceed to our superiors by the first ensuing dispatch, for which purpose they are now delivered in; at the same time that from the speedier departure of the present convoy than had been expected, I can by the present opportunity submit only a few general observations on those by Mr. Rickards, reserving the further remarks I may have to make respecting the means of improvement to Salsette, for the purposed departure of the Teignmouth.

2. The impression I have received in perusing Mr. Rickards's Essay on Taxation is, that it purports to apply the rules of European, to the widely different state of Indian society, such as may in many points of view be found difficult to assimilate, if not hazardous to treat of, as depending on a common principle.

3. Thus, in his 58th paragraph, this gentleman shows, that in England, from barley alone, and its modified products, a revenue was not many years since derived to the British Government, of £. 3,503,422 sterling, whereas the whole land-tax of England does not, he observes, produce annually more than about £. 1,900,000, of which no great proportion can be considered as at all referable to the produce of barley; admitting which to be the case, it does not follow that in India any like circumstances could ensure the same result, until at least the tastes and nourishment of Englishmen became those of Indians. There is no want of barley cultivation within the Company's territories, but the natives do not convert it into the products on which the excises are established in England, and the cases admit not therefore of accurate comparison, farther than to evince that the taxes noticed in the 60th paragraph cannot be, in India, carried even to the height to which this part of Mr. Rickards's argument adverts, unless the manners of the great body of the people be first entirely altered.

4. Whether or not the principle of the French economists, of laying all the taxes on the land, be, as noticed in Mr. Rickards's 61st paragraph, erroneous or otherwise, it is certainly conformable to the prevalent system in India, nor is that theory supported by the French alone, but by respectable authorities in England, who contend, that all taxes fall ultimately on the products of the soil, and that in advancing a different doctrine, the eminent author of the Wealth of Nations, is at variance with himself, inasmuch as his previous data lead to that conclusion.

5. With respect to Mr. Rickards's application of the principles in his Essay to the present state of Salsette, I refer to the printed regulation on that subject, entered on the proceedings of the 24th of February, which will show, that some alterations have intermediately taken place, particularly in the abolition of the several farms, whence exclusive of the article of moothurfa, which may perhaps still require revision, I am not aware of any remaining head of collection that presses with undue weight on the inhabitants, provided the experiment last year introduced of a new administration for the late tobacco and liquor-farms, shall be found to answer their object; which remains to be determined.

No. 3. President's Minute, (7 July 1808) on Mr. Rickards's Essay.

6. With respect to the alleged objectionable clause in the cowles, or proposed deeds of property, as adverted to in Mr. Rickards's 67th paragraph, by which I understand to be meant, that they are (though erroneously) supposed by the natives to be revisable every ten years, with a view to an increase on the rentals, I rather impute more of them not having been taken out, to the causes adverted to in the clause 3d of Section XLV of the above-mentioned Regulation, and particularly to the last of them, as seems also supported by the petition presented by several of the natives of Salsette to Mr. Rickards, forming the voucher D. among the accompaniments to his plan: added to which, the Secretary's fee established on these deeds was, I am now convinced, by far too heavy for the slender means of this numerous body of agricultural peasantry, and should therefore be either altogether abolished, or reduced, in due proportion to the extent and value of their respective occupancies or estates; but under any modification, these deeds of property will probably never prove palatable to the majority of the cultivators, for experience indicates that we have thereby been attempting to obtrude on them a system which, how congenial soever in its aspect to our possessions, proves but little acceptable to their limited estimate of its benefits, which they consider more than counterbalanced by the contingency it involves of despoiling them of their patrimonial tenancies, of which dread they are relieved, by adhering to the customs of their forefathers, in sharing with Government the greater or less product of each year's harvest; a rule, the origin of which is nearly as untraceable from its antiquity, as in its application it must have always been peculiarly suitable to the periodical rains of India, that will ever prove the prime regulator of the abundance or scantiness of the general crops.

7. In considering the question propounded in the 68th paragraph of Mr. Rickards's Minute, I beg leave to premise, that the introduction of English terms into Indian finance, leads, as in all other instances of verbal inaccuracy, to incorrect ideas. Thus we have translated zemindar by landholder or landlord, although the more accurate version would perhaps have been landkeeper, in the sense that the same Persian affix "dah" is applied to the viceroy of a province or soubah; viz. soubah-dar, a term to which the obvious absurdity of the inference has guarded us from attaching, as in the former case, any notion of property; but having once translated zemindar by the English term landholder, we have thence been led, too inconsiderately, to annex to it our general idea of a proprietor of land, and to yield to the consequent benevolent idea of raising them to that condition, whether with their will or against it: but the present race of cultivating peasantry in Salsette can be expected to aspire to nothing comparatively higher than that of rural yeomanry in England, who would not hesitate to pay as farmers, to a landlord or superior, the third of the agricultural produce of their labour, although this be in fact a higher proportion than is rendered by not a few of the inhabitants of Salsette; nor am I aware of any taxes being continued so as to affect this net residue of two-thirds at the least of the gross paddy or rice produce remaining with the coorumby or cultivating ryet, after the discharge of his public rental.

8. Would not the laying on again a tax on shopkeepers, as proposed in Mr. Rickards's 72d paragraph, operate as an additional burthen on the coorumbees, and other inhabitants, by an enhancement of the articles in which those shopkeepers deal: it was at least in that view that this tax was taken off, as noticed in the thirty-ninth section of the already cited Regulation I. 1808.

9. I own I am not aware of the intrinsic advantage of removing the tax from the land to the houses: and it seems also objectionable, on the mere ground of so important an innovation, such as ought not to be lightly adopted in any case affecting the general rights of the community; but it is needless to enter much into argument on this part of the subject, as, under the orders of the Court of Directors of the 24th of August 1804, approving of the present system, as being in conformity to the principles of the Permanent Settlement throughout India, it would be exceeding our powers to introduce so great an alteration, unless sanctioned by the Supreme Government, to which, under another order from the Honourable Court of the 21st of April 1790, this Government is authorized to refer on points respecting the fiscal economy of Salsette, or of the vicinal districts.

10. With reference to the 75th, 76th, 77th, and 78th paragraphs of the Minute from Mr. Rickards, it may be proper to notice that it has already been made fully known that persons undertaking to bring waste lands into cultivation may, as several do accordingly, hold the same at a fixed rent in perpetuity, which appears to be an old and well-established rule in the island of Salsette, as specified in the 2d clause of the fourth section of Regulation I, 1800. Few or no instances have, I fancy, yet occurred where the parties have desired to set free in such lands for so long a term as Mr. Rickards has suggested; but it may in general be affirmed that as long a period has in this respect been granted as solicited or deemed in anywise necessary; nor am I aware, as seems implied in the last of these cited paragraphs, that the exaction of revenue is consentaneous with the extension of batty or rice; tillage from lands not already perfectly arable, and in a state of due cultivation: neither can any thing be clearer than that the principle of the system in Salsette, as expressed in the proffered deeds of property, precludes any additional tax for either improvement or extension of cultivation, whether on low or high grounds within every possessor's own limits, all which he or they are expressly declared to be at full liberty to apply to the growth of what products they prefer, without affecting thereby their fixed rental to Government; and had not Mr. Camac's proposed tax on fruit trees been altogether given up, for the reasons assigned in the eighteenth clause of the 36th section of Regulation I, 1800, it is difficult to suppose that the mere planting of trees could be attended, as set forth in these paragraphs, with any immediate exaction of revenue; the genuine object of all territorial taxation in India being, that Government should share proportionally in its actual produce, without anticipating thereon; a principle which must of course continue in force, in as far as the major part of the present occupants of Salsette may prefer its contingent, but regulated operation, to the more precise limitations which have offered to them in the deeds of property.

11. With respect to the doubts expressed in Mr. Rickards's 80th paragraph, that the true sense of the present deeds of property will never be understood in respect to that clause thereof which renders the money value of the perpetually fixed grain tax decennially liable to alteration, it seems that after the expiration of the first ten years, the degree of obscurity thought to be involved in the clause in question must, by the future practice, become sufficiently elucidated; but this I consider, either way, of no great moment, since, if deemed requisite by our superiors, this defect may be cured by announcing to the cultivators that the money value of the settled rent in kind is also fixed, so as not to be liable to future alteration.

12. Not clearly comprehending the inference in the 82d paragraph of the Essay, I pass it over without remark.

13. On the 85th paragraph, I shall only say, that whatever terrors the cowls or deeds of property hold out, none of them have been left; the Company's Government not having hitherto proceeded, to my knowledge, to the length of selling either lands or other property for arrears due to the state.

14. With respect to the liquor farm, as adverted to in the next following paragraph, it has been already mentioned to have been abolished, and a system ordered to be introduced, since October last, founded on the Bengal abkary Regulations, which, when matured, may, it is hoped, answer the object of suppressing that inordinate use of spirituous liquors, such as in no part of India has probably produced such baneful effects, in debasing the minds and weakening the bodies of its deluded votaries, as among the Christian part of the inhabitants in Salsette, who form so considerable a part of its population.

15. The tobacco farm has likewise been discontinued from the same period, and a system substituted in pursuance of the experiment previously made in Caranja, of which Mr. Rickards has, in his 89th paragraph, expressed a better opinion, such as it will be very agreeable to me to find it ultimately to merit.

16. Mr. Rickards having adverted in the 93d paragraph of his interesting Essay, to the remarks by Dr. Scott, in reply to certain queries which I had on the 25th of July last addressed to him, and to others, the most qualified from local knowledge to pronounce on the state of Salsette; I shall annex those queries and Dr. Scott's answers to the present remarks, and leave the whole to make their own impression with those who may peruse them.

Nos. 1. & 2.

17. The result of Dr. Scott's, as well as of Mr. Ashburner's exertions, and of all the large capital they are said to have laid out on their respective estates, must I fear appear by the latter's, and Dr. Scott's agents joint late address, and the present state of the former's premises, to have fallen very short indeed of the expectations that Mr. Rickards seems to entertain of both in this part of his Essay.

Vide Mr. Ashburner's and Dhackjei's Letter of the 14th June R. D. 17th D°.

The observations by Mr. Rickards, in his 98th and following paragraphs, might open a wide field for remark; but as more immediately connected with the subject under discussion, I shall only express a doubt whether the peasantry in India, under the genuine Moghul system (such for instance as is still upheld in Broach, in the manner delineated in the Report from the Commission of Revenue at that station, of the 31st May 1807) be not, as many of them, in a state of comparative ease in their circumstances, by sharing with Government, according to ascertained rules, the product of their agricultural industry, without the fear of dispossession from their hereditary tenancies, than can fall to the lot of the harassed commonalty of the same description in too many parts of Europe, these latter having over them lords, proprietors, with reference to whose severities to the more helpless classes of their rural fellow subjects living under their sway, the governments in that part of the world can exert but a slight degree of corrective power; whilst in India, its right and duty are in this important respect as well understood, as frequently and beneficially exerted, insomuch that the great body of cultivating peasantry in India, would probably be disposed to reject, if tendered to them, the offer of being placed under our European constitution. Such as the system for the permanent leases granted throughout the greater part of British India, although approximating to, has yet found it necessary to guard against this eventual abuse of, by a variety of checks and provisos; leaving the Company's ryots in a state still materially different from the relative insecurity of the like classes, in the region from which Mr. Rickards has drawn his principal data. In as far therefore as that system may seem the most conducive to individual happiness to the greatest number of human beings, and specifically, in providing a state of relative security to that most numerous and valuable class of mankind, the body of husbandmen, by conferring on them—not indeed riches, (which is often very distinct from happiness) but a medium state of permanent quiet and contentment, will it not remain in some degree questionable how far the balance may in these respects be in favour of European or Asiatic economy, a consideration which may contribute perhaps to make us hesitate in hastily making use of our power for the introduction of speculative lative ameliorations, such as the legislature appears to be jealous of, by requiring that the revenue rules of the country shall be maintained and respected in favour of the natives.

No. 3. President's Minute 7 July 1808) on Mr. Rickards's Essay.

19. The fiscal system now in force in Salsette, has that of India for its basis, in like manner as at Broach, but with this difference, that its inhabitants have suffered more from the successive conquests, not singly of Mahommedans, (which in common with the last cited district it has undergone) but by those of the Portuguese, Marhattas and British, each of whom have left the stamp of some part of their respective administrations. That however the natives of Salsette were the happy people under the Portuguese, that is apparently supposed in Mr. Rickards's 104th paragraph, appears doubtful from the accounts of that island by such travellers as visited it during their dominion in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, all of whom appear to represent the Indians under that nation, in a state of absolute and debased villanage (as per extracts in the accompaniment) whence the gay appearance of the Portuguese churches and buildings of that period, may stand no more in proof of individual prosperity and happiness, than the similar aspect of one of our West India islands, without retrospect to the number of slaves that compose the great majority of its population.

20. But in howsoever degraded a state the inhabitants of Salsette may heretofore have been, from their former oppressions, or continue still under, the unhappy disposition of so many of them to the excessive use of spirituous liquors; the introduction of capitalists into that island, as adverted to in the 106th paragraph of the Essay, may be perhaps attended with less success than could be hoped for, in as far at least as may be judged from the recent disappointments experienced by those who have had time to estimate the result of their having, subject to the payment of one single tax, entered on such undertakings, combined with the necessity of such adventurers procuring, as in the last instance of Ardeshere Dady, the good-will of the present occupants, before we can, consistently with what has from the highest authority been announced to the people of Salsette in general, proceed in the plan of placing over them more real landlords, in the European sense of that expression, or rather perhaps zemindars, in the more qualified modern acceptation of that term, in the British part of Eastern India; for under the engagements in which Ardeshere stands bound towards those who on such conditions consented to become his tenants, his power over them, and his estate, approximates much more to one of the latter, than of the former description; but yet it was not without a considerable degree of precaution, and with some jealousy evinced on the part of the ryets on his estate, that they yielded to Ardeshere's becoming at all their superior, as must be inferred from the conditions they exacted for their own security, as briefly enumerated in the fifty-fifth section of the Regulation already noticed.

21. Neither might our being able to introduce into Salsette the plan proposed in the Essay, constitute much proof of its easy extension into our other territories. We may, from the local and peculiar circumstances of the natives of that island, act towards them, or probably those of the smaller island of Caranjah, as we please, without risk of active resistance, but such is not the case with our far more extensive possessions in the vicinity of Surat, and still less in the north-western parts of Guzerat, in which, innovations on the customs and habits of the people will for years, and perhaps for ages to come, expose the Government that attempts them to a very undefined and vexatious series of evasive or more open opposition.

22. I concur entirely with Mr. Rickards in all the benefits to which that gentleman adverts in the 107th, and other parts of his Essay, as connected with the most plentiful supply of water for the purposes of irrigation in Salsette, and I have collected some information on this part of the subject, which will shortly be submitted to the Board, in time for any measures that may in consequence be undertaken on the commencement of the fair season, such as will, I hope, be found to be in general concurrence with the several able suggestions of Mr. Rickards in this part of his work.

23. The lands adverted to in Mr. Rickards's 113th paragraph, are not under the Company's authority, as that gentleman supposes, the pergunnah of Gundavie appertaining to the Guicawar; but this is of no consequence to the argument, as we possess other districts in the same vicinity, from which the ascertainment of the facts alluded to can easily be made, or obtained from Gundavee itself, by a reference to the Resident at Beroda.

24. In Mr. Rickards's 119th paragraph, he defines the advantage of a house or reservoir tax, over one on land, to consist in its "not interfering with the immediate pursuits, or "sharing in the immediate benefits of industry;" but does this amount, after all, to more than a verbal distinction? since, whether the tax be laid on the house, or on the lands, or on their product, it is this last alone that can pay the tax, which must therefore interfere very nearly as much in one way as the other with the husbandman's pursuits, and with the profits of his industry; such fixed tax inferring, whether rated on land, or deriving from whatever other real or nominal source, much the same requisites and consequences.

25. The estimate of square miles assumed in the 74th section of the already mentioned Regulation, differing considerably from that in the 124th paragraph of the Essay, it may be proper to notice, that the former is taken from the Report of Captain Brookes of the Engineers, after a local ascertainment thereof by that able officer.

26. It thence follows, that the relative population of Salsette is considerably more numerous than as noticed in the Essay.

27. The

No. 3. President's Minute (7 July 1808) on Mr. Rickards's Essay.

27. The contents of Mr. Rickards's 125th paragraph, are well calculated to arrest the attention of political economists; but I cannot say that the same results thence present themselves to me as to that gentleman; which is perhaps because I contemplate the subject more on Asiatic or Indian, and he (as already observed) with a greater view to the European principles of rural economy. Prosperity, in its true sense, must bear material, and even chief reference to individual happiness, which is not always necessarily connected with what is in the Essay alluded to, under the term of "active industry," in a greater degree than is frequently to be found in the undisturbed and easy life enjoyed by the majority of Indian cultivators, who (for a nearer approximation to English ideas) may be considered as the Government's soccage tenants; and is it not somewhat repugnant to Mr. Rickards's data, that Salsette, if so wretchedly an impoverished country, should nevertheless exhibit a relative population not far short of the double of the two most populous divisions of Great Britain? for it is one of the leading maxims of European statistics, that "where there are "the wisest institutions, and the most happiness, there will also be the most people."

28. The general argument in the next following paragraph of the Essay, seems not, by this rule of judgment, very applicable to Salsette, inasmuch as in its present state it upholds from its agriculture a very numerous body of inhabitants, among whom, and yet in a greater degree perhaps amongst the peasantry of India in general, there are but few under really necessitous circumstances, enjoying, as they do in this respect, most of the requisites for comfortable existence in their relatively humble spheres; whilst in Europe many a peasant is (if I be rightly informed) pinched for meat, clothes, and fire, for his family.

29. It does not appear to me that, as stated in Mr. Rickards's 130th paragraph, the applications occasionally made in Salsette (as in all other countries similarly constituted) from ryots to circumscribe their cultivation according to their circumstances and convenience, form any definitive proof of increasing general poverty, inasmuch as cultivators for these grounds, or their equivalent, are generally found, so as on the whole to maintain from year to year the cultivation at about its usual standard, whilst on the other hand it is obvious, as noticed in section 36, Regulation I. 1808, that some parts in Salsette (and that too where Mr. Rickards's favourite experiment, or one approximating to it, by introducing capitalists, on a singly rated system of taxation, has not been attempted) are of late years decidedly improved in their cultivation, internal industry, and exterior commerce.

30. The 135th Paragraph, which closes the general plan of the Essay, is replete with truisms, which no one will undertake to impeach, but I am at the same time not aware of their peculiar applicability to Salsette, from not perceiving the advantage that Mr. Rickards views in the substitution of a house tax for one equally definite on land, my reasons for which I have already assigned.

31. Mr. Rickards having, in his letter of the 24th of October, adverted to the situation of Caranja, it seems allowable here, and may prove useful, to contrast the state of that fully cultivated vicinal district with the relatively different condition of Salsette; although, in point of favour from Government, the latter has been abundantly more cherished than the former. It is not thence reasonable to conclude, that in the insalubrity of the air, and greater natural sterility of Salsette, are to be found the causes of its more tardy progress in bringing into culture the waste and jungles that yet cover too large a proportion of its extent, some of the central parts of which will however appear, from the evidence in the Accompaniment No. 3, to have subsisted throughout the best times of the Portuguese administration.

32. An experiment is now however making in that island towards the clearing of the jungles, and the application of those wastes to the rearing of hemp, teak, and other produce, such as, if attended with success, may diminish the regret that so much of the soil of Salsette remains still at the public disposal; but on this subject it would be premature to enter farther at present. By the dispatch of the next ships in February or March 1809, a decisive opinion may be formed of this operation.

33. With respect to that part of Mr. Rickards's plan that relates to the reduction of the expense of the revenue establishments in Salsette, Caranja, &c. I beg leave to assure him and the honourable Court, that I will most willingly place immediately in his hands the realization of this saving, to be continued from our proceedings on that head, under date the 4th of September last, which have brought them to the lowest state that the collector represented to be compatible with the realization of the public rental: comparatively with their amount of revenue, it must be admitted that these districts, as well as the island of Bombay, may appear to have always been disproportionately burthened with extensive collecting establishments; but in apology for this, it need scarcely be noticed, that small collectorships having also very minute parts of revenue to realize, are apt to exhibit, to a certain degree, this unfavourable contrast, when compared with much larger ones, in which the payments are more in gross sums; but however that may be, no one will rejoice more than I shall at the largest practicable reduction of the present charge.

34. In thus desiring to commit the more immediate direction of this important branch of the public administration to Mr. Rickards, in the hope of his being able to operate several desirable reforms in it; I would wish to be understood, that these should be effected with as little prejudice as possible to the income of the present Patells in Salsette, who, though too many of them unworthy and useless, as sufficiently appears by Regulation I, 1808, possess, nevertheless, with their families, such an interest in the immunities hereditarily attached to their situations, that to deprive them thereof, without some equivalent, would amount to a severe hardship.

No. 3. President's Minute (7 July 1808) on Mr. Rickards's Essay.

35. It appearing from Mr. Rickards's communications, that the inhabitants of Caranja have announced their consent to the new system proposed by that gentleman, it is known to him that I have (in view to that circumstance, and to the smaller interests involved in that comparatively flourishing island, combined with the less formal sanctions respecting its existing revenue constitution, than have been passed regarding Salsette) expressed a disposition to his proceeding to make the experiment on it, of which the principles are unfolded in the Essay.

36. The subject of the Petitions from Salsette and Caranja, which accompany Mr. Rickards's Essay, have, with respect to the particular grievances set forth in them, occupied my attention; the result of which I hope soon to be able to bring before the Board.

37. It may however be satisfactory to notice, that although these Petitions are professedly collections of every thing which the subscribers considered as remaining evils, and wished to be relieved from, any alteration in the rate of assessment on the lands of Salsette, or in the system for their territorial or grain rental, is not even glanced at: whence it follows, in concurrence with all the other information I possess, that in this essential point they consider themselves as too well treated to desire a change.

38. Mr. Rickards having included among the Accompaniments to his Essay, a general state of the revenue establishments throughout the limits of this Government, it may be satisfactory to our honourable superiors to know, that they have since undergone considerable reduction; whence, upon the ground of information from the Accountant General, I may safely state, that upon the whole, they are now under nine per cent. on the landed jumma or rental, which is, I conceive, within the proportion of such charges at the other presidencies.

Bombay, 7th July 1808. (Signed) Jonathan Duncan.

SUPPLEMENT, added on the 8th July 1808.

1. Having, since writing the preceding remarks, had an opportunity of perusing very summarily Mr. Rickards's Minute of yesterday, I beg leave (under a natural anxiety to stand as little as possibly in the way of an experiment, purporting to teem with so much public benefit) to express my acquiescence to give immediate effect to the terms of the plan as therein adverted to, by acting on the announced intended proposals of "several natives of "the first wealth and respectability, who are it seems desirous of taking waste lands in "Salsette, and employing capital in their improvement," which need not interfere until the experimental progress of clearing the jungle, and rearing of hemp for the Company, there being room for both operations concurrently; nor should I have ever demurred to such an object as is now announced, had I understood it to be limited to lands not already under cultivation, or of which there are not occupants in possession, who would not probably be willing to have landlords placed between them and the Government, of which they consider themselves as now immediately holding.

2. With reference to Mr. Rickards's doubts as to the source whence the system of Indian finance could have originated, I may here notice a very modern publication, entitled, "Patton's Principles of Asiatic Monarchies," wherein the source of it is attempted to be traced, and contrasted from that European one, of which proprietary landholders constitute the main prop.

3. It is not to be inferred, from any remarks that I have offered, that I presume to decide which of those two systems is on the whole to be preferred; but as that of India is interwoven into all the habits of so extensive a population, I would only wish to recommend caution and deliberation before it be finally abolished. Were India to be populated by Englishmen or Europeans, their own system would certainly be for them the best: whether it be so for men differing from them entirely in religion and manners, is a momentous question, which nothing less than the united wisdom of our superiors, should be perhaps allowed finally to appreciate and decide.

4. Proceeding with the sequel of Mr. Rickards's Remarks of the 7th of this month, I have further to notice, with respect to his mention of the Portuguese Governments not having adopted in Salsette the Indian system, that the European landlords, among whom they divided it, did so; whence it was the same thing, or, on the whole, probably worse for the aboriginal inhabitants, who appear (as already observed) to have been reduced and held by those foreign superiors, in a state of very abject servitude.

5. It is remarkable that Mr. Patton deduces from the Sacred Records the very converse of the doctrine thence inferred by Mr. Rickards, as to the property of the soil being, according to this author, throughout the East, in the sovereign, and not in landholders, as Mr. Rickards judges thence to have been antiently the case. Whilst engaged in this subject, I took the opportunity of a visit this evening to poor Dondoo Punt, the late Marhatta killadar of Lohgurh, to ask him whether among them the land or soil was understood to be private property, or to belong to the sovereign. And he answered without hesitation in the latter sense, adding, that the Marhattas had a common saying, that "the daughter belongs to her parents, but the land to the king."

No. 3. Supplement to President's Minute (7 July 1808) on Mr. Rickards's Essay.

6. Yet, although this may be the true and most generally established theoretic definition, the practice perhaps in India, as now constituted, will be found (as truth does, in the greater part of contests) between the two aforementioned extremes, by individuals holding a qualified possessory property in the soil; the nature and precise description of which, should not be reduced to the level of our habitual notions, but received, and admitted to operate, according to its own genuine import, varying, as it a good deal does, through the several great divisions of Hindoostan, the Deccan, the Carnatic, and Malabar; and being, for instance, much more sensibly felt and acted on in the provinces of Bengal, than in that of Guzerat, the Grassia tenures in the latter excepted. In short, this is a subject that might require much time and consideration to discuss with entire accuracy, but meanwhile it may involve the least hazard, that the Company's servants should uphold the genuine import of the settled customs of the natives, provincial or general, as they find them, without adventuring to innovate on them without due authority, or endeavouring to compress them into their own meditated forms of amelioration.

7. With respect to the situation of Malabar, its whole constitution, civil as well as fiscal, was so different, till after the middle of last century, from any other in India, that I scarcely consider it as furnishing an apt criterion for general comparison. By those who are of an opposite opinion to Mr. Rickards, (such as the well-known Mr. James Grant, who has with wonderful assiduity developed the whole Moghul constitution of India, or Mr. Patton, the author already quoted, or the honourable Mr. Greville, who is understood to be the author of "India Analyzed,") no term equivalent to that of a European landholder, is acknowledged to exist among the natives of Hindoostan, or the Deccan: and if the Portuguese Government constituted landholders in Salsette, they stood towards the former hereditary tenantry, in lieu of that Government, and made the same collections that it might have realized; but out of which his most faithful Majesty was satisfied with reserving a light quit rent, such as in many places is paid by agmadars in Bengal at the present day, and by grassias in their wanta tenures on this side of India.

8. The just decision of the question thus at issue, may accordingly still seem to depend upon a thorough ascertainment of the first principles on which it rests; as to which, however, the differing advocates for either conclusion, continue unhappily at entire variance. I have already intimated my own impressions, and I shall here take leave, for the present, of a discussion on which the unexpected urgency of existing circumstances, with respect to the departure of the convoy for England, having obliged me hastily to commit so far my sentiments, that considerations may, I trust, apologize for the desultory order and imperfect tenor of the several remarks, that, pursuing the order of Mr. Rickards's observations, I have, as a point of duty, and not of choice, and with a diffidence proportionate to the great interest of the objects in view, been thus unavoidably called upon to submit.

(Signed) Jonathan Duncan.

(No. 1.)—ACCOMPANIMENT to Mr. Duncan's Remarks of 7th July 1808.

QUERIES addressed to Doctor Scott and others, respecting the state of Salsette, in a letter from the Governor in July 1807.

Queries referred to in the President's Minute (7 July 1808) relative to Salsettes.

1. WHAT proportion of Salsette do you think remains now waste, one half or one quarter part, or how much, with reference to what is already in cultivation?

2. Do you think the population has increased, or diminished, in this island, during the last ten years?

3. Do you consider the island to be in a progressive state of improvement, or decline; or as stationary?

4. What improvements do you conceive would the island now admit of, with respect to its government, the redress of grievances, or the security of the cultivators and landholders?

(Signed) Jonathan Duncan.

Dear Sir,

I SHALL not fail to the best of my judgment to answer every part of the Queries with regard to Salsette. I certainly do consider the island as in a state of improvement. A man who thinks otherwise, must be blind and prejudiced at once, for nothing in my opinion is more certain and obvious.

Dear Sir,
Yours, &c.

24th July 1807. (Signed) H. Scott.

(No. 2.)—ACCOMPANIMENT to Mr. Duncan's Remarks on Salsette.

No. 3.
Answer to Queries referred to in President's Minute (7 July 1808) relative to Salsette.

Bombay, August 1807.

THERE can be little doubt but that under the Portuguese, the island of Salsette was in a very flourishing condition; the lands were then private property, and many of the landholders were wealthy: some remains of their buildings and public works give us an idea of considerable opulence, and it is fully confirmed by tradition, which is not yet very remote. I have seen a man nearly 100 years of age, who died lately at Pasparely, who remembered the time when no less than 40 Europeans assembled every Sunday in the church of Trinidad. After the conquest of the Mahrattas, all was destroyed; the landholders fled precipitately from the island, and the conqueror introduced his oppressive and degrading system on the ruin of that of private property.

After a period of about 50 years the island was taken by the English, and for about 30 years past it has remained in our possession. The English chiefs appeared to have had no better views of right policy than their predecessors the Mahrattas: they adopted all their methods of raising money from the people, and some of them, (among whom Mr. Farmer deserves particularly to be named) invented new, and I do think very hurtful methods of taxation. Under us, the people certainly found themselves in no better a situation than under the Mahrattas: our chiefs never understood well the language of the country; the system of letting out the lands under the management of natives, was continued, and some exceptionable means of raising money were over and above adopted by us.

The first attempt at improvement by the Government of this Presidency, was, I think, made under the chiefship of Mr. Camac. Several very exceptionable taxes were then relinquished, the lands were let out in a more equitable mode, and their rents, which were too high, were somewhat diminished. To these salutary changes, Mr. Duncan added the Court of Justice as it now exists, and which is certainly a great improvement on the former system. Other means were gradually adopted to promote the cultivation of Salsette, and to encourage the people to industry. It was signified to the inhabitants, that their lands would be transferred to them as private property, if they chose it, and without any addition to their present payments: a few accepted of this offer; but such was the debased state into which mankind had fallen by long oppression, that the rest rejected it. They looked on the proposal with sullen distrust and indifference. The property of the land had never entered into their minds, nor had they the means, nor the energy to extend, or to improve their cultivation.

With the same view of increasing industry and cultivation, Government was pleased to encourage the undertaking of Poway and Bandoop. Before those estates began, the universal cultivation of Salsette was rice, nor had those rich articles which give so high a value to the tropical countries been attempted there, although the soil and climate of Salsette are extremely favourable to most of them. I may truly say, that independently of personal advantage, the proprietors of those estates had a sincere wish for their success. They entered on their undertakings with enthusiasm, and under many losses they have to this hour never relinquished the animating hope of success. They have certainly effected a good deal. Their cultivation of canes and other articles is extensive: they have sunk many wells for the purpose of irrigation, and they have established a numerous population where some years ago there hardly existed a human being. They ought not perhaps at the outset to have expected that they could clear and cultivate a large tract of land and settle inhabitants on it, without some personal loss. This they have severely experienced, and at one time a state of bankruptcy stared them in the face.—I allude to the time of the great famine, which in spite of the active vigilance of Government, was felt severely in Salsette; but by none so much as the proprietors of Poway and Bandoop, where a large capital was embarked, and where cultivation at one period was nearly stopped. Since that time more favourable circumstances have occurred, and among others, those estates have derived an essential benefit from their spirit contracts. Government could certainly by no other means have given so cheap, or so appropriate an encouragement to Poway and Bandoop. Indeed I may say that this encouragement has not lost the public a single rupee, for we know from past experience that those who deal in spirit would not have supplied it to Government at a cheaper rate, and it was often procured at a dearer rate. The best spirit is the product of the sugar cane, and I think Salsette will soon keep, by these means, a large sum of money among us, which has hitherto been annually sent to foreign nations. A great advantage must arise, too, to Government, from the supply being at hand, for distant supplies are constantly attended by ill effects: the stores in such cases are too full of the article, or deficient in it, and the price is always most irregular. As soon as the present contracts expire, I further expect that Government will get their supplies here at a much cheaper rate than elsewhere, and in as small or as great quantities as they require. All those are advantages which a foreign market cannot afford.

Among the advantages that have already arisen from Poway and Bandoop, I may notice the rents now paid for those estates, which are very considerable. This is a permanent gain to the Company, for those lands had fallen into such a state, that they, twelve years ago, yielded little or nothing. Population is always a farther gain to the public, and the great increase of it on those estates, may fairly be reckoned among the late improvements of Salsette.

The estates of Poway and Bandoop have at times, and chiefly in the beginning, suffered severely from disease: they were over-run with trees and underwood; and the luxuriant grass that

No. 3.
Answer to Queries referred to in President's Minute (7 July 1808) relative to Salsette.

that the fields produced uneaten by cattle, rotted on the ground, and spread fatal fevers over the country; this is too much the case at this moment in many parts of Salsette. The change on those estates is now surprising, for such is the effect of cultivation, that those lands, formerly so destructive to mankind, are as free from disease as any part of Bombay, and we no longer see the labours of the year disappointed in a moment by the morbid consideration of our cultivators. The natives have now lost their terrors, and they at last are convinced that they can live at Bandoop or Poway with perfect safety: I consider this fact as highly important; for the sad effects of disease in the beginning, not only exposed us to great pecuniary loss, but had almost induced us to relinquish hope.

I think a man must be very full of prejudice who does not in many respects see a great improvement in Salsette within the last ten years. The causes detailed in the beginning of this Paper, have greatly contributed to that effect, but many no less important remain still to be mentioned.

The building of the causeway at Scin, and the new road to Tanna, have been of the greatest utility. A few years ago a traveller in Salsette, on the most frequented road of the island, met with nobody besides a few passengers on foot; the high road is at present covered with carts, which transport to Bombay, Tanna, or other parts, the grain, straw, and other products of husbandry. There is not a moment that people do not pass the bridge at Lion, with a variety of provision, &c. where formerly a solitary traveller but now and then made his appearance; not only has the bridge and the great road facilitated this intercourse, but it has been promoted by various regulations. The ferry, at the time I allude to, was ill managed, and a system of pilfering prevailed which it is very difficult to prevent with the natives. Severe regulations have been made against such abuses, and with excellent effect. With regard to duties, &c. &c. it has been ordered, that Salsette and Bombay shall be on an equal footing, that the intercourse shall be perfectly free, and that in almost all respects they shall be considered as one island. This regulation, adopted several years ago, gave very high satisfaction to the people of Salsette, and has been of very material benefit to that island. It has given a security to the husbandman and the trader, which they knew not before.

It is not alone the agreeable appearance of increased activity that makes me conclude that the improvement of Salsette is so considerable of late years; many other circumstances confirm it; of late some respectable natives with capital, have with permission of Government, settled in Salsette. Such people deservedly meet with encouragement; but the disposition that men of this description now show to embark their property there, is a proof of the change of public opinion with regard to Salsette, for some years ago no man of property would have entered on such a speculation. Settlers of this kind will bring a new spirit with them, and will soon effect what the poor, indolent and long oppressed natives never could have done. I observe that even the purvoes of Bombay have dug some wells in Salsette, and made inclosures of stone.

I had long wished at Poway to induce the natives to take my lands from me on almost any terms they pleased. I had become convinced that no other method would ensure the general cultivation of the island, and that the West India practice of proprietors cultivating the whole of their estates, was not applicable, for many reasons, to the state of things in this country. With this view I offered the natives wells, cattle and lands, for a trifling consideration, and even gratis, but I could get nobody to venture on such an enterprize; I was almost in despair, when to my astonishment I found this season that I could let out much of my land to adventurers in agriculture, by giving them cattle and some other kinds of encouragement. I now soon expect to see the whole of my ground in cultivation, and producing various articles for the Bombay or foreign market, while I shall relinquish all immediate income in agriculture; employing myself only in aiding or directing those who are immediately concerned in it. This is the state of things which I have long anxiously wished to see, for this alone can render permanent and useful all that we have hitherto done in Salsette.

As a further proof of the improving state of Salsette, I may observe, that about three years ago I got from Government the village of Tankey. For a long time its population had been diminishing, and in Salsette, the immediate consequence of a diminished population, is an increase of jungle, or what is still worse, of grass, which give rise to fevers and dysentery, and waste, in a proportion rapidly decreasing, the people who still remain. When I took Tankey not a single habitation remained, and the few people who had escaped from disease had gone to other parts. I have already collected a considerable number of people; not less I think than thirty houses; and half of the lands are now in cultivation. Such is the present spirit, that I believe that every foot of the village will be occupied in ten or twelve months more. Among my adventurers in Tankey there are two Bombay purvoes, both men of some property.

Some things still exist in Salsette of the ancient establishment, which I think might be altered with advantage, and which are not consistent with the general spirit that has of late years regulated that island.

There are some small farms, which produce yearly to the public but a few hundred rupees, while they harass and injure the inhabitants. I can affirm from experience, that it is impossible to authorize the servant of a tax-gatherer of any kind to wear a livery, without making him a little tyrant. To this moment the poorest classes of the people know us not sufficiently. They have been used to Mahratta oppression, and will seldom venture to resist any body who comes in the shape of authority. Two of those farms I shall mention, the farm of Jungars, which is a tax on the husbandmen of Salsette, and unknown even to the Mahrattas; 2d. the farm for cattle, sent from Bombay in the rains, to graze in Salsette: the farmer pays for this a mere trifle, and I have known him commit very unwarrantable actions.

No. 3. Answer to Queries referred to in President's Minute (7 July 1808) relative to Salsette.

It must be allowed that the lands of Salsette are let too dear, although something has already been done to lighten the burthen. The difference of rent would, I think, be amply made up by the quantity of land let.

A Marhatta practice still prevails in Salsette, which greatly impedes the progress of agriculture. When a man has once rented a piece of land from the Company, he can never again leave it, nor even relinquish a part of it; there he must remain; and if all of his children or relations, whose assistance only he was able to cultivate, were to die, he must continue to hold and pay for the same quantity of ground. Even the widows of the deceased are obliged after the death of their husbands or children, to engage for the usual amount of ground. This is a great bar to the letting of the Company's lands to strangers, who would otherwise be disposed to settle, and who look with terror at this unavoidable condition.

It might be useful to change the patells of villages yearly. They at present hold the office for life, and thus acquire a great influence among the people, which they sometimes apply to bad purposes, both with respect to the public and individuals. In a village near to Poway, I know a patell who has amassed a great deal of money; he turns to his own account all the unoccupied lands, for which he pays nothing. These lands have now become a considerable proportion of the whole village, and are constantly on the increase. As he feeds cattle, cuts hay, &c. &c. on those waste lands, it is highly for his interest that they should increase; and I fear patells in other situations may have a similar interest.

Another circumstance seems in Salsette to impede the progress of cultivation. As few villages are fully cultivated, the inhabitants make choice of the finest spots, allowing the rest to become waste. If any person wishes to settle in such a village, he finds it impossible, for the inferior grounds that are left are so intermixed with those of the first quality, that confusion would ensue, and the new settler would be harassed and ruined. This is a general evil, and exists to a great extent over much of the island; when new settlers offer, they should be put in possession of a sufficient quantity of land annexed with the lands of others: but this will meet with a vigorous resistance. When I took part of the village of Paspauly it was with the greatest difficulty, and after every impediment they could devise, that I could get what I required unmixed with occupied spots. I procured at last a third part of the village, and in spite of the difficulty that I had, one third of it to this moment still remains uncultivated, producing nothing to the Company.

It would be difficult to find in any part of the world, a spot better situated for cultivation than Salsette. It one day may be of greater value than the large island of Trinidad in the West Indies, for in the one case a perfect state of agriculture will be acquired and supported with great difficulty, while in the other there is every desirable facility. Salsette is contiguous to Bombay, and may be said to embrace it for above half of its circumference; on the other side it is separated by but a small channel from the continent of India. It has thus every facility that can arise from the neighbourhood of an immeasurable population and great wealth. The riches of the mercantile community of Bombay are extremely considerable; to possess the soil seems to be a natural passion of all mankind, and it is felt on this island by every class of the community. Even the bora quits his shop on his holidays, and flees to his little garden in the country. When we have fully convinced the wealthy inhabitants of Bombay that it is possible to cultivate the lands of Salsette to advantage, and that his property in the soil, and his property of every other kind is there as secure as in Bombay, the riches and the industry of this island will take that direction, and I have no doubt but that at last every corner and nook of Salsette will be as eagerly bought up and secured as it is here. The wealth of individuals is that of the state, and thus a comparatively small tract of land may become to Government of infinitely more importance than extensive provinces, where an imperfect agriculture does little more than feed a needy population. Of late years much has been done for Salsette, and the effects that already appear, are flattering; to amend a degenerate people, or to improve a wretched state of agriculture, is not the work of a day. I am very sensible that I am speaking to a far better judge than myself on matters of general policy, nor should I have ventured on the subject but at your desire; but I may have observed some circumstances, from being on the spot, which have escaped your observation at a distance.

(Signed) H. Scott

ACCOMPANIMENT to Mr. Duncan's Remarks on Salsette.

Extract from the voyages of John Francis Gemelli Barere, descriptive of the state of Salsette, as it was in the year 1695 of the Christian era.

"The island of Salsette, in which the aforesaid pagod is seated, is about seventy miles in compass, twenty in length, and fifteen in breadth; being very low, it is cut by several channels running in from the sea; but there are high mountains in it covered with trees. The soil is very fruitful, and produces abundance of sugar-canes, rice, and fruit; such as mangos, mahgos, cócoas, transalins, giacharas, tamarinds, ananas, papas, and other sorts, which shall be described elsewhere. There are in it several villages of poor wretched gentiles, moors, and christians, living in houses built with wattles, crusted over with mud, and covered with straw, or palm tree leaves. They go naked, both men and women, covering their privities with a clout, and their breasts with another, or else with a short jerkin, that does not reach below the navel, leaving the arms, thighs, and legs bare. On their arms they wear bracelets of silver and glass, and thick silver rings about the legs. The peasants are worse than vassals to the lords of the villages, for they are bound to till the land, or to farm as much as may put them in a condition to pay the landlord: thus, like slaves, they fly from one village to another, and their landlord brings them back by force. They generally pay for their land, four, six, or twelve morais of rice, so called when the husk is off, and vate when it is on, which is the way they usually deliver it. A morai is twenty-five paras, and the para twenty-four pounds Spanish; measures the Portuguese use for provisions, as they do the covedo for long measure. If the peasants take the land to till, in the place of their abode, they pay no other duty to king or landlord, (though some exact some days of personal service;) but those held in fee, pay an imposition according to what they are worth, every four months, to the kings, factors, or treasurers residing in all the northern cities. These villages are given in fee to soldiers who have served long, or to other persons that have well deserved of the Crown, for three lives, after which they generally endeavour to renew; but to the church they are given for ever."

The author adds, that he travelled in Salsette "eight miles through a thick wood," in the vicinity of the Canara caves; after passing, as he notices, "over a mountain full of monkies, "tygers, lions, and other wild beasts and venomous creatures." See pages 195 and 198 of Church M. Vol. V.

EXTRACT of a farther Account of Salsette: Written by Mr. Hamilton about the beginning of the eighteenth century.

"SALSETTE is an island about 25 miles long, and in some places 10 miles broad. It is fruitful in roots and fruits, but not in corn; it is stocked with villages and churches, but has no city in it but an old one called Cama, hewn out of the side of a rock, but by whom I could never learn. It is near a mile in length, and many antique figures and columns curiously carved in the rock, and has several good springs of water to accommodate it. At present it is inhabited only with wild beasts and birds of prey. The island is almost cut in two by a narrow river, that bisects it at a town called Werwa, which lies on the sea shore, and has a little narrow harbour, deep enough to receive ships of the greatest burden, and is secured by a small fort standing on the north side; but the town is on the south side of the river. It drives a small trade in dry fish, made here and transported to the inland countries and villages that want the benefit of fishing. The fishers here catch their fish in long nets fastened to stakes placed in the sea, the outward ones, most of which are driven in the bottom in nine fathoms water, and they appear to strangers like a wood in the sea. There are several villages standing between Versua and Bombay, on the sea shore; but Bandara is the most conspicuous, which fronts Mahim in Bombay, about a mile distant. The Portuguese have some great guns planted at Bandara, but they have no trade, because the river belongs to the English; and all customs of goods, either imported or exported, are paid to the custom-house of Mahim. The mouth of the river is pestered with rocks, that forbid entrance to any vessels of burden."

In anno 1694, the Muskat Arabs made a descent on Salsette, and committed great depredations, in plundering and burning villages and churches, killing the priests, and carried about 1,400 captives into irredeemable slavery.

EXTRACT from Dr. Fryer's Travels:—Begun 1672, and finished 1681:

"CURIOSITY led me a second time to visit the island Canorein (another name for Salsette,) having obtained leave for a longer stay; nor went I alone, some of the best quality on the Island being led by the same desire: joining themselves with me, we carried a train of servants, horses, and palankeens, which were ferried over before us; and we coming soon after, were met by the fraternity (of the Jesuits,) and conducted to the fathers, who detained us till the afternoon by a stately banquet; showing us the curiosities of the church and college, diverting us with instrumental and vocal music, and very good wine.

"After which, we were dismissed; and four miles off Bandora, were stopped by the kindness of the padre superior, whose mandate, wherever we came, caused him to send his recorders (a term of congratulation, as we say, "our service",) with presents of the best fruits and wines, and whatever we wanted.

"Here, not adjoining to any town, in a sweet air, stood a magnificent rural church; in the way to which, and indeed all up and down this island, are pleasant aldeas, or country seats of the gentry, where they live like petty monarchs; all that is born on the ground being theirs, holding them in a perfect state of villanage, they being lords paramount.

"From hence, when we had baited, the same night we travelled early to Magatana, using our fowling-pieces all the way, being here presented with rich game, as peacocks, doves, and pigeons, chitrels, or spotted deer."

See Fryer's Travels, printed at London in 1698, page 71, wherein he adds, that on his way from Magatana to the Caves of Canara, he passed half a mile through a thick wood "peopled" (to use his expression) "by apes, tigers, wild buffaloes, and jackalls."

The

No. 3. Historical Extracts relative to Salsette.

The Travels of Carrere show that he approached the Caves of Canara from the northward, by Gorabunder, and the village of Deinse Dina, whilst Mr. Fryer's route was from the south and west. Hence the difference, as to the extent of the wild tracks they passed through, such as are generally traceable in those localities to this day.

The above recorded Papers not having been yet perused by Mr. Lechmere, no decision can be immediately passed on this subject; but copies of them are in the meantime to be transmitted by the ships under dispatch, noticing to the honourable Court of Directors, that our further proceedings thereon, together with such resolutions as shall thereon be passed, will be communicated to them by the shortly expected dispatch of the honourable Company's cruizer Teignmouth.

EXTRACT of BOMBAY REVENUE CONSULTATIONS, the 22d July 1808.

Mr. Lechmere delivers in the following Minute:—

Mr. Lechmere's MINUTE.

Mr. Lechmere's Minute (16 July 1808) on Mr. Rickards's Essay and Minute.

I HAVE perused with much attention the Essay and Minute delivered in by Mr. Rickards, as well as the Minute and Accompaniments by Mr. Duncan, and should be happy, were it in my power, to state any thing that could further elucidate either side of the question under debate.

This point having been so ably discussed on both sides, leaves it for me only to observe, that I concur in the opinions expressed by the President; and that I conceive the question to be of such importance, that no material alteration ought to take place in the present system, without a previous reference to the honourable Court of Directors, who, on the arrival in England of the lately departed ships, will be in full possession of the subject, and no doubt will give us the earliest notice of their sentiments on the subject.

The question appears to me to be, how far it may be politic and prudent to introduce a new system of taxation to the exclusion of local forms, customs, and usages, among the natives of this country, who, from their infancy, have been bigoted to them; any deviation from which, we all know, they look upon with a most tenacious and jealous eye, even supposing that deviation be evidently for their good.

I agree with Mr. Rickards, that it would be a most desirable thing to construct reservoirs for water, as well as to have all the tanks cleared out, a subject, I know, Mr. Duncan has had for some time past under his consideration, as well as some police regulations; but how far it may be proper, just at this time, to make so large an outlay as will be requisite of the Company's money, is a question for serious consideration.

It is more from this want of water that I conceive the cultivation on Salsette does not more rapidly increase, than from any cause of excessive taxation, the inhabitants only paying one-third of their produce, which I cannot call excessive.

The paper given in to Mr. Duncan by Dr. Scott, who has for many years been in a manner living on Salsette, ought to have much weight; and I am happy in having it in my power to say, that during a circuit I made of the island by desire of this Government, in the year 1803, I perceived with much satisfaction the very improved state of the inhabitants in general, when compared with the situation I saw them in some years before.

Since the period I made the tour of the island, I have almost the whole time acted as the Judge of the Provincial Court of Session, and consequently have had very frequent opportunities of seeing the general state of the people and country, both of which have impressed me with a conviction that the situation of the inhabitants was much improved, and that cultivation was increasing.

This improvement may not have been perhaps so rapid as might have been expected from the various reliefs afforded the inhabitants by this Government for some years past; yet I have not a doubt but it will continue gradually to increase, and the more particularly so if there should be a more abundant supply of water procured.

Whether this improvement would be accelerated by the introduction of a new plan of management, must be a mere matter of speculative opinion, on which it may be hazardous to pronounce; but as the island undoubtedly is, under the present arrangements, advancing in cultivation, I am not for interrupting that certain progressive amendment, by the introduction of a system that may lead not only to undo what has already been done, but may tend much to alarm the inhabitants, and which may ultimately not prove at all to answer any of the good purposes intended by it.

If it is possible to decrease the expense of the collections, the measure will have my most hearty support and approbation.

Should the honourable Court be inclined to try the plan brought forward, and so ably supported by Mr. Rickards, they will communicate their directions to us, when the Board will afford every facility that may lie in their power to the successful issue of the undertaking.

Bombay, 16 July 1808. (Signed) Thomas Lechmere.

No. 3. Rev. Cons.

Resolutions of the Board respecting Salsette.

Resolved, That according to the sentiments of the majority, no innovation be made by this Government, without a reference to their superiors on the system and principles of settlement for the island of Salsette, which, having been originally sanctioned by the Supreme Government, has since been approved and confirmed by the honourable the Court of Directors.

This Resolution does not, however, extend to such part of the island of Salsette as is not under cultivation, and, as such, occupied by tenants to whom a proprietary title has been conceded.

In the event, therefore, of Mr. Rickards finding it practicable to make trial of his financial system in those parts of Salsette that lie thus open to experiment, the honourable the Governor in Council will very readily concur in such measures as Mr. Rickards may, in consistence with the preceding general exception, suggest for that purpose.

And, inasmuch as the inhabitants of Caranja appear to have requested Mr. Rickards' system of finance to be introduced among them, the Governor in Council is very willing that Mr. Rickards should immediately proceed with the experiment in that island, which will also facilitate the beneficial object that Mr. Rickards views as practicable in making a large reduction in the charges of collection.

Resolved also, that Mr. Rickards be invited to bring forward, for the consideration of the Board, those reductions of expense in the island of Bombay and Salsette, and generally throughout the Company's possessions under this presidency which have occurred to him to be available, and which the present exigencies render most expedient to realize to the utmost limits of prudence, sound policy and justice, with reference to which this Government has been engaged in such reforms for these twelve months past, and having not yet closed their proceedings, each member of the Board will, more particularly in view to the recent call of the Secret Committee, as communicated from Bengal under date the 24th June last, be prepared to contribute whatever may appear to either of them to constitute remaining sources of admissible retrenchment within the limits aforesaid.

EXTRACT BOMBAY REVENUE CONSULTATIONS, 29th July 1808.

Mr. Rickards's Minute (23 July 1808) respecting Salsette.

IN delivering in the following Minute, Mr. Rickards begs leave to observe that he had completed the rough draft previous to his seeing the letter from Bengal of the 24th ultimo, with its enclosure from the honourable Court of Directors. The remarks have, therefore, no reference to any other than the vouchers mentioned in the first paragraph of his Minute; on the very important contents of the Bengal letter, he proposes to submit his ideas and suggestions separately, and shall be most happy to co-operate with his colleagues most cordially and zealously in any measure likely to relieve existing difficulties, or promote the public good.

Mr. Rickards begs to request his present Minute may be transmitted to the Court of Directors by the first dispatch which may leave India, as a necessary sequel to the papers on this subject already submitted to the honourable Court's consideration under date 9th instant.

MINUTE.

ON the propositions contained in the honourable the Governor's Minute of the 8th instant confirmed in Mr. Lechmere's of the 16th, and the resolutions of Government of the 22d, tendering to my management the proposed reduction of native establishments on Salsette, and the settling of wealthy capitalists on the waste lands of the island, I beg leave, in the first place, to express my acknowledgments of the Board's acquiescence so far in the suggestions I have had the honour of submitting in this respect to public consideration, but to decline having any thing to do in a partial execution of my proposed experiment. From a trial by piece-meal, and particularly of those parts of the experiment likely to be least relished by the present inhabitants, failure and discredit could alone be anticipated. Neither can it be desirable to run the risk of the whole experiment in opposition to the decided opinions of the first local authorities, and their consequent influence. I have no personal wish, or motive whatever, to interfere with the administration of Salsette; my reasons for selecting the spot for an experiment need not be repeated; and, as the whole proceedings are referred to the Court of Directors, I prefer to abide by their decision. If they are pleased to view without offence a humble attempt to promote the public good, to order the experiment, and that it should receive that entire and cordial support on the part of Government which a new undertaking of this nature may very possibly be found to require, my utmost exertions shall still gladly be contributed to give it effect. In this case, however, I could respectfully submit to the honourable Court the expediency of authorizing such eventual sacrifices of present land revenue as particular cases of hardship, or views of useful encouragement, may seem to require; these may not be necessary; but even if they are, portions can only be trifling where the whole revenue of the island is in itself but inconsiderable. If, on the other hand, the honourable Court are pleased to deem the whole scheme inexpedient, I shall bow with patient submission to the decree, and feel personally no other regret than that of the unnecessary trouble it has occasioned. It is on public grounds only that I have proposed it;—for public purposes alone that I should wish to prosecute it; and with no other personal motives or expectation than that of public benefit; but, if the scheme be finally proved and adjudged to be a vain speculation, far be from me the silly vanity of urging it into further notice.

No. 3. Mr. Rickards's Minute (23 July 1808) respecting Salsette.

The honourable the Governor has correctly stated his having offered the island of Caranja for the experiment proposed. I believe the offer was repeatedly made, but he, no doubt, also recollects it was as often rejected from the total unfitness of the spot. Its situation in respect to Bombay affords no attractions to wealthy settlers; it is divided from the presidency by a considerable extent of sea, always inconvenient, and often extremely tedious to cross, being very small, its valleys are already fully peopled and cultivated; it has, therefore, no waste lands of sufficient extent or natural fertility to induce new settlers to occupy them; and the wastes that are there consist chiefly of high hills of barren rock and slender soil, which nothing but a superabundant population of the utmost efficiency and industry would ever attempt to cultivate. The honourable Court will, therefore, I trust, not impute to me a fastidious rejection of the honourable the Governor's offer, when it would seem to be but too certain that nothing again but failure and discredit could result from the attempt in so limited and altogether ineligible a district.*

In composing the Essay of the 24th September 1807, subjects occurred, and are therein noticed, which it was impossible fully to elucidate without protracting that paper to a most inconvenient and tedious length. I therefore determined to enlarge on those particular subjects in subsequent supplemental Minutes; that recorded under the 9th instant is one of them; others will also be submitted in support of other parts of the argument, as I may have leisure to complete them, and these, from the particular subjects thereof, will contain my ideas on some of the general principles adverted to in the honourable Governor's Minute. Indeed, it is to these general principles I could wish the discussion to be confined; questions of a particular tendency I sincerely deprecate.

There is one argument, however, adduced by my colleagues against the general propositions I have taken the liberty of submitting to them, part of which at least, from its apparent plausibility, may, in the scrupulous breasts of English judges, be considered of more weight than it really merits, if not properly sifted, and therefore requires a few immediate observations. Its apparent plausibility, however, is only my present opinion; I may be mistaken; and if so, shall be thankful for the communication of such lights as would convince me of my error; an additional inducement for noticing it here. The argument alluded to is the objection that seems to be preferred generally against the propositions I have at different times advanced, that they are only calculated for Europeans, and totally inapplicable to Asiatic polity; and the great danger and impolicy of interfering with the established usages and existing systems of the natives.

Although the greater part, and all the reflecting part, of my life has been passed in India, and though a mind constantly employed in various departments of its administration cannot be supposed to be devoid of Asiatic impressions, yet, independently of these considerations, I must certainly have taken pains to very little purpose, to instruct myself in the principles of my present profession, if those principles have any other limits than that of the earth itself. The habits, the manners, the prejudices, of the inhabitants of different countries, are all of human institution; their varieties are of course subject to local regulation, and justly claim the attention, though not the primary attention, of practical politicians; but the principles of natural law have their origin in the divine will. That law is immutable; it is not only the same every where, but the best every where; and instead of conceiving the genuine principles deduced therefrom to have a mere local use and application, I should rather be disposed to question the authenticity of such as were not generally useful and applicable in every region of the civilized world.

It is but natural for the sciences to be most improved in countries where learning is most cultivated; all the other branches, astronomy, chemistry, &c. &c. have also been brought to their present state of refinement among the most enlightened nations of Europe, but their local origin or progress does not affect the prevalence of their doctrines; these must be universal to be true; and is that which its most distinguished professors proudly boast to be the noblest and the most useful of all, to be a solitary exception; must it be degraded to the level of a mere district regulation?

On what grounds, moreover, of experience or practice, these principles are admitted to be applicable, but only applicable to the national intercourse of Europe, I cannot clearly discern, for I know of no nations in that quarter which act up to them. Those few which approach nearest in practice to the best economical principles are certainly the most flourishing; whilst the widest deviations from these prescribed rules involve in Europe, as in Asia, the greatest checks to national improvement, and consequent political debility.

The universality and immutability of the great laws of nature, in respect to civilized societies, may however be inferred, among other proofs, from the invariable similarity of structure and constitution of the latter; we find every where the same classes of labourers, cultivators of the soil, manufacturers and mechanics, commercial agents of different denominations. Wealthy proprietors, where their existence is not suppressed, ministers and princes, or ruling authorities; different customs, laws, or religious prejudices, may subject these

* I do not mean by this to say, that that part of the experiment would not succeed in Caranja which regards the present inhabitants; but, for the reasons given in the Essay, little could be expected from these alone; and the effect might, for a long time to come, be so little perceptible, that sceptical minds would still question its success, not because proof did not exist, but because it was not sufficiently striking.

No. 3. Mr. Rickards Minute (23 July 1808) respecting Salsette.

these classes to different modifications or restraints, may even require different methods of carrying the same principles into execution; but these do not affect the origin, or the relative uses of the respective classes, the causes, or the consequences of their reunion in the great social body. Since labour, therefore, every where supplies wealth, and wealth supports labour: since there exists universally the same dependence of the different classes on each other, it is but reasonable to infer, that their mutual comforts and advantages, their happiness and prosperity, are alike promoted by the same rules, and dependent on the same principles, hic et ubique.

Considering too, the other more immediate objects of my remarks, is agriculture, permit me to ask, any thing in India but the cultivation of the soil? or commerce any thing but the distribution and exchange of its productions? or manufactures any thing but the preparation of commodities for the supply of human wants? Do not mankind live by agriculture, commerce, and manufactures in India as in all other, though not quite so preposterously to be sure as in some parts of the civilized world? Are the love of gain, the desire of enjoyment, or the sense of self interest, different passions in Indian and European breasts? Is wealth a different thing in the Asiatic and European world? Is its source or its mode of acquisition different? or the purposes, after acquisition, to which it is applied? Are not the freest and lightest-taxed communities among us the most industrious, the most prosperous, and the most wealthy*? And is not the greatest multiplication of individual wealth the most effectual method of conducing to the resources, the strength and permanency of the state. These are matters, I humbly presume, which depend much less on the habits and prejudices of men than on principles of a far higher origin. It is remarkable that the means of prosperity in these branches are perfectly consistent with all the varieties of national manners, except under the very worst of existing governments; and it will probably be found on due investigation that those fundamental rules and principles for the promotion of prosperity are the best, whether in the East or in the West, in the North or in the South, which are most conformable to the immutable laws of natural order.

But the argument of innovation should not, at all events, be used merely to answer the purposes of objection: if it is admissible in one instance, it must be in others. Now I apprehend the history of our administration in this country will be found to contain a long series of innovations to the full as striking, and some far more obviously, and decidedly repugnant to long-established habits, than what I have lately ventured to propose. The records of every Government in India exhibit numerous examples thereof: the Permanent Settlement itself is an instance; but to say nothing of the various others, has not the Bombay Government very lately sanctioned one, and the supreme Government most highly approved of it? And in a quarter too where innovation is alleged to be most dreaded, where the habits of the people have been officially represented to be "so vigorous and firmly "established as to be most difficult to overcome." I allude to the abandonment by the Guzerat and Kattywar chieftains of the old and prevalent usage of Mulukgeery, which the Resident at Baroda was authorized to negotiate, even under the co-operative influence and presence of a large military force, and which, with his usual ability, he at length brought to a successful issue. But can any man for a moment doubt the advantage of this abolition of an old custom, or conceive that the chieftains and inhabitants concerned in it will not be equally satisfied when they have experienced its benefits? The argument, therefore, is wholly inapplicable, unless the proposed innovation can be first proved to be mischievous, instead of beneficial: where the latter object only is in view, we have recorded proof, and the most confirmed experience †, of its being unobjectionable in cases not connected with the religious or superstitious sentiments of the people; and, from long personal intercourse with the natives of this country, I can confidently affirm that their attachment to their own agricultural or commercial economy is not of a nature to render partial changes either

* On a late excursion into the Deccan I was exceedingly pleased and surprized to observe the great appearance of prosperity which the city of Poonah exhibited, and which was the more remarkable after the scenes of desolation, plunder, and famine, it had been so lately subjected to: all the principal streets and bazars were crowded with people, whose dress and general appearance displayed symptoms of comfort and happiness, of business and industry, not to be exceeded in any of our own great commercial towns. The whole, indeed, was a smiling scene of general welfare and abundance. On noticing this to the Resident, he informed me that the Paishwa, since his return, with a view of promoting the prosperity of Poonah, had exempted it and the surrounding country from every description of tax; and, to prevent the possibility of exactions unknown to himself, had even abolished the office of cutwal. This fact is at least one proof, among various others, of the practicability of introducing what are termed the European principles of economy into Indian societies, with the same happy effects as have been experienced elsewhere.

† In a late Letter from the Collector of Kaira, to whom a part of the above-mentioned mulukgeeree negotiation was intrusted, we have an additional proof of what is here advanced. He reports as follows: (Letter, 29th June 1808.) "Although I found it necessary to have several "personal interviews and negotiations with the "Gago Zemandars before I could surmount the "effects of their naturally inherent suspicions at "any change in the administration of circumstances connected with their pecuniary payments, "still their judgments were not at length inaccessible to the great advantages to be derived from "the permanent system of amelioration negotiated "for their good by the Resident at Baroda." We have pretty plain proof, indeed, in the whole of the late negotiation, that native Indians, (not the most remarkable for civilization, and not very firmly subjected to our control,) may be persuaded to sacrifice many of their civil and military habits to views of personal benefit.

No. 3. Mr. Rickards' Minute (23 July 1808) respecting Salcette.

either dangerous or impracticable, provided the people to be subjected to the change are only first convinced by plain arguments, and clear demonstration, that it is calculated to promote their own benefit. Attempted changes without this previous conviction, or by means of actual force, have frequently been attended with evil; but the case is widely different which receives the entire concurrence and unreserved co-operation of all concerned. To urge, indeed, the inviolability of human laws and customs, is, in fact, to maintain the impracticability of amendment, and supposes the passive doctrine of its being better to suffer existing evil than to make even the most virtuous efforts to remove it.

After all, the proposed experiment differs essentially from a general innovation: a very simple change in the mode of revenue payments, confined to a very small district, where similar changes have been repeatedly and safely made, without an idea of compulsion, or even wish of extending it beyond these limits, except on confirmed proof of its benefits, and consequently its probable acceptability, can scarcely be deemed hazardous, or likely to prove generally offensive. Or can it be justly said to intend the abolition of existing systems in any district, otherwise than as local circumstances may appear to render advisable, and under such precautions as shall ensure the approbation, by consulting the prejudices, and local usages of the inhabitants? In all conversations on this particular subject, in official papers, and once very lately on these records, I have uniformly expressed an aversion to the execution of any public measure affecting the private interests of Individuals, except with their full approbation and consent; and it was under this impression that I proposed myself to conduct the experiment; but, in the hands of a collector he might conceive any thing short of the full execution of the measure, or of its enforcement, if necessary, an imperfect compliance with the wishes of Government. I had also another motive, and that is the conviction that theories, when reduced to practice, are seldom found to accomplish the fulness of their promise: modifications are often necessary, without affecting their original principles, to adapt them to particular circumstances; and I was desirous of satisfying my own mind that nothing was attempted which should not afford a reasonable probability of success. The Court of Directors, I humbly hope, will hardly conceive that success to be at all dependent on a total change in the manners and tastes of the natives, or ascribe any such inference to a plain fact avowedly advanced, for no other purpose than to show the advantage of moderate and divided taxation, not over the French system of economy*, but over the widely-different land-tax of India;—to show, in fact, whether taxes be or be not ultimately paid by the land; that it is infinitely more advantageous and productive to allow wealth to circulate, and enrich a community, previous to its contributing to the public impost, than for Government to absorb that wealth before circulation, or as soon as it is annually produced.

Bombay, 23 July 1808. (Signed) R. Rickards.

Ordered, That the preceding Minute be circulated for the consideration of the Board.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER to BOMBAY, dated 10th January 1810.

Letter from 9 July 1808. (Para. 3, ad fin.) Referring to an Essay on Taxation, delivered in by Mr. Rickards previous to his taking his seat in the Council, accompanied with Documents and Explanations, Minutes by that gentleman; and likewise to a Minute delivered in by Governor Duncan, and illustrated with Documents containing his sentiments upon Mr. Rickards' proposition.

Para. 156. General discussions upon subjects of science, when conducted with temper and moderation, have, we are inclined to think, in all cases, a beneficial tendency. In the observations, therefore, which we may think it necessary to make upon Mr. Rickards' Essay and Minutes, so far from wishing to be understood as meaning to discountenance any attempt to throw light upon a subject both intricate and important, we shall always feel disposed highly to approve of and encourage this species of disquisition, even when, as in the present instance, we are not prepared to adopt the conclusions which may be deduced by the inquirer from principles which he may deem incontrovertible in their nature, and of invariable application. To the zeal and talents of Mr. Rickards, of which, on the present occasion, he has given unequivocal testimony, we are willing to do ample justice; and though we cannot avail ourselves of this exertion of them in its full extent, he will not on that account, we trust, show himself less ardent or less active to promote the interest of his employers.

157. Mr. Rickards' financial project, though he only now proposes to make an experiment of its practical utility in Salsette, has no particular reference to the actual circumstances of that island; but seems equally applicable to any or all of our other territorial possessions. It is founded upon defects supposed to be inherent in the constitution of our whole revenue system, and professes to be a general remedy for the numerous evils resulting, not from necessary causes, but from an unnatural, mistaken, and perverse policy.

158. The

* Although the French economists proposed to draw the entire public imposts directly from the land, yet I apprehend the revenue systems of India would be found on comparison to be perfectly abhorrent to their liberal principles. The great proprietors deriving the utmost possible product net from their estates by the means therein explained; and whose expenditure constitutes the most important features of the French scheme, are here entirely wanting; the very source of prosperity remains yet to be created.

No. 3.

Revenue Letter (10 Jan. 1810) on Mr. Rickards' Essay and Minute.

158. The leading features of Mr. Rickards' plan may be described in very few words. Its objects are to relieve the land from all immediate burthens, and at the same time to preserve to Government a revenue equivalent to that which is now derived from the produce of the soil. For this purpose its author would make over in perpetuity the land in full proprietary right to the present occupiers, leaving them to cultivate and improve it without any control or interference on the part of Government; the house of each occupier to be assessed with that portion of revenue which he now pays to Government from the land; the rate of this assessment on houses to be fixed in money, never to rise, but on the contrary, gradually to decrease, in proportion as it may be found practicable to transfer part of the burthen to shops, or to commute this source of revenue into taxes upon articles of consumption, such as tobacco, arrack, &c. till it be reduced to what is termed an uniform and moderate standard. The advantages of this arrangement are stated to be a simplification of the collection of the revenue, a strong encouragement to industry, consequent improvement, and a rapid increase of general prosperity. The plan also provides for the cultivation of waste lands, by a proposal to grant them free of all tax to any persons who may undertake to reclaim them; the houses of the occupiers of such lands at the end of fifteen or twenty years, and not until then, to become liable to the general house-tax, which it is supposed will, before that time, be every where reduced to the uniform and moderate standard already mentioned, that is, when a general tax ad valorem shall have been imposed upon all houses in the island, without any reference to the produce of the land. And lastly, Mr. Rickards proposes that Government shall establish tanks and reservoirs upon the island for the purpose of irrigation, subject to a tax sufficient not only to reimburse the expense of construction, but also to compensate for the reductions made in what may be called the representative house-tax.

159. Mr. Duncan having in his minute entered into a detailed examination of the merits of the financial project, of which we have just stated the outline, and the general scope of his observations meeting our concurrence, it will not be necessary for us to expose at any great length the objections to which it seems liable; objections which we should think must appear even to its author, on further reflection, to be quite insurmountable.

160. The principles of taxation, as developed in the beginning of Mr. Rickards' Essay, are unquestionably just. All the institutions by which the economy of states is regulated or upheld, may be considered as more or less perfect, in proportion as they are conformable or incongruous with the established and immutable laws of nature. But it must not be forgotten, that these laws, though invariable in their principles and tendencies in every clime and country, and among every race of men, are liable to be impeded, and sometimes obstructed in their operations, by the ignorance or perverseness, the prejudices or passions, of those whose welfare it is the object of the lawgiver to promote. It is as much the intention of Providence that we should be wise and virtuous, as that we should be prosperous and happy: nay, the possession of wisdom and virtue has, by an eternal and immutable law, been rendered necessary to the attainment of any considerable portion of happiness and prosperity. The obvious way, therefore, to make a wretched people happy, is by improving their moral habits; and the way to make a poor nation rich, is by enlightening it.

161. It is undoubtedly the duty of Governments by their institutions to come in aid of the laws of nature, to endeavour to invigorate their action where it is languid, and to restore it where it has been suspended. But this never can be a sudden and momentary operation. As the declension of states is generally gradual and slow, so also must be the progress of their renovation. Hence the necessity to which legislators are reduced in framing their judicial and financial systems, of consulting not only the order of nature as originally established, but the actual situation of the people to whom they give laws. Hence also the distinctions universally acknowledged to exist, though frequently lost sight of in the warmth of discussion, between the theoretical and practical fitness of forms of polity.

162. There thus arises a strong presumption à priori, that a system of finance which might be well adapted to a nation highly enlightened, and far advanced in the career of civilization, would be unsuitable to a people, who, though not barbarous, are certainly ignorant; and whose poverty is the result not of a faulty and short-sighted administration, but of deep-rooted prejudices and habits; which, while they remain unshaken, must by limiting their wants, for ever restrain their industry, oppose the accumulation of wealth, and are indeed altogether incompatible with the existence of a prosperous and flourishing country. It is inattention to this circumstance which must have led Mr. Rickards astray; though it does to us appear surprising, that a gentleman of his experience and observation should so far have mistaken the nature of the evil for which he has attempted to propose a remedy. The artificial and unnatural division of a people into casts is perhaps the most effectual method that could be devised by the ingenuity of man to check their improvement and repress their industry. It is so diametrically opposed to the strongest principles of our nature, that wherever such a distinction exists and is rigidly observed, it is impossible for enterprize to thrive; and it is altogether vain to talk of counteracting its mischievous tendency by any code of fiscal regulation. Did it ever occur then, to Mr. Rickards, when he was recommending a system of taxation founded upon the established order of nature, that this order has been so much disturbed in those countries where he wishes his system to be introduced as to render it wholly inapplicable to their present situation? Or if this did not escape his observation, is it possible he could imagine, that an alteration in the revenue system now in force would have the effect of completely changing the character and habits of the people, and new modelling the whole mis-shapen structure of society, in defiance of a strong host of prejudices of every description, arrayed against innovation, and resolute to maintain what from age to age they have been accustomed to venerate.

No. 5. Revenue Letter (16 Jan. 1810) on Mr. Rickards' Essay and Minute.

163. Without meaning to lay it down as a maxim of invariable application, that in no conceivable circumstance there should be any deviation from the principles and views which have influenced the formation of the permanent settlement of our territorial possessions, it is desirable, for very many reasons, that the system adopted for their administration should be as uniform as possible; and particularly that where it has been once proclaimed it should not be lightly abandoned. Were we to innovate upon our own institutions, our measures would assume an appearance of fickleness and levity, little calculated to obtain that respect which is necessary to the stability of the Government.

164. In the present instance, the change proposed does not in our opinion offer so much as a contingent prospect of advantage. For what is it? Mr. Rickards wishes to transfer the tax from the land and to lay it upon houses, still the change is only nominal; the tax must, as before, be paid from the produce of the soil, and the land in reality would not be relieved of the smallest fractional part of the burthen to which it is at present subjected. There is indeed a very strong objection to a commutation of this sort, though it be merely specious and nominal; which is, that a people of circumscribed notions like the Hindoos would feel much more reluctance to pay a large revenue from a subject which yielded them nothing but imperfect shelter, than they would to admit the Government to a reasonable share of the profits which they derive from cultivation.

165. It is not necessary here to enter into a discussion of the opinions of the French economists; they, like most of the advocates for favourite theories, probably went too far: Certain it is, however, that their system was very ably supported, and that it still has a numerous class of adherents even in this country. The existing revenue system in India, while it resembles it more than any that ever has been acted upon in Europe, is free from one of the chief objections to which Mr. Neckar considered that of the economists to be liable in practice, namely the impolicy of a government deriving its revenue from any single source. But though in no European state an attempt has been made to reduce to practice the doctrines of these very ingenious speculators, neither on the other hand has any government so far testified its aversion to them as to abolish a land-tax where it had previously existed. Mr. Rickards, therefore, has against him not only a class of the most acute, and as some people think, of the most profound, reasoners on matters of political science that ever existed, but the practical financiers of every country in that part of the world, upon the history and observation of which his notions seem to be chiefly founded.

166. We are willing to concede to Mr. Rickards (but by no means to the full extent of his argument) that considerable inconvenience does arise from Government absorbing a large proportion of the revenue of land before it has time to circulate and reproduce. But what tax has not its inconveniencies? Would not a tax upon the bushel of corn, or a tax upon the loaf of bread, equally effect improvement by raising the wages of labour as a tax upon the acre of ground? We have indeed the authority of Dr. Smith, that a tax on land has no such effect,—"When," says he, "instead either of a certain portion of the "produce of land, or of the price of a certain portion, a certain sum of money is to be "paid in full compensation for all tax or tithe, the tax becomes in this case exactly of the "same nature with the land-tax of England" (and we may add of the same nature with the tax imposed under the permanent settlement in British India). Then, says the doctor, "it neither rises nor falls with the rent of land. It neither encourages nor discourages "improvement." Book. v. Chap. 2.

167. Had our revenue system been the same with that which obtained under the Mogul and the Marhatta Government, and that which is in force in Guzzerat at this moment, then indeed Mr. Rickards would have just reason to complain of its paralyzing effect upon the active powers of the mind, and consequently upon the general prosperity of the empire. But the great object of our policy has been, and still is, to subdue the original vices in the character of that system, and so to modify it, that, according to the high authority just now quoted, it may have no tendency to discourage improvement.

168. Mr. Rickards has founded much of his reasoning upon a division of society into two classes, the one of which is supposed to be productive, the other unproductive. The justice of this distinction, though it can boast the support both of the economists and the enlightened author of the Enquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations, has been very ably combated, by objecting the utter impossibility of drawing any line by which it can be marked. For example, what possible reason can be given by the followers of Quesnai, for, considering the man who drives a plough as a productive, and the man who makes a plough as an unproductive, labourer? Nor is it easier to conceive why Dr. Smith should have ranked a person who sings a song in the latter, and a person who writes a song in the former, class, merely because the one produces something tangible, whereas the other does not. Governments are necessary to the protection of subjects, as subjects are to the support of Governments. The soldier who shields the peasant while he is cultivating his field, from the annoyance of the foe, performs his part towards the improvement of the land; and the Magistrate, whose duty it is to give security to property after it is ac-quited, contributes more even than the capitalist himself towards the public prosperity. Let it not be imagined, therefore, that the revenues of a state lose all powers of reproduction from the moment that they pass into the chest of the Collector.

No. 3. Revenue Letter (10 Jan. 1810) on Mr. Rickards' Essay on Minute.

169. It may also be observed upon this branch of the subject, that capital is much less necessary to promote cultivation in India than in Europe. The soil, owing to its extreme fertility, produces with less labour; and the implements employed in agriculture are so simple, that farming is carried on at a comparatively trifling expense. It is worthy of remark also, that in Salsette, where more capital perhaps has been expended than upon the same extent of territory any where else, its effects, according to Mr. Rickards, are scarcely perceptible, and must be allowed on all hands not to have been very considerable.

170. Neither is it irrelevant to the present subject of discussion to inquire, whether, in the Guzzerat, the grassia lands, which pay only one half or three quarters of a rupee per bhegha, are better cultivated than those of the Sirkar, which pay from three to four rupees. The grassia proprietor seems there to be nearly in the situation of an European landlord, who derives a rent from the land, and pays a very moderate tax to Government. Yet we do not find, from any of the reports of our servants employed in that quarter, that this difference of circumstances has produced an effect either upon the face of these districts, or the condition of the inhabitants, such as Mr. Rickards' speculations would lead us to expect.

171. From every point of view, then, in which the subject can be contemplated, we are compelled to return to the observation with which we set out,—that the project supposes a state of things which does not exist, and which it could in no way be instrumental in creating. Mr. Rickards is himself aware of the impossibility of raising the revenue, in the first instance, from articles of consumption, and therefore he proposes to raise it from dead stock, till industry and wealth, and consequently consumption, so far increase as to yield a revenue equal in amount to that now derived from the land. And all this, he calculates, may be brought about in the course of fifteen or twenty years! As if people whom it is difficult, if not impossible, to convince that there is any value in a simple arrangement, by which security would be given to property, and stability to the relations subsisting between them and the Government, would all at once comprehend abstract and metaphysical deduction; as if religious prejudice, the long-established order of society, and ancient and rooted habits, would suddenly yield to reasoning, however persuasive, however forcible; as if, in short, a financial theory could possess virtue to call into being desires, wants, the means and the power of gratifying them, in a society enthralled by ignorance, indolence, and superstition.

172. The comparison instituted by Mr. Rickards between our system of Indian finance, (if by that is meant the system practised under the permanent settlement) and the taille, or tax upon the profits of stock employed in agriculture, formerly levied in France and other countries of Europe, is wholly unfounded: no two things can be more unlike. The taille, one would think, must have been copied from the old Mogul practice, so closely did it resemble it in all its details. In France, the assessments were made by elections and generalities, as they are made by villages and districts in the Guzzerat at this day, varying from year to year, according to the reports delivered in to the council in the former instance, as they are to the collector in the latter, concerning the respective abilities of these villages and districts, founded upon a survey of the state of the crops. In France also the deficiencies of one parish were made good by the other parishes in the election, just as a whole village in India was under the Moguls held responsible for the revenue payable by all its members; this coincidence is very remarkable; and when Doctor Smith, speaking of the taille, reprobated it as tending to discourage cultivation, and consequently to dry up the principal source of the wealth of the country where it obtained, he did not apply to it stronger language than we have employed in this very dispatch, in treating of the financial system established by the Mogul Government in the Guzzerat. It is neither our wish nor intention that this system shall endure; and when the revenue system now in force in Bengal shall have been introduced into Salsette and the other territories which have been lately annexed to the Bombay presidency, many of the evils for which Mr. Rickards proposes a remedy (indeed all which it is practicable to cure by any code of financial regulation) will be found no longer to exist.

Smith's Wealth of Nations, Book v. chap. 2.

173. That some time may elapse before this change can be brought about is probable from the indifference hitherto manifested by the inhabitants of Salsette, and also, perhaps, from a doubt on our part whether it would be safe to give up that security for realizing the revenue which we now possess by watching the crops and keeping them in our possession till it is paid. But Mr. Rickards's plan is still less likely to suit the taste and wishes of the inhabitants than that which we propose to them, because it is more difficult of comprehension and diverges farther from the line of their present habits, while at the same time it offers no additional security to the revenue.

174. From all these considerations we are decidedly of opinion that no advantage could result from Mr. Rickards' financial project, in so far as it proposes a commutation of the revenue from land to houses, which may not be better attained under our Permanent Settlement, and that the former is even liable to some weighty objections from which the latter is exempt.

175. There does not seem to be any thing in the plan proposed by Mr. Rickards for improving waste lands, when separated from the other branch of his scheme, deserving particular cular notice. We hope, indeed, that means will be found of rendering them productive in a shorter period than fifteen years.

No. 3. Revenue Letter (10 Jan. 1810) on Mr. Rickards' Essay and Minute.

176. Of his suggestion to establish tanks and reservoirs in Salsette, with a view to promote the improvement of cultivation, we highly approve. We are happy also to find that a measure of this sort had engaged the attention of our Governor, and that he is employed in collecting information which may facilitate its execution. From his exertions, united to those of Mr. Rickards, we participate a result highly beneficial, not only to the agriculture of Salsette, but generally to our territories situated on the western continent of India, and placed under your administration. For any expense, therefore, which Government may be at in constructions subservient to this object, we have no doubt that we shall be able amply to reimburse ourselves by a reasonable assessment, after leaving to the cultivator a proportionate share of benefit. This source of improvement therefore we particularly recommend as fit matter to employ your utmost industry and zeal.

Letter from 14 October 1808. (Para. 2 a 6.) Referring to a Minute delivered in by Mr. Lechmere, containing his opinion upon the Essay and Minutes of Mr. Rickards, and communicating the Decision of the Board thereupon.

178. We observe that Mr. Lechmere coincided in opinion with our Governor upon Mr. Rickards' proposal. We certainly should have strongly disapproved of your proceedings had you attempted, without consulting us, to introduce a revenue system into Salsette, founded upon the principles already discussed. We are far from regretting even that Mr. Rickards declined availing himself of the latitude which you left him, to make an experiment of his system upon the waste lands of that island, or upon Caranja, convinced as we are that it would be attended with no advantages which may not be better attained by other means. A general retrenchment in the present revenue establishment is certainly very desirable, but we know no way by which this can be so well effected as under the Permanent Settlement, which when once introduced will, we trust, in great measure supersede the necessity of employing the long retinue of native agents now attached to the collector's cutcherry.

Para. 7. Adverting to Proposals received from some wealthy inhabitants of Bombay to become landed proprietors in Salsette.

179. You are already in possession of our sentiments respecting the general policy of arrangements of this sort, which we shall always be ready to sanction when formed upon an equitable basis.

No. 4.

Copy of a MINUTE recorded by Mr. Colebrooke, on the Revenue Consultations of Bengal, the 20th June 1808;—respecting the Extension of the Permanent Settlement to the Ceded and Conquered Provinces.

EXTRACT BENGAL REVENUE CONSULTATIONS, 20th June 1808.

Mr. Colebrooke's Minute.

No. 3. THE final Report of the late Board of Commissioners for the settlement of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, dated 15th April, contains propositions of so much importance and so greatly at variance with the previous resolutions of Government, that in recording my opinion, I think it necessary to go at some length into the consideration of the reasons which have been urged by late Commissioners in support of their propositions. Those reasons, as far as they relate to the question of a permanent settlement, correspond so precisely with arguments which were fully and repeatedly discussed upon the occasion of the Permanent Settlements of Bengal and Behar in 1789-90, and the territories on the coast of Coromandel in 1799, that my task will be nearly confined to show their exact correspondence, and to refer to the former proceedings of this Government for the ample discussion which they underwent, and for the final decision which was passed on the merits of the question by the honourable Court of Directors.

2. I trust that arguments which were not suffered to weigh against a measure recommended by wise and enlarged views of policy, but not then promised to our subjects, will not be allowed greater weight at this momentous period against a similar equally recommended by liberal considerations of policy, and solemnly promised by an express declaration in a legislative act.

3. Govern-

No 4.
Mr. Colebrooke's Minute on extension of the Permanent System to the Ceded & Conquered Provinces.

3. Government is pledged by the proclamation of 14th July 1802, 15th September 1804, and 11th July 1805, to conclude a permanent settlement with the landholders at the expiration of the periods there specified, for such lands as may be in a sufficiently improved state of cultivation to warrant the measure, on fair and equitable terms. It was judged expedient on full consideration of the subject, and with ample knowledge of the circumstances now alleged, to anticipate those periods; and accordingly in June 1807, the Governor General in Council notified to the zemindars and other proprietors, by Regulation X. 1807, that the jumma assessed for the last year of the ensuing settlement, shall remain fixed for ever, if they be willing to engage, and the arrangement shall receive the sanction of the Court of Directors.

4. The pledge which has been thus solemnly contracted, cannot be forfeited without such a glaring violation of promise, as would indeed lose us deservedly the confidence of the people. I do not mean to intimate that the obligation which has been voluntarily contracted is so indispensable, that no exception can on any consideration be admitted; some exceptions must unavoidably be made, and the postponement of the measure is not a matter of choice, but of necessity, in various instances which have been already under consideration, and which must become the subject of further deliberation. But exceptions should be admitted for only such reasons as are clear and intelligible even to the persons whom they concern. The general postponement of the measure, a twelve months after it was solemnly announced, and when so many steps have been publicly taken for carrying it into execution, would demonstrate a degree of fickleness which would be far from creditable to Government, even independently of the higher considerations of public faith.

5. The late Governor General, than whom no man was more conversant with the subject of a permanent settlement, which had indeed engaged a large portion of his attention within the last twenty years, deliberately resolved on accelerating the highly beneficial measure of a permanent settlement of the land revenues in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, upon a comprehensive view of the interests of the Honourable Company, and of its new subjects. There is room for regret, that the gentlemen to whom the execution of that measure was committed, should have put into deliberation, not the best means for carrying it into effect, but the expediency of the measure itself, which they were selected to execute. Giving them all credit for their good intentions in the call which they made upon the collectors to canvass a legislative enactment of Government, I feel it my duty to say, that the attention of the revenue officers would have been better directed to the requisite preparation for the settlement which had been ordered, than to the discussion of its expediency upon partial views of a most important question, which had been already decided by the Governor General in Council.

6. The objections alleged by several of the collectors, as well as by the late Commissioners, against the immediate conclusion of a permanent settlement, are principally the imperfect knowledge yet acquired of the resources of the country, the inequality of the present assessment, the great proportion of uncultivated lands, estimated generally at a fourth of the arable lands, the deficiency of population and want of capital to extend the cultivation, the existing restrictions on commerce, the want of opulent consumers, the extent of resumable land yet unascertained, the necessity of continuing certain farmers in possession of their farms, the general uncertainty in regard to the proprietary right either at present contested or not ascertained, in respect of extensive tracts of waste land, the doubtful value of the standard coin, the risk of disappointment should the settlement be disapproved by the Court of Directors.

7. Lest this brief abstract should inadequately convey the reasons alleged, I beg that reference may be made to the recapitulation in the 210th and the following paragraphs of the late Commissioners letter, where they are stated at full length.

8. All these circumstances it will be remembered existed in Bengal. They were alleged partly as reasons against the conclusion of a permanent settlement, and partly as arguments for the immediate adoption of that measure, though now all marshalled against me.

9. The argument on which, if I mistake not, the late Commissioners chiefly rely, is, that the right of participating in future improvement ought not to be relinquished, because Government is in a manner the landlord and proprietor of a vast estate, the resources of which are not yet fully brought forth, and because no other productive source of revenue exists to supply the place of the future revenue, which would be abandoned by an immediate permanent settlement. The late Commissioners therefore propose the postponement of a permanent settlement for four years, after the expiration of which period mocurrery grants to be made to the proprietors of estates which have attained a high state of cultivation. But where the resources have not been brought forth, the settlement to be made on a russud or increasing jumma, and the assessment of the last year, whenever circumstances may permit, to be declared fixed for ever.

10. The motive of this proposition is explained, where the late Commissioners estimate one quarter of the arable lands to be yet uncultivated, and conclude that 75,00,000 rupees per annum would be relinquished, if the demand of Government be now limited to the present available jumma, of 2,25,00,000 rupees.

11. It appears from instructions issued by the late Commissioners to the collectors, as well as from several passages in the Report now under consideration, that they consider 10 per cent. to be a sufficient allowance for the landholder, both for income and charges of collection, and that the landholders are not at present supposed to realize more.

No. 4.
Mr. Colebrooke's Minute, on extension of the Permanent System to the Ceded & Conquered Provinces.

12. Without offering any opinion on the correctness of those estimates, I shall contrast them with the declared intentions of Government, in regard to the landholders of Bengal, when the permanent settlement was concluded in this province.

13. Mr. Shore, (now Lord Teignmouth) whose diligence of research, and whose thorough knowledge of the revenues of Bengal are universally acknowledged, and need not the tribute of praise, estimated no less than a third of the amount received from the cultivator, for the charges of collection and intermediate profit between Government and the raiat. This estimate is quoted and confirmed as corresponding with experience on the coast of Coromandel, by the Board of Revenue at Fort St. George, in the very able Report of that Board, dated 2d September, 1799.

Minute, the 18th June 1789. p. 109.

14. It was with the belief that a third part of the collections made from the cultivator were applicable to the charges of collection, and the support of the zemindar, that the assessment in Bengal and on the coast of Coromandel was fixed for ever. At the same time Lord Cornwallis estimated no less than a third part of the Company's territory to be a jungle, and the researches in which I was engaged at that period, furnish me with grounds for the opinion that the estimate may, with great approximation to accuracy, be understood as applicable to lands fit for the cultivation, and totally exclusive of lands barren and irreclaimable.

Minute of 18th Sept. 1789.

15. With this opinion as to the extent of the uncultivated lands, Lord Cornwallis, far from desiring to reserve any right to participate in future improvement, argued strenuously against the pretension, and in these memorable words: "If the idea of permanency is to be "withdrawn from the settlement now in agitation, of what avail will the power of Mr. "Shore's arguments be to the zemindars, for whose rights he has contended." "They are "to have the property in farm for a lease of ten years, provided they will pay a good rent "for it; and this property is then to be again assessed, at whatever rent the Government of "the country may at that time think proper to impose. In any part of the world where "the value of property is known, would not such a concession of a right of property in the "soil, be called a cruel mockery."

16. The sequel is no less forcible and convincing; but it may be sufficient to refer to that important document for the powerful arguments by which Lord Corwallis demonstrated the propriety of declaring the settlement permanent. His observations on the power reserved to the Court of Directors, of confirming or annulling the settlement, are no less important, and bear directly upon the subject now under consideration.

17. The power of making a perpetual and irrevocable settlement of a great empire, without being subject to the revision of the controlling authority at home, would, in my opinion, have been too great to delegate to any distant government. I cannot, however, believe, that the Court of Directors would hold out the flattering hopes of a permanent settlement, which alone, in my judgment, can make the country flourish, and secure happiness to the body of the inhabitants, unless they had been pre-determined to confirm the perpetuity, if they found that their servants here had not failed in their duty, or betrayed the important trust that had been reposed in them. Nothing, I am pursuaded, but our expressing doubts and fears, can make them hesitate; and as I have a clear conviction in my own mind of the utility of the system, I shall think it a duty I owe to them, to my country, and to humanity, to recommend it most earnestly to the Court of Directors to lose no time in declaring the permanency of the settlement, provided they discover no material objection or error, and not to postpone for ten years the commencement of the prosperity and solid improvement of the country.

18. Before I quit the subject of the Court of the Directors sanction, I must be indulged in one more quotation from the same Minute. It is not for the purpose of taking shelter under a great and revered name, that I shall quote from Lord Cornwallis, instead of arguing on new grounds, or in new words; but because the answers by him given to the objections which are now revived, have received the seal of the approbation of the Company's administration at home.

19. Mr. Shore had stated, that if after the notification that the settlement, if approved by the Court of Directors, would be declared permanent, the Court of Directors should not declare the permanency, the confidence of the natives in general would be shaken, and those who relied on the confirmation would be disappointed, and conclude that it was meant to deceive them. Lord Cornwallis replies, "I can only say in answer to this objection, that I can-"not believe any people to be so unreasonable as to accuse Government of a breach of faith, "and an intention to deceive them, for not doing what Government in express terms "assure them it is not in their power to promise to do, as it must depend on the appro-"bation of their superiors."

20. Entirely concurring in the sentiments here expressed, and in the conviction that the uncontrolled power of fixing an irrevocable assessment ought not to be delegated by the controlling authority at home to a distant government, and that the ratification of the Court of Directors will not be withheld from the permanent settlement which may be concluded, unless they discover material error in it; I can see no sufficient reason for the previous

previous reference recommended by the Board of Commissioners, were it even still a matter of choice, and the question now for consideration were, whether the intended permanency of the settlement should be notified or suppressed.

21. But the subject of participation in the future improvement to be expected from the cultivation of waste lands, is not new to the Court of Directors. A doubt was expressed by the honourable Court, in their general letter of 19th September 1792, on this point: "If the "different proprietors should be allowed to avail themselves exclusively of the whole benefit to "be derived from the land, (at present left uncultivated) in the improved state of cultivation "which the new system has an evident tendency to promote, such a circumstance may in "process of time add very considerably to the value of possessions already too large. It is "besides to be considered, that if it can be effected without counteracting the principal object "of encouraging industry, Government may fairly expect in due time some reasonable par-"ticipation in the wealth arising from such a source." The honourable Court afterwards remark, that the subject is connected with points of considerable delicacy; and add, "nor "should we be inclined to adopt it, if it should on due consideration be thought to break "in upon the principle of permanent property in the present landholders, or should appear "likely to discourage or retard the progress of cultivation."

22. It was among the last duties of Lord Cornwallis's administration to reply to the Court's letter. The general letter of 6th March 1793 expresses, "with respect to the suggestion "concerning waste lands, we do not hesitate to offer it as our opinion, that any attempt to "stipulate for a proportion of their produce, would greatly counteract, if not wholly damp "that spirit of industry and improvement, to excite which is the great object of fixing "the tax upon each estate." 6th March 1793.

23. After distinguishing two sorts of waste land, 1st. those in the level country, interspersed in more or less extensive tracts among the cultivated lands; and secondly, the sunderbunds and the foot of the vast range of mountains which nearly encircle the Bengal provinces, it is observed:—

24. "The first-mentioned description of waste ground will be easily brought into "cultivation when the zemindars have funds for that purpose, and provided they are certain "of reaping the profits arising from the improvement. These lands, however, are not wholly "unproductive to them at present; they furnish pasture for the great herds of cattle that "are necessary for the plough, and also to supply the inhabitants with ghee and milk, "two of the principal necessaries of life in this country. It is true that the lands in this "desolate state, far exceed what would suffice for those two purposes; but it is the ex-"pectation of bringing them into cultivation, and reaping the profits, that had induced many "to agree to the decennial jumma, which has been assessed upon their lands. It is this "additional resource alone which can place the landholders in a state of affluence, and enable "them to guard against inundation or drought, the two calamities to which the country must "ever be liable, until the landholders are enabled to provide against them (as we are of "opinion they in a great measure might) by the abovementioned and other works of art. "To stipulate with them, therefore, for any part of the produce of their waste lands, would "not only diminish the incitement of those great and essential improvements in the "agriculture of the country, but deprive them of the means of effecting it. The landholders "and cultivators of the soil would continue (as they have hitherto been) little more than "the farmers and labourers upon a great estate, of which Government would be the land-"lord. In endeavouring therefore to obtain an addition to the public income, by "reserving a portion of the produce of the waste lands, Government would risk the "realizing of the very ample revenue which has been assessed upon the country; and "landed property would continue at the very depreciated value which it has hitherto "borne."

25. It may not be superfluous to observe, that the Board of Revenue at Fort St. George, in their Report dated 2d September 1799, quoted this reply, as equally applicable to the waste lands on the coast of Coromandel, upon which they remark with regret, "that the proportion is very considerable;" and the Governor General in Council on the 31st of December 1799, authorized the Governor in Council at Madras "to adopt the principles laid down in that "reply, as the rules of their guidance with regard to waste lands."

26. Thus, upon the important occasions of the permanent settlements of Bengal and Behar, and of the territories on the coast of Coromandel; and after mature deliberation, a claim of participation in the future improvement of the waste lands was relinquished, to a greater extent than the proportion at which they are computed by the late Board of Commissioners in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces.

27. The happy result of the measure is now witnessed in Bengal: the reviving prosperity of the country, its increasing wealth and rapid improvement, are unquestionably due to the permanent settlement, the principle of which was so wise, that even the serious errors which were committed in filling up the outline of the plan, could not ultimately disappoint its views.

28. But the Commissioners argue, that we were better prepared for the measure in Bengal; that land is here more easily cultivated, water more readily procured, wells and public works unnecessary, capital seldom required.

29. That

No. 4.
Mr. Colebrooke's Minute, on extension of the Permanent System to the Ceded & Conquered Provinces.

29. That is not the picture of Bengal, as then drawn: a reference to the minutes recorded by the members of Government will show, that the same representations were then made respecting the deficiency of information, the uncertainty of the proprietary right, the poverty of the landholder and cultivator, the scantiness of population, the decline of agriculture, and the depreciated value of landed property. A permanent settlement was the proposed remedy of those evils; and it must indeed have been postponed for ever, if it waited until they were remedied by other means.

30. Of all the objections which were then urged, the most serious was drawn from the still imperfect knowledge possessed by Government respecting the real resources of the different districts, and regarding the respective rights of the different classes of landholders and tenants, and the consequent extreme difficulty of distributing the assessment on the several districts with the requisite equality, and securing to the great body of proprietors and occupants the undisturbed enjoyment of their rights. A similar objection is repeatedly urged with great earnestness by the late Board of Commissioners, and by the collectors of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces; it was urged no less strenuously in Bengal, after twenty years had been employed in successive investigations, and three years had been especially devoted to enquiries preparatory to the decennial settlement. Were the permanent settlement of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces now postponed, the same objection would be again advanced with equal force and truth at the expiration of four years, or of any greater period whatsoever. The deficiency of correct information is the unavoidable consequence of the system under which the revenue is administered; persons of every description are interested, or think they have an interest, in withholding information, and suppressing the truth. Apprised of this disposition to baffle their enquiries, the officers of Government can place no reliance on the information which they receive, though it may happen to be correct. Under a different system, in which the adjustment of the rent demandable from the cultivator would be the immediate duty of the officers of Government, and a first step towards a settlement of the revenues, accurate information would be collected in a long series of patient surveys. But it is not now a question, whether the influence and authority of all intermediate orders of men between the ruler and the cultivator shall be suspended; the settlement, even if temporary, must be made in the first instance with landholders or with farmers; and the intervention of those, and of amils or tehsildars, must prevent the acquisition of accurate knowledge respecting the real resources of the lands. Minute scrutinies would be vainly undertaken; they would harrass the people, with no real benefit to Government; and without such minute and vexatious scrutinies and measurements, the same complaints of the insufficiency of information obtained from general enquiries, or from accounts of doubtful accuracy, would be made at a future period as at present.

31. After the lapse of eighteen years, we are now enabled to pronounce with certainty on the solidity of the objections which were urged against the permanent settlement of Bengal. That the distribution of the assessment was not originally equal, is indisputable; that it is now equalized, will not be asserted; but experience has not shown that the inequality of assessment has been productive of those evils which were then foreboded, and which are now again anticipated, in regard to other provinces.

33. I appeal to this experience in preference to any speculative argument. The design of the permanent settlement in Bengal has been fully answered. It was the wish of the Company's administration at home, as well as of the Government in Bengal, to limit the demand of land revenue, and fix its amount on a moderate scale; it was computed that the assessment left, not ten per cent. but fifty, on the sudder jumma, for the charges of collection and income of the proprietors; it was estimated that the landholders income alone amounted to ten or fifteen per cent.; it was expected that the improvement of estates by the culture of waste lands, would enrich the landholder by the increase of his usual income, and enable him to meet the variations of seasons and temporary calamities of drought and inundation, without needing remissions of revenue.

34. Those expectations have been realized; and if the persons whose benefit was immediately intended, have not generally profited by the beneficence of Government; if a great change have taken place in the property and occupancy of the lands; this event, though much to be lamented, has arisen from extrinsic causes; and it remains an undoubted truth, that the landholders of Bengal are now in the enjoyment of an aggregate income, not indeed greater than the author of the measure contemplated, but exceeding their former profits by more than the amount which the late Board of Commissioners think too great reward of future improvement in the hands of the land proprietors of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces.

If a permanent settlement on a moderate scale of assessment, leaving to the landholder the whole benefit of future improvement from the cultivation of waste lands, was in Bengal a judicious measure, which justice called for, which the policy dictated, and which the interests of the Company countenanced, how much more is a similar measure recommended by like considerations in regard to our new territories. It is of the utmost importance; it is essential for the safety of the state, to conciliate the great body of the landed proprietors, to attach to the British Government that class of persons, whose influence is most permanent and most extensive; to render it their palpable interest to uphold the permanence of the British domination; to give them a valuable stake in the present administration of the country. This can be in no other way accomplished but by creating for the proprietors or possessors of the soil, a beneficial interest, which emanating from the British Government, would increase with its duration. The landholders enjoying their estates under a moderate assessment fixed in perpetuity, are not ignorant that a change of Government would be followed by the exaction of an enhanced assessment: love of novelty may blind some, dissatisfaction with the local administration may indispose others, some may be turbulent by inclination, others may be restless by habit. But the greater number, sensible that they benefit by the continuance of the British authority, would be little disposed to listen to the suggestions of disaffection. If on the contrary the utmost revenue be exacted, the landholders have nothing to fear and every thing to hope from a change, and the consequent impulse to promote the event, will be permanently added to the other causes of indifference or disaffection which have been pourtrayed by the Board of Commissioners.

possessors

35. This has been viewed in a very just light by the late Commissioners when the settlement of Zillah Agra was under their consideration. And though there be no inconsistency in their taking a different view of the subject as relating to other districts, I cannot think that the distinction is well founded. At this period especially (could there have been at any time a doubt) every part of our Indian possessions must be considered as exposed to the same hazard and the same means of conciliation tending to ensure internal tranquillity; what are expedient in a frontier district are advisable in all; and a limitation of the demand of revenue, from which salutary effects are expected in the one, cannot be less productive of good consequences in the others.

36. This point, as of the highest importance, deserves ampler illustration. It may be drawn from past experience.

37. During the late war in Hindostan, the necessity of retaining a large force within the Company's territories, left but a small portion of a great military establishment applicable to active operations. It will be remembered that the safety of the state was thought to have been more than once hazarded in engagements fought under great disadvantage of numbers against an enemy essentially inferior, but who was able to bring his whole force into action, while a small part only of the British strength could be put forth against him. In future wars, the same necessity must again recur (I need not say how much to be deprecated) if the internal tranquillity of our provinces have not in the mean time been placed on a securer basis than that on which it then rested. But it is only by conciliating that class of men, whose conduct and disposition, whose influence and example must determine the character and condition of the people, that the tranquillity of the country can be secured. I allude to the zemindars, who are unquestionably the persons possessing most natural influence and effective power over the minds of the people: it is only by conferring on them the benefit of a permanent assessment of the land revenue, that that great body, consisting not of a few individuals, but of the numerous landholders of the country, may be suddenly and effectually gained.

38. It appears to be a very prevalent opinion, that the British system of administration is not generally palatable to our Indian subjects. Admitting this opinion to be not unfounded, it follows, that while they taste none but the unpalatable parts of that system, and while the only boon which would be acceptable to them is withheld, the landed proprietors, and with them the body of the people, must be more and more estranged from the Government, in proportion to the expectations which they had formed, and the disappointment which they will have experienced.

39. In Bengal, where the national temper is indeed less turbulent; in Behar, and in Benares, where the popular character and disposition are the same as in the western provinces, the permanent settlement has been long since tried with ample experience of its benefits; no disaffection, no discontent, are there supposed to prevail among the landholders and peasants. Is it credible that the zemindars, who have the experience of a moderate and fixed assessment, should be so insensible to the advantages which they enjoy, or so ignorant of the consequences which would follow, as to desire or in any way promote a change?

40. In fact no apprehensions have been entertained for the public tranquillity, on withdrawing the military force from those provinces. And whenever the internal peace of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces shall be as well secured, nearly the whole military establishment will be available for the purposes of active warfare. No measure would more essentially contribute to this very desirable end, than that of a permanent settlement; and even if it be attended with some sacrifice of future revenue, that would be more than compensated by an increased efficiency of military strength, giving a greater disposable force in war, or permitting greater reductions of expense in peace.

41. Neither can it be admitted that the relinquishment of a claim to participate in the future improvement of landed estates, is an entire sacrifice of the revenue. Though concurring in many of the observations of the Board of Commissioners on the subject of transit and excise duties, I cannot think it would be unreasonable to attribute the productiveness of the salt revenue and abkaree in Bengal and Behar, to the increased opulence of the country, ascribed to the permanent settlement as the principal cause of its general prosperity. In the increase of the revenue from unexceptionable sources, the Company have ample compensation for the doubtful expectation which was abandoned. In these observations I do not mean to hint a propostion for renewing the attempt, which was unsuccessfully made to establish a salt monopoly in the Ceded Provinces. The form of it was injudicious, and the attempt to obtain a large revenue from salt, was premature. But it does not follow that, at a future period, a judicious plan may not be devised for levying a large revenue upon that necessary of life. In most countries it is heavily taxed; and it is almost the only necessary that can be taxed with propriety and effect, in the present state of society in India. Where the opulent indulge less in personal enjoyment of luxuries, than in maintaining numerous attendants, no productive sourse of revenue can be looked for, except an impost on an article of primary necessity.

No. 4.
Mr. Colebrooke's Minute, on extension of the Permanent System to the Ceded & Conquered Provinces.

42. I shall only state one further reason for a decided opinion in favour of persevering in the proclaimed intention of immediately concluding a permanent settlement for the Ceded and Conquered Provinces. I allude to the abuses to which temporary settlements are liable, and which indeed have been usually attendant on them. The Board of Commissioners express themselves as aware that temporary settlements are harrassing, and afford opportunities of frauds. They describe the possible misconduct of public officers, in language which has greatly the appearance of pointed allusion; Government has not before it the grounds of judging whether abuses, which are possible, and indeed probable, have been practised to a great extent; there certainly is no sufficient preventive, nor any effective remedy, against abuses, without a permanent assessment of the revenue; and the purity of the civil service of the Company on this establishment, which was fixed in a basis apparently secure, by the system of administration established by Lord Cornwallis, would be inevitably lost in the long continuance of temporary settlements of the revenue in the extensive provinces above Benares.

Para. 226.
Dº - 151.

43. For this and for other reasons, which have been here imperfectly stated, but which are fully set forth and amply illustrated in the copious minutes which were recorded on the settlement of Bengal, I am clearly of opinion, that the proposition of the late Board of Commissioners, for the general postponement of the permanent settlement for a period of four years, which upon the same ground on which it is proposed, would lead to a further and indefinite postponement, should not be adopted, and that the measure should be carried into effect in every practicable instance, conformably with the provisions of Regulation X. 1807.

Para. 227.
Dº - 261.

44. The proposition of the Board of Revenue, next in importance, is for the continuance of the tehsildars on the former footing; this proposal is stated contingent on the postponement of the permanent settlement. It will consequently be unnecessary to discuss the reasons of it, under a contrary resolution respecting that question.

45. I am glad however to observe so strong testimony borne by the Commissioners in favour of the general character of the present tehsildars. From the knowledge which the course of judicial functions had given me of the tehsildars of Benares, Allahabad and Goruckpore particularly, and of the western Zillas in general, I had a less favourable impression of their character and conduct; but independently of this consideration, the power with which they are invested was unnecessarily great, and inadequately controlled, and the intervention of such a class of persons between the landholders and the officer representing Government, appears highly objectionable.

46. In regard to the expected economy from the change of system, it will be recollected that the Court of Directors have disapproved the magnitude of the revenue charges under the government of Fort St. George, and that the amount of the charges, as remarked by the late Government of that Presidency, is very short of the expense of collection in the ceded and conquered provinces. A reduction of the charge has been promised by us, and will no doubt be expected by the Court of Directors, and the amount of the saving to be looked for from this source, cannot be rated at less than 10 lacs of rupees.

47. Another proposition of serious importance brought forward by the late Board of Commissioners, is the rescinding of Regulation XI. 1793, and enacting a law by which estates, not exceeding 500 rupees, shall go to the eldest son to the exclusion of the rest. If the Regulation above cited, which abrogated the special customs of families in regard to the inheritance of land, were now first proposed, I should, without hesitation, vote against that interference with established. But it is late to rescind a law which has been in force for nearly fourteen years. I think it much more objectionable to interfere, as is now proposed, with the general law of inheritance, and in opposition to the usages of the country; we must beware of lifting a rash hand against civil institutions, which are sanctified by their association with the religion and dearest prejudices of our native subjects.

Sic orig.

48. Very minute subdivision of landed property is no doubt inconvenient to Government. But other means may be devised of remedying the inconvenience, without interfering with the law of inheritance, and without excluding co-heirs and co-partners from the enjoyment of their several rights. Regulation VI. 1807, does not, to my apprehension, provide the proper remedy. But the consideration of this subject does not press for immediate attention.

49. I am happy to concur entirely with the Board of Commissioners, on the expediency of revising the Regulations concerning different classes of landholders and tenants, and prescribing definite rules for determining claims to property in the soil. Instructions have been issued on this subject to the Board of Commissioners, and information from them may be early expected. It may however be proper to draw their attention again to this very important subject.

50. It would be wrong to prejudge the question of the concurrent rights of talookdars and zemindars. It ought to be decided on considerations of justice and preferable right, and not on those of policy and expediency. But if the scale of justice be so equally balanced as to leave room for the admission of other considerations, I am disposed to think, that expediency might incline the scale in favour of the village zemindars against the superior talookdar.

51. The inferior class of landholders in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, appears from such information as is at present before Government, to be precisely similar to the village zemindars of Benares, and maliks of Behar. The talookdars correspond to the pergunnah zemindars of both these provinces. The preference was there given to the village zemindars, but that did not operate to the extent of entirely depriving the superior landholder of his estate. The greater part remained to him, as also happened in the case of the separation of inferior talookdars in Bengal, except perhaps a few instances, or a solitary one, in which nothing remained to the superior landholder, and here the liberality of Government interposed for his relief.

52. Considering the hazard which may attend the measure of depriving the powerful talookdars in zillahs Allighur and Saharunpore, of the farms held by them, the late Commissioners suggest, that the settlement may be made with them as amils, under a stipulation requiring them to grant pottahs to the inferior zemindars at fair and equitable rates, and under a prohibition to the judicial and revenue officers, against interfering on trivial occasions. Para. 259.

53. It is known to every judicial offieer in Bengal, that the provisions in the Regulations for preventing undue exactions from department talookdars, have proved totally nugatory, though the courts of justice are open to them for recourse. The proposed stipulations would not be more efficacious, and would be a very illusory fulfilment of that guarantee of private rights, which in the Commissioners opinion, it would be contrary to all principle in any case to suspend.

54. I am by no means satisfied that any necessity exists for continuing the powerful talookdars in possession of all their farms. They do not pretend to have received any permanent grant of them, or to possess any proprietary right to them That they will be best pleased to retain them on the advantageous footing which they at present enjoy, cannot be questioned. That they would be provoked to rebellion or irritated to disaffection by the refusal to renew their recent farms, may be doubted. But even if it be necessary or advisable to conciliate these powerful chieftains by so great a sacrifice of public revenue, it would be much more for the interest of Government to grant them their entire estates in Jageer, in lieu of the more extensive farms held by them for an inadequate tribute. Their local influence would be thus restricted to narrower limits; the hazard of irritation from the interference of revenue and judicial officers would be greatly diminished; the sacrifice of the public resources would be not augmented; and Government would be at liberty to fulfil with sincerity its guarrantee of the rights of landholders.

55. The late Commissioners propose, that clauses of the Regulations, under which the claims of farmers and landholders to be admitted to the settlement are maintained, should be revised and explained. I am not aware of any objection to this proposal, and considering how much doubt has been entertained, and how desirable it is that no room should be left for misconstruction or for any strain in favour of one description of persons to the injury of another, I think it may be right to introduce into the intended Regulation, a declaration of the true meaning of the clauses in question. Para. 257.

56. I cannot omit to remark in this place an extraordinary misapprehension of the Regulations, which appears in the Report of the collector of Etawa, transmitted by the Board of Commissioners. He says, that "as the Regulation for the guidance of collectors allowed "no discrimination beyond the fulfilment of engagements on the part of the zemindars or "farmers, with whom the 2d settlement was in all cases to be concluded, he could not in "any case eject the farmers. He could only refer the claimants to the adawlut, but he made "it a rule to require an engagement from the faremr, that, if the zemindar should obtain "a decree, the farmer should account to him." The collector had here totally lost sight of the 7th section of the Regulation to which he alludes, (Regulation V. 1805) where provision is expressly made for the admission of the zemindars conformably with a former Regulation (Regulation XXV. 1803, section 33) and he had forgotten that the Court at that period had no power to decree immediate possession to the zemindar, and dispossession of the farmer, in any other case but where it was already the collectors duty to admit the zemindars in preference to the farmer. Para. 42.

57. There is some appearance of a misapprehension of the same kind in the Commissioners observations on the question between the zemindars and farmers, where they argue, that the zemindars, who declined the first settlement, voluntarily submitted to the consequences (of being excluded, not for the three years, but for ten), and especially where the Commissioners cite Regulation XXV. 1803, section 29, as directing the 2d and 3d settlements should be made with the same persons, whether zemindars or farmers, and as holding out the advantages of a long lease indiscriminately to both landholders and farmers. Para. 134. D° - 139.

No. 4. Mr. Colebrooke's Minute, on extension of the Permanent System to the Ceded & Conquered Provinces.

58. Another proposition of the Commissioners regards a regulation intended for the security of sureties, by giving to them the right of mortgages when they have been compelled to make good the revenue for which they were answerable, and authorizing the collector to give them possession after a summary enquiry.

59. Though consideration be undoubtedly due to sureties whom the bad faith of the landholders has subjected to heavy responsibility, I entertain some doubt of the propriety of creating by regulation a contract not in contemplation of the parties. It may however be advisable that the opinion of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, and present Board of Commissioners, should be taken on the proposed enactment.

60. I have felt so much concern in the necessity of repeatedly expressing my dissent from the propositions of the late Board of Commissioners, that I have a sincere gratification in passing to other propositions which have my unreserved concurrence.

61. Sales of land for arrears of revenue, should certainly be avoided to the utmost practicable degree. I entertain a hope, that means may be devised for the recovery of arrears, without recourse against the person of the defaulter, or the property of his estate. The Regulations for Benares, contained provisions adapted to that purpose; and unless it appear on enquiry that they have been neglected for sufficient reasons, I should recommend the revival of them in that province, and the extension of similar provisions to the western provinces.

Para. 262.

62. The Board of Commissioners recommend a more efficient authority in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, to afford security to the people, and guard the interests of Government. This is desirable, not only only for the immediate purpose hinted by them, but for the important end of conciliating our new subjects, who are acquainted with their British rulers, in none but the invidious characters of lawyers and tax-gatherers. They see only judges administering obnoxious laws with undiscriminating rigour, and collectors exacting the utmost revenue with uncongenial punctuality. We cannot, perhaps, establish any controlling authority, which is not connected either with the revenue, or with the administration of law. But I am willing to believe, and an incidental remark of the Commissioners authorizes me in the belief, that the Court of Appeal may be less unpopular than the District Courts, and that a permanent controlling authority in the revenue branch, would be conciliatory and useful.

63. I shall conclude by declaring my concurrence in the Commissioners recommendation, that steadiness, moderation, and justice should be the features borne by the administration of Government. But it is not by abandoning a measure diliberately resolved on, and beneficial to our subjects, that we shall approve our steadiness. It is not by grasping at the highest revenue, and wringing from our peasants the utmost rent, that we shall evince our moderation. Nor is it by depriving the sons of our petty landholders of their birth right, that we shall demonstrate our sense of justice.

(Signed) H. COLEBROOKE.

No. 5.

EXTRACT of a Letter from the Governor General in Council of Bengal, in the Public Department; dated the 30th June 1809:—PARAGRAPHS 109 to 117, both inclusive; together with the Papers referred to therein.

PROCEEDINGS of the Right Honourable the Governor General in Council, relative to Mr. Rickards's Proposition for establishing a General Bank, and other Financial Arrangements.

EXTRACT of PUBLIC LETTER from BENGAL; dated 30 June 1809.

Para. 109.

ON the Proceedings referred to in the margin, your Honourable Court will find recorded several letters from the Government of Bombay, referring for our consideration, various suggestions and plans submitted to them by Mr. Rickards, at present a member of that Government.

Pub. Cons.
6 May 1808.
29 July —
9 Sept. —

110. The principal measure proposed by Mr. Rickards, is the establishment of a General Bank, whose operations shall extend throughout India; but as we were sufficiently acquainted with the sentiments of your Honourable Court on this subject, and as the ideas of Mr. Rickards appeared to us to resolve themselves into mere speculation, without embracing objects capable of being realized, while the machinery proposed by that gentleman for the performance of a very simple operation, was extremely cumbrous and complicated; we thought it sufficient to point out to the Government of Bombay, that no public Bank could be established without the sanction of your Honourable Court: to whose consideration, therefore, Mr. Rickards's plans, if persevered in, must, we observed, be submitted.

111. Connected with the plan of a General Bank, Mr. Rickards proposes the institution of a Sinking Fund; but your Honourable Court are aware that such a fund has long been established, both at this Presidency and at Fort Saint George; although, from the circumstance of the public securities having risen so much in value of late, the Commissioners at this Presidency have been obliged to suspend their operations.

112. Mr. Rickards does not suggest any means of raising, from any independent source, the supplies which might be required for a Sinking Fund; except indeed by retrenchments, which he is of opinion may be made from the allowances of the native officers at the different Presidencies; but if the reductions pointed at by Mr. Rickards can be effected, without injury to the public service, they ought of course to be made without any particular reference to the objects to which Mr. Rickards would propose to appropriate the saving.

113. At this Presidency your Honourable Court are apprised that the public establishments have undergone repeated revisions, and you were lately furnished with the Report of a Committee, who were appointed by us to revise the establishments, with a view to effect every practicable reduction of charge; but with respect to the allowances of the native officers employed under this Government, we are far from thinking that they are, in general, upon too high a scale, or that the expense of this part of the public establishments can with propriety be reduced. We except from this remark the tehsildarry establishments in Benares, and in the ceded and conquered provinces, in which it is expected that considerable reductions will be effected at an early period.

114. Mr. Rickards, in a Minute which your Honourable Court will find in our Proceedings of the 29 July 1808, proposes that the annual supplies required by the Government of Bombay should be obtained by bills on Bengal, rather than by raising loans at Bombay; and the argument on which that gentleman's proposition is founded, assumes, that a public debt having always the effect of raising prices, it must necessarily occasion inconvenience and disadvantage to every description of annuitants, as well as to the Government itself.

No. 5.

Papers relative to Mr. Rickards's Proposition for establishing a General Bank, &c.

115. But Mr. Rickards, in this proposition, seems to have overlooked, that the alternative suggested by him might have no other effect than to transfer the inconvenience apprehended, from Bombay to Bengal; for unless there should exist at the time a fund at this Presidency quite sufficient to meet all the demands from Bombay, whether for the discharge of debt or otherwise, the drafts from that Government might have imposed upon us the necessity of raising loans under the very same circumstances which Mr. Rickards so strongly deprecates as having an injurious tendency at Bombay.

116. When that gentleman's proposition was first submitted to this Government, it did not appear to us that the whole annual supply required at Bombay could be conveniently provided for in Bengal; but as the state of our finances has since that period greatly improved, and our present resources will enable us to meet any demands which can be expected from Bombay, we have deemed it expedient to recommend to that Government to raise as large a proportion as possible of the funds required by them, by bills upon this Presidency. In recommending this arrangement, we proceeded upon the presumption that there is at present a surplus revenue in India applicable to the discharge of debt, after providing for the public disbursements at all the different Presidencies; nor did we consider it at all necessary to advert to considerations connected with the question of prices. It was simply obvious that it must be to the advantage of the Honourable Company, that any existing surplus should be drawn to that quarter where funds might be required, or where they could be best appropriated to the discharge of existing debt.

117. Mr. Rickards, we are persuaded, was actuated by the most laudable motives in bringing forward his different plans; and although speculations of the kind do not always lead to practical results, the spirit of inquiry should not be discouraged while it proposes to itself useful objects.

EXTRACT of the BENGAL PUBLIC CONSULTATIONS; dated 6th May 1808.

Government of Bombay, Political Department.

To the Right Honourable GILBERT Lord MINTO, Governor General in Council, at Fort William.

My Lord,

1st. WE have the honour to forward the copy of a letter addressed to us by Robert Rickards, Esquire, a civil servant on this Establishment, who arrived some months ago from England, appointed by the Court of Directors to succeed to the first vacancy in Council.

2d. This address being, with its accompaniments, so fully explanatory of the very important subject of which it treats, we are persuaded that it will be rendering an acceptable service to our honourable employers, and to the public, to submit it, in the channel of its present transmission, to that superior authority which can alone, if approving of the plan it delineates, give it also due effect.

3d. We have understood that some, or all, of the agency houses, who may be esteemed as at the head of the monied interest of this Settlement, would probably be disposed to promote the object of the proposed Bank, as far as respects the limits of this Presidency.

We have, &c.

(Signed) Jo^n Duncan,
L^t Corkran,
Thos. Lechmere.

Bombay Castle, the 22d October 1808.

No. 5.

Papers relative to Mr. Rickards's Proposition for establishing a General Bank, &c.

To the Honourable JONATHAN DUNCAN, President and Governor in Council, &c. &c. &c..

Honourable Sir,

AN humble attempt to promote the public advantage, and that more particularly of the Honourable Company's Government in India, will, I trust, be indulgently received by your Honourable Board.

Having, since my re-appointment to India, reflected much on the financial state of the Indian Governments, the amount of the public debt, the difficulties it is likely to entail, and the danger of its increase, a Plan has suggested itself of diminishing the weight of this heavy burthen; connected with other public advantages; which I venture to submit to the favourable consideration of Government, and that of the Court of Directors.

As in the vouchers A to E, I have endeavoured to explain every difficulty, and obviate every objection, it would be superfluous to add any thing on the subject here, further than to hope, that as it involves the most intricate and abstruse part of the science of Political Philosophy, my errors may be pardoned, in consideration to the motives which have actuated the attempt.

I have, &c.

(True Copy) (Signed) R. Rickards.

(Signed) F. Warden, Chief Secretary to Government.

(A.)

OUTLINES of a PLAN for paying off the INDIAN DEBT.

1. Suppose the debt 20 million*, desired to be reduced to 6 million.

2. Constitute a General Bank, and make over to it, for the security of its issues in notes, territory or territorial revenue to the amount of one million sterling per annum, to be paid in coin: this security to be inviolable under whatever exigency, and to be proclaimed as such in the most solemn terms. Divide this Bank into three; one at each Presidency, with a proportionate share of the above-mentioned security settled on each; the notes of each to have a prescribed local currency; and the amount in circulation to be always limited by the decision of the Bank Directors, independent of Government.

3. Although the Bank be thus divisible into three, one at Calcutta, one at Madras, and one at Bombay, which is an easy after-arrangement, let it, to avoid confusion of ideas, be considered as one General Bank throughout the remainder of the plan.

4. Let the capital stock then of this General Bank be called £. 12,500,000, yielding a certain annual income of one million, or 8 per cent. on this nominal capital.

5. Advertise the bank-stock for sale in the market, to be paid or subscribed for either in coin or in the Company's paper now in the hands of their creditors.

6. Bank

* This sum is stated more with a view to easy calculation, than to the actual amount of debt. The debt is considerably more; but if the principles of this Paper are correct, they will be found equally applicable to any other amount.

No. 5.

Papers relative to Mr. Rickards's Proposition for establishing a General Bank, &c.

(A.)

6. Bank-stock yielding a certain net 8 per cent. settled on the best of all securities, will I presume be deemed very acceptable property, and therefore readily purchased, more particularly if the business of the Bank (to be hereafter described) shall be profitable over and above the expenses of it. Of the merchant stockholders, a certain number, both European and native, are then to be elected directors of the Bank, conjointly with an officer of Government, or a member of Council,* as may be thought best, under whose united management, the business of the Bank is to be conducted.

7. But of the bank-stock above specified, about two-thirds of the whole amount, or £. 8,500,000 only, should be sold: this will dispose of an equal amount of the present debt, supposing the whole to be subscribed for in Company's paper; if any part be paid for in cash, a corresponding proportion of the debt may be paid off: but this is not likely while there is paper in the market; so that we may here consider £. 8,500,000 of the present debt to be converted into bank-stock, in the hands of individuals, the remainder, or four millions, will be Government's share, for purposes to be hereafter mentioned.

8. The Bank thus constituted to be conjoined with the Company's Treasury in the receipt and payment of sums on account of Government, to be a Bank of discounts, to grant credit on unexceptionable security, and at such times only as the Bank shall in their own judgment deem perfectly unobjectionable, and also to engage in the business of exchange by granting bills at a more reasonable rate than can be procured from individuals, in favour of merchants applying for the same on any part of the Company's territories; and for this purpose to have subordinate banks or offices in different parts of the country, as well to facilitate this business of exchange, as the circulation, if necessary, of the notes; there may hence be fewer demands for coin on the Bank than would be otherwise preferred, less coin exported for the payment of foreign or distant debts, particularly if the great Indian shroffs are concerned in the Bank, and therefore its necessary deposits of specie less liable to inconvenient fluctuations. This operation will be a great convenience to the mercantile body, who will be freed from the losses and inconveniences now suffered in exchange, and from the artifices of shroffs, and therefore find their pecuniary intercourse with every part of British India much facilitated.

9. With

* Were I proposing the establishment of a bank in England, I should certainly not select a member of Government for a director. In free countries of open and extensive commerce, the perfect independence of a bank is perhaps essential to its credit and the general confidence of the public; but in India, local circumstances should also be considered at each Presidency; the chief merchants, who, comparatively speaking, may be said to engross the trade, are few: and were a general Bank intrusted to their exclusive management, these few are just as liable to enter into hurtful combinations to promote their own interest, as a Government is to injure public credit by arbitrary acts to relieve occasional distresses. By the union, these parties will operate as a check on each other; and if after trial it be found desirable for Government to withdraw, the sequel of this plan provides for such a contingency as soon as the debt is paid.

Native directors seem to me of great importance to the complete success of the plan; and the co-operation of the great Indian shroffs in this establishment, would facilitate many of its operations.

Note.—It should be clearly understood beforehand, that the Bank will exercise its own discretion in the granting of credits, in view to the amount of notes in circulation at the time such credits may be applied for, and to other local circumstances.

I do not enter into a detail of the business of the Bank, because it would extend this paper to a tedious and unnecessary length. The nature of the intended business is, I presume, sufficiently manifest in the plan, and it is surely not too much to anticipate, that its profits, arising from these branches of business, may do a great deal more than defray the expenses of the institution.

The granting of bills of exchange on England, on favourable terms, might often be a local convenience to individuals in India, and also to the Bank; it may likewise be an accommodation to the captains and officers of the Indiamen. These latter often bring out specie which might thus be supplied to the Bank if required. This however is introduced as a suggestion, because the Court of Directors can alone determine how far it may be convenient to answer such drafts.

I also pass over the means of supplying the Bank with its requisite deposits of specie, because I apprehend all that may be required in this respect, may be derived without difficulty from the annual income, the revenue, the aid of merchants, proprietors of stock, and in the frequent imports of specie into India; and because the actual amount can only be ascertained by experience, though, from the nature of the Bank business, it is conceived this amount may never require to be considerable.

9. With the aid of a Bank thus constituted, Government may venture to pay off, say £. 4,000,000 of their debt,* after giving sufficient notice, as follows. The present paper contains a stipulation whereby it is to be liquidated according to number on the register, by cash, at the Presidency, or by bills on the Court of Directors: these clauses may, I conceive, be literally executed. The precise amount of the drafts on the Court of Directors, it is not material here to know; but that calculation may proceed on determinate data, we will suppose these drafts to absorb £. 500,000,† and therefore $3\frac{1}{2}$ millions to be paid in India.

10. Bank-notes, if as good credit as those of the Bank of England, will readily be accepted by the Company's servants in payment of their monthly allowances, whatever they may be; by the creditors, in payment of debts‡. Let the servants therefore be paid in Bank-notes issued on the responsibility of Government, but with the consent of the associated Bank Directors, § to the amount of all in all of $3\frac{1}{2}$ millions if possible, or to any lesser amount, that the general circulation may be locally found capable of receiving, without depreciation of the said notes; and in lieu thereof, let Government be previously prepared with an equal amount of coin reserved from the revenues as they are regularly paid in, to be deposited in the Bank, in addition to its annual income as stated in the 2d paragraph. With this coin, when sufficient is accumulated, the creditors may now be paid (after due previous notice) according to the literal and express conditions of their original contract.

11. This issue of notes, whatever be the actual amount, may be made gradually, to avoid unnecessary alarm, and should be proportioned with judgment to what the circulation will from time to time absorb. Three millions and a half being about three or four months ordinary expenditure, may perhaps be absorbed in 6 months; but whether it be so or not, it should be the chief object of the Bank's attention, at its first institution, with which, until duly executed, the other branches of its intended business should not be allowed to interfere, or only be conducted with a proper precautionary regard to the ultimate success of this primary object. In a country yielding 14 millions annually of revenue, it surely will not be difficult to reserve the $3\frac{1}{2}$ millions above proposed, for this grand operation, or more if necessary. The

* This sum is stated in view to the expected extent of capability in the plan. Though a lesser amount be paid off in the manner here proposed, it will still not in the least affect the ultimate grand object (as will be seen in the sequel), which is to liquidate fourteen millions of debt in eight years at furthest, and without any other aid beyond what the Bank and revenues of India can supply.

† The drafts on the Court of Directors will probably be much more whenever the debt comes to be paid off; but this large proportion of $3\frac{1}{2}$ million is purposely stated against India, to show what the plan is capable of.

‡ Not a single note should be offered to any creditor unless he voluntarily desires to receive them; the original compact with the Company stipulates for payment in cash, &c. which is clearly specie, and the clause should be literally executed; the strict and literal preservation of public faith between a Government and its creditors, being always a matter of the highest importance.

§ An objection may possibly here occur, that the associated Directors will not consent to this issue, on the plea of its diminishing other issues in the discount of bills, by which they would benefit, but which they are thus deprived of. In reply, let it be considered, that the major part of this issue of notes to the Company's servants will be made over in the first instance to their respective agents (the principal of whom will be Bank Directors,) or, in ordinary course, find their way back in revenue payments to the Company's Treasury, where, as a certain sum of notes may be supposed to be always accumulated, such sum, together with the amount in the hands of the Directors, may be employed in re-issues to transact the private business of the Bank. These considerations may perhaps obviate the objection, and even be found to give the said directors, agents and merchants, an interest in receiving these notes, and therefore tend to promote their easy circulation.

Indeed both the coin and notes above proposed to be issued, must, in the natural course of Indian circulation, find their way, in large proportions, to the said agents and merchants, who will of course employ the notes in local currency, and in all transactions with the Bank; the whole of the coin, in other profitable pursuits: hence arises a manifest increase of mercantile capital, and in due proportion to the means and credit of each individual merchant, for all may thus partake of as much of the said notes and coin as their trade, or probable expectations of profit, will enable them to employ.

Wherefore, if these premises be correct, the Bank may, at its first opening, commence with the discharge, in notes, of demands on the treasurers at the respective Presidencies for monthly allowances and on other accounts; and as by the supposition these notes will rapidly return to the Bank or Treasury, it would seem to preclude the necessity of any extra issue of notes, or, at all events, greatly limit it; that is, the whole or nearly the whole private business of the Bank may thus, with the annual imports of specie into India, present another source of eventual supply.

No. 5.

Papers relative to Mr. Rickards's Proposition for establishing a General Bank, &c.

(A.)

co-operation of the merchants, be transacted by means of the very notes, or (which comes to the same thing) the same amount of notes that shall be issued in the first instance in payments on account of Government.

The amount capable of circulation at the respective Presidencies, will thus be speedily ascertained, and accordingly limited. The subordinate provincial Banks may then be authorized to issue notes in the same way to a specified limited amount from each; these notes will again similarly return through the medium of merchants into the said Banks, and into the Company's Treasury, in discharge of revenue; the Treasury and Bank being conjoined, both at the Presidencies and Subordinates, will mutually assist each other; and as moreover each Bank may, it is presumed, under proper authority, and in cases of necessity, either coin or destroy notes at pleasure, so, on the one hand, there need never be impediment to the private business of the Bank, while on the other, the amount of notes in circulation may always be kept within prescribed limits. (Vide paper (B.) where this operation is further explained.

12. If the credit of the Bank be well established, this proposed $3\frac{1}{2}$ millions in notes, may not be too much for the general circulation of our Indian territories, for according to the plan, this will be the only issue of notes by the Bank or its original landed security; four millions moreover of the capital stock of the Bank is the Company's own share, which, under the operation of the Plan, as shown in the annexed figured statement, will be annually increasing, perfectly free from all incumbrance or engagement, and therefore of itself more than adequate for $3\frac{1}{2}$ millions of notes intended to be circulated.*

13. Of the present Indian debt of £. 20,000,000, there will now have been converted into bank-stock £. 8,500,000; paid in cash and by bills on the Court of Directors, £. 4,000,000; and there will remain in the hands of the creditors in promissory notes or bonds, £. 7,500,000 more, which we are now to dispose of.

14. The one third share of Government in this General Bank, or 4 millions, has been reserved to operate as a Sinking Fund, to which may be added the annual million now applied to the use of the Sinking Fund, and this combined fund will buy up £. 2,500,000 stock, and nearly extinguish the $7\frac{1}{2}$ millions of outstanding promissory notes or bonds in six years, as exhibited in the annexed figured statement: in other words, it will effectually annihilate in 6 years near £. 10,000,000 of the existing debt.

* It is perhaps impossible to state the precise amount of the Indian currency, or, until trial be made, how far commercial capital will admit of augmentation, or of a substitution in paper of that part which merchants must always keep by them to answer occasional demands: future circumstances must determine these points; but, independent of the probable conjectures to be derived from the amount of annual revenue which must be kept in view, as hereafter shown, there is one thing certain, that from the existing depressed state of industry in this country, it is capable, under proper stimuli, of incalculable increase, and therefore, of the employment of an indefinite amount of circulating capital, if the common incentives to industry and improvement be not palsied by the immoderate wants and impolitic exercise of arbitary power.

But whatever may be the immediate effect of a brisker circulation on Indian industry, the Plan, it will be easily conceived, does not propose to overload the currency with useless abundance, but merely to substitute, in the first instance, notes of unquestionable credit, for coin; which latter, in as far as it may then be redundant in the country, will be exported, or employed in foreign commerce. It is at the same time meant to infer, that there is ample room for retaining, or at least for recalling this, and perhaps a greater addition to the circulating capital, through the medium of increased industry and trade, while, in the interim, the substitution of good notes for coin, to the amount of three and a half millions, is not thought to be excessive, in a country which, independent of a brisk trade at the respective Presidencies, now pays annually fourteen millions in specie to its Government; or likely to prevent those lesser annual realizations from the revenues in coin, required for the use of the Sinking Fund, as will be more fully explained hereafter.

15. It being desirable to keep up 6 million of debt, which precise amount is now found in the hands of the stock-holders, Government may only be considered as debtor on the £. 3,500,000 of bank-notes supposed to be in circulation; Government may also now determine to continue, or withdraw its concern in the Bank: in either case, the proceeds of the combined Sinking Fund, are sufficient to call in and extinguish, if desired, the whole of the aforesaid £. 3,500,000 of bank-notes in two more years as shown in the statement, or in 8 years at furthest, to liquidate fully and effectually the proposed 14 million of debt, leaving the directors at full liberty to proceed with the Bank either on the old or any new footing deemed eligible. In short, the £. 3,500,000 of bank-notes may be considered as a loan, without interest, from the Bank to Government, which the latter are now fully prepared to pay off, or continue to employ in such way, and according to such arrangement, as may, under existing circumstances, be decided on between the parties.

16. The advantages of this plan may therefore be said to consist, under prudent management, in the certain reduction of £. 14,000,000 of the Indian debt, in a period that we may all rationally look forward to see the accomplishment of, and therefore not so liable to be counteracted by unforeseen accidents or events.

17. In eight years the annual payments on account of interest and Sinking Fund, will be reduced to £. 480,000, or £. 8 per cent. on the £. 6,000,000 of bank-stock debt; viz.

Present interest - - - - - - - -		£. 1,600,000
Applied to the use of the Sinking Fund - - - -		1,000,000
Total of present payment per annum - - -		2,600,000
Deduct:
Amount of appropriation to the Sinking Fund, no longer required - - - - -	£. 1,000,000
Interest on 14 millions of debts now extinguished at 8 per cent. - - - - - - -	1,120,000
		2,120,000
Remains - - -		£. 480,000

Whence there will be upwards of £. 2,000,000 per annum to be ever afterwards applied to the augmentation of the Company's own wealth and the improvement of their India territories. The Company may then, I presume, trade without further aid from loans: their India investments ought then in fact to cost them no more than the expense of transporting to England, which should enable them to undersell every other nation, to the very great benefit of the Mother Country. The outlay of such a sum, in the support of industry in India, will proportionably contribute to the improvement of that country, where some such fostering aid is essentially required.

18. The commercial interests of India will be greatly benefited, trade and industry increased, and therefore it is not unreasonable to expect the cordial and zealous co-operation of the mercantile body in promoting the success of the plan.

19. It has also the advantage of requiring no additional tax: it depends for success on no probable reduction of the rate of interest; and it preserves public faith with the creditors. Those who get bank-stock for their present bonds, are likely to be greatly benefited by the exchange, and the remainder are all paid according to the very letter of the original contract; should future wars incur future debts, a recurrence to the same description of Sinking Fund as above specified, presents a certain mode of rapid liquidation.

20. Finally, it has been observed in the Plan (vide notes of 9th paragraph) that the drafts on the Court of Directors in part payment of the Indian debt, have been purposely stated low, to show, or at least to try the extent of capability in our Indian means. Now, to view the Plan in all its bearings and particularly those which may at first be apprehended to press heavily on the Honourable Court in England; let us suppose the drafts, from the favourable rate of exchange, or other circumstances, to be very considerable,—lesser difficulties may be disregarded, when the greatest are capable of easy removal;—let us give this its most formidable aspect, and calculate, for example, that, of the first £. 4,000,000 to be paid off, £. 2,000,000 at least will be demanded by bills on the Court of Directors, and £. 1,000,000 more in each successive year, till the whole be liquidated; it then follows,

First.—That, as no attempt is made to pay off debt until the proposed amount be reserved from the revenues, and in the hands of the Sinking Fund, £. 2,000,000 of this sum, or any other portion, may be remitted to England through the medium of investment, or otherwise, to answer the bills so demanded on the Court of Directors.

Secondly.—A cursory view of the figured statement will show, that another annual million, or any other required amount, may be similarly remitted, to answer drafts in each succeeding year; and that the Sinking Fund is still capable of completing its object of final liquidation precisely at the same period: And,

Thirdly.—

No. 5.

Papers relative to Mr. Rickards's Proposition for establishing a General Bank, &c.

(A.)

Thirdly,—There will always be abundant time to provide for the discharge of these drafts, because they are only payable 15 months after date, or 12 months after sight; or,

Fourthly.—Should the Court of Directors prefer paying these drafts with funds raised in England, and allow the Sinking Fund to accumulate at the same time, by still appropriating to its use the interest of each portion of debt so remitted, the process of final liquidation in India will be most rapidly accelerated, as a short calculation will easily evince.

Lastly.—In proportion to these remittances, there will be so much less coin required to pay off debt in India, and therefore greater latitude for the circulation of bank-notes.

21. Hence it may be confidently added, that in whatever proportions the debt be ultimately paid in India, or in England, the resources of our Indian possessions are alone equal to the accomplishment of the object; and all the advantages of the plan are, in these respects, at least equally realizable.

(Signed) R. RICKARDS.

(Accompaniment to Letter A.)

STATEMENT, to show how the combined Sinking Fund proposed in the Plan, will extinguish, in 8 years, 14 millions of Debt; consisting, viz.

Of Bank-stock to be bought up by the gradual accumulation of the Sinking Fund	£. 2,500,000
Of Promissory Notes, D° - D°	7,500,000
And D° - to be paid off in the first instance in coin reserved from the revenues, for which Bank-notes are to be substituted, and by Bills on Court of Directors	4,000,000
Total		14,000,000
1st Year:
Proceeds of £. 4,000,000 of Bank-stock, at 8 per cent. per annum, is	£. 320,000
Add 1 million	1,000,000
to be deducted		1,320,000
		£. 12,680,000
2d Year:
Proceeds of £. 5,320,000 Stock, as above; viz. Interest thereon	£. 425,600
Add 1 million	1,000,000
to be deducted		1,425,000
		£. 11,254,400*
3d Year:
Proceeds of £. 6,745,600 Stock and Notes; viz. Interest thereon	£. 539,648
Add 1 million	1,000,000
to be deducted		1,539,648
		£. 9,714,752*
4th Year:
Proceeds of £. 8,285,248 Stock and Notes; viz. Interest thereon	£. 662,819
Add 1 million	1,000,000
to be deducted		1,662,819
		£. 8,051,933
5th Year:
Proceeds of £. 9,948,067 Stock and Notes; viz. Interest thereon	£. 795,845
Add 1 million	1,000,000
to be deducted		1,795,845
Carried forward		£. 6,256,088

* It will be observed that the fund, in this year, will have done more than purchase the £. 2,500,000 stock proposed, whence the remainder of the calculation has reference to the promissory notes and bank-notes intended to be extinguished.

Brought forward		£. 6,256,088
6th Year:
Proceeds of £. 11,743,912 Stock and Notes; viz.
Interest thereon	£. 939,513
Add 1 million	1,000,000
to be deducted		1,939,513
		£. 4,316,575*
7th Year:
Proceeds of £. 13,683,425 Stock and Notes; viz.
Interest thereon	£. 1,094,674
Add 1 million	1,000,000
to be deducted		2,094,674
		£. 2,221,901
8th Year:
Proceeds of £. 14,000,000 Stock and Notes; viz.
Interest thereon	£. 1,120,000
The full annual million being no longer required, add only	601,901
to be deducted		1,721,901
And there remains		£. 500,000

Which the Plan supposes to have been liquidated by bills on the Court of Directors, or, if no such bills are granted (which however is highly improbable) a very small addition to the Sinking Fund would still liquidate the whole in India in the course of this 8th year.

On this Statement it is further to be remarked, that until the sum of £. 4,000,000 be discharged (which the Plan supposes may be in six months after the establishment of the Bank) the whole debt will be running on at interest, as at present: whence it follows, that all that is contributed in this intervening period, on account of the Company's share of bank-stock, will be an extra charge on the revenues in the first year: this share being 4 million, and the interest thereon £. 320,000 per annum, the said extra charge on the revenues for six months, will bear a due proportion thereto.

Against the additional expense, may be stated the sum minus the annual million in the last or 8th year of the above Statement, or £. 398,099, and indeed all its other advantages, which, for so small an extra sum in the first year, may be said to be cheaply purchased.

(Signed) R. Rickards.

(B.)

STATEMENT, to show how 14 million will be liquidated, on the supposition of four million being paid off in the first instance, in the manner proposed in the 9th, &c. paragraphs, Paper A; but in the proportion of two million in coin, and two million by bills on Court of Directors.

THIS supposes an issue of two million of notes, in lieu of the coin required from the revenues to make the preceding payment, and in this case the annihilation of four millions debt will exactly counterbalance the extra charge of £. 320,000 per annum on the revenues, occasioned by the appropriation of four millions to constitute a Sinking Fund.

That part of the debt which is intended to be reduced, will then consist, as follows,

Of Bank-stock intended to be bought up by the Fund	£. 2,500,000
Of Promissory Notes outstanding - D° - D°	7,500,000
And - D° - to be paid off in the first instance, as above specified	4,000,000
Total		14,000,000
1st Year:
Proceeds of £. 4,000,000 of Bank-stock at 8 per cent. is	£. 320,000
Add 1 million	1,000,000
to be deducted		1,320,000
Carried forward		£. 12,680,000

* The seven and a half million of promissory notes being nearly bought up by the Fund in this sixth year, the remaining two years are chiefly employed in calling in the bank-notes in circulation: but as these bear no interest, the accumulation in the last of these two years, is calculated only on the stock and promissory notes which do bear interest, and will at this juncture be found in the hands of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, as follows;

	£.
Original four millions of bank-stock	4,000,000
Bank-stock bought up by the Sinking Fund	2,500,000
Promissory Notes - D° - D°	7,500,000
Total	£. 14,000,000

No. 5.

Papers relative to Mr. Rickards's Proposition for establishing a General Bank, &c.

(B.)

	Brought forward - -	£. 12,680,000
2d Year:
Proceeds of £. 5,320,000 Stock, as above; viz.
Interest thereon - - - -	£. 425,600
Add 1 million - - - -	1,000,000
	- - to be deducted - -	1,425,600
3d Year:
Proceeds £. 6,745,600 Stock and Notes; viz.
Interest thereon - - -	£. 539,648
Add 1 million - - -	1,000,000
	- - to be deducted - -	1,539,648
		£. 9,714,752
4th Year:
Proceeds of £. 8,285,248 Stock and Notes; viz.
Interest thereon - - - -	£. 662,819
Add 1 million - - - -	1,000,000
	- - to be deducted - -	1,662,819
		£. 8,051,933
5th Year:
Proceeds of £. 9,948,067 Stock and Notes; viz.
Interest thereon - - - -	£. 795,845
Add 1 million - - - -	1,000,000
	- - to be deducted - -	1,795,845
		£. 6,256,088
6th Year:
Proceeds of £. 11,743,912 Stock and Notes; viz.
Interest thereon - - - -	£. 939,513
Add 1 million - - - -	1,000,000
	- - to be deducted - -	1,939,513
7th Year:
Proceeds of £. 13,683,425 Stock and Notes; viz.
Interest thereon - - - -	£. 1,094,674
Add 1 million - - - -	1,000,000
	- - to be deducted - -	2,094,674
And there remains - - -		£. 2,221,901

Of which sum, it will be remembered two millions are proposed, in the preamble to this Statement, to be paid by bills on the Court of Directors; and if the Court are pleased to raise this sum in England, it will only leave, at the end of the 7th year, the mere trifle of £. 221,901 to be finally liquidated.

On this plan, therefore, the whole fourteen million may be positively liquidated in seven years, without any other difficulty than that of the Court of Directors borrowing two million in England, and without subjecting the revenues in this country to extra charge on account of the Sinking Fund.

But in considering the two proposals, which suggest, the one, an issue of 3½ million of notes, and the other, of two million, it is not to be supposed that either proposal infers an absolute necessity for such issue; for an attentive consideration of the Plan, will show that no such necessity exists. The Sinking Fund will notwithstanding perform all its functions with equal efficacy and regularity: but a Sinking Fund, it may be objected, would liquidate the debt of itself, without other aid; then where the use of the Bank? It is true a Sinking Fund would do so, but how establish this Sinking Fund without being an extra charge on the revenues, which the said revenues can ill bear; or without additional taxes, which would most assuredly be oppressive? The union of the Bank and Sinking Fund, obviates this serious and important difficulty.

1st. By the issue of 3½ million of notes, as a substitute for so much specie, intended, with another half million, by draft on the Court of Directors, to pay off four million of debt, a sum of annual interest (£. 320,000) is extinguished, exactly equal to the annual extra sum, or £. 320,000, required to support the Sinking Fund.

2d. By the issue of two million of notes, and the payment of two million more by the Court of Directors, the same effect is produced, and in both cases there is no extra charge on the revenue.

3d. Should the issues of the Bank, in either of these two cases, not reach the precise limit above defined, still every approach to it will be a proportionate diminution of the extra charge on the revenues. The probability indeed is, that it will be no extra charge at all, and therefore certainly require no additional tax; and if this object is capable of accomplishment, as anticipated in the Plan, it affords ample proof of the utility of the proposed co-operative union of the Sinking Fund and the Bank.

4th. Admitting the worst that can occur, viz. that a part of the support of the Sinking Fund do prove a charge on the revenues, still it need only be temporary, for the preceding Statement shows the Fund to be annually increasing. In the 4th year, for example, it will be upwards of eight millions: at which period even the whole of the original £. 320,000 required for its support, might be surrendered; and it would still proceed in the rapid liquidation of the debt, though not quite so rapid as before.

But all this relates to the advantage derivable by Government, in the establishment of a Sinking Fund free of charge. To estimate the advantages, of which the Plan is supposed capable, to the merchants (independent of those acknowledged general advantages derivable from the institution of an extensive bank) let us, for example, Suppose 24 lacs issued at Bombay and its subordinates, or any other sum determined on by the Bank Directors, and that a considerable portion passes into the hands of the merchants, and remains floating in circulation, that is employed in payments between individuals, or in circulating commodities locally; and let us suppose, for the sake of the explanation, that ten lacs be employed in revenue payments to Government, i. e. to be constantly returning on the Company's treasury.

The first portion is a clear addition to the mercantile capital, as exhibited in note to para. 10. Plan A. to be employed as the said merchants think proper. Even this portion of the issue might be employed in the banking business without loss, probably with some degree of gain.

But of the other portion, which is supposed to be circulating through the different treasuries, does not the union of the Bank and Treasury afford means to the former of employing this amount to their own exclusive advantage? The treasury, for example, lending it, as it were, to the Bank, free of interest. In other words, if notes can be coined and destroyed at pleasure, so as to keep a certain limited amount always floating, may not the Bank employ in its private business, and to its own exclusive advantage, a sum of notes equal to what experience shall ascertain to be the amount always returning on the Company's treasury in revenue payments, where each payment so received, will, for a certain period, lie dead? Would not this be in fact the same thing as allowing the Bank a portion at the first issue on their own account? And would not the numerous points at which notes would be always readily received at par, viz. the treasuries, the different agents and merchants, and the Bank itself, tend greatly to facilitate the circulation of that quantity determined to be issued, and lessen, if not obviate, the danger of an inconvenient run on the Bank for specie?

Another View of the same case:

Suppose the circulation to absorb 24 lacs, of which 14 go to the merchants, and 10 return on the Company's treasury. The first 14 is an addition to the merchants capital, to be employed as they think proper.

Suppose the revenue 60 lacs per annum, paid in three instalments of 20 lacs each, i. e. once in four months, of which, ten lac in bank-notes; then as ten lac may be supposed withdrawn from the commercial circulation, and to return on the Company's treasuries every four months, could not the Bank employ this 10 lac, or which is the same thing, an equal amount, in the conduct of its private business? In other words, might it not issue ten additional lacs into the commercial circulation, destroying a corresponding amount from the payments made daily or regularly into the Bank; still limiting, by such destruction, the amount in circulation to the 24 lacs above specified; and at the same time gain all the advantage of employing the ten lac which it was thus able to send abroad.

By this supposition, the Bank would go on issuing, we'll say, ten lac of notes at its discretion, and according to its own judgment of the probability of their remaining out. The notes cost the Bank nothing, and bear no interest; if therefore we suppose their daily receipts and issues to balance each other, they may surely destroy ten lacs of their receipts, while they have all the advantage of the ten lac at issues, since the notes are of no value, either way, to them, but from the interest they produce.

Let us next suppose this operation to occupy the four months above adverted to, or perhaps six or eight months. By this time, the payers of revenue, who have another instalment to make good, will probably have withdrawn ten lacs more from the commercial circulation. But there is also 10 lacs in the treasury: it is issued to Company's servants, who disburse part, and pay the rest to their agents; and it thus goes to fill up the void in the commercial circulation.

There is now again exactly 24 lac in currency, of which 10 being thus capable of continued employment in the private transactions of the Bank, they of course derive the advantage thereof, and the prescribed 24 lacs is not exceeded.

It would be impossible, on this plan, to define the precise amount of notes which the Bank would be enabled to employ; but it is very certain that the amount would be considerable; as a large proportion of the notes issued would most unquestionably form a part of all future revenue payments, and these notes would for a certain time be always lying dead, either in the treasury, or in the hands of the payers of revenue, expecting the day of instalment.

If therefore the advantage here supposed be realizable, it should, including every other profit realizable from the private business of the Bank, be shared by the said Bank, free of all participation on the part of Government; for Government, it must be remembered, have their advantage in the first instance, arising out of the first issue of notes: with this they ought ought in justice to be content, and therefore to cede all other profits to the directors and proprietors.

No. 5.

Papers relative to Mr. Rickards's Proposition for establishing a General Bank, &c.

This is supposing always a first issue on account of Government: but as this operation may appear too complicated; and as these two first proposals are intended more as explanatory suggestions than as plans for actual adoption; let us proceed to a third, leaving to future determination, whether either of the submitted Plans, or modifications thereof (of which indeed the principle will be found abundantly capable,) be, or be not ultimately feasible, with the advantages anticipated in favour of Government and the Public.

(B.)

(Signed) R. Rickards.

PROPOSAL (C.)

In a Letter from the Government of Bombay, of 22 Oct.

1. But in the preceding Proposals A and B, it may still be objected, that difficulties will occur in keeping a large amount of notes in circulation, or in accumulating sufficient specie in such case, from the revenues, to furnish the Bank and Sinking Fund with, for buying up the outstanding bonds or promissory notes: all of which contain a stipulation to be paid in cash, or by the bills on the Court of Directors; or, finally, that they do not afford a certainty of sufficient profit to the directors and proprietors of stock: To which I answer,

2. That if these difficulties be deemed insurmountable, the Plan may be executed in another mode; viz.

3. Let the Bank, after establishment in the way proposed in the Plan A, proceed with its business of credits, discount, and exchange, issuing notes on these accounts only, proportioned to its actual deposits of cash; and let the Sinking Fund then operate on the whole of the bonds or promissory notes outstanding, which in this case will be equivalent to £.11,500,000 and the bank-stock intended to be bought up to reduce the debt to 6 millions, - 2,500,000

Total - - £. 14,000,000

The preceding figured Statements show, that the proposed Sinking Fund is still more than equal to the liquidation of this amount in eight years; and this latter mode, if preferred, may therefore be followed.

4. But in this case, it must be remembered that the annual payments out of the revenues, on account of the Bank, will be - - - - - - - - - £. 1,000,000
And interest on the above £. 11,500,000 of outstanding bonds at £. 8 per cent - 920,000

Total per annum - £. 1,920,000

or, £. 320,000 more than is now paid for interest on the debt, or in other words, an annual extra charge equal to the income derived by the Company from their original share of bank stock, to be appropriated, as above shown, to the use of the Sinking Fund.

5. And it must be further remembered, that in this case the notes in circulation may not differ much, in their aggregate amount, from that of the first or second Plan; for though 3½ million, or otherwise 2 million, is proposed to be issued altogether, yet the Plan expressly limits the amount to what may be always circulated at par, whilst from the immediate return of these notes to the Bank, in the ordinary course of Indian circulation, it merely anticipates the advantage of combining this important aid to Government, with the benefit which its other branches of business are capable of yielding to the directors and proprietors of stock.

6. If, however, this last mode be found to obviate real difficulties in the way of the other, and therefore preferred, there will only remain to provide, from the surplus revenues in India, for this extra charge of £. 320,000 per annum, which, compared to the annual revenue of the country, is but a trifle.

7. In opposition to this extra charge, may be stated the probable gains of the Bank over and above its certain £. 8 per cent. income. They may possibly reimburse the Company in the full amount of the above-mentioned extra charge, or even more, and in this case counterbalance the required extra supply from the surplus revenue, or otherwise, being added to the sinking fund, annually tend to liquidate the whole debt in a proportionately shorter period. At all events, I should anxiously hope that whatever portion of this extra charge may not be counterbalanced by the profits of the Bank, would be met by some practicable reform of present expenditure, rather than by the imposition of an additional tax; which, in the present distressed state of industry in India, particularly agricultural, I should earnestly deprecate.

8. Whichever therefore of the three preceding plans, if indeed either be thought worthy of attention, every objection arising out of deficiency of specie, merits deliberate consideration, for the payment of the bonds or promissory notes in specie, as far as the discharge be required in India, I take to be indispensable to the maintenance of public faith. On the aggregate gate amount of the coin now circulating in India, we can at best only speculate, or even as to the amount of notes that may be circulated without depreciation, having provided an adequate check against improvident issues, local experience and practical observation must necessarily determine the rest; yet to afford more distinct ideas on this part of the subject, it may be useful to repeat, and even keep constantly in view, that the 3½ million or the two million proposed to be issued in notes, will clearly be an addition to the present circulation, whatever it is; admitting therefore that the circulation may absorb this amount always at par, and that in the manner proposed in the Plan (vide note, para. 10. Plan A. and Plan B.) the other business of the Bank may be conducted by means of this issue alone; it still follows that it can only be a substitution in lieu of so much coin, which coin, in as far as it cannot then be employed at home, will necessarily be exported. Let us suppose it all exported; then, deducting the sum which merchants must keep always in hand to answer occasional demands, we may expect the major part of the remainder will be continually returning into the Company's Treasury and the Bank. In proportion therefore to the amount of this first issue of notes, whatsoever it may be, and which ever plan be adopted, we may be assured that all future revenue payments will be made in paper; and this is a very material consideration in view to the ultimate success of the plan.

9. It is moreover probable the Bank will soon practically know what portion of the above sum is likely to be absorbed by mercantile capital, and the circulation of the respective Presidencies: there are further considerations required to be duly weighed in the first or gradual issue of notes, for on this must depend the amount to which each provincial bank should then be positively and specifically limited. I have stated this issue altogether at 3½ million, or at two million, in the avowed hopes of the Plan being capable, under prudent management, of circulating notes to this extent; but it remains now to be added, that the issue must be limited to this amount, or to some other prescribed by local experience, until the debt is liquidated, in view to the annual realization of coin from the revenues required for paying of the creditors, and other indispensable purposes.

10. The present bonds, or promissory notes, stipulate that the interest, as well as principal, is to be paid in cash, &c. alias specie. It hence follows that Government must continue to pay every particle of interest on their debt in specie; so that the whole annual payments indispensable to be made in specie, after the 4,000,000 l. shall have been paid off, will stand as follows: The total amount of debt will then be 16,000,000 l.

The interest of which, at 8 per cent.	£. 1,280,000		These two sums of course include the income settled on the Bank, as per 2d paragraph, Plan (A.)
Government's share of bank-stock interest, or 8 l. per cent. on four millions - - - - - -	320,000
		1,600,000
The annual million for the use of the Sinking Fund - - - - - - - - -		1,000,000
Total per annum - -		£. 2,600,000

11. From this view of the subject, the local authorities may judge of the probability of these sums being realized in specie, in each succeeding year, from the revenues to be paid into the Bank and Sinking Fund; and must necessarily portion the issue of notes accordingly. But this coin, it must be remembered, will again return into the currency, and remain there; it cannot quit the country, as the first 3½ million or two million did, because it is not over and above what was in currency before, and therefore not over and above what the circulation of the country requires. There will be here no substitution of notes, as in the other case; for by the supposition almost all the notes in circulation will be continually returning upon the Bank, either in the course of its own business, or on account of payments to Government, and these again will be continually re-issued in the same way; so that after ascertaining what may be absorbed by mercantile capital, and the circulation of the Presidencies respectively, the above annual sum of 2,600,000 l. as being required in actual coin, will afford a very tolerable criterion by which to regulate the total issue of notes, should the first or second plan be adopted; or should the third mode be preferred, the annual sum in coin of 2,920,000 *l. will be requisite, and therefore form the criterion; for if due provision be made for securing either of these sums annually in coin, according as either plan may be adopted, it seems to me unobjectionable to supply any portion of the remaining currency in paper, as long as that paper is of sufficient credit, and conducted with sufficient prudence to circulate invariably and certainly at par.

* It will not, I trust, be conceived here that either this sum or the preceding one of £. 2,600,000, infer an additional burthen or charge on the revenues to this amount, over and above present expenses. An attentive perusal of these sheets will show that they both include the interest on the present debt and the annual million to the Sinking Fund, which, from the papers laid before Parliament, I suppose to be easily contributable in time of peace.

The latter sum implies, it is true, an extra charge of £.320,000, as specified in the 4th paragraph of this Statement, but this (vide 7th paragraph) is again expected to be fully counterbalanced by the gains arising in this case out of the private business of the Bank.

12. In this consideration of the aggregate amount of Indian revenue, it will now be seen that no conclusions are thence intended to be drawn as to the actual amount of current coin; it does not indeed afford grounds for any such calculations; but perhaps it is not unreasonable to suppose, that in a country of depressed industry and languid circulation, a greater proportion of the actual currency must be employed in the annual payments to Government than in those industrious states where a small actual sum, by rapid change of hands, may serve to discharge a large annual amount. This supposition has, I confess, influenced some of the preceding suggestions; but the whole are, with deference, submitted to better judgments.

No. 5.

Papers relative to Mr. Rickards's Proposition for establishing a General Bank, &c.

(Signed) R. Rickards.

(D.)

ALL the preceding Proposals are founded on the supposition of being able to establish a Sinking Fund equal to four million, in the first instance, free of all, or at most but little extra charge on the revenues. But the plan, on the principle proposed, is evidently capable of modification, so as that the amount of the Sinking Fund, in the first instance, be exactly regulated by the advantage or profits which Government may be enabled to realize from the institution of the Bank.

First. Suppose, then, according to Plan (A.) and (B.), that only one million of notes be issued, in the first instance, on account of Government, and one million paid by draft on the Court of Directors, so as to admit of the establishment of a Sinking Fund, free of extra charge on the revenues, to the amount of two million at the first outset: or, Second, Suppose, according to Proposal C. that in order to establish the said fund, free of charge as above mentioned, the Government in India be allowed to draw on the Court of Directors for two million, with which to purchase bank-stock in India: or, which comes to the same thing, to purchase some promissory notes to be converted into bank-stock; a sinking fund is then established free of all charge on the Indian revenues. The two million will cost the Court of Directors in England 5 per cent. diminished, however, if not wholly counterbalanced, or perhaps more than counterbalanced, by the profits arising in this country from the Government share in the Bank, and which may therefore be annually remitted to meet the said charge in England.

In either of these cases, a Sinking Fund of two million is established, which will have to operate on the following portions of debt; viz.

Bank-stock to be bought by the fund, so as to reduce the said Stock to six million	£.4,500,000
And Promissory Notes outstanding	9,500,000
		14,000,000
1st Year:
Proceeds of two million of Stock, at 8 per cent. per annum	£.160,000
Add 1 million	1,000,000
	to be deducted	1,160,000
	£.	12,840,000
2d Year:
Proceeds of £. 3,160,000 Stock, D° - D°	£. 252,800
Add 1 million	1,000,000
	to be deducted	1,252,800
	£.	11,587,200
3d Year:
Proceeds of £. 4,412,800 Stock, as above,	£. 353,024
Add 1 million	1,000,000
	to be deducted	1,353,024
	£.	10,234,176
4th Year:
Proceeds of £. 5,765,824 Stock, as above,	£. 461,266
Add 1 million	1,000,000
	to be deducted	1,461,266
	£.	8,772,910
5th Year:
Proceeds of £. 7,227,090 Stock and Notes, as above	£. 578,167
Add 1 million	1,000,000
	to be deducted	1,578,167
	Carried forward	£. 7,194,743

6th Year:		Brought forward - -	£.7,194,743
Proceeds of £.8,805,257 Stock and Notes, as above - - - - -	£. 704,420
Add 1 million - - - -	1,000,000
	- - to be deducted - -		1,704,420
			£. 5,490,323
7th Year:
Proceeds of £.10,509,677 Stock and Notes, as above - - - - -	£. 840,774
Add 1 million - - - -	1,000,000
	- - to be deducted - -		1,840,774
			£. 3,649,549
8th Year:
Proceeds of £.12,350,451 Stock and Notes, as above - - - - -	£. 988,036
Add 1 million - - - -	1,000,000
	- - to be deducted - -		1,988,036
			1,661,513
9th Year:
Proceeds of £.14,338,487 Stock and Notes, as above - - -			1,147,079
	And there remains - - -		£. 414,434

which is all that will be required of the annual million in this year, to effect a complete liquidation of the proposed fourteen million of debt.

This Statement, it will be observed, is calculated on the supposition that the principle of the last Plan C. be adopted, viz. to issue no notes in the first instance on account of Government; but if that of either of the other proposals, which infer a first issue on account of Government, be preferred, the process of final liquidation will be exactly the same; for in this case the Sinking Fund in the last year will have to operate on bank-notes, instead of promissory notes, which will cause no difference as to final results.

(Signed) R. Rickards.

(E.)

EXPLANATORY REMARKS on the preceding Plan.

In a Letter from the Government of Bombay, of 22 Oct. 1807.

1. SOME material parts of the Plan contained in the preceding sheets, seeming still to require elucidation, a few additional Remarks may be useful.

2. It is already, I apprehend, sufficiently shown how the Bank, in all its operations and decisions, will be independent of Government, whilst still deriving every proper aid from an union with the public treasuries, both at the presidencies and subordinates. The Bank Directors are all independent men, with the exception of one Government Director, the others may be at each presidency a member from each commercial house, with a certain number of natives; and as all measures are to pass by majority of votes, it precludes the possibility of undue influence on the part of Government, without an arbitrary and violent breach of the original compact. The advantage and utility of this independence are adverted to in the Plan itself, and are too obvious and well known to require further explanation. The advantage and utility of a certain degree of check on the other Bank Directors, is also adverted to, and will be further manifest in these remarks.

3. Both these are points of importance to require serious and very particular attention in the final arrangement of the Bank, should the Plan be ever carried into effect.

4. The operation of the subordinate banks proposed in the Plan, may be compared in some respects to that of the country banks in England, relatively to that great centre of circulation, the Bank of England.

5. Under the controul of the Bank of England, the country banks are of the greatest use to country traders, who now transact their business with the metropolis through the banker in their own neighbourhood, with greater facility and expedition, at less risk, and a lower rate of commission than when the said traders were obliged to employ their separate correspondents.

6. The advantages thus experienced in the commercial and pecuniary intercourse between town and country, have been compared to those of the economized abridgment of labour which generally mark the growing prosperity of mechanical employments in a flourishing

No. 5

Papers relative to Mr. Rickards's Proposition for establishing a General Bank, &c.

(E.)

flourishing country. The labour of keeping accounts, writing letters, receiving and paying bills, is transferred to one house, which had before been divided among many; and a "new "security afforded to the transactions between the metropolis and the country, by the "interposed credit of wealthy and respectable country banks."

7. By the simplification, in short, of pecuniary transactions, they are conducted at less risk, as well as at less expense to individuals.

8. The subordinate banks proposed in the Plan, are evidently capable of all the advantages enumerated or adverted to in the preceding paragraphs; the facility and security which they will afford to all commercial and pecuniary intercourse between the respective presidencies and the subordinates, and between one part of the Company's territories and another, cannot fail to be beneficially felt in the internal trade of the country, and to smooth many difficulties and obviate many hazards now unavoidably experienced.

9. But the subordinate banks will do more. By union and connection with the public treasuries in each district, they are capable of still greater benefit to the commercial community, by simplifying and regulating the business of exchange. At present the exchange all over India is liable to sudden and violent fluctuations, which are inexplicable on any other grounds than the manœuvres and secret dealings of shroffs: these fluctuations are often not to be accounted for by the actual state of the currency, or existing balances of trade; indeed their suddenness, violence and variableness, preclude their being attributed to causes which would naturally produce steadier effects; and no man, I believe, entertains a doubt of the secret mal-practices and artifices of shroffs being the actual cause. The admitted fact is therefore a proof of the undue and pernicious influence of these shroffs over the course of trade, from which the fair and honourable dealer has long sighed to be effectually liberated.

10. It is therefore a principal object of the Plan to effect this liberation, and to free entirely the trade of the Company's territories from this source of difficulty and impediment. The subordinate banks, from their union with the public treasuries, and dependence on the great presidency banks, are the means of accomplishing it. Bills of exchange may be freely given on any part of the Company's territories at a reasonable rate of exchange, at even a lower rate than it is possible for private money-dealers to grant the same accommodation, and without the possibility, as far as I can see, of obstruction from the shroffs within the limits of the Company's territories. That this accommodation may be more cheaply granted by the banks than by individuals, is evident, because the banks having no occasion to transport bullion or specie, or to use the bullion or specie of a correspondent, who must be recompensed for the advance, may therefore do it with less charge but equal profit; or if bullion should at any time be required to be transported, it may, with the aid of Government, be so transported at less expense to the Bank than to the individual; and therefore, under this supposition, which is a case that will but seldom occur, the accommodation may still be more cheaply granted.

N.B.—It may be one of the articles of agreement between Government and the Bank, that in the few cases where specie or bullion requires to be transported, it shall be done free of expense to the Bank. This alone will give the Bank a decided advantage over the shroffs, who never can transport specie without considerable risk and expense.

For this and any other aid it may be in the power of Government to grant, they may consider themselves amply recompensed in the speedy reduction of their debt and the general advancement of commerce. Both parties have a reciprocal interest in the success of the entire plan.

11. In short, the diminished labour and risk, and consequently the diminished charges with which these banks are capable of carrying on this business of exchange and remittance, must necessarily exclude all competition on the part of the shroff, or individual money dealers.

12. When the shroffs are thus driven out of this part at least of the money market, they may not improbably seek, in the gradual course of time, a connection with the banks; it will be their interest to do so; it is the only apparent method by which this connexion can be brought about, and it is highly desirable, from the means which these shroffs, through their money connexions, possess of facilitating and extending the operations of the said banks. In the outset of this institution, actuated by self-interest also, their first attempts will be to obstruct the banks; but these, I apprehend, must be vain, and wholly ineffectual: foiled in these attempts, the next incitement of self-interest may be to co-operate; and if the great Indian shroffs are thus in time either impelled or persuaded to connect themselves with the institution, the same benefits as above described, will be no longer confined to our own territories, but follow the commerce of our merchants over the whole extent of India.

13. Whether this object be accomplished in the whole, or in part, the business of exchange and remittance may at all events, to the extent of its accomplishment, be reduced to clear and definite rules; the rates of exchange may be always fixed and known, and the expense of distant speculations calculated without a possible risk, from this source of disappointment.

14. The first rule to be considered is, the state of the currency in different districts:—A given weight of fine bullion, in the respective coins of any two districts, constitutes the real par of exchange; and this given weight, not the nominal value of current coins in the respective districts, affords the only equitable grounds of fixing the rate of exchange, as far as it is likely to be effected by this cause; even the shroffs themselves must, I apprehend, be guided by the same principle. For let us suppose, merely for the sake of the argument argument, that a Bombay rupee and a Surat rupee were both ordered to pass at the same nominal value, the Bombay having 15, and the Surat 10 grains of more silver; the Surat rupee is at this rate a depreciated currency, and every species of depreciated currency has the certain effect of raising the prices of commodities. It is evident that a bag of rice would be worth more Surat rupees than Bombay rupees, and no Surat shroff would give a bill at par on Bombay, knowing he received for his bill a coin worth less, by upwards of 30 per cent. than the coin in which it was to be discharged. He would lose all this difference in real value by the transaction.

15. There appears to me therefore no fear of counteraction from the shroffs, in the adoption of this equitable rule, because they could not counteract it without loss to themselves; and a trade that is carried on at a loss cannot be long supportable.

16. The next rule to be considered is, the balance of trade between different countries, or, in other words, the difference between their respective exports and imports. Where the exports and imports are equal, there will be a reciprocal equality of debts and credits; but where the imports exceed the exports of a country, there is a balance against that country; and the excess of imports must be paid for in bullion or specie: goods cannot be sent to pay it, because no more are required. The immediate purchasers of the excess of imports may pay their debt by a bill of exchange, but then they must advance to the shroff who grants it, all the expense, added to his own profit of sending bullion to the spot, to answer the draft in question.

17. It is therefore clear, that, all other things being equal, bills of exchange required to discharge an unfavourable balance, ought never to cost more than the expense of transporting bullion to the spot where the debt requires to be discharged, for if they did, bullion would of course be remitted in their stead.

18. But according to the Plan, the subordinate banks, from their connection with the public treasuries, will in most cases relieve the Presidency Banks, and also each other, from the necessity of remittances on this account; and as the cases must be few in which such remittances will be necessary, it follows, in further proof of a preceding assertion, that this branch of business may be conducted at a much cheaper rate by the banks, than is possible for individuals.

19. Indeed, with due attention to these two rules, I do not see why bills of exchange may not pass between all the banks at a very near approximation of the real par of exchange. The difference can only be what is necessary to reimburse expenses, with a moderate profit to the Bank, and possibly this may in no case exceed one or two per cent.

20. Surely then it is not too much to say, a grand and decided permanent advantage is here established in favour of our own commerce, facilitating its operations, and tending to the stability of its profits, without the possibility of successful opposition from the shroffs, at least as far as regards the immediate pecuniary intercourse of our own districts.

21. The generality of the system will prevent any hurtful effect on the aggregate amount of local currencies, as few or no remittances will be required to be made from one part to another to answer drafts; there will be no violent interference in the natural course of the money circulation, though a treasury may be occasionally exhausted by the discharge of drafts; the money remaining in the same district, will again return to it in revenue payments; due credit will of course be given for all advances on account of the Bank, and in the event of local distress any where, a neighbouring district, or the Presidency, will always be at hand to relieve it.

22. Another object in the contemplation of the Plan, is to furnish as many checks as possible against an excessive issue of paper, as prejudicial always in its effects to the public as to the Bank itself. To prevent over-traders (of whom many are found among the secondary class of merchants in all countries) from taking improper advantage of the Bank, it is authorized and even particularly required to use its own discretion and judgment in granting credits or cash accounts; for men of the description above mentioned, on producing undeniable security, might raise funds with a Bank to promote imprudent speculations, and thereby throw an excess of paper into currency; for the inconveniences of which to the public, even the ruin of the speculator, would be no recompense, and the security of the Bank no remedy. This means of excessive issue may therefore, it is hoped, be effectually checked in India, from the accurate knowledge in so limited a community, which Bank Directors may attain of the nature of their neighbours mercantile speculations; whilst it appears advisable to extend this power to the Bank, lest it might otherwise be exercised by the shroffs to the prejudice of this institution.

23. In the business of discount, it is true, a bank is liable to be imposed on by speculators through the medium of bills of accommodation; fictitious drafts may be presented for discount, and a capital or sum of money may thus be obtained from a bank under fraudulent pretences; but in this country, again, as above intimated, where the commercial community is so limited, and its members, generally speaking, so well known, frauds of this description can hardly be practised to any great extent. It would seem to be within the power of vigilance on the part of the Bank, to restrain the evil so as never to produce permanent mischief; for the Bank may narrow its discounts, or in this country raise its rate of interest at pleasure; and it is not a casual and temporary excess of paper that is so injurious to the

No. 5.

Papers relative to Mr. Rickards's Proposition for establishing a General Bank, &c.

Public, as that permanence of superabundant currency, which necessarily affects the nominal prices of all commodities.

24. Yet notwithstanding these checks on the speculations of others, experience teaches us that there is a manifest tendency in directors themselves and proprietors of bank-stock, to increase their issues of paper to an extent hurtful to the public, for the promotion of their own private gains. The greatest banks in the world have been guilty of this error, and the Bank of Ireland, and even the Bank of England, are at this day existing proofs of the fact.

(E)

25. After the restriction of payments in specie in 1797, the former had, in six years, increased its paper issues from about £. 600,000, to upwards of 2½ million; and the latter, from about 10½ million, to upwards of 16 million; and the bad effect is universally felt.

26. It is here, then, that the Government Director may be found chiefly useful, with no other interest in the Bank but what may arise out of an esprit de corps: his chief views will be directed to the successful operations of the Sinking Fund, and to the public advantages derivable from the whole institution; he may therefore successfully interfere, and even exercise a salutary influence in checking speculations tending to promote private advantage at the expense of the public good. It is in this view of salutary check, without the power of undue influence, that utility is anticipated from the services of a Government Director; and in this view, his mind should be familiar with principles enabling him to discriminate between the advantages of the banking system and its abuse; and to prescribe a limit to speculations beyond which Directors should never pass. In this duty, however, he will only point out the rule which is still left to the good sense and public spirit of the conjoined Directors to adopt or reject.

27. It has been observed, that the most perfect and most commodious currency of any great commercial country, consists in a due union of paper with the precious metals, and some of the reasons above given are a proof of its convenience to commerce: the value however of every currency is measured by its utility, and the consequent confidence placed in it, by the concurrent opinion of the world, as a medium of exchange. Divest the precious metal of its worth as a commodity, and it is the general confidence of the world in its immediate convertibility into articles of use and consumption, that gives it value as a money currency: for the same reason, paper must owe its entire value (since it possesses none within itself) to confidence: this confidence is complete while it continues a real and useful representative of the precious metals which enjoy the general confidence of the world: but the precious metals themselves have their utility proportioned to the demand for them in any country, as a medium of exchange; their use diminishes with superabundance; in other words, their value lowers, and the currency is then said to be depreciated: if this happens to the metals themselves, how much more evidently must it be the case with paper? A superabundant currency, therefore, whatever it consist of, is a depreciated one; and in proportion as its own value is lowered, that of every other commodity is raised: a more striking example cannot be produced than the effect of the discovery of the American mines; it threw an abundance of metal into the great money market of Europe, which proportionably raised the money prices of all commodities for which it was exchanged: commodities are now estimated at 15 times the price they stood at the conquest; other causes have contributed to this increase of price; but the abundance of money lowering its own value, is a chief one.

N. B.—It is said by one of the ablest writers on this subject, that, when in England, payments under five pounds were made in cash, and larger payments in paper, convertible immediately into specie, the system appeared to unite the conveniences, and exclude the disadvantages of a paper currency in the greatest possible degree. If a similar principle be adopted in India, it is hoped it may never be slightly relinquished in the practice of banks. Experience has proved the evil of deviation from salutary rules.

28. It is therefore evident that every currency should be proportioned to the exact demand there may be for its use, as a representative of value, or medium of exchange: gold and silver, if left to the natural course of things, would find their own proper limit; but a paper currency, capable of arbitrary increase, requires to be regulated: it should never exceed in amount the quantity of precious metal a society would otherwise demand, and of which it is only intended to be an useful and cheap representative: its constant and immediate convertibility into specie, is a satisfactory indication of its being always confined within this, its proper boundary; without this convertibility indeed, it at once loses a portion of that confidence which is its only value: with it, confidence is firmly established; and though at first it may be rather slow of growth, where the institution is quite novel, yet a confirmed experience in this immediate convertibility into cash, must necessarily give at length its just value to paper, in every commercial country in the world.

N. B.—When paper is issued into currrency, it will, in its first effect, supersede the use of so much coin. The coin not being required in home circulation, will of course lose a portion of its value in that particular channel; it naturally seeks employment in others; more may be now employed by jewellers and manufacturers in precious metals. Merchants finding the paper answer for the transaction of home concerns, will employ coins in their commercial intercourse with foreigners, or in purchases or payments where

29. It must not however be supposed that discount is the only proof of excess in paper currency: bank paper may be excessive to a considerable degree before it attains this point of depreciation; the first effect of a superabundant currency is, as in the case of the precious metal itself, to raise the price of commodities by being lowered in its own value: this effect not being so plainly perceptible as a positive discount, is the more dangerous from its secret operation, and therefore the more necessary to be guarded against. Every species of depreciated currency produces this effect; and when a known large quantity of paper exists in circulation, it may, with great probability, be assigned to this cause. Bullion being a commodity like others in the market, and, generally speaking, more steady than any other in its price and value, is commonly looked to as one test of this excess; and where its market price for a constancy exceeds the mint price, without being being explicable by an unfavourable balance of trade, it is generally esteemed a criterion of debased currency. The course of exchange with different foreign countries, is another common test, because the goods purchased by nations from each other, will be ultimately estimated by their bullion, not currency value, and all other things being equal, the exchange will necessarily be, or appear to be, against that country whose currency is depreciated. This test is a good one in countries where the exchange is not under the influence and direction of money-dealing monopolists; but in this country, where shroffs almost exclusively regulate the course of exchange, as their own views or interests dictate, the test may not be so applicable as that of the steady market price of bullion.

where coin will go further than the paper currency; a quantity of coin proportioned to the issue of paper will thus silently and gradually be displaced in the home circulation, and without any apparent effect on the price of labour and commodities; but unless there be proper checks to the issue of paper, it may go on imperceptibly and gradually increasing, till it becomes excessive; i. e. till there be more than the circulation would have absorbed of coin had there been no paper issued. This effect is first felt in a rise of prices, because the currency is depreciated by superabundance; but it does not follow that the paper will be at a discount, because gold and silver, possessing intrinsic value, will still find employment at home; the greater loss and charges of exporting it, may prove a certain portion to continue in the home circulation along with the paper currency, and they must necessarily pass (while the public confidence is not impared) at the same rates in respect to each other; but if the excess of paper continues to increase till the depreciation at home is so great as to render it actually profitable, after defraying all charges of freight, insurance, &c. to export the coin, then it will be forced abroad as it were for exportation sake; it may be said, to shun all further intercourse with the depreciated paper currency; and the latter will naturally bear a positive discount, because it must then pay a premium for retaining gold, &c. at home, which otherwise it would be more profitable to export. In the intermediate gradations of debasement, however, it would seem that paper may continue to circulate in excessive quantity, without this more observable and striking mark of degradation.

30. The state of home currency is, however, a matter of the highest importance in the administration of an extensive or National Bank; for it must be remembered, that every depreciation of that currency is not only a public inconvenience, but equally public injustice. Whatever lowers the intrinsic value of a currency, is a positive violation of every existing contract in the country. Every creditor finds the amount of the just debt due to him diminished; every income is lessened in value, from inability to procure for its possessor an equal amount of the necessaries and comforts of life. Every description of wages is necessarily raised with the rise in the price of commodities. Every consumer feels it, though he may not be aware of the real cause; and even Government, the greatest consumer of all, have all their expenses increased in the same proportion, and must accordingly have ultimate recourse for relief to increased taxes.

N. B.—An excessive issue of paper is not only an inconvenience to the public in the rise of prices, but will be felt by the Bank itself, which is required to discharge its notes in specie on demand. For in the case of the market price of bullion exceeding the mint price, there will naturally be a run on the Bank for specie to convert into bullion, a run which might subject the richest Bank to very heavy distress.—Hence it occurs, that the constant and immediate convertibility of bank paper into specie, is, as a general rule, perhaps the best security that can be adopted against excessive issue, for in the event of excess, the paper will naturally return on the Bank to be exchanged.

31. An excessive issue of paper, therefore, though not subject to an actual discount, must have precisely the same effect on the community at large, as a proportionate depreciation in the gold or silver currency. It is the same, in effect, as those detestable expedients of the governments of old, in diminishing the intrinsic value, or raising the denomination of their coins for the sake of temporary gain; and which have been the execration of all subsequent writers. It is, in short, a power too extensive, and too important in its consequences, to be solely intrusted in the hands of men who have a manifest interest in abusing it; and it is in this respect, therefore, in particular, that I think a salutary check over the operations of the Bank, should be exercised by the Government itself.

It is this due limitation of paper currency, also, which gives it a stable and permanent value, and stability is a point of the utmost importance in every medium of exchange; an unstable currency must be one of impaired utility, considered as a measure of value; and what stability can attach to paper that fluctuates beyond the limit of that intrinsic value which it is merely intended to represent?

Constant and immediate convertibility into specie is therefore a rule which cannot be too much insisted on.

32. In other respects, and in all useful respects, the Bank will enjoy entire freedom. They will have every aid which Government is capable of affording; and that aid will, as it ought to be, liberally granted. The chief object of Government being the speedy reduction of the public debt, that object attained, its views of collateral advantages, from the establishment of the Bank, will, as they ought to be, proportionably limited.

(Signed) R. Rickards.

Ordered, That the following Letter be written to the Honourable the Governor in Council of Bombay:

To the Honourable JONATHAN DUNCAN, Esq. Governor in Council of Bombay.

Honourable Sir,

WE have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Letter under date the 22d of October last, transmitting copy of a Letter addressed to you by Mr. Rickards, with the several Documents mentioned to accompany it, on the subject of paying off the Indian Debt by the institution of a General Bank.

2. The

No. 5.

Papers relative to Mr. Rickards's Proposition for establishing a General Bank, &c.

(E.)

2. The Honourable the Court of Directors having in a late dispatch expressed their decided opinion against the establishment of a public Bank, in which it is proposed that their Government should have an interest, without their previous sanction; we do not consider it to be necessary to take the subject into our consideration, but recommend it to Mr. Rickards to submit the Plan in question to the consideration of the honourable Court.

We have, &c.

Fort William, the 6th May 1808.

(Signed) MINTO,
G. HEWETT,
J. LUMSDEN,
H. J. COLEBROOKE.

EXTRACT BENGAL PUBLIC CONSULTATIONS, the 29th July 1808.

Government of Bombay.

To the Right Honourable GILBERT LORD MINTO, Governor General in Council, Fort William.

My Lord,

AS connected with the subject of our Letter, dated the 22d of this month, we have the honour to forward a copy of a Minute delivered in by our colleague, Robert Rickards, Esquire, on the subject of your Lordship's dispatch, under date the 23d of last month.

2. Being specially restricted, by the repeated orders of the Supreme Government, from adopting any measure of finance connected with the annual supplies, otherwise than as your Lordship in Council may be pleased to sanction; and your late orders of the 23d of May, authorizing a recurrence to bills of exchange, on the condition only of the loan now open at this Presidency, continuing to prove as unproductive as at the period of your late Instructions, all that we can, under such circumstances undertake, is to transmit a copy of Mr. Rickards's Minute for your Lordship's determination.

Bombay Castle, 24th June 1808.

We have the honour, &c.

(Signed) Jon^n Duncan,
Tho^s Lechmere,
R. Rickards.

MINUTE.

THE Letter of the 23d ultimo from the Supreme Government, having directed our recurring to the system of drafts or bills to furnish the pecuniary exigencies of this Presidency, I would beg leave to submit whether our immediate adoption thereof to the fullest extent that may be authorized, may not be preferable to the mode of raising our supplies by loan.

Notwithstanding the supposed advantages of the present open loan, notwithstanding all that has been said or written in favour of Government loans, and that the payment of interest is no loss to the nation, since it is only a transfer of revenue from one part of the society to another, &c. &c. I apprehend it may still be found liable to solid and fundamental objections. It is not my intention to enter into a detailed discussion of the subject, which would lead to tedious length, and at present unnecessary, but merely to state a few plain reasons in support of the objections I conceive to exist against this mode, whenever avoidable, of fiscal supply.

To appreciate these, it will be necessary to go beyond the mere superfices of the subject, which is but too apt at all times to mislead with false or imperfect views of immediate benefit, and to leave the mind unconscious of ultimate and permanent consequences; and as the evil of misapprehension, in respect to the financial arrangements of a nation, is proportioned to the importance, magnitude and extent of their influence, it would seem to be the more advisable, as it is always practicable, to recur to first principles, and to keep in mind the effect of natural operations, which cannot be obviated, nor even attempted to be opposed, without prejudice to the society at large.

It will probably be admitted to have been clearly demonstrated by Doctor Smith, that the prices of all commodities are resolvable into three parts; viz. the rent of land, profits of stocks, and wages of labour; that is, into some one or two of these three parts, or, as most commonly happens, into all three. The profits of stock or profit, as it is commonly termed, is, for example, an evident component part of the price of every vendible commodity. The wholesale merchant, who deals out these commodities to inferior traders, and to retail dealers, not only trades upon his own capital stock, but in in what he may be able or disposed to borrow at the time in the society at the interest authorized as established by law: the inferior traders and dealers do the same. The profits of their mercantile dealings, must therefore, among others, enable them to pay this interest. The interest being thus a part of their profit, is consequently a component part of the price of every commodity they sell. It therefore raises the price of every commodity beyond what would be its natural standard, if no interest were to be paid to the lenders of money by the different descriptions of commercial dealers; money however cannot be borrowed without interest; but it is manifestly for the good of the whole society that it should be as low as possible, for it is a commercial charge on the price of the commodity; all commercial charges are a burthen, however necessary, and the lower they can be reduced, in all cases, the better. In India the interest of money is universally high, and competition can hardly expect to lower it, while the Company's Treasury continues open at the present rate.

Interest, moreover, is a child of commerce; and inasmuch as its influence is limited to raise the price of manufactured commodities, it necessarily lowers the value of rude produce for which the manufactured is exchanged, and thereby operates to the serious detriment of the most important, the most valuable, and the most productive branch of human industry.

The interest required for the payment of public debts, has a still further operation; the interest is the price which Governments are obliged to pay for the money they borrow, and in India is chiefly resolvable into the rent of land; Government absorbing, in some countries, all, and in others, by far the greater part of that rent in the public revenue; the pernicious effects of which, I have endeavoured to explain in other papers. Inasmuch as this interest is raised from tolls, from farms, and other direct duties on consumable commodities, it is another direct enhancement of the price of such commodities; and through the influence of these prices on the wages of labour, an indirect enhancement of their recompense alone.

Taxes levied for the payment of this interest, diminished too in proportion the general wealth of the society, for the expenditure of this sum by Government, or even by idle annuitants, is not so profitable an employment as it would find, if left in the hands of individuals, by adding to the amount of productive capitals. The sum of annual reproduction is therefore diminished, or is not so large as it would be, had not the wealth absorbed in the afore-mentioned taxes been withdrawn. Inasmuch therefore as there is a diminution in the quantity of annual reproductions, proportioned to the effectual demand, it will operate as a further enhancement of the price of commodities, from all which sources of enhancement, every consumer in the society, however ignorant of the cause, materially suffers, and Government more especially, the greatest consumer of all.

These effects are not the less severely felt, because not always perceptible within the limit of common observation, because the price of grain, for example, does not sensibly rise from 16 rupees per candy in one day, to 17 the next, 18 the next, and so on, or because the wages of labour do not visibly increase from 10 rupees in one month to 15 in another, &c.; but let the price of commodities be compared, at given distant periods in any country, where more and more money is annually borrowed at fixed interest, and particularly a high one; let the Government of such countries similarly compare the amount of their own annual expenditure; let them compare the charges of military equipments, and the expenses of campaigning armies; let them consider even the wants of their own domestic servants; and that allowances, formerly thought handsome, are now but a bare maintenance, and the effects above intimated will probably be thought more apparent.

It is not intended to say that interest is the sole cause of the augmentation of prices in commercial commodities, neither are the preceding the only ways in which it is supposed to effect prices; but these are perhaps sufficient to show that it is one evidently operative cause of increase, and that the injurious effects are equally felt by the society at large and by Government. I should therefore always be disposed to prefer the raising of our supplies by bills on Bengal, as now directed by the Government General, and to the full extent to which they may be enabled to authorize our drafts, rather than recur to the alternative of a public loan, which, if the reasons above given be true, ought to be deprecated, except under circumstances of absolute necessity.

The sum, in short, of the preceding reasoning, is, that in proportion as interest tends to augment prices, the value of every income in the society is diminished; the income of Government being the largest of all, they are of course individually considered the greatest sufferers; and a short calculation on these priciples, might show that the premium, for example, now paid in subscriptions to the loan, was but a deceitful gain, contrasted with the lowered value of the public revenue; the gain being limited, perhaps only nominal, the less real and perpetual, and fell in the amount of every future outlay, as long as the debt and its interests may continue to exist.

At all events, the reasoning here submitted, may afford hints for a more minute view of the subject, although the Board may deem it unworthy of adoption.

Bombay,
June 23, 1808.

(Signed) R. Rickards.

No. 5.

Papers relative to Mr. Rickards's Proposition for establishing a General Bank, &c.

P. S. Finding in a late publication of some celebrity (which I cannot help thinking, however, it owes more to the peculiar circumstances of the times, than to its own intrinsic merits) that the argument, of interest on national debt being no public injury, because it is only a transfer of revenue from one to another, is again brought forward with apparent plausibility: a few remarks thereon, may tend to elucidate more fully the subject of the preceding Minute. The author observes,—"Those who contend that the deprivation to "which the payers of the interest of the national debt, are obliged to submit to, must "necessarily diminish the demand for the industry of the country, forget that although "the sums they pay, are not by themselves expended in consumable commodities, yet they "are so expended by the receivers of the interest of the national debt, though the land "proprietor, the farmer, the manufacturer, now consume less luxuries than if they had not "to pay one half their income (which they really do pay in taxes); yet the stock-holder "takes their places, he expends the sums which they save, and thus the effect is just the same "on the prosperity of the nation."

To estimate aright the force or fallacy of these arguments, let us suppose that A, previous to the existence of the debt, had an income of £.2,000 per annum, and according to the premises of the same author, that it be reduced one half to A, by the payment of taxes; which half is transferred to a stock-holder; A, then, it is admitted, has his power of consuming diminished by £.1,000 per annum, which is transferred to B; but the taxes which thus diminished the former's income, are raised on consumable articles, and are therefore an addition to the price of such articles, which is now, on the preceding date, doubled.

The powers of B to consume, is therefore proportionately diminished also; this £.1,000 per annum will only purchase as many enjoyments as £.500 would formerly; whence the specific original income of £.2,000 has its power over the industry of the country reduced by one fourth; although the full half lost to the original proprietor, should be in toto transferred to the stock-holder, the sum total of annual expenditure, which is admitted by the same author to be the very essence of our system, is therefore evidently diminished equal at least to one fourth of the revenue of the nation thus affected.

This too, it must be admitted, is a more favourable division of the original income than ought properly to be conceded in a correct view of this argument, for all the taxes paid by possessors of income in a nation are not transferred to resident stock-holders, but are still more wasted in their expenditure; and if we consider the numerous other incomes which the free expenditure of this £.2,000 per annum by its original proprietor, would constitute or contribute to, in the great variety of hands it would pass through, in a nation of few or no taxes and brisk circulation, it is not impossible that its power over the industry of the country might be ten or twenty fold greater than in states where, from multiplication of taxes, this power is impaired one half in every income into which, through circulation, it could be made to enter.

Supposing, however, according to the other view of the subject, that the portion of revenue of any society so affected, were equal to 60 million sterling, and that taxes were to be levied to pay the interest of the national debt, which should have the effect of doubling prices, it would seem that expenditure, the very essence of our system, that "the demand in fact for the industry of the country," would be diminished 15 million per annum; that is, that consumable commodities to this amount could not be brought into being, from want of purchasers, which there could be were there no interest, and consequently no stock-holders to participate. The effect therefore on the general prosperity of the nation, would certainly not be the same,—it would be highly injurious; whilst the revenue of Government, like that of the original proprietor of £.2,000 per annum, would be diminished in value one half; i. e. the same expenses and establishments which formerly cost them ten million, would now cost them 20 million, and go on from year to year to cost them more and more as their debt or taxes were required to be increased.

Bombay, Council Chamber,
24th June 1808.

(Signed) R. Rickards.

(A true Copy) (Signed) F. Warden,
Chief Secretary to Government.

Ordered, That the following Letter be written to the Governor in Council of Bombay, in reply to the foregoing.

To the Honourable JONATHAN DUNCAN, Esquire, Governor in Council of Bombay.

Honourable Sir,

WE have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Letter under date the 24th ultimo, transmitting a copy of a Minute recorded by Mr. Rickards, a member of your Board, respecting the mode of providing the supplies required for the service of the Presidency of Bombay.

2. It is evident, that while the Admiral charges, and the amount required for the provision of investment at the several Presidencies, shall exceed the annual receipts, the deficiency of supplies which shall be required for the public service, must be raised by means of loans, and we do not perceive the advantage which can arise to the public interest, by discontinuing that mode of raising the supplies required at Bombay, and opening your treasury for bills on Bengal, while we must have recourse to the very same measure here, viz. that of raising by loan the amount which may be required to enable us to answer those bills.

3. We are of opinion that it is advisable to raise as large a proportion of the annual supplies at Bombay by loan as may be practicable, and that you should draw bills on this Government only in the event of that mode of raising money being inadequate to provide the deficiency of your own Presidency.

4. It was conformably to these sentiments, therefore, that in our letter dated the 23d of May last, we had the honour to recommend your opening your treasury for bills on Bengal to such an extent as may be required for the supply of your wants, in the event of your subscriptions to the loan now open at your Presidency, being inadequate for that purpose.

We have the honour, &c.
(Signed) MINTO,
J. LUMSDEN,
T. H. COLEBROOKE.

Fort William,
the 29th July 1808.

EXTRACT BENGAL PUBLIC CONSULTATIONS, the 9th Sept. 1808.

Government of Bombay, Political Department.

To the Right Honourable GILBERT Lord MINTO, Governor General in Council, Fort William.

My Lord,

IN reference to your Lordship's Letter of the 6th of May, we have the honour to transmit a copy of a Minute, dated the 17th of this month, and its enclosure, as delivered in by our colleague Robert Rickards, Esquire, bearing general reference to future reforms and reductions, such as our colleague views to be practicable, in the Establishments throughout India; particularly in the Revenue and Judicial branches of the public expenditure; and upon which very extensive ameliorations being contemplated, in the general condition of the British possessions in India, it seems proper that a communication, inferring such beneficial effects, should be submitted to that authority which can most extensively give them operation.

We have the honour to be, &c.
(Signed) Jon[n] Duncan,
Tho[s] Lechmere,
R. Rickards.

Bombay Castle,
22d July 1808.

MINUTE.

IN pursuance of the recommendation of the Supreme Government of the 6th of May, and of my short Minute recorded thereon, under the 27th following, I now submit another copy of my scheme for paying off the Indian debt, to be transmitted by the approaching dispatch to the honourable the Court of Directors.

A complete copy of the scheme is contained in the vouchers from A to E, to go a number in the packet, as affording a more easy means of reference than direction to a voluminous diary. Those vouchers therefore contain nothing new; but as it may be desirable, particularly at so great a distance from the superior authority, to leave no conceivable objection that might be urged against the Plan unanswered, I propose, in this Minute, to state such as have been made to me in this country, together with my answers thereto; since, if the same objections should occur in England, these at least may, I hope, be found to be refuted without further reference.

3. First.—The most important of all the objections urged, is perhaps the want of surplus revenue to supply the Sinking Fund with the annual million said to be required for its use; and this objection has always erroneously run on the idea that the supply of an actual million annually, was indispensable to the execution of the Plan.

4. In

No. 5.

Papers relative to Mr. Rickards's Proposition for establishing a General Bank, &c.

4. In the scheme itself, I have already stated the reason why I took a million sterling per annum to calculate upon; but an attentive consideration of it, will at once show, that this amount is by no means indispensable; in calculations, it is necessary to take some specific sum as the foundation thereof, and a million was accordingly assumed; but if the surplus revenues cannot afford this amount, they may afford some other lesser sum to aid the operation of the Sinking Fund, and all in fact that the plan in this respect proposes, is the most rapid liquidation of debt, under due controul, which our means and resources in India will admit of.

5. It may, however, be urged, that under present circumstances there is no surplus revenue to contribute to the aid of the Sinking Fund; and some lately published statements give reason to apprehend the fact. In this case, as the reduction of the Indian debt would doubly appear to be an object of the first importance and necessity, and even the rapid reduction of it, for reasons to be adduced presently, I would beg leave to refer the honourable Court to the two papers I have taken the liberty of recording; one dated the 24th September 1807, the other, 7th July 1808, on the revenue systems of India: wherein I have pointed out the means of reducing the revenue native establishments to a considerable amount. This proposed reduction is no vain speculation, for it has been put to the test of experiment in Malabar for a series of years, with complete success; one, I may also add, of the most difficult collectorships in India. In that province, a saving was effected in 1803, by reduction of revenue native establishments alone, of 1,40,000 rupees per annum. In the first year of the reduction, more revenue was realized from the province than ever had been received from it before; the successor of the collector who effected it, has gone on even with a somewhat smaller establishment than his predecessor left him, and with continued and even improved success. This fact, however, is here mentioned with no other view than merely to show, that if similar reductions took place generally on the principles set forth in the two Papers or Minutes above referred to, the Sinking Fund would no longer want the means of powerful operations on the Indian debt. It is not only a perfectly unobjectionable, but highly desirable method, also, of permanently reducing the public expenditure, and far preferable, in my humble opinion, to the measure of curtailing European allowances, the policy of which, independent of the odium it excites, may in a national point of view be strongly questioned.

6. I do not hesitate to add, on the grounds of experience likewise, that similar reductions are capable of being made with equally good effect in the Judicial department. Our present judicial system is a theory to be admired, and founded for the most part on solid principles. While the principles may be admitted to continue, or at all events with some little modification, the mode of administering them in practice, must sooner or later undergo reform, unless it should be determined to persevere in opposition to confirmed experience of its insufficiency to fulfil the object in view. The establishment of a Zillah Court, for example, is so very expensive, that it will ever be impossible to have a sufficient number of them to give justice to all who want it, in a country, generally speaking, far more comparatively populous than perhaps any European state, and at the same time poorer to. A complainant whose daily labour is his own and family's support, cannot go 20 or 30 miles, or even more, to seek justice, when the expenses of his journey, and detention at the zillah, will even exceed the amount of his suit; he must content himself with the original injury or loss; and the attempt to remedy this inconvenience by means of native referees, is, in my humble opinion, only to place power in the hands of people most sure to abuse it. But this is not a place to examine the merits of the judicial system. If the question ever comes to be discussed, I can point out what I believe, from personal experience, to be the utter impracticability of administering justice universally, or even generally, by means of the zillahs, on their present footing; and also the means of very considerably reducing this branch of the public expenditure: the savings in which might be equally applied, as far as was found requisite or expedient, to the uses of a sinking fund. By means of both these reductions, I should conceive it might be supplied with funds to any requisite amount, although no aid, under existing circumstances, could be derived from surplus revenue.

7. Secondly.—It has been objected, that the proposed liquidation of debt is too rapid; that all hasty movements in objects of finance, are to be deprecated; and the usual arguments are brought forward in respect to the convulsion it would occasion in property, &c. too well known to be repeated; adding, that the "present sinking fund which appropriates 2 per cent. "on the original amount of the Indian debt," would liquidate the whole in 21 years; which slow operation is deemed preferable to the other.

8. Admitting that a Sinking Fund of £. 2 per cent. is capable of relieving Government from the present grievous burthen of debt in 21 years, provided no interruption or impediment intervenes, still it does not follow that it will do so; for in so long a space as 21 years, wars and other casualties will in all human probability occur to arrest its progress, or defeat its otherwise beneficial effect. It has been the fate of most, if not all sinking funds, from the slowness of their operation, to yield a good that is but scarcely felt in the increase of public burdens, which accumulate before the object of the fund is capable of attainment; they thus diminish debt without affording effectual relief; it is like help to a drowning man without taking him out of the water; life is continued, but with the fear and danger of impending destruction still before his eyes. Past experience, therefore, warrants the establishment of a fund of more rapid operation, of a fund in fact equal to its object, in spite of ordinary obstructions and difficulties.

9. As to the convulsion of property apprehended from the too rapid operation thereof, let it be remembered, that this property is, in part at least, that of the very persons who have the management of the Bank and Sinking Fund in their own hands, and who, by primary arrangement at the institution of the Establishment, or by majority of votes at any subsequent period, may check this apprehended convulsion, whenever, if ever, it is found to be injurious or inconvenient; the rapidity of its operation is therefore no argument against it, when that rapidity may be checked at pleasure.

the

10. But after all, the speedy discharge of public debt is more, perhaps, a cause of chimerical than of rational fear: we have all seen the evils of an increase of debt; who has yet seen the evil of discharging it? In countries where capital has already filled every channel of employment, the dread of convulsing property by the sudden discharge of a large debt, may be justly founded; but if there be any truth in the papers which I have already had the honour of submitting to Government, under dates 24th of September 1807 and 7th of July 1808 (both recorded under the 9th instant), it must be admitted that in India there are channels still capable of receiving any quantity of wealth that can be poured into them, and which only require to be opened to receive the genial current. Supposing, therefore, this opening to be effected, the rapid discharge of Indian debt would then be one of the most fortunate things that could happen for the rising prosperity of the country; setting industry and ingenuity at work to find out new applications for capital, the sums paid off would overflow into a thousand useful courses, and commerce, agriculture, architecture, and every branch of public and private industry, would receive a new impulse; the inconveniences, if any, would be momentary, the benefit eternal. But the single observation of the probability of wars (added to the consideration of there being now, in time of peace, no surplus revenue) is itself decisive of the necessity of employing the largest possible fund for the discharge of the debt; and on this account alone, a sinking fund that has only power to extinguish a debt of 20 million in 21 years, will, in my opinion, never give effectual relief: it may accomplish its object; but in the period proposed, another 20 million, or even more, may, and probably will, still leave the same financial difficulties and dangers to be encountered.

11. As connected with this part of the subject, I shall beg leave to add a few more remarks on the operation of the Sinking Fund, which may eventually be found of the utmost importance; and to avoid all further misconceptions of the component parts of the fund (for these have also been misconceived) and of its particular mode of operation, it may be useful to prefix a concise statement thereof.

12. The Sinking Fund, as stated in the Plan, consists of the proceeds of 4 million of bank stock, as per Papers A and B; or otherwise, of the two million, or any other determined amount, as per Paper of modification D, together with an annual million, or some other amount capable of being supplied from the surplus revenues, or from the proposed reductions above adverted to, of native establishments. These are its only two component parts: it has nothing whatever to do with any other sum mentioned throughout the scheme.

13. Then suppose the Sinking Fund to consist, as per Papers A and B, of one million, to be supplied from the surplus revenue, and the interest of 4 million of stock, or £. 320,000, to be paid out of the other annual million supplied to the bank from the ordinary, and now appropriated revenues, and which is in fact at this instant applied in the same way, viz. to the payment of interest on the debt; then the fund will consist, in the first instance, of £. 1,320,000; the odd £. 320,coo would however be an extra charge on the revenues, if a corresponding amount of debt could not be annihilated; but with the aid of the Bank and stockholders, that amount of debt, or 4 million, is annihilated or paid off, and the £. 320,000 of interest thereon goes to constitute this branch of the Sinking Fund.

14. It is true this £. 1,320,000 bears no interest of itself, but it is immediately converted into stock or notes, which do bear interest; the annual proceeds thereof in cash being also similarly converted into stock or notes, in each succeeding year, the accumulation of interest cannot fail to proceed, as specified in the Statement annexed to A. It is moreover a fund which is anticipated to operate in its full amount on the Indian debt, because the Company are bound to provide funds in England for paying off such part of the debt as may be demanded, by drafts, in whatever way and at whatever time it may be liquidated, and may be supposed to be prepared for the event. It is therefore probable no deduction will be required from the proceeds of the Sinking Fund in this country to pay the small amount of interest there may be due upon a required loan in England to discharge drafts.

15. But here a very important suggestion occurs: let us suppose the worst. Suppose the Company may not be provided with funds to answer these drafts, and that, on the contrary, they should be obliged to borrow in England, not only the first £. 500,000 to discharge drafts, but also to borrow another annual sum equal to the interest thereof; in other words, suppose they are obliged to borrow this £. 500,000 at compound interest of 5, 6, 7, or even 8 per cent. for 8 years, secured on their Indian revenues, a short calculation, compared with the figured Statement annexed to A, will show that the operation of the proposed Sinking Fund will still liquidate the whole in less than 8½ years, for (vide that Statement) if we admit the £. 500,000 to be even doubled in 8 years by means of the compound interest at which it may be borrowed, and to stand then at one million—let the full supply be contributed to the Sinking Fund in this 8th year, instead of the reduced sum specified in the Statement, and it will leave no more than about £. 600,000 of debt to be liquidated after the expiration of the 8 years, which the Sinking Fund, from its amount, will then be equal to accomplish in about 4 months longer.

No. 5.

Papers relative to Mr. Rickards's Proposition for establishing a General Bank, &c.

16. If this explanation then is perfectly clear with respect to A and B, it must be equally so with respect to the lesser sums calculated upon in the modified Paper D (which however supposes drafts on the Court of Directors to the amount of either 1 or 2 millions) and it must be equally so with regard to any other sum whatever adopted as the basis of the Sinking Fund, provided the principles of the Plan be equally adhered to, and which in short is intended to exhibit the means of establishing a Sinking Fund free of extra charge on the Indian revenues, capable of extinguishing the debt in a short period, and with ability to afford effectual assistance to the Company in England, should that be required, in raising funds for the discharge of the drafts which must necessarily be made on them whenever the debt comes to be paid off; for if we suppose the fund to be in full operation in this country, the Company, it is presumed, will experience no difficulty in borrowing money in England, which they have thus such speedy means of repaying, to answer any conceivable amount of drafts, or other demands, that may chance to be made on them.

17. At all events it is not to be supposed an arrangement of this kind will be attempted without previous preparation by the Court of Directors, or without perhaps the sanction of the Legislature; some of the existing loans in India, it may be added, contain a stipulation whereby the principal as well as interest of the debt is payable by drafts on the Court of Directors at any time optional with the holder of the promissory note. They are therefore liable, even now, to a demand for millions (a late publication says 17) on any sudden alarm, and if not prepared to meet the demand, it may not be unacceptable to show the means of relief whenever this difficulty may occur.

18. Thirdly.—The remaining objections I have to notice, seem to me to arise chiefly from misconception of the object and principles of the Plan. It is, for example, objected that the Plan is of too gigantic a nature, that the issue of $3\frac{1}{2}$ million of notes is more than the circulation of India will absorb, supposing, as the objection erroneously does, this $3\frac{1}{2}$ million to be indispensable, and four million to be in every case required as applicable to the establishment of a Sinking Fund; and that the creation, as it is misnamed, of so enormous a capital as $8\frac{1}{2}$ million, for the stock of the Bank, is out of all proportion, is impracticable, and even dangerous, &c. and that the security for payment of the income of bank-stock is only plausible.

19. The papers A and B, it is true, contain calculations founded on the supposition merely of four million being paid off in the first instance, thereby forming the basis of a Sinking Fund; but it is also evident that neither of these papers absolutely require this amount of notes to be issued, or of debt to be paid off; it may be any lesser amount, suited to what the circulation of India will easily absorb: and that this part of the subject might be exhibited in a clearer point of view, Paper D was prepared to show, and I think it clearly does show, that the Plan, on the principles proposed, is capable of modification, so as that the amount of the Sinking Fund, in the first instance, be exactly regulated by the advantage or profits which Government may be enabled to realize from the institution of the Bank Paper D; then proceeds to a calculation, founded on the establishment of a Sinking Fund of two million only, instead of four at the first outset; and in which the first issue of notes for all India may, according to the principle of A and B, be only one million, or according to C, it may be just that quantity, and no more, which the circulation will easily absorb, and with this Sinking Fund of two million only, the debt is shown to be capable of liquidation in 9 years. In the voucher No. 1 are annexed the remarks of a gentleman of highly distinguished knowledge and science on this subject, together with a short answer, which will tend to show the still further modifications of which the Plan is susceptible.

20. As to the capital stock of the Bank, whether it be taken at $12\frac{1}{2}$ or $8\frac{1}{2}$ million, if the nature of it be duly considered, that it is in fact no new creation, that it already actually exists, and that its conversion into bank-stock is no more than a mere change of name, it may I apprehend be termed any thing but gigantic. Its amount will be no objection to subscribers, if it yields a certain adequate income; and none to the public, or Government, if it has the effect of a rapid liquidation of debt, and consequent diminution of present heavy taxes. The security for the payment of this income is real and not plausible, it consists, as at present, of a portion of territorial revenue now applied to the payment of interest on the debt, which only requires, on the institution of the Bank, to be repledged in the same way for as much of the said debt as may be converted into bank-stock. There is here no creation of a new and gigantic capital: it already exists, together with the revenue appropriated to the payment of its interest: its name only is changed. In this view of the case, there would seem to be neither danger or impracticability in the conversion of $8\frac{1}{2}$ million, or of some other amount of debt, into stock; for supposing this stock secured to yield 8 per cent. certain interest, and that the holders of this stock realize, say only 2 per cent. more from the net profits of the Bank, making altogether 10 per cent. would not stock of this description be greedily purchased? and if not subscribed for in promissory notes of the present debt, it must be paid for in money, which would serve to discharge the corresponding amount of notes. But of this sum of $8\frac{1}{2}$ million, as of others stated in the Plan, it seems still necessary to be observed, that in calculations tending to elucidate principles, it is necessary to have recourse to specific sums, particularly where the subject is abstruse, in order to carry through some clear connecting idea of cause and effect. If $8\frac{1}{2}$ million cannot be converted into stock, some other lesser sum surely can, and the amount of this conversion, whether great or small, is a matter of indifference to the operation of the Sinking Fund. The conversion of debt into stock is intended to establish an union of the Bank and Sinking Fund, for the purpose explained in the Plan, and to induce the present creditors to subscribe their promissory notes for bank-stock; the same pledge or security is given for payment of interest, in addition to all the advantage which the said creditors, as stock-holders, will derive from the net profits of the Bank. If therefore 8½ million of stock be not subscribed for at first, the only difference therefore occasioned is, that a proportionally smaller sum of revenue than 1 million per annum will be settled on the Bank. Some stock will certainly be purchased, and Government, with the aid of the Bank and stock-holders, will then be enabled to establish the proposed Sinking Fund of 4 million, or of some other lesser amount (as fully shown in Paper D,) free of extra charge on the revenues; which fund will equally operate in the reduction of debt (as may be seen on reference to either of the figured Statements) whether it be promissory notes or bank-stock that it is required to annihilate. The millions mentioned in the Plan may at first sound high, but an attentive consideration of the principles of the Plan, with the modifications of which it is evidently capable, viewing the millions only as specific data on which to found easy calculation, will I think convince that it is in reality neither gigantic, or at all formidable or difficult of execution.

21. Fourthly.—The establishment of the Bank has been objected to on the grounds of its being a Government Bank, and therefore deemed unconstitutional, and an engine too dangerous in the hands of any form of government, &c. The propositions in respect to exchange are also objected to on the same principles, and the impolicy urged of allowing any Government to interfere therein.

22. A real Government Bank is doubtless impolitic, and may often prove a very dangerous engine. The arguments on this head are incontrovertible. But can a Bank, consisting of one Government Director, with one vote, and an indefinite number of other Directors, say eight, ten, or twelve, with as many votes, be properly termed a Government Bank; or be considered liable to the objections which are justly urged against a Bank directly conducted or controuled by an arbitrary government? The business of Government in the Bank here proposed, is chiefly co-operation, with a small, but perhaps salutary degree of check over private speculations of injurious tendency to the public. If the Bank of England is proved, from transgression in this respect, to be in need of salutary check, how much more requisite must it be in a general Bank in India, where at the Presidencies, the great commercial agents, and who must be the chief Directors of the Bank, might otherwise be left at liberty to pursue their own particular interests, without any regard to those of the public? Reasons, however, are given at some length in the Plan, to show the necessity of a check on both sides; and if the checks proposed against undue influence on the one hand, or imprudent speculation on the other, are inadequate, experience must furnish better ones. In the meantime I cannot yet discover that this Bank is any other than a General Bank, encouraged and fostered by the protecting hand of Government. It certainly was intended to be precisely this; and to obviate the evils incident to a Government Bank, properly so called; while much mutual advantage, it is hoped, may be derived, and inconvenience obviated, by this union of the mercantile body with Government in a firm bond of mutual interest.

23. The supposed interference of Government with respect to exchange, will, I should hope, on due consideration, appear to be another misconception of the Plan. It certainly gives Government no power of interference; Government contributes a co-operative aid through the medium of its several treasuries; the whole business of exchange, including rates, &c. is left to the Bank Directors, in other words, to the great body of merchants in every part of British India, to be regulated, in fact, by the free course of trade. In any question that may arise on the subject, Government can have only one vote against perhaps a dozen.

24. Fifthly.—The conversion of any portion of the Indian debt into Government bank stock, has been received as a dangerous experiment seriously to be deprecated. Whilst the principles of the Plan are admitted to be generally correct, the proposals which it contains in this respect have been considered as pregnant with all the evils, and liable to the same failure as occurred in the similar attempts of the South Sea and Mississippi Schemes in the famous year 1720. Objection.

25. The Plan being admitted to be generally correct in its principles, will surely bear no comparison with the South Sea and Mississippi bubbles, whose very name proves them to have been founded on no correct principles at all.—The failure of those schemes does not appear to me to be in the least attributable to the conversion of public debt into the joint stock of those Companies, but to the delusions practised on an infatuated public: neither one or the other was ever possessed of funds equal to the realization of those profits and promises which they held forth to the world; the value of their stock was therefore artificially enhanced; and when delusion could be kept up no longer, the bubble, as it has been commonly termed, burst.—Indeed the South Sea Company continued to flourish for some time, under an incorporation, or conversion, of about nine, and afterwards eleven millions of the public debt into their joint stock. The fraudulent stock-jobbing speculations which followed upon the Statute 6 George I. seem to have been the sole cause of their downfall. Answer.

26. The Mississippi Scheme, it is true, had in view the payment of the public debts of France: so far comparison may be admitted with the present Plan; but it is by no means equally evident that the conversion of public debt into the stock of Mr. Law's Royal Bank or Company, occasioned its failure. After a series of the most violent shocks to public credit, even from the year 1713, after various arbitrary changes decreed by the Duke of Orleans,

as

No. 5.
Papers relative to Mr. Rickards's. Proposition for establishing a General Bank, &c.

as well in the metal as the paper money of the kingdom; and after several artificial if not fraudulent enhancements of the Company's stock, the scene drew to a close with two of the most extraordinary acts that ever betrayed the ignorance of Government in respect to the principles of money :—first, the issue of bank-notes to the amount of more than double that of the coin estimated to be necessary for the currency of the kingdom; and, secondly, the famous, or rather infamous arrêt of the 21st May 1720, whereby the notes in circulation were at one blow reduced to one half of their former value. It was not till after these fatal measures, that the public became alarmed, or their confidence in the scheme impaired; and when to these are added a want of funds to fulfil promised dividends on all these actions or shares outstanding, we need look to no other cause for a complete overthrow of the whole concern.

27. In the present Plan, however, there is nothing that I can see that admits of comparison with the acts in the Mississippi Scheme, of an arbitrary and perhaps ignorant Government operating on an infatuated public. There is here no attempt at delusion, the whole Plan might, and perhaps ought to be published: its funds are fully adequate to every anticipated result; not a share that will not certainly yield its expected profit; not a bank note issued beyond what the circulation may as certainly require. Government of itself can do nothing, and therefore nothing is to be dreaded either from the influence or capricious exercise of arbitrary power. Under such circumstances, I confess I neither see the danger or inconvenience of giving, to a certain portion of the debt, a mere change of name.

Objection.

28. Sixthly.—There have been some other objections advanced: such as, in case of war, that the notes would be thrown back on the Bank when money bore a premium; the impossibility of issuing others without a loss equal to this premium; the danger of inconvenient runs on the Bank, when relief must be sought at a great distance; and the limited power of extending the issue of notes, &c. But as all these would seem to be sufficiently refuted by the course and successful progress of banks in other parts of India, under the circumstances apprehended, it may not be necessary for me to trouble the Honourable Court with any particular remarks thereon.

Answer.

29. Seventhly.—Finally, it has been urged, that the "merchants here (Bombay) are themselves bankers;" and that "this plan would necessarily transfer much of that part "of their gains to the Bank; that the Bank can in no way hold out an inducement sufficient to prevail on the merchants to give up their present command of the money trade "to take merely a share of that of the Bank; that it would be like admitting the holders "of bank-stock into a copartnery with them in a gainful part of their business."

30. In the Plan itself there are details of some length, to show the advantages which the mercantile body may derive from a successful co-operation therein, and the benefits and facilities which trade in general would experience. Perhaps advantages are no where, or seldom, attainable without corresponding sacrifices; but if the compromise here shall not be found sufficiently favourable to the merchants, there is still no reason why the objection may not be obviated by an arrangement which should limit the amount of bank-stock to the actual shares of the Directors, the merchants themselves would be these Directors, and they would then have no copartnery in a gainful part of their business; the gain, for example, might be all their own, under some of the modifications of which Paper (D.) and the voucher No. 1. to this Minute, show the Plan to be capable; whilst a Sinking Fund, under this connection, would still be established, which is all that Government want, free of extra charge on the revenues.

Vide second supposition, Paper D.

31. But after all, however desirable the aid and co-operation of the merchants in the execution of the scheme in question, still if they should think proper to withhold it even in toto, or pro tempore, it is evidently in the power of Government to establish the proposed Bank and Sinking Fund independent of their aid, and to conduct the same by officers of their own, if just and established principles be scrupulously adhered to, until the object in view, viz. the reduction of debt, be accomplished to the full extent that may be desired.

(Signed R. Rickards.

Bombay, 17 July 1808.

No. 1.

Extract of a LETTER, &c. with Remarks annexed, on Mr. R.'s Plan for reducing the Indian Debt; and Answer thereto, dated 16 October 1807.

When I had the pleasure of seeing you at Dr. Scott's, I took the liberty of stating one or two remarks, which the intricacy of the subject, added to that habitual difficulty which I feel in communicating my ideas in conversation, prevented me, I fear, from explaining so as to be intelligible; I have therefore used the freedom of repeating them in the inclosed memorandum X, in as few words as possible.

I must again repeat, that none of the objections which I have heard started, tend in any degree against the foundation of the Plan: some of them suppose a certain change in the channel of the money trade, but most of them are only difficulties, such as every similar institution institution is liable to, and which require only an increase of vigilance to foresee and prevent. There seems no good reason why, in a country so rich and trading as India, a bank should not prosper as much as in other countries. The novelty of the plan would occasion difficulties, which it is not ascribing too much to the talents of the original projector, and the sagacity of the Bank Directors, to suppose they could overcome: judicious management is of course supposed in every such plan; and the objections seem to me to be chiefly considerations for the Bank Directors. The local experience of the merchants, would furnish invaluable assistance, and the limited extent of the first issues and operations, would try the ground, and prove the best experiment how far the Plan could be gradually extended, and what quantity of active stock might be required for its transactions. If the Plan C were adopted, of beginning business merely as a bank, in which the Company was a sharer, under the agreement that after a limited time the issues of notes should be on the joint account of the Bank and of the Government, under such considerations and in such proportions as might easily be fixed, Government gains not only the agreed proportion of the notes kept in circulation, but the further proportion corresponding to its share in the Bank. The interest of Government and of the stock-holders and directors is thus also united. Let the share allowed to Government be one half, as it has also a third of the remainder, the gain of Government would be nearly two-thirds of the whole issue. If Government were allowed five eighths, their third giving another eighth, their whole advantage would be three fourths of the issue, and a large sum of profit would still go to the bank-sharers from the remaining fourth. The Paper D shows indisputably that these and numerous other modifications might be made, preserving the beneficial effects of the original Plan.

Perhaps the additional fund proposed in (C) might be delayed; and some conjectural sum from the issues, rising progressively, substituted in its place.

By giving Government a proportion of the issues, the Bank might be made to serve Government exactly in proportion to its own success, and the increasing trade and prosperity of the country.

I owe you many apologies for having detained the Papers so long, and still more for the freedom with which I have written on a subject, of the principles of which I confess that I have only some glimpses, and which can be best decided only by those persons, of great local knowledge and extensive commercial transactions, who have been made acquainted with the plan, and to whom the difficulties and advantages of the schemes must be strongly visible. I confess I see no difficulties that are insurmountable; and I cannot help congratulating Government and the Country on possessing a practical politician, who, by so simple a plan, promises to relieve Government of so great a part of its burdens, by means which, far from being injurious to industry or trade, seem to offer new facilities to increasing the wealth, prosperity, and happiness of India.

MEMORANDUM X.

1. The mode in which the Bank is to begin its operations, is not perhaps sufficiently apparent. No fund, by means of which the operations are to be commenced, is pointed out by the Plan. The capital is in the hands of Government, and has been used to pay off Government debts: in this state it affords sufficient security to the creditors of the Bank, but it is not a disposable fund for active transactions, as no part of the interest becomes payable till six months after the period of the purchase of bank-stock; the Bank has no funds till then: at that time indeed half a million is payable by Government, and a fund to that extent for Bank operations exists; but then it must be understood that the purchasers of bank-stock do not receive their first half year's interest. The first instalment must be applied to form the active fund of the Bank: this is the first fund they possess naturally for carrying on their business; the large sum of stock in Government's hands can be applied only as a passive fund to gain credit to the Bank in its loans and issue of papers. It is an excellent security to the creditors, but can be used by the Bank only as an instrument of credit, not as stock engaged in trade. If what has been here denominated the active fund of the Bank, is to consist of half a million, the stock-holders must do without half a year's interest: if it is to consist of one million, they must give up a whole year's

ANSWER to REMARKS.

1. The difficulty of a connected explanation in private conversation, on so abstruse a subject, renders it at the best always liable to some obscurity. In Plan A, I have stated that I purposely declined entering into a detail of the business of the Bank, which will of course be ultimately regulated and arranged by the Directors. This constitutes a material part of that detail; and the quantum of deposit in specie required for the active operations of the Bank, must necessarily depend on the plan determined to be adopted, or the amount of capital issues in bank-notes. The Bank must of course, like all other banks, be at the expense of its own deposit of specie. What I meant to explain was, that this expense will admit, on the plans here suggested, of considerable diminution, in view to the payments required to be made by Government into the Bank for the use of the Sinking Fund, viz. the payments in the first year, for example, on this account, being 1,320,000 l. might be made in monthly instalments of 110,000 l. which will increase in arithmetical progression, say till the sixth month, or any other specified time, when the aggregate sum may be required to be applied to the uses of the said Sinking Fund. But in the seventh, or following month, another 110,000 l. is paid in, and will similarly increase monthly; so that in this way a very large sum of specie will be continually in deposit in the Bank,

No. 5.

Papers relative to Mr. Rickards's Proposition for establishing a General Bank, &c..

MEMORANDUM X.

interest, and so on in proportion. The suggestion that this fund might from the first be gradually supplied by the regular coming in of the Company's revenues, offers a partial corrective; but as this proceeds on the idea not only of a full treasury, but of an accommodation from the treasury to the Bank, not specifically pointed out in the Plan, and really forming a temporary loan without interest, from Government to the Bank, it is doubtful how far it would be prudent to rely on it. It is not what the Bank can demand. Besides, it only operates during the six months: at the end of that time the interest is due, and the money must either return to pay the stock-holders, or be by them permitted to remain employed by the Bank. The accommodation on the part of Government therefore ceases, and the burden of supporting the Bank's operations devolves on the stock-holders. It therefore seems necessary, either that the Bank should begin its operations on credit, and by borrowed money, or that the fund should be raised gradually by detaining the half-yearly interest of the stock-holders.

2. It is of much more importance to keep in mind, that in no instance can the holders of notes, or the merchants, gain by the issue of notes. The notes may be of very great convenience to the merchants and the public, but never can turn to the profit of any but the Government or Bank. By all others they must be purchased, and stand only in the place of specie.

3. It may reasonably be doubted whether any inducement could be held out to the Bank to take a deep interest in the notes, except either an agreement that a certain proportion should be issued for the Bank, when a certain proportion was issued for the Government, that the Government and Bank should divide the total issues in certain shares, or an agreement that the Bank, on making Government a certain loan without interest, should have the sole benefit of the issues of notes. In the former way their interest wolud be mutual, and neither party would have any inducement to urge an inordinate issue, particularly if the expense of supporting the sum of cash for keeping up the circulation, were also divided in certain proportions: thus too the gain of Government would increase as the advancing prosperity of the country enabled the issues of paper to be extended. In the latter way, the total issues, after passing the loan to Government, would accrue to the benefit of the Bank alone. It is to be observed that the supplies of foreign specie would come only as they do at present; any importation from England, for example, must be purchased by value given by the Bank, as much as by any individual. That in Bombay the trade runs very much in seasons, and hence the issues of notes would need to be considerably limited in the busy months, to prevent inconvenient returns afterwards.

ANSWER to REMARKS.

intended for the use of the Sinking Fund at certain fixed periods: which deposit, I conceive, the Bank may intermediately use, provided proper care be always taken to complete the amount at the particular times when the Sinking Fund demands it, and which will therefore tend to lessen the expense which other banks are subject to on account of a deposit necessary to the support of their active operations.

This, it may be objected, is an important aid contributed by Government to the Bank, free of interest:—True. But the Government have their advantage also, for on either plan they have a Sinking Fund established, with the aid of the Bank, free of extra charge on the revenues; and on Proposal C in particular, or any modification thereof, let it be remembered, that every diminution of the Bank expenses will be a corresponding addition to the profits in which Government have a prescribed share. The possibility of reducing the debt in so short a period as from seven to nine years, is moreover a matter of such high importance, as to be worthy some sacrifice at least to effect it.

2 & 3. It will perhaps be thought some recommendation in favour of the Plan, to find that its original principles are capable of such various modifications; some of which it is at least hoped may be found perfectly unobjectionable. The very ingenious remarks contained in these paragraphs, are in fact modifications of A & B, which infer a loan from the Bank to Government free of interest; in consideration of which, the Bank should enjoy a corresponding proportion, or all the advantages arising from its private business. Both these suggestions, however, and the simple modes of proceeding, are therefore perhaps preferable. The original Plan indeed proposes a loan in bank-notes, which will therefore cost the lenders nothing, while the opposite modification implies, I presume, a loan in specie. But if the former be deemed too complicated, or not ultimately feasible, and the latter therefore preferred, should any difficulty arise from requiring so large a sum in specie as 2 million in loan from the merchants, even this is capable of still further modification, as follows:—On 2 million of debt being advertised to be paid off, let the merchants lend as much thereof as shall not be taken by the creditors in bills on the Court of Directors; suppose then the merchants, i. e. proprietors of stock, lend in this way £. 1,200,000, and £. 800,000 be paid by bills, let 12-20 be the share of the said proprietors in the Bank profits, and 8-20 the share of Government, which latter share will go to counterbalance the expense to be incurred by the Court of Directors in raising the £. 800,000 in England.

(Signed) R. Rickards.

(True Copies.) J. Warden,
Chief Secretary to Government.

No. 6.

COPY of PARAGRAPHS 31 a' 38 inclusive, of a Revenue Letter from the Governor in Council at Bombay, to the Court of Directors of the East India Company; dated 20th February 1808.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER from BOMBAY; dated 20th February 1808.

Para. 31.

No. 6.

Revenue of Broach and Surat.

AFTER this detail respecting the Pergunnah of Broach, and our proceedings on its revenue concerns, it is not a little pleasing to us to be able to close it with requesting your honourable Court's attention to the further Report from the same Commissioners, under date the 24th of January, exhibiting the progress made in its fiscal and other concerns; the result of which, in as far as respects the former head, is as follows:

		Rupees.
1803-4	Collections	10,54,539.
1804-5	D°	11,30,647.
1805-6	D°	11,26,997.
1806-7	D°	12,24,583.

whilst the amount of those realized during the twenty years of Scindia's tenure, averages no more than 8,35,105 rupees.

32. Nor have we less satisfaction in requesting your honourable Court's perusal, and attention to the Report under date the 26th of January, from the similar temporary Commission at Surat, showing that the cultivation, and, consequently, the revenues, have been rapidly increasing since our acquisitions from the cessions by the Paishwa and Guicawar in the Attaveery, (or country between Demaun and the Nerbuddah,) the receipts from which having risen, in the space of four years, from the annual amount of 6,24,463 rupees to 7,28,122 rupees, yielding thus, in four years, an increased yearly return of 1,03,659 rupees.

33. The Report from the collector of the very extensive territory dependent on the zilla or division of Kaira, under date the 20th of January, recorded in the same day's proceedings, as above cited, will, we flatter ourselves, prove, in view to the particular circumstances of that cession, no less pleasing to your honourable Court than the consideration of the two preceding narratives, as to the prosperous condition of the Broach Pergunnah, and of our districts in the Attaveery.

34. In submitting these briefs notices of the revenue administration hitherto in progress throughout the three grand divisions of country intrusted to the charge of the Government of this Presidency, it will thence appear, that in all and each of them, very material ameliorations have taken place, not only in the considerable increase of the annual receipts, but in the Regulations for the country, particularly under the division of Broach, in which a system of regularity, order, and quiet, has been uniformly advancing at the same time with the augmention of the funds for the revenue; which last has been above shown to have increased, by nearly two lacks per annum, notwithstanding our having intermediately given up such parts of the former funds for it, under the late Government of Scindia, as were believed to have an oppressive tendency.

35. The same general observations will be found applicable, in a considerable degree, to the division of Surat, in which the cultivation will appear to have been considerably extended, and the revenue in particular to have increased in a still greater proportion than within the collectorship of Broach.

36. It will, on this occasion, be pleasing to communicate to the honourable Court, that relief has been afforded to the inhabitants of the city of Surat, by the abolition of a variety of the Moghul taxes, to which they were subject during the Nabob's Government; and it is our intention to prosecute this object as far as future enquiries or experience may indicate, more especially in the department of the customs, which are thought to fall too heavy on the inhabitants there, in proportion to those at the Presidency.

37. In as far as respects the extensive collectorship at Kairah, it may, in conclusion, be observed, that although the increased realization in the public funds, has, in that quarter, been less in proportion, the most orderly and highly regular manner in which the settled revenue have been collected, redounds, in view to the peculiar description of a great part of its inhabitants, so much to the credit of the collector's management, that we discharge only a duty in again distinguishing Mr. Diggle as one of the most promising and meritorious of the civil servants in this line of employ.

of

No. 6.

Revenue of Broach and Surat.

38. The success which is thus shown, on grounds the most obvious, to have attended the administration of our lately acquired Northern territories, will constitute, it is hoped, the best apology for our deferring till another opportunity to submit at greater length the ultimate and more fixed rules, which we may have to recommend for their permanent management. There may not (generally speaking) be many we could propose better adapted (as the result has shown) to their general prosperity hitherto, than those they have been for the few past years subject to; and as far as our impressions yet extend on a subject of such great delicacy, we feel inclined to coincide in the principles already indicated by the Legislature; viz. that the established customs of the natives should be generally adhered to, affected only by such well-weighed improvements as have for object the guarding, (by the means, for instance, that are above mentioned to be intended by the written or printed deeds to be granted to the patells of Broach) more effectually their own established systems, from such vicissitudes and abuses as experience has shown them to be liable to; in short, to endeavour to ameliorate their condition, without subverting the foundation of their hereditary rights; the preservation of which, as interwoven into all their manners and impressions, must tend, it is conceived, most efficaciously, to their permanent happiness.

No. 7.

COPY of PARAGRAPHS 49 a' 54 inclusive, of a Revenue Letter from the Governor in Council at Bombay, to the Court of Directors; dated 14th April 1810.

EXTRACT of REVENUE LETTER from BOMBAY; dated 14th April 1810.

Para. 48.

AT Broach, the revenue in arrear on the 30th April 1808, stood at Rs. 1,88,903. 1. 36. which, we have the satisfaction to add, was entirely cleared by the same date on the following year, Rs. 176. 1. having been alone remitted; nor are there any arrears on account of former years under this collectorship.

49. The jumma for the several districts included in the collectorship of Broach for 1808-9, amounted to Rs. 14,31,076. 2. 86.; the collections within the year aggregated Rs. 14,21,846. 0. 37. leaving a balance, on 30th April 1809, of Rs. 9,230. 2. 49. which there was little doubt of realizing; and the cause of which arises from the revenue not falling due within the period embraced by the year of account, as already explained in a preceding part of this Address.

50. The disbursements of this collectorship in 1808-9, on account of native establishments, amounted to Rs. 21,522, being only 1.503 dec^{ls} per cent. on the jumma; the allowances to covenanted servants amounted to Rs. 23,199. 3. 96. being 1.621 dec^{ls} on the jumma; whilst the total of the charges bear only 3.125 dec^{ls} on the receipts. The customs yield Rs. 1,18,410. 2. 65. and the native establishments amount to Rs. 5,388, being 4.550 dec^{ls} per cent. on the receipts.

51. The total receipts therefore from the revenues and customs aggregate Rs. 15,49,486, and the total charges Rs. 50,109, being 3.234 dec^{ls} per cent. on the former; and, by throwing the charges of the judicial establishments (being Rs. 1,70,876. 1. 43.) which include the Court of Circuit and Appeal for the whole northern division, into the computation, the disbursements on account of the revenue, customs, and judicial establishments (amounting to Rs. 2,20,985), bear at the rate of 14.262 dec^{ls} per cent. on the receipts from this possession.

52. On the settlement of the revenues of this district for the year 1808-9, we had the satisfaction to find that the land-revenue of Broach still continues to encrease, being, for that year, Rs. 9,76,818. 3. which is Rs. 19,495 more than the preceding one.

53. The land revenue of the Pergunnah of Broach Proper (which constitutes singly the principal source of the above large rental) was never, under any former Government, for two

No. 7.

Revenue of Broach and Surat.

two years together so high (according to our best information) as the first settlement made by the Revenue Commission in March 1805; and its permanency and increase are principally to be attributed to the investigations, which brought to light and abolished the various mal-practices of native revenue officers, and the many ruinous and oppressive systems introduced by Mahratta farmers, at the same time that they ascertained the true and old established system of assessment which has since constituted the rule of guidance; the land revenue of that single Pergunnah of Broach Proper alone, is now Rs. 1,59,433. 2. 50. more than it was when the Revenue Commission was first appointed in January 1805; whilst, as described in the Commissioner's Report of 31st May 1807, the increase of income to the cultivators is to the full as much as that in the Government share or revenue; the surplus not resulting from any enhancement of the rate, but from that rate being levied on a more extended cultivation.

54. The general improvement in the state of the inhabitants of this district, is further very observable in the number of substantial houses to be seen in the villages, where huts of mud and straw stood about four years ago, as reported in the letter from the late Revenue Commission, dated the 26th February 1809.

No. 8.

COPY of PARAGRAPHS 113 a' 142 inclusive, of a Revenue Letter from the Court of Directors to the Governor in Council at Bombay; dated 10th January 1810.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER to BOMBAY; dated 10th January 1810.

Para. 113.

THE third, and not the least important subject to which your enquiries have been directed, is the mode of realizing the revenue. The information on this head, contained in the Report of Messrs. Prendergast and Steadman, of the 31st May 1807, and its accompaniments, is certainly more complete than any that had been previously acquired; but we cannot help thinking that by the aid of better arrangement, it might have been conveyed in a form more perspicuous and satisfactory.

114. The principle upon which the jumma or rental is annually settled in the Guzerat, seems to be an equal division of the produce of the tulput land in cultivation between Government and the farmer. Though it be competent for either party to insist upon this principle being literally acted upon in fixing the jummabundy, and upon half the produce being levied in kind, the rent, according to ordinary practice, is commuted into money. A general rate of assessment has been fixed throughout the greater part of the pergunnah, where there is but little difference in the soil at 4 rupees per bheega, for the better, and 3½ rupees for the inferior sort of land. But in the immediate vicinity of the Nerbuddah, the rent varies from two to twelve rupees per bheega, according to the different descriptions of soil and the crops, the share of Government being always calculated upon the estimated value of half the produce, whether the ground be a sandy hillock or a rich bottom, and the crop be rice or sugar-cane. This rate however, in uncommon seasons, or under particular circumstances, is either increased or reduced, as the collector or husbandman may show cause. When the crops are so far advanced as to admit of a fair estimate being made of their value, the melitas, tullaties, and patels transmit statements thereof to the collector's cutchery; Native Committees, consisting of a karkoon belonging to the collector, a dessoy and moozumdar and ameen patel are sent out in different directions, to check the statements given in by the village revenue officers; and when this investigation is completed, amended statements are made out and remitted to these officers, who, agreeably thereto, form jummas of their respective villages. This being accomplished throughout the district, separated sunuds or notes are prepared for each village, specifying the amount of their individual assessment. The patels assembled on a certain day, sign these sunuds in token of their acquiescence, and when they return home, the mehta apportions the precise amount of the rent payable by each patel, according to the size and quality of his particular bang or share in the bungdaree villages, and according to the number and productive powers of the bheegas which he cultivates in the bheegotee village. The charges of husbandry are borne by the cultivators; the expense of collecting the Revenue is defrayed by the Government, and the periods of collection are fixed at those seasons when the farmer is ablest to pay, or when he has realized the value of his crops, the amount of the instalments by which the contributions are levied, being always proportioned to the estimated funds of the contributor at the dates when they become due. In fine, as a security for the payment of the Government rent, the crops can neither be reaped, housed, threshed out,

No. 8.
Jumma or Rental in Guzerat.

nor sold without the permission of the collector, or one of his authorized agents. Such is the general outline drawn in the Report of the Revenue Commissioners of Broach, of the system now in force in that pergunnah, and the principles which you conceive to have been acted upon by the Mogul Government, with little variation, throughout the whole of their territories in the western part of India.

115. That a system of this kind is liable to very grave objections, and that, both in principle and detail, it is in direct and uniform hostility with the doctrines of political economy, which in this part of the world have been considered not only as theoretically true but practically beneficial, does not admit of doubt: and though it might be perilous in every case to act conformably to these doctrines, without regard to local circumstances, which may occasionally prescribe a deviation from them; so, on the other hand, there is some danger lest long and constant familiarity with inveterate prejudices, should lead us to confound the rule with the exception, and to forget the difference between a necessary compromise, and a voluntary renunciation of the first maxims of political science.

116. The system now in force is liable to all the objections which are thought generally applicable to the payment of rend in kind; for though the Government revenue be collected in money, the sum contributed is supposed to be the precise value of half the produce; and the only difference between the present mode, and that of paying in kind, is, that in the latter case the husbandman would deliver the half of his crop at the collector's cutchery, whereas now he carries the whole to market, and on his return pays in one half the sum he has received for it. In one respect, indeed, the present system is more troublesome to the Government, and more vexatious to the farmer, than the other; for were the produce collected in kind, it would be necessary for the collector to continue his superintendence of the crops after they were removed from the field, and the cultivator having delivered the moiety due to the sirkar, might house, thresh out, and dispose of his own share at what times and in what proportions he might find convenient, without being subjected to the galling restrictions now imposed upon him.

117. It can hardly be necessary to point out the evils inseparable from a revenue system of this nature. It is troublesome and expensive in itself: it loads the productive class of society with the support of a numerous train of unproductive pensioners: it unquestionably tends to discourage improvement, by diminishing the motives to industry: it fetters and embarrasses the cultivator, by the imposition of restraints always irksome, often prejudicial; in fine, it offers a strong temptation to fraud and depredation on the part of the ryot, while the trouble attending it must frequently occasion neglect or collusion on the part of the collector.

118. A tax levied, generally amounting to the estimated value of half for the produce, must operate very unequally, if great care be not taken to distribute in equal portions the good and the bad land among the individual contributors: a precaution which may not be always practicable. It is evident that a certain portion of the produce of land is, in different situations, equivalent to a very different portion of the rent. In rich lands the cultivator may afford to give half the produce, and at the same time have a very handsome profit; whereas in poor lands the produce may be so small, and the expense of cultivation so great, that were he to pay one quarter of the produce in the shape either of rent or tax, he would not only have nothing over, but would be without the means of subsisting himself and family.

119. The practice of letting the lands from year to year, cannot fail to stifle every thing like enterprize on the part of the farmer. Though the claims of the patel as an hereditary cultivator, may give him security against being dispossessed of his farm, he must, as things are now managed, be contented to share half the advantage of his improvements with Government, the same years even in which they are made, so that his most laborious exertions serve only to add to the weight of his assessments.

120. But notwithstanding the strong objections to which the existing revenue system is liable, even after the many ameliorations and improvements it has undergone in the course of your administration, (which we shall notice by-and-by,) we entirely concur in the opinion that you entertain of the delicacy, impolicy, and danger of introducing any great and sudden innovations among a people with whom antiquity of usage is regarded as paramount to every other sanction, and who are always averse to change, even when it is likely to redound to their advantage.

121. Judging, however, from the materials of which we are already in possession, it seems by no means impossible to ingraft upon the existing institutions a system somewhat analogous to that which has been established in the greater part of our other territories; and the hints thrown out, rather incidentally indeed, in the 21st paragraph of the letter we are now answering, show that the expediency of granting lands to the patels upon zemindary tenures, by which, instead of dividing the produce, they shall pay to Government a fixed and invariable rental, has entered into your contemplation.

122. You at the same time express a doubt whether the patels would be generally willing to become parties to a permanent arrangement of this sort: this, we conceive, will depend altogether upon the terms which may be proposed to them. No man would think it worth while to become a proprietor of land upon terms which would place him in a worse condition than when he was only a cultivator. A patel, with his naturally strong aversion to change, will, it is presumed, if the matter be left entirely to his own option, require to have opened to him a prospect of greater benefit than would be necessary to decide the choice of a person of more versatile character. The terms, therefore, held out must be such as will present a considerable temptation to their acceptance; the moment that property becomes saleable, that temptation exists. If there were a warm competition among the bidders, it might be inferred that the temptation was too strong; and if there was no demand for it, even at the lowest price, in a market where there can be no glut, seeing that nothing of the kind ever appeared there before, it might be concluded that it is not worth having. The last conclusion, it may perhaps be alleged, would only be just, in circumstances where every man acts under an enlightened sense of his own interests, which can never be the case, where obstinate and perverse prejudices are prevalent. It should, however, be recollected, that the empire of prejudice, when it is opposed both by reason and immediate interest, is seldom so universally despotic that some minds will not be found vigorous and bold enough to burst its fetters when a fair opportunity occurs; and after a spirit of revolt manifests itself, the influence of example will gradually achieve the overthrow of its power.

No. 8.

Jumma or Rental in Guzerat.

123. There is also a wide distinction between indolent and active prejudices. The former there is seldom any danger in slighting, because they are not irritable in their nature; nay, all that is wanting often to their dispersion, is the spirit to encounter them. The latter indeed ought uniformly to be treated with forbearance, and frequently with respect: but the prejudices to which we now allude, can hardly be ranked among this class.

124. From these observations, it follows that the establishment of a zemindary system is not likely to meet with any insuperable obstacles, provided its effect be to improve the condition of the patel: its tendency to this object, must depend upon the terms of the settlement; and these terms may be considered sufficiently advantageous, if they render the land conveyed to him saleable, which will never be the case till, besides paying the expenses of cultivation, it yields a certain profit to the landlord.

125. It will therefore be matter for your enquiry and consideration, whether land in the Ceded Provinces would be saleable, paying the present rental, estimated at the value of half the produce, or if any and what abatement would be necessary to render land transferrable with a premium to the vender. At the same time that you communicate to us the result of your investigations and reflections upon this question, you will also state what other suggestions may occur to you respecting the formation of a permanent proprietary settlement that may be liable to the fewest present or future inconveniences, and which, while it provides for the comfort, prosperity, and security of all classes of the people committed to our charge, may not considerably, if at all, impair the actual income of the State, or preclude Government from afterwards deriving an increased revenue from an eventual augmentation of resources.

126. Before any steps can be taken towards the execution of an arrangement of this sort, it will be necessary that the projected survey of Broach shall be completed; and should the experiments, when made, be succesful in this province, it may afterwards be tried in the other districts. It will be be proper also that you shall previously acquire much more accurate information than you now possess, respecting the manner in which the patels collect the rents and revenue from the ryots, and the exact relations in which these two classes stand to each other.

127. It can hardly be necessary to remind you, that it is neither our wish nor intention, in the formation of a system for the future administration of any part of our territories, to favour one class of our subjects at the expense of another, much less to give rights to the more opulent which they may exercise to the oppression of the lower orders. It must always be the policy, as well as the duty of an enlightened Government, in some measure to compensate, by the equality of its protection, for the unequal distributions of fortune.

128. Of your intention, after a survey of the Broach district has been made, to grant written or printed deeds to the patels, particularly describing the portions of land which they occupy, with the view of guarding their possessions against those encroachments and usurpations which they have experienced in time past, we highly approve; but we are not disposed to think that enough shall have been done till we have furnished them with new motives to industry, as well as with additional securities for what they already possess. Let the process of improvement be conducted with judgment, caution, and after mature deliberation, and the impediments by which it is at first retarded will gradually become less embarrassing.

129. Much has been effected since the cession of Broach to the Company, in the way of purging the ancient Mogul system from the abuses which had crept into it under the Marhatta administration; the great, the intolerable evil of which was, not the excess of its imposts, but the mode of levying them.

130. The Manotee system, by which the Government, in consideration of advanced payments on the credit of the revenue, delivered over the persons and properties of its subjects to a band of merciless usurers, by whom they were tortured, plundered, and oppressed, it was one of the first steps of your administration to suppress.

131. The Sookree Chandla, that discreditable resource, consisting in a sale of licenses by Government to one class of its subjects, to make arbitrary exactions from another, was properly abolished, as a scandal to the British name.

132. Instead

No. 8.

Jumma or Rental in Guzerat.

132. Instead of tannadars and jemadars stationed throughout the country under the pretence of maintaining the police, but really for the purpose of extortion, a Court of Adawlut has been instituted, for the trial of offences according to the rules of law.

133. The Dungur Tojee, or assessments upon the first crops, proportioned to the wants of the treasury but not to the funds of the cultivator, and by the excess of which the patels were driven to the most ruinous modes of raising money, has given place to a system under which the demands of Government exactly correspond with the means of the contributors.

134. The claims of the Dessoys and Moozundars have been put into a train of adjustment, the result of which, we trust, will be the relief of the laborious part of the community from a number of arbitrary fees and exactions by which they were vexed and impoverished; and an economical reform has been introduced into several branches of the village establishments, equally beneficial to Government and the ryot.

135. In fine, Tuccavy, or the money advanced by Government to the farmer, to facilitate agricultural improvements, is lent at common interest, instead as before at the most exorbitant rate of usury.

136. The facility with which these changes, so creditable to your administration, have been effected, show the practicability of further amelioration, while at the same time their importance to a certain degree diminishes its urgency; we would not therefore have you, on the one hand, to imagine that you had reached the utmost limits of improvement, nor, on the other hand, to run the risk of failure by venturing too far, or proceeding without due precaution.

137. We entirely agree with you in opinion, that the suggestions for increasing the revenues of Broach, brought forward by Dessoo Patel, are altogether unavailable for the purposes for which they were intended, if indeed they had any other object than that of recommending himself to the Government by an apparent assiduity to promote its interests, and thus to retrieve the disgrace he had incurred by his former conduct.

138. Upon the whole, we have had much satisfaction in tracing the progress of your administration in the Pergunnah of Broach. It seems by far the most valuable of the districts ceded to the Company in the Guzerat; and its augmented and growing prosperity is the best proof which could be adduced of the wisdom which has presided over its management, and of the zeal and ability of those who have carried into effect the plans devised by the Government.

Letter from, dated 26 February 1808, (32 to 37) relative to the Revenues of Surat and the territories dependent on the Zillah of Kaira.

139. We have great pleasure also in remarking, that the improvements have not been confined to Broach, but that they have been extended to our territories situated both to the southward and northward of that dependency.

140. Owing to the bad health of Mr. Morrison, the collector of Surat, we are not in possession of such minute information respecting his collectorship, as concerning the two others; but from the last Report made in his stead by Mr. Crow, the judge and magistrate, there is reason to believe that agriculture is making rapid progress in the countries situated in the Attawery. Of this indeed there is positive proof, in the very great increase of the revenue, conjoined with the growing prosperity of the people, territories having produced 2,11,830 rupees more than the sum for which they were ceded by the Peishwa and Guicawar, and 1,03,600 rupees more than they yielded in the first year of your management.

141. Though the increase of revenue in the division of Kaira, since it was placed under Mr. Diggle's care, does not amount to more than rupees 36,164, the actual state of that part of the country, compared with what it was when it devolved to the Company, does not furnish less matter for congratulation than the improvements which have taken place in our other possessions in the Guzerat; and we embrace this opportunity of acknowledging, with warm approbation, the judgment and zeal manifested by the collector in the discharge of the very difficult duties of his office. Though the quantity of waste land within the bounds of that collectorship be inconsiderable, the ferocious manners of the inhabitants seemed to oppose a far more impenetrable barrier to civilization than the most desolate appearances which the surface of the earth can present. We are happy therefore to find that the people in that quarter already begin to show a sensibility to the comforts resulting from order and obedience to the laws; that the number of the hardened and refractory is diminishing apace, that justice is gaining an ascendant over violence, that the calls of Government are, with few exceptions, willingly answered; and that, by persevering in a line of conduct marked by an union of lenity and firmness, we need not despair of circumscribing within narrow limits, if not of wholly suppressing, the dominion of anarchy and barbarism.

142. The investigation which you caused to be instituted into the local duties paid by the inhabitants of the town of Surat, has led to the beneficial result of relieving them from a variety of impolitic and vexatious imposts, without any material sacrifice of revenue. It will be always agreeable to us to hear of, and encourage, similar inquiries.

No. 9.

Copy of a LETTER from the Court of Directors, in the Political Department, to the Governor in Council of Fort St. George, dated the 29th September 1809.

OUR GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL AT FORT ST. GEORGE.

Paragraph 1.

No. 9.
Letter from Court of Directors, 29 Sept. 1809; on Political State of the Travancore Territory.

WE have received your several Dispatches in the Secret Department, of the 24th October and 29th December 1808, the 27th January and 28th February 1809, describing the rise, progress and issue of certain discussions between you and the State of Travancore. These discussions, which related to arrears due to the Company under the treaty of 1805, and brought the provisions of that treaty generally under review, have terminated no less unhappily than surprisingly, in the employment of the force and resources of the Travancore territory, by the Rajah's minister, in deliberate hostile aggression and open offensive war against the troops and the power of the British Government.

2. Being by inclination, by interest and by duty, decidedly fixed in favour of a pacific system of Indian policy, we cannot see any renewal of war, or an interruption of the relations of peace and amity with any of the Indian states, even when such interruption becomes unavoidable in self-defence, without keen regret; and hostility with an ancient ally, whose interest and ours seemed to recommend a lasting union, must be still more painful to us.

3. We entered therefore with anxiety into an investigation of the causes which could have induced the Government of such a State as Travancore, whose power and resources were so utterly disproportioned to those of the Company, and whose territory was accessible to us on every side, to take up arms against our Government. And this has led us to a review, which we shall here introduce, of the different stages of our connection with that State.

4. Mutual interest first formed, and afterwards cemented, the connection between the two Governments. In the articles of pacification agreed on between our Government and Hyder Ally in 1769, the Rajah of Travancore was included as an ally of the Company. The same care was taken of his interests in the treaty of peace, made between the Company and Tippoo Sultaun in 1784; to these treaties the Travancore State owed its security for a series of years, from the very unequal power and inordinate ambition of those rulers of the Mysore country; and when at length Tippoo, disregarding the articles of the treaty made with him in 1784, attacked the territory of Travancore, in the year 1790, the Company entered into a war with that Prince in defence of their ally, whose safety was again secured by the peace made with Tippoo in 1792.

5. The treaty concluded between us and the Rajah of Travancore, in the year 1795, which stipulated that a British force should always be ready for his defence, against any war of aggression made upon him, had particular respect to the danger to which he still stood exposed from the more powerful neighbouring state of Mysore, which rendered the protection of the Company essential to him, and to that protection he owed the continuance of his independence.

6. Things remained in this state during the life time of the old Rajah, who was himself, as there was reason to believe, a prudent man, attached to the British connection, and was served by a Dewan of uncommon ability and worth. The Rajah died in the year 1798, and his death appears to have been followed by various circumstances unfavourable to the maintenance of the cordial friendship that had long subsisted between his State and the Company's Government. Most of these circumstances are stated in the early correspondence of the resident, Colonel Macaulay, with the Supreme Government; and as he had, from his situation, the best opportunities of knowing the internal state of Travancore; as his communications, professing to describe facts and events of the times at which he wrote, appear to have received entire credit from that Government, and to have been corroborated by subsequent occurrences, we see no reason for withholding our confidence from those communications.

7. The old Rajah was succeeded by his nephew, a young man whose character seems ever since to have been marked by imbecility, caprice, and other qualities which shew him to be wholly unequal to the task of government. The old and faithful Dewan of his uncle was supplanted by low and vicious persons, who soon gained an ascendency over the Rajah, and influenced the conduct of affairs. In 1799, an insurrection broke out in the districts. In 1800, a cabal, headed by a person named Sumpreddy, seized the reigns of government. Gross abuses prevailed in many of the public departments; the revenues were decreasing, whilst the bulk of the people were in the lowest state of depression; and another insurrection took place on account of oppression in some branches of the collections. The time of the Rajah is described to have been chiefly engrossed by his pleasures, and by superstitious ceremonies among the Brahmins, who, with their dependants, were reckoned to be equal in number to the working class. The late Dewan, so much respected by the people, was not suffered to live even in retirement. There is very strong reason to believe, that he was taken off by poison, and the British Resident thought it his duty publickly to accuse Sumpreddy of this foul murder; but after a short arrest, and an appearance of inquiry, in which more solicitude was shown to avoid than to effect discovery, he was restored to his liberty and influence at the Durbar. This man is stated to have charged the late Dewan with ruining the interests of Travancore by connection with Europeans, particularly the English; and from all the details contained in the ample correspondence carried on by the British Resident at that time, it is strongly to be inferred, that neither the Rajah nor those employed in the transaction of his affairs, regarded British connection with the ancient cordiality.

No. 9.

Letter from Court of Directors, 29 Sept. 1809; on Political State of the Travancore Territory.

8. This change, it is probable, did not arise solely from the change of men, and the very different characters of those who succeeded to the administration of the Travancore Government. The fall of Tippoo in 1799, placed that State in circumstances entirely new. The formidable danger to which it had been long exposed, from a more powerful neighbour, headed by a restless chief, was now removed; Mysore came under the controul of the Company, who had been the best friend of Travancore, and from whom, as it probably feared no injustice, so it might seem no longer to need active support or protection. Such a material alteration in the external relations of the Travancore State, may reasonably be supposed to have influenced its policy in respect to the British Government, whose friendship would not hence appear an object of so much solicitude as it was before. In point of fact, the British Resident, Colonel Macaulay, who was appointed to that Durbar in 1800, soon thought that he perceived in it a coolness or diminution of regard towards the British connection.

9. The Governor General had instructed the Resident, on receiving his appointment, to prevail if possible, on the Rajah to agree to a new modification of the treaty with the Company:—of this modification, the principal conditions to be proposed were, that no Europeans should be permitted to reside in the territority of Travancore, without the consent of the British Government; that in lieu of the military aid which the Rajah was bound by the former treaty to furnish to the Company, when engaged in war, he should defray the expence of an additional battalion of Company's troops; that he should confide the defence of his territory to the Company, and receive their advice in the more important concerns of the civil administration.

10. With respect to this measure, the change in the relative circumstances of the two States might naturally suggest some alteration in the existing treaty. It is justly observed by the Governor General, in his instructions to the Resident, that the accessibility of Travancore, by a long line of sea coast, renders it a country through which the British possessions may become vulnerable to an European enemy; to which it may be added, that the strong military positions which the territory of Travancore affords, increases the importance of that consideration. The British Government therefore, after having saved Travancore from being overwhelmed by the Mahomedan State of Mysore, though in this acting also with a fair view to British interests, had a right to expect, not only that it would be willing to prevent, to the utmost of its power, the enemies of Britain from availing themselves of its ports and strong holds, but would permit the British Government to employ for that purpose the necessary force which Travancore could not itself furnish. Whether all the conditions proposed for a new treaty were requisite to the attainment of this object, may be considered hereafter; but it appears certain, that in the first negociations of the Resident with the Rajah and his Ministers, and for several years afterwards, until the occurrence of new events, they shewed a settled aversion to accede to any terms more favourable to our Government than were contained in the old treaty.

11. In 1801, the Rajah, after repeated representations from the Resident of the disordered state of the country, and the necessity of rescuing the management of affairs from those whom he had permitted to possess themselves of it, appointed a new Dewan, named Vallay Tomby. This person had been at the head of the insurrection of 1799; but being reputed a man of ability and firmness, the Resident, in the great want of persons of that description, approved of his appointment, and had reason to expect that he would be friendly to the connection with the British Government. His subsequent conduct however did not justify this expectation. The Resident, after some absence from his station, on returning to it in December 1801, found that all the relations of the old and respectable Dewan, who himself had suffered a violent death, had also been murdered; and that Sumpreddy, the former favourite, had been disgraced and imprisoned by means of the new Dewan, Vallay Tomby.

12. After the peace of Amiens became known in India, towards the end of 1802, the Resident found increased difficulty in negociating with the Travancore Durbar for the exclusion exclusion of Europeans from his territory. The Rajah had virtually given a qualified assent to a proposition of this nature in 1800, but never could be persuaded to reduce it to writing; and the return of peace seems to have led him to desire and expect some intercourses with the French and Dutch. Under this apprehension, the Resident, between the month of August 1802, and March 1803, repeatedly represented to the Supreme Government the necessity of measures to check the symptoms of disaffection in the minds of the Rajah's evil counsellors, and to prevent French influence, stating that he had reason to apprehend the Rajah was disposed to the French, and that a political negociation had been opened with him by a French agent who landed there. If attempts of this nature were made, the renewal of the war with France, by removing the subjects of that country from Travancore, probably put an end to them; and it led, in February 1804, to an agreement on the part of the Rajah, advised no doubt by his Dewan, to place a respectable force at the disposal of the British Government.

No. 9.
Letter from Court of Directors, 29 Sept. 1809; on Political State of the Travancore Territory.

13. But so precarious was the possession of power in that State, that almost immediately after a strong conspiracy was formed against the Dewan, Vallay Tomby, in which the Rajah himself was supposed to be engaged. The Dewan was excluded from all confidence, his enemies openly triumphed, a near day was fixed on for his death, without any trial, and he fled to the British Resident, by whose firmness and remonstrances the Rajah was at length diverted from his purpose, the conspirators were thrown into prison, and the Dewan obtained not only his life, but the restoration of his power. The leading person in this conspiracy was a Gosseyn, one of an eminent religious order, and stated by the Resident to be in the French interest. The Resident's letter, written at this time, and in the two preceding years, describe in strong terms the degraded state, in point of character, both of the Government and of the principal people.

14. Before the end of that year, 1804, a formidable revolt took place among the Nair battalions in the service of the Rajah. Their original cause of dissatisfaction appears to have been a reduction in their allowances: these the Rajah restored, and a short calm succeeded, but the revolt burst forth again with increased violence; the ringleaders liberated the conspirators in the former plot, increased their numbers to 10,000 men, and, as was asserted by the Rajah himself, at length extended their views to the subversion of the British power and influence in Travancore, and the assassination both of the Dewan and the British Resident. Intelligence also was received by the Resident, before this dangerous revolt was entirely suppressed, of a projected expedition from the French islands against one of the ports of Travancore. It was only by the judicious active conduct of the Resident, and the resolution of the British officer commanding the Carnatic brigade in the service of the Rajah, joined to the firmness of the Dewan, who had again fled to the Resident for protection, that this rebellion was put down. The treaty of 1795 did not specifically stipulate the aid of the British power in suppressing internal commotions in Travancore; but this was agreeable to the spirit of it, and became highly expedient on such an occasion, and the march of three of our battalions to the confines of Travancore, confirmed the tranquillity which had been restored there.

15. The Rajah, who had shewn great alarm in this crisis, was highly gratified by the mission of British troops for his support, and then professed an entire devotion to British interests, and the Dewan pledged himself to adhere, to his latest breath, to that system of measures which should receive and merit the approbation of the Governor General. Thus, what had before been steadily resisted, both publicly and privately, for five years, namely, a new treaty of subsidiary and defensive alliance, they both at length consented to, and concluded in January 1805. It may be observed, that during the two preceding years in which this measure had been fruitlessly pursued by the Resident, the British Government had been engaged in an arduous war with the Marhattas, and that it was brought to a very successful close, about the time when the domestic convulsion in Travancore appeared to turn the scale in favour of a more intimate British connection.

16. The articles in which this treaty varied from the one of 1795, were chiefly these: the Rajah, who by the treaty of 1795 stood engaged to furnish the Company, when involved in war, with such part of his military force as he could spare, with safety to his own country, was, by the treaty of 1805, relieved from that obligation, and, in lieu of it, he stipulated to pay annually, in addition to the subsidiary payment under the former treaty, a sum equivalent to the expence of one regiment of native infantry, estimated to amount to rupees 4,01,655; and the disposal of the whole subsidiary force, either within the country of Travancore or the limits of the Company's dominions, was left to the option of the British Government. The Rajah also became bound, by the new treaty, to pay a due proportion of the expence of any troops, additional to the subsidiary force, which it might eventually be necessary to employ for the protection of his dominions. It was expressly provided, that whenever the Governor General in Council should have reason to apprehend a failure in the funds destined to defray either the expences of the permanent military force in time of peace, or the extraordinary expences in time of war, he should have full power to introduce regulations for the management and collection of the revenues, or to assume, on behalf of the Company, the direct management of a part of the territorial possessions of the Rajah, as he might deem most expedient. And whereas the treaty of 1795 had respect chiefly to the internal defence of Travancore, the Rajah promised, by the new treaty, to pay at all times the utmost attention to such advice as the British Government should occasionally judge it necessary to offer him, in respect to all the objects connected with the advancement of the internal interest of his Highness, the happiness of his people, and the mutual welfare of both States.

No. 9.

Letter from Court of Directors, 29 Sept. 1809; on Political State of the Travancore Territory.

17. The ratification of the new treaty by the Supreme Government arrived at the Rajah's capital in July 1805, and he and his whole Court gave public demonstration of joy on that occasion. The first account of it reached England in November 1805, but the papers connected with the negociation did not arrive till January 1806, and owing to the circumstances of that time, the treaty was not then taken into particular consideration. The correspondence of the Resident, Colonel Macaulay, does not touch upon this treaty after the month of July 1805, until the month of October 1806, when he, having been put under the immediate orders of the Fort St. George Government, on the requisition of that Government, stated, that no part of the additional subsidiary had been paid, and that the Governor General in Council had authorized the remission of one half of that subsidy for two years from the commencement of the treaty.

18. By a letter from the Supreme Government to us, of the 1st May 1807, and a subsequent one from Fort St. George, of the 21st October 1807, the following statements were brought before us:—1st. That the remission of one half the new subsidy, for two years, which was no part of the treaty, was granted at the earnest request of the Rajah, in order to render it as little burthensome as possible to him; and to enable him gradually to effect such military reductions, reforms and improvements as were stated to be necessary to supply the resources for the whole of the additional subsidy:—2dly. That as late as the month of September 1806, the unremitted half of that subsidy had neither been claimed nor paid:—3dly. That the Rajah earnestly desired to retain in his service the corps known by the name of the Carnatic Brigade, which had proved on various occasions essentially useful to him, and to obtain the permanent remission of one half of the additional subsidy, to enable him to bear the charges of that brigade:—4thly. That this application on the part of the Rajah, was deemed to be altogether unreasonable, since the discharge of the Carnatic Brigade, was, to form one of those reductions of expense by means of which funds were to be provided for the additional subsidy, and that the reduction of a large proportion of the Rajah's military establishment was one of the objects of the treaty, independently even of the provision of resources for the additional subsidy; whereas the Rajah had applied the remitted portion of the subsidy to the maintenance of the brigade, and pleaded its continuance in his service in support of his application for the permanent remission of that portion of the subsidy, for which the discharge of the brigade was intended in part to provide, thus, endeavouring to derive advantage from the abuse of a solicited indulgence, of even urging that abuse as an argument for the obtainment of additional concessions:—5thly. That the Supreme Government had determined to require provision to be made for the immediate, or at least gradual, discharge of the unremitted half of the additional subsidy, and the gradual discharge of the whole amount from 12th January 1807:—6thly. That although the discharge of the Carnatic Brigade was a measure obviously conformable to the spirit and intent of the treaty, by which the Company is charged with the whole military defence of the State of Travancore, yet on account of the merit and attachment of the Carnatic Brigade, the Supreme Government would not insist on its discharge of its continuance in the Rajah's service were consistent with the provision of funds for the payment of the Subsidy:—7thly. That it was computed by the Resident, the resources of the Travancore State would not be less than twelve lacks of rupees per annum, after defraying all charges of a civil and military nature, with exception only of the Carnatic Brigade, and after paying the full amount of the new subsidy:—And lastly, that the determination of the Supreme Government having been communicated to the Rajah of Travancore, no further objection was made on the part of his Government, and the arrear of subsidy which had become due, was in train of liquidation by instalments.

19. It was upon this view of things, that the answer contained in our political dispatch to you of the 7th September 1808, was founded. We did not then go into a consideration of the original formation of the treaty of 1805, not being aware of various circumstances in the history of that transaction, which have been since found in our Indian records, but were not indicated in the dispatches from that quarter. We went merely on the principle of requiring the observance of a treaty, supposed to have been fairly and voluntarily made, which after allowing for the deductions stipulated in it of the Rajah's military force, and the relinquishment of all claim on him for military aid to the Company, imposed no heavy addition to the general expence of his Government, and a treaty which the Rajah appeared to be very able to fulfil. Our dispatch however could not reach you before the adoption of hostile measures, both on the part of the Dewan of Travancore and of our Government.

20. From the month of October 1807, when the arrears of subsidy were stated by you to be in a train of liquidation, until the month of October 1808, no progress appears to have been made in that affair, although the Resident states, in July 1808, that for eight months preceding, scarce ten days had passed without his reminding the Dewan of the arrears, which then amounted to rupees 6,62,669: repeated letters in the course of that time, to the Resident and your Government, from the Rajah and his Dewan, which all seem to have been the work of the latter, complained in strong terms of the oppression of the new treaty, and the inability of the Rajah to pay the additional subsidy; the whole was said, by the Dewan, to have been extorted contrary to humanity and the law of nations; and the whole is laid to the personal account of the Resident, according to an usage common among the Indians, who in remonstrating against acts of Government, represent them as the acts of its

No. 9.

Letter from Court of Directors, 29 Sept. 1809; on Political State of the Travancore Territory.

its agents only, although in this case, the Governor General had himself written to the Rajah when the new treaty was first proposed; that what the Resident did, he did by his authority, and the Governments, both of Bengal and Fort St. George, had in their direct communications with the Rajah and his minister, left them no pretence for affecting to consider the new treaty and the enforcement of its stipulations, as the personal acts of the Resident. In this period, they for the first time, explicitly demanded the relinquishment of the whole of the new subsidy, whereas before they seemed to have confined their application to an abatement of only two lacks.

21. With respect to the ability of the Travancore revenue to afford the whole of the subsidy, the Dewan appears to have acknowledged in March 1808, that he could not answer the statement of the Resident on that head, and you have expressed our conviction that the plea of inability was unfounded. We are particularly pleased, however, that our Governments, both of Bengal and Fort Saint George, have distinctly declared to the Government of Travancore, that if it could give any satisfactory evidence of inability, due consideration would certainly be paid to that circumstance; and it was doubtless more an evidence of unwillingness than of inability, that no retrenchments were made in the military establishment of Travancore, the reduction of which, with the substitution of Company's troops, was according to the evident understanding of the parties, one of the proposed ends of the treaty.

22. Of such indisposition to fulfil those stipulations, independent of any question of ability, there is sufficient proof even at that period; and it appears to be chiefly, if not solely, imputable to the Dewan, of whose "unhappy bias" the Resident speaks in his letter of the 10th March; and in your letter to Bengal, of the 5th of August 1808, you suspect that Minister to entertain the design of disturbing the relations between the two States; in the same month, the Resident stated in a private letter to Mr. Secretary Buchan, that the Dewan was of late greatly changed in temper, having become ferocious, and that the Rajah was "a mere cypher, trembling at the very name of the Dewan." The Resident also states in a letter of the 16th September, to Mr. Buchan, that the Rajah had several times conveyed to him his satisfaction in the subsidiary engagements, and his perfect reliance on the honour and liberality of the British Government. The letter, however, which you very properly caused to be written to the Dewan, on the 30th July 1808, appears to have produced the happiest effects upon him; he expressed to the Resident the deepest contrition for his past defaults, and on the 22d September he commenced paying the arrears, and with the hopes which this change encouraged, your letter of the 24th October 1808, closed.

23. But those hopes were of short duration. By the month of November, the payment of arrears amounted only to rupees 60,000, and the balance due was eight lacks; instead of a further liquidation of debt, that month produces only a succession of informations from the Resident, evincing with increasing clearness, the certainty of what that officer at first calls "something like a systematic plan of contumacious resistance on the part of the "Dewan," which he says rendered it necessary to apprize the Rajah, that with a view to the proper regulation of the affairs of Travancore, another person should be chosen for the office of Dewan, in the room of Vallay Tomby. This is the man who first comes into notice as the leader of an insurrection in 1799; who, with the assistance of British influence, was advanced to be Prime Minister in 1801; whose early administration is clouded with suspicion, arising from the atrocious murder of the family of the deceased respectable Dewan; who, in 1805, vowed unalterable attachment to British interests, and only two months before professed sincere contrition for his failures in this respect. He now begins to appear as the sole ruler of the Travancore State; the Rajah, though his disposition was deemed to be favourable to the British Government, is stated to have been incapable of following the course of his own wishes; he henceforth ceases to be seen in public transactions, and the Dewan exercises in his own person all the powers of government. We hear of a "faction formed under his protection, of an augmentation of Travancore sepoys, the manufacture of bows and arrows, his training the inhabitants to arms, his success in exciting a ferment, his sending to the Isle of France for 500 artillerymen, and expectation of assistance from thence, his rooted purpose of determined hostility, his being capable of instigating his partizans to an attack, and the expediency of placing him as the prime mover and instigator of hostility under arrest." Early in December you were told by the Resident, that the Dewan still continued, with unremitting activity, his plans of hostile preparations, and that in conjunction with the Rajah of Cochin's Minister, a person who appears to have been a suitable confederate to him, and made a conspicuous figure in the subsequent transactions, he was endeavouring to force that Prince into measures of hostility against the British Government, urging him to unite with other chieftains friendly to Travancore, for the expulsion of the English, requiring him with that view to train particular classes of his subjects in the same manner as had been ordered in Travancore. You were at the same time informed by the officer commanding in Malabar, that a report prevailed there of an intended attack on the British Subsidiary Force, and that an army of 22,000 Travancorians was assembled at no great distance from it.

24. You therefore, with proper precaution, directed detachments of troops to proceed from Trichinopoly and Canara, to be prepared to penetrate the Travancore country on both sides, if the course of events should require measures of that nature; and you informed the Resident at the same time, that the Rajah was to be protected in his person, and in the exercise of all his rights, but that it was necessary such a system of internal administration should be established, as should ensure the exact fulfilment of the existing treaty, and guard against the recurrence of those evils which had menaced the public interests in that quarter.

No. 9.

Letter from Court of Directors, 29 Sept. 1809; on Political State of the Travancore Territory.

25. After these measures were taken, the Dewan earnestly requested, through a native then at Alleppe, in the service of Colonel Macaulay, to enter into a negociation with that officer. The Dewan proposed to retire from his situation, and to live at Callicut, under the protection of the Company; the terms, which seem to have been moderate on his part, were settled apparently to his entire satisfaction. He on the 27th of December, transmitted to Colonel Macaulay, through the same native agent, a sealed letter to the Rajah, the contents of which he did now show, but he gave a translation of it, which is on your records, and contains the resignation of his office. The agent, a man of character, has reported, that the Dewan on that occasion, said with great sensibility—"Tell the Colonel, I now see and "acknowledge all my errors and faults; I now know that I was wrong and misled; Colonel "Macaulay has twice saved my life, at the risk of his own; by to-morrow I shall owe my "life to him a third time; all the country know that to him I am indebted for the rank "and authority I have held; I quit my office cheerfully, confiding in him; it is the only "reparation I can now offer to him and the Rajah." Colonel Macaulay states, that at the Dewan's earnest request, he had weakened his own party of sepoys, and had sent his palankeens and boats to provide for the Dewan's security and convenience, in coming to him at Cochin, whither he was to proceed on his way to Calicut. The Dewan's letter, written on the 27th of December, he dated the 28th, observing to the agent—"The Colonel will receive "it to-morrow, and as to-morrow will be a lucky day for all parties, let it be dated to-"morrow." On the night of the 28th, a body of 1000 nairs, commanded by a particular friend of the Dewan's, attacked the house of Colonel Macauley at Cochin, with the intention of murdering him; several of his sepoys were killed, and his own escape was most providential and surprizing. On the 30th of December, the Dewan in person, with an army reported to have been 30,000 strong, attacked the British Subsidiary Force at Quilon. The whole of this proceeding is marked by a character of signal perfidy and atrocity, which may throw light on other parts of this man's conduct. It renders credible the report of his designing, in 1806, to have Colonel Macaulay poisoned, and was a prelude to the murder in cold blood, which he afterwards ordered, of Dr. Hume and thirty-three soldiers of His Majesty's 12th regiment, and to the cruelty he exercised towards the native adherents of the British cause who fell into his hands.

26. Before you were apprized of these open acts of hostility, you had, on the 25th of December, countermanded the orders for marching troops from the Carnatic and Malabar to the frontiers of Travancore, and all military movements and measures against that State. You also recalled Colonel Macaulay, and appointed another Gentleman to the charge of the Residency. You have no where distinctly stated the reasons for this change, which you notified to the Supreme Government on the 27th December, observing only in general terms, that subsequent accounts had led you to entertain great doubts regarding the apprehensions which had been excited. This is also the tenor of your letters to us of the 29th December and 27th January; and in your reply of 15th February 1809, to the letter from Bengal, of the 23d January, in which that Government acquiesced with evident reluctance, and only in reliance upon your judgment. In your suspension of military proceedings, and the recal of Colonel Macaulay, you merely state yourselves to have "received information, of a private nature, from different quarters, which certainly "impressed you with a belief that the rumours respecting the preparations in Travancore "had been exaggerated." You added, that it was well known the Resident had been long at variance with the Dewan; and that the latter did not cease to make, through different channels, the strongest professions of his earnest desire and endeavour to preserve undisturbed the subsisting relations between the two countries. How far his conduct in respect to the payment of the subsidy, and after his earnest declarations upon the receipt of Sir George Barlow's letter, in the month of September preceding, accorded with these professions, you had yourselves the means of judging; and Colonel Macaulay's private letters to Mr. Secretary Buchan contained no intimation of a change of councils in the Dewan; on the contrary, his letter to Colonel Chalmers of the 9th December, transmitted to Mr. Buchan, states in the strongest terms the continuance of his hostile preparations. On the 20th, indeed, he mentions, that the Dewan had shifted his ground, and that his object was to lull suspicion asleep; but this letter could not well have reached Madras in time to produce the change of measures adopted on the 25th. The real ground of this alteration in your system must have been a doubt of the accuracy of Colonel Macaulay's intelligence, and, as appears from Mr. Petrie's minute, of the propriety of his conduct; which doubts arose from private information derived from other quarters; but that private information has neither been communicated to us, nor to the Supreme Government.

27. With respect to the minute of Mr. Petrie, it delivers merely an opinion, without the facts or reasons on which it may have been formed; and it implies the opinion not to have been first adopted at the time the minute was written; yet we find in no preceding part of your transactions relative to Travancore, any intimation of such an opinion. Upon the whole of this topic we shall only observe, that it is in general impossible to form a judgment here of the wisdom and justice of the measures pursued in India, unless the facts and reasons upon which they are grounded are distinctly stated.

28. We should however, suppose, that the private intelligence above alluded to was of so decisive a nature, as not only to have raised doubts of the accuracy of Colonel Macaulay's numerous

No. 9.

Letter from Court of Directors, 29 Sept. 1809; on Political State of the Travancore Territory.

numerous informations, but to have prevented you from drawing the natural, and indeed the necessary inference, from the perfidious attempt already described of the Dewan upon his life; which attempt, with all the train of atrocious and convincing circumstances attending it, was known to you on the 4th of January, when you, notwithstanding, renewed your orders for the suspension of military measures. In the remarks made upon this decision in the letter of the Supreme Government, of the 23d January, we certainly concur, as well as in the general principles laid down in that very able letter. It was written upon the supposition that your reasons for doubting, both the propriety of the Resident's conduct, and the accuracy of his intelligence, were convincing. Uninformed as we still are of the particulars upon which your doubts were founded, we can pronounce no judgment. Your proceeding however, is a full proof of your unwillingness to enter upon hostilities. Yet whilst we do justice to your laudable motives for being thus reluctant, and for making every attempt to conciliate; and whilst we repeat our own decided aversion to war, and our sorrow for the occurrence of those circumstances in which you were then placed, it still seems to us that after so flagrant an attack upon the public representative of the British Government, to suspend even the march of troops towards Travancore, was not the best mode of seeking conciliation, nor a mode suited to the just respect due to our own Government; and we cannot therefore but reckon it fortunate, that the zeal and activity of Colonel Macaulay, in very trying circumstances, and the gallantry of Colonel Chalmers, and the troops under him, prevented part of the evil consequences which might have resulted from this delay.

29. The attack upon the Subsidiary Force at Quilon, on the 30th of December, left you no option but to resume the system of vigorous measures. It is not our intention, at present, to go largely into this part of the dispatches now before us, nor into the military operations which unhappily became unavoidable. But, as from our general confidence in the wisdom and decision of your Government, it is an unpleasant part of our duty to state our doubts upon any part of your conduct, we think it just to express our decided approbation of the energy and activity you displayed on this occasion. We approve of your letter to the Rajah of Travancore, and of your proclamation to his people, preliminary to the entrance of our troops into his country: but with respect to the instructions which you transmitted on the 19th of January to Colonel Macaulay, for the regulation of the affairs of Travancore after tranquillity should be re-established, it appears to us that it was, at that moment, rather premature to determine exactly upon the future measures that should be adopted with respect to the Rajah, and that your instructions have an air of rigour which it might have been desirable to avoid; but on the general subject of our future relations with that Prince, we shall have occasion to make some observations in the sequel.

30. The conduct of the military operations, so far as they have yet been reported to us, demands our unqualified praise. The steady bravery and repeated victories of Colonel Chalmers and his troops, and his temperate yet firm behaviour towards the Dewan, were of great importance. The storming and capture of the lines of Travancore was an achievement of distinguished gallantry, which reflects great credit on the commanding officer, Lieut. Col. St. Leger, and the officers and men under him, in particular on Major Welsh, who led the storming party in a manner that does singular honour to his intrepidity and perseverance. The civil servants also, whose local situations gave them any part in these transactions, appear to have acquitted themselves with zeal and ability; particularly Mr. Warden, collector of Malabar, who communicated important informations; Mr. Gillio, magistrate in Malabar; and Mr. Hepburn, collector of Tinnevelly.

31. The prompt zeal manifested by his Excellency the Governor of Ceylon, in dispatching early and material aid to our officers employed in Travancore, demands our acknowledgments; and we desire that you will take an early opportunity of making known to him the sense we entertain of his public spirited conduct on this occasion.

32. We are also sensible of the very useful aid derived to our service from the zealous co-operation of Captains Byng and Foote, the Commanders of His Majesty's ships the Belliqueux and Piedmontese.

33. Nor can we omit to notice on this occasion, the becoming conduct of the late Rajah of Cochin, who evinced the utmost reluctance to enter into combination against the Company, and whose life, it is strongly to be feared, was, in consequence of this reluctance, traitorously sacrificed to the views of the hostile party. We think the family and interests of that Prince entitled to our marked consideration, on account of his conduct and his sufferings, and we hope they will have received a due attention from you.

34. With respect to Colonel Macaulay, we find, that soon after his arrival in Travancore, the Rajah complained of him as harsh in his conduct, and as seeking to impose a new treaty upon him. It appears to us, that Colonel Macaulay, in his early intercourses with that Government, assumed a tone of authority, higher, perhaps, than in the former reign had been either usual or equally requisite: by his own account, his public accusation of one of the Rajah's disreputable favourites, of murder, drew upon him the resentment of the Durbar of that time; and his refusal of money, of which he says he had large offers, made him be counted an enemy. The Governor General, Lord Wellesley, however, in answer to all the complaints made to him, declared that he was perfectly satisfied with Colonel Macaulay, and that what he had done, he had done by his order. Lord Clive, to whom similar complaints were made, appeared to have been also satisfied; the new treaty brought on the carpet by him, seems, throughout, to have been the chief article of grievance. The other charges advanced against him at that time, which were rather vague and of little importance, and apparently urged with the view of effecting his recal, (as Mr. Powney had, on his complaint, been recalled before, merely because he was disagreeable to him), seem to have been satisfactorily answered; but the treaty was nevertheless represented to successive Governors, both before it was made and afterwards, as the work of Colonel Macaulay, though as already noticed, Lord Wellesley's Letter to the Rajah had distinctly declared that measure to be his own. With the Dewan Vallay Tomby, to whom Colonel Macaulay had rendered such essential services, he seems to have had no quarrel till he began to require the payment of the new subsidy in 1806, and in respect to requisitions on that account, he seems to have been abundantly patient. The tone which he adopted in his memorandum to the Rajah of 10th March 1808, was a proper one, and his calling upon the Dewan for proof that the payment of the increased subsidy pressed inconveniently upon the finances of Travancore, as well as his repetition of the statement of their resources, which he had with great propriety explained upon a former occasion to the Dewan, has our approbation; but we cannot give the same approbation to his ultimate determination, not to transmit the Rajah's letter of 16th February 1808, because that determination naturally led to the irregular communication which ensued; and we must also disapprove his having omitted, when he withheld the letter, to communicate the correspondence which had taken place between the Dewan and himself upon the subject of it to his Government, until the month of July 1808, when he first mentioned it in consequence of the dispatch from the Chief Secretary in the preceding month, returning the subsequent letters from the Rajah and the Dewan, to the Governor. These circumstances, we conceive, ought to have been noticed in your correspondence with the Resident, though it is indeed true, that as the declaration of the inability of Travancore to discharge the full demands had been considered by the Governments of Bengal and Madras as futile, and all requests for a further remission had been directly negatived, the Resident may have been naturally led to think, that a mere repetition of these assertions and demands, unsupported by any fresh proofs or allegations, was unnecessary to be transmitted; and our Government at Madras may upon the same grounds have thought it expedient to put an end to all hopes of relaxation, by considering the subject as closed. The most important letter of complaint received by your Government from the Dewan, appears to be that of the 10th July 1808, which reached you in the interval between the receipt of Colonel Macaulay's explanation of his conduct, as complained of in the Dewan's former communications, and the transmission of your letter of reproof to the Dewan, dated the 30th of the same month. In this letter of the 10th July, the Dewan alledges that the conduct of the Resident and of his nephew Doctor Macaulay, was personally disrespectful and offensive to the Rajah and himself, and he complains pointedly of the delegation by the Resident, of his authority to the latter gentleman, inclosing a copy of a note to himself from Colonel Macaulay, dated the 26th June 1808, in which that delegation is referred to in a manner which seems to show that it had been matter of previous complaint. Of this letter, no other notice appears to have been taken by you, than the mention made of it in your letter of reproof to the Dewan, in the enumeration of the communications from him which are there acknowledged. We are surprised, that you should have thought it unnecessary to require any explanation from the Resident upon the subject of this letter. We should have supposed that a representation of this nature would have led you to call for copies of all the correspondence which had taken place between Colonel Macaulay and the Court of Travancore for some time past, and for as full an account of his verbal communications, and those of Dr. Macaulay with the Dewan, as could be furnished; and we should have expected this the more upon such an occasion, because it is evident from the silence of the records, that the Resident was not in the habit of making a regular communication to you of the particulars of what passed on the constant and pressing applications and remonstrances which had been made by him to the Travancore Government, in respect to the payment of the subsidy. Upon the whole of this subject, it appears to us, that Colonel Macaulay may have been wanting in a conciliatory temper, and that his residence at a distance from the seat of the Travancore Government, with his consequent transaction of the public business by a delegate, was inexpedient. We think also, that he committed an unfortunate error in making the new subsidy higher than the first instructions to him from the Governor General proposed, and upon this point we shall say something more hereafter; but on the other hand, it is fair to allow, that as from the complaints that were reiterated against him, chiefly on the ground of the treaty, and the resistance he experienced to the payment of the new subsidy, it became difficult for him to conciliate that Court, so, although it is a matter of concern, that any plea of this nature should have been afforded for complaints, yet from the character of the Dewan, it cannot be supposed that the personal demeanor of Colonel Macaulay could be the cause of the extensive and deeply criminal views into which he entered; and as far as we can judge from the information before us, Colonel Macaulay appears to have conducted himself with great integrity, and with distinguished ability and firmness in a difficult situation, and in a variety of trying conjunctures.

No. 9.

Letter from Court of Directors, 29 Sept. 1809; on Political State of the Travancore Territory.

35. Before we quit this subject, we take occasion to observe, that it is of importance the mode of intercourse between our Government and Courts which stand in a relation to them, similar to that of Travancore, should be distinctly understood. This intercourse should, undoubtedly, be carried on in the regular form, between the Resident and the Prince, or his Minister; but as cases may arise in which the country Powers may have, or think they have, reason to complain of the conduct of a Resident, and means ought to be afforded them of transmitting such complaints through a regular channel, nothing more can be expected

of

No. 9.

Letter from Court of Directors, 29 Sep. 1809; on Political State of the Travancore Territory.

of them, than that they should do, what appears in the case immediately before us, to have been proposed, namely; to transmit them openly through the hands of the Resident, thereby giving him an opportunity of clearing himself from any unfounded charges which may be brought against him. The establishment of a different principle, would preclude all regular channels of complaint, and leave no hopes of redress but in resistance.

36. Having now reviewed the state of our relations with the Government of Travancore, from an early period to the present time, and through a long course of friendly alliance, to a state of comparative alienation, and at length of open warfare, we proceed to make some observations on the causes which may have led to this last unhappy predicament in which we are now involved, and on the principles by which our future conduct towards that Government ought to be regulated.

37. We have already noticed the great change produced in the external relations of the Travancore State, by the downfal of Tippoo Sultan, and of his power in 1799. From that time, as the protection of the Company has ceased to be essential, which before it was, to the independence of Travancore, so it is certain that our friendship has been regarded by that State with less solicitude; but it might have been expected, that it would maintain its ancient relations, both in gratitude for past services, and because it could not swerve from them without incurring our just resentment; we had a right also, to expect in return, for securing that State from destruction, by enemies external and internal, the most complete security which it could afford us against European force or intrigue; and on the other hand, it was still of so much importance to us, in reference especially to European enemies, to maintain the influence we had obtained over the political conduct of Travancore, that it became our interest to make its connection with us as easy to that State as should consist with a due controul over its foreign relations. To secure the continuance of that controul, was in the new situation in which the two States were placed after our conquest of Mysore, an object of legitimate policy to our Government; but to increase to Travancore the expense of its connection with us to so large an extent, seems to have been inexpedient. According to these positions, it was fairly allowable to our Government to propose in 1800, a new modification of the treaty of 1795, and some increase of the Subsidiary Force; but beyond the amount which upon a just estimate the Rajah should be found likely to save annually, by being absolved from the stipulation to furnish the Company with military aid whenever they should, in a state of war, demand it, it appears to us, that no pecuniary concession should have been required of him, unless he had shewn a perfect willingness to have made up whatever that estimate should have fallen short of the charge of a third subsidiary battalion of our troops; for it became the interest of the Company, in the new state of things, to devote a third battalion to the care of that country, even if no allowance had been made to them for it. The Governor General in his instructions of February 1800, to the Resident, required him to propose that another battalion should be subsidized; but the Resident, as we have already observed, unhappily proposed a regiment; this no doubt increased the disinclination of the Travancore Government to a new treaty, which it resisted for five years, and only acceded to at last, in the moment when it was preserved chiefly by British support, from being overwhelmed by domestic insurrection and revolt. The augmentation of the money subsidy seems, both from what passed at the time and what has since transpired, to have been the objection most felt by the Travancore Government to that treaty. It is indeed, true, that the Resident was correct in believing the Rajah could afford to pay the additional subsidy; the vast military preparations of which Travancore has since been found capable, is a clear proof of this. It is also true, that since the inability of the country has been pleaded, our Government has constantly professed a readiness to pay regard to that plea, if any evidence could be adduced in support of it; and that no such evidence has been offered, is another proof of the ability of the country; it must further be admitted, that nothing could be more improbable or less likely to be apprehended, than any hostility between one Government and the State of Travancore, and that in the situation of the Company's finances in the year 1805, to desire an additional subsidy for an additional force, from a Prince who was able to afford it, who then owed a large balance of obligation to the Company, and was utterly unlikely to break his connection with them, might seem fairly allowable; but after all these admissions, it is in our opinion to be regretted, that any new subsidy beyond the fair commutation already mentioned, should have been demanded; that the grounds of discontent on the part of the Travancore Government, either in respect to the treaty or the conduct of the Resident, as also the reported hostile preparations of that Government, were not in due time closely scrutinized; and it is a source of great concern to us, that either the treaty or the manner of enforcing it should have been in any measure a real or an assignable cause for the misunderstandings that ensued, and which at length unhappily ended in enormities, on the part of the Dewan, that nothing in the treaty or the adherence of our Government to it could possibly justify.

37. When the treaty of 1805 reached us in the end of that year, we were not aware that it had not been entered into with the good will of the Travancore State, having then been quite uninformed of the resistance that had been made to such a treaty during four years preceding; nor were the records which contained the details of the Resident's correspondence during that period brought under our notice, till your late advices called our attention to the subject.

38. That the Rajah of Travancore himself, or any other individual in his situation, would have broken his connection with the Company on such a ground as this, we see no reason to believe; and that he should have been of so weak a character, and should have retained a man so unprincipled and malevolent as Vallay Tomby, in an office which enabled him to exercise despotic power, are circumstances to be lamented; but that Minister does not seem at first to have entertained any idea of refusing the payment of the subsidy; and by what process of mind, by what combined views of daring ambition and enmity to our Government, passions by which he seems to have been powerfully influenced, his ferocious spirit was led into formidable military preparations and hostile negociations, and thence to the desperate game he at length ventured upon for independent authority, it must be impracticable to ascertain; but the treaty of 1805 ought not to be considered as responsible for all the consequences flowing from his subsequent illegal assumption of powers, which belonged only to his Sovereign, and from the daring wickedness with which he used those powers. In fact, he appears to have been influenced by events, as they successively arose to his view, and to imagine that he was steadily actuated from the beginning only, or chiefly by the motive of resistance to the additional subsidy, would be to form a conclusion which the nature of his character by no means warrants. It was only after the return to India of Lord Cornwallis, who was supposed to favour a system of external policy different from that of the preceding Governor General, that the Dewan first thought of complaining of the treaty; the changes which afterwards took place, both in the Governments of Bengal and Madras, encouraged him, according to the Indian manner, to renew his complaint; and we are sorry to observe, from his English letters, and circumstances mentioned by Colonel Macaulay, that European or Portugueze intriguers may have contributed to mislead him; but the rumours which were circulated in the country about the time of the Vellore mutiny, the commotions of that time, and above all, the reports of a French invasion, and a new war between the Company and the Mahratta States, seem to have made a strong impression on his mind, and to have disposed him to entertain schemes of aggrandizement and resistance; and as the most effectual means of success, to look to an alliance with the French, with whom, if he could have established a connection, it would be inconsonant to his character to suppose, that he would not have supplied the benefit of it to the establishment of his own power, rather than to the service of his master. The daring lengths to which he is capable of going in his schemes, and in the means of accomplishing them, have been exemplified in some of the transactions already noticed, and receive a further illustration from his plan to assassinate all the European officers of the Subsidiary Force, previous to the attack upon that corps on the 30th of December; and from his attempt to instigate by the most atrocious unfounded calumnies, the Zemorin and other chieftains of that part of India, to rise in arms for the subversion of the British power; a man of such flagitious dispositions never could have been safely trusted, nor can it be at all concluded, that without any plea like that of the new subsidy, his bad passions would not have led him to the greatest extremities. The power which he at length exercised in the Travancore State, rendered his master a cypher, and was inconsistent with the rights of that Prince, and the engagements subsisting between him and the Company. The personal character and conduct of the Dewan were therefore to be clearly separated from any question arising out of treaties between the two States; and we doubt not that in the settlement, which there is reason to hope has long since taken place of the affairs of Travancore, you will have seen the necessity, in justice both to the Rajah and the Company, of depriving the author of all the late disturbances, of the power of doing any mischief in future.

No. 9.

Letter from Court of Directors, 29 Sept. 1809; on Political State of the Travancore Territory.

39. With the Rajah himself, who does not seem to have taken personally any active part in the hostile proceedings of his Dewan, and may rather have been intimidated by him into acquiescence, we still wish that a lenient policy may have been pursued. To a pertinacious refusal to fulfil the obligation of a solemn treaty deliberately formed, and a refusal for which no satisfactory or valid reason was assigned, our Government could not, in justice to itself yield; and when this refusal was followed by active hostility against us, it became necessary to have recourse to the law of arms; but when our military power shall have prevailed, as we trust it will, in so unequal and unprovoked a contest, it is our wish that the temperate and indulgent consideration, into which we should from the first have been most ready to enter, of the subsidy stipulated by the treaty of 1805, may still have had place. The luminous and judicious view given in the letter addressed to you by the Supreme Government on the 23d of January, already noticed, of the principles which should regulate the conduct of the Company towards the State of Travancore, both in the critical circumstances then existing, and for the maintenance of permanent relations between us and that State, exhibits in general the sentiments we entertain upon this subject, particularly the latter branch of it, which respects the future connection of the two States. But we are not prepared to admit, with the Governor General in Council, that if it could be proved the revenues of Travancore were, after defraying all expences, adequate to the payment of the additional subsidy, that circumstance would alone be sufficient reason for insisting on the continuance of the standard of 1805. We are, however, fully of opinion, that complete reparation ought to be made by the Travancore State, for the insults offered to our Government by the hostile attacks made upon the house and person of the British Representative, and upon the Subsidiary Force at Quilon, and for the expence of the detachments of troops, which those measures obliged the Company, in self-defence, to march into Travancore. We are of opinion too, that no concession should be made which would appear to the Travancore Government, or to the rest of India, to be the effect of compulsion or intimidation; but that after the honour of our Government has been sufficiently vindicated and secured, our object should be, by manly and liberal policy, to conciliate the lasting attachment of the Travancore State; and that if the amount at which the subsidy was fixed by the treaty of 1805 should be found to interfere with this object, it ought on that account alone to be reduced.

No 9.

Letter from Court of Directors, 29 Sep. 1809; on Political State of the Travancore Territory.

40. On the whole, although we must ever lament the necessity which has impelled our Government to have recourse to arms against the aggressions of the Travancore State, we would hope, that the events which have lately passed there, and our conduct towards it, will lead to a permanent settlement of our connection with that country, and tend to preserve the general tranquillity of India.

We are,

Your loving friends,

(Signed) CHAS. GRANT. J. HUDLESTON.
WM. ASTELL. ROBT. WILLIAMS.
T. METCALF. GEORGE SMITH.
JNO. INGLIS. GEO. MILLETT.
JNO. JACKSON. W. WIGRAM.
G. A. ROBINSON. JAS. PATTISON.
R. C. PLOWDEN.

London, 29th Sept. 1809.

No. 10.

Copy of the TREATY with the Rajah of Travancore, dated the 28th January 1793.

(Copy.)

No. 10.

Treaty (28 January 1793) with the Rajah of Travancore.

ARTICLES of Agreement made and entered into by the Honourable Major General Robert Abercromby, President and Governor of Bombay, for and on behalf of the Honourable United English East India Company, and their Successors, on the one part; and Gueswa Pilla, Dewan to his Highness the Rajah of Travancore, for and on behalf of his said Highness, and his Successors, on the other part; this 28th day of January of the English year 1793, viz.

That this agreement shall not affect or interfere with any agreements subsisting between the said Honourable Company and the said Rajah; and the said Rajah shall deliver to the said Company, between the 10th February 1794 and 10th April following, three thousand candies (of 560 pounds weight) of clean pepper, at the rate of one hundred and fifteen Bombay rupees for each candy, exclusive of two rupees customs for each; and shall further deliver a similar quantity (three thousand candies) annually, at the same price and at similar periods, for nine successive years, that is, three thousand every year, until the 10th of April 1804 (English computation.)

That of the pepper above stipulated to be delivered annually, two thousand five hundred candies shall be delivered at Quilon, and the remaining five hundred candies at the said Company's warehouse at Anjengo, into the hands of such officers as the Company may appoint for the purpose of receiving it.

That the said Rajah shall receive, in part payment for the said annual contract for pepper, the undermentioned articles, at the usual prices for which he has been debited in former contracts; two thousand stand of arms complete, one hundred candies of lead, three hundred yards of scarlet broad-cloth superfine, one thousand five hundred yards of ditto fine, twenty-seven thousand five hundred yards of red purpet, two thousand yards of blue purpet, five hundred yards of yellow purpet, five hundred yards of green purpet.

That the balance due for the said annual provision of pepper shall be discharged in Bombay rupees; which balance, together with the warlike stores stipulated to be taken in part payment, shall be made good between the 10th February and the 10th April of each respective year that this agreement shall be in force, in like manner as the Rajah engages to deliver the pepper within those periods.

That should the Rajah fail to deliver the quantity of pepper contracted for by this agreement, within the periods specified, he shall forfeit to the said Company fifty-seven rupees and an half penalty, for each candy of pepper so deficient. In like manner, should the Company fail on their part, to make good to the Rajah the amount specified in the agreement, within the terms prescribed, they shall forfeit a penalty of double the sum so deficient.

In witness of the foregoing agreement, Major General Abercromby and Gueswa Pilla have subscribed to two copies thereof, which have been mutually exchanged, and have affixed their seals, this 28th day of January 1793.

(Signed) Robert Abercromby.

No. 11.

Copy of a PARAGRAPH, 226, of a Revenue LETTER, from the Governor in Council at Fort St. George, to the Court of Directors of the East India Company, dated 21st October 1807.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER from FORT ST. GEORGE, dated 21st October 1807.

Para. 226.

No. 11.
On the Revenue of Malabar.

THE following Extract of the Report of the Board of Revenue, conveys a most satisfactory description of the beneficial changes which have occurred in the affairs of that province:—

"WHEN we consider the destruction of troops, enormous expenditure of the public "money, and miserable state of confusion, which until very lately rendered this province a "source of constant regret and anxiety, we cannot help congratulating Your Honour in "Council, on the very happy change which the public measures have effected. We think "but few instances have been exhibited of a speedier and happier transition from civil war, "poverty, and enormous expenditure of the public money, to perfect tranquillity, increasing "opulence, and comparative economy."

[No. 12.—Copy of a Letter from John Bebb, Esq. (a Director of the East India Company), to the Court of Directors, dated 31 May 1813; respecting the 13th Proposition, submitted to the House of Commons, on the renewal of the Company's Charter;—having been already printed, is not here inserted.]

No. 13.

Copy of the 2d and 3d PARAGRAPHS of the Military LETTER, from the Governor in Council at Fort St. George, to the Court of Directors of the East India Company, dated the 1st of July 1812, relative to the late Occurrences at Quilon in Travancore.

EXTRACT MILITARY LETTER from FORT ST. GEORGE, dated 1st July 1812.

Para. 2.

No. 13. Occurrences at Quilon in Travancore.

WE avail ourselves of the opportunity afforded to us by the departure of His Majesty's ship Doris for Europe, to transmit to you the enclosed Copies of further Communications from the Resident in Travancore, received since the date of that letter, respecting the late occurrences at Quilon. We have also the honour to enclose Copies of Letters dispatched by our order to the Resident, and to His Excellency the Commander in Chief.

3. We are happy to inform your Honourable Court, that a careful consideration of the Resident's dispatches has confirmed us in our belief, originally grounded on the proceedings of the Military Committee of Enquiry, laid before us by the Commanding Officer of the Subsidiary Force, that the conspiracy at Quilon will ultimately appear, as far as regards the troops, to have been confined to a few bad characters in one battalion of the army, and that the inhabitants of Travancore were entirely unconcerned in it. We have however, deemed it proper to direct, that four companies of His Majesty's Royal Regiment shall be detached from Trichinopoly to Travancore, as a temporary arrangement, until it shall be determined from what garrison the European force intended to be stationed in that country can be permanently spared. The native troops in Travancore have also been ordered to be relieved.

PAPERS

RELATING TO

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS:

VIZ.

Growth of Hemp, and Cotton.—General Revenues of India; and Mr. Rickards's Finance System in part of Salsette.—Permanent Settlement in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces.—Mr. Rickards's Proposition for establishing a General Bank.—Revenue of Broach and Surat.—Jumma or Rental in Guzerat.—Political State of the Travancore Territory; and Treaty with the Rajah of Travancore.—Revenue of Malabar.—Occurrences at Quilon in Travancore.

Ordered, by The House of Commons, to be printed,
22 June 1813.

PAPERS

RELATING TO

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

(Resident Europeans.—Police.—MISSIONARIES.—Weavers, and Investments.)

Ordered, by The House of Commons, to be printed,
14 April 1813.

LIST OF PAPERS

Presented to The Honourable House of Commons, pursuant to Orders, dated the 2nd—7th—9th—and 12th of April 1813.

—No. 1.—

EXTRACTS from such TREATIES with the Native Powers of India, as relate to the Residence of Europeans in their respective States - - page 1.

—No. 2.—

EXTRACTS of the Replies of the ZILLAH JUDGES of Bengal, Bahar, Orissa and Benares, to the Thirty-ninth Query of the Governor General, in 1801, relative to the conduct of Europeans, not in the service of the East India Company, residing within their Jurisdiction - - - - page 5.

—No. 3.—

RETURN to the Order of the Honourable House of Commons, dated the 2nd April 1813, requiring, "Copy of the fourth, fifth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, "twelfth, thirteenth, nineteenth, and twenty-second Paragraphs, of the "Report on the External Commerce of India, dated the 28th December "1804." - - - - - - - - - - page 7.

—No. 4.—

EXTRACT of the Bengal Judicial Consultations in the CRIMINAL DEPARTMENT, of the 13th of July 1810; containing a Letter from the Justices of the Peace at Benares to the Secretary of the Government of Bengal, dated the 5th of May 1809, transmitting his Proceedings on certain Charges preferred by a Native Subject against Mr. James Titchborne, for an assault and false imprisonment;—together with the Enclosures referred to in that Letter - - - - - - - - - - page 8.

—No. 5.—

EXTRACT of the Bengal Judicial Consultations in the CRIMINAL DEPARTMENT, of the 20th of July 1810;—containing an Abstract of the Cases of Mr. J. L. Turner, R. S. Douglas, T. Gardner, and T. Clark, Persons accused or tried for serious offences committed in the interior of the Country; also of Mr. Titchborne, accused of similar offences;—together with the Depositions referred to in the said Abstract; and Copy of the Proceedings of the Governor General thereon - - - - - - - page 11.

— No. 6. —

Copy of a LETTER from the Governor General in Council, to the Secret Committee of the Court of Directors, dated the 2nd November 1807; relating to The MISSIONARIES - - - - - - page 41.

— No. 7. —

Copies of all DOCUMENTS inclosed in a LETTER from the Governor General of India, to the Court of Directors, dated the 2nd November 1807; in so far as the said Documents relate to The MISSIONARIES:—And, Copy of the ANSWER from the Court of Directors to the said Letter, so far as relates to the said subject of The MISSIONARIES - - - - - page 47.

— No. 8. —

Copy of a LETTER from the Bengal Government, to the Secret Committee of the Court of Directors, dated the 7th December 1807; together with the several Enclosures accompanying the same; on the subject of MISSIONARIES: —Also, Extract of a Letter from the Court of Directors, dated 7th December 1808, in REPLY to the said Letter - - - - - page 74.

— No. 9. —

Copy of a PROCLAMATION of Lord WILLIAM BENTINCK, as Governor of Madras; dated 3rd December 1806 - - - - - page 86.

— No. 10. —

Copies of all REGULATIONS AND ORDERS, issued, and now in force, under the Bengal Government, respecting The WEAVERS, as well in regard to their connexion with the provision of the Company's Investment, as in respect to their employment by Individuals - - - - page 87.

East India House,
14th April 1813.

—No. 1.—

Extracts from such TREATIES with the Native Powers of India, as relate to the RESIDENCE of Europeans in their respective States.

EXTRACT TREATIES CONCLUDED BY THE GOVERNMENT OF BENGAL.

Treaty with Nudjum ul Dowla, Nabob of Bengal: 1765.

ARTICLE 10.—I will allow no Europeans whatever to be entertained in my service; and if there already be any, they shall be immediately dismissed.

Treaty with Asuf ul Dowlah, Nabob of Oude: 1775.

Article 2.—The aforesaid Nabob engages never to entertain or receive in his dominions Cossim Ally Cawn, the former Soubadar of Bengal; and Sumro, the murderer of the English; even in case of his getting them into his hands, he will, out of friendship, make them prisoners, and deliver them up to the English Company. He also engages, not for any cause or under any pretence, to entertain Europeans of any nation in his service, without the consent of the English Company. That he will prevent, oppose, and send back such as offer to come into, pass through or remain, or shall be in his dominions, without the perwannah of the English Company. The Europeans of every nation, in the service of the said Nabob, are hereby dismissed; and now and in the future, he engages never to entertain the said Europeans, and to deliver up to the English Company such of their servants who have deserted or may desert, in case of his apprehending them.

Treaty with the Ranah of Gohud: 1779.

Article 9.—No English factory shall be established in the dominions of the Mahà Rajah. No persons of any denomination shall be sent into his dominions on the part of the English Company, or with the licence of the Governor General and Council, without his previous consent; neither shall his ryots be pressed for any military service, nor any authority exercised over them but his own.

Treaty with the Marattas: 1782.

Article 13.—The Peshwa hereby engages, that he will not suffer any factories of other European nations to be established in his territories, or those of the chiefs dependant on him, excepting only such as are already established by the Portuguese; and he will hold no intercourse of friendship with any other European nations: and the English, on their part, agree, that they will not afford assistance to any nation of Decan or Indostan, at enmity with the Peshwa.

Treaty with the Nabob of Oude, Asoph ul Dowlah: 1787.

Lord CORNWALLIS's Proposition.	NABOB's Answer.
If any Europeans shall reside there without my permission in writing, your Excellency shall oblige him to quit the country; or, if demanded, send him to the Resident on the part of the Company.	I have not answered every particular of your Lordship's kind letter, because I have heard, that your Lordship positively means to come to this quarter, and when we meet, every matter will be answered in a most friendly manner. Now, considering acquiescence to your Lordship's orders and preservation of your pleasure as the principle of friendship, I have complied.

Treaty with the Rajah of Travancore: 1797.

Article 6.—The reigning Rajah of Travancore for the time being, shall not keep in his service, in any civil or military capacity, nor allow to remain within his dominions, as merchants or under any other plea or pretext, the subjects or citizens of any nation being at war with Great Britain or with the East India Company; nor under any circumstances of peace or war, allow any European nation to obtain settlements (i. e. territory or places under their own authority) within the same, nor enter into any new engagements with any European or Indian States, without the previous concurrence of the British Government in India.

No. 1. Extracts from Treaties, relative to Residence of Europeans.

Treaty with the Vizier Nabob of Oude, Saadit Ali: 1798.

Article 15.—The Nabob, Saadit Ali Khan, engages and promises, that he will not entertain any Europeans of any description in his service, nor allow any to settle in his country, without the consent of the Company.

Treaty with the Nizam: 1798.

Article 6.—Immediately upon the arrival of the subsidiary force at Hydrabad, the whole of the officers and servants of the French party are to be dismissed, and the troops composing it dispersed and disorganized, that no trace of the former establishment shall remain. And his Highness hereby engages, for himself, his heirs and successors, that no Frenchman whatever shall ever hereafter be entertained in his own service, or in that of any of his chiefs or dependants, nor be suffered to remain in any part of his Highness's dominions; nor shall any Europeans whatever be admitted into the service of this state, nor be permitted to remain within his territories, without the knowledge and consent of the Company's government.

Treaty with the Nizam: 1800.

Article 1.—That all the former treaties and agreements between the two states, now in force, and not contrary to the tenor of this agreement, shall be confirmed by it.

Treaty with the Peshwa: 31st December 1802.

Article 11.—Whereas it has been usual for his highness Rao Pundit Purdhaun Bahauder to enlist and retain in his service Europeans of different countries, his said Highness hereby agrees and stipulates, that in the event of war breaking out between the English and any European nation, and of discovery being made that any European or Europeans in his service, belonging to such nation at war with the English, shall have meditated injury towards the English, or have entered into intrigues hostile to their interest, such European or Europeans so offending, shall be discharged by his said Highness, and not suffered to reside in his dominions.

Treaty with the Rajah of Jyepoor (or Jyenagur): 1803.

Article 7th.—The Maha Rajah shall not entertain in his service, or in any manner give admission to any English or French subjects, or any other person from among the inhabitants of Europe, without the consent of the Company's Government.

Treaty with Rajah Umbajee Rao Englah: 1803.

Article 4.—Rajah Umbajee shall not entertain in his service, or in any manner give admission to any English or French subjects, or any other person from among the inhabitants of Europe, without the consent of the English Government.

Treaty with the Rajah of Berar: 1803.

Article 8.—Senah Saheb Soubah engages never to take or retain in his service any Frenchman, or the subject of any other European or American power, the government of which may be at war with the British Government, or any British subject, whether European or Indian, without the consent of the British Government. The Honourable Company engage, on their part, that they will not give aid or countenance to any discontented relations, rajahs, zemindars, or other subjects of Senah Saheb Soubah, who may fly from or rebel against his authority.

Treaty with Dowlut Rao Scindiah: 1803.

Article 13.—The Maha Rajah, Ali Jah Dowlut Rao Scindiah, engages never to take or retain in his service any Frenchman, or the subject of any other European or American power, the government of which may be at war with the British Government, or any British subject, whether European or native of India, without the consent of the British Government.

Treaty with the Ranah of Gohud: 1804.

Article 9.—Maha Rajah Ranah shall not entertain in his service, or in any manner give admission to any English or French subjects, or any other persons from amongst the inhabitants of Europe, without the consent of the British Government.

Treaty with the Rajah of Travancore: 1805.

Article 8.—His Highness stipulates and agrees, that he will not admit any European foreigners into his service, without the concurrence of the English Company Bahaudur; and that he will apprehend and deliver to the Company's Government all Europeans, of whatever whatever description, who shall be found within the territories of his said Highness, without regular passports from the British Government, it being his Highness's determined resolution not to suffer, even for a day, any European to remain within his territories, unless by consent of the said Company.

Treaty with the Rajah of Bhurrutpore: 1805.

Article 8.—The Maha Rajah shall not, in future, entertain in his service, nor give admission to any English or French subjects, or any other person from among the inhabitants of Europe, without the sanction of the Honourable Company's Government; and the Honourable Company also agrees, not to give admission to any of the Maha Rajah's relations or servants without his consent.

Treaty with Jeswunt Rao Holkar: 1805.

Article 6.—Jeswunt Rao Holkar hereby engages never to entertain in his service Europeans of any description, whether British subjects or others, without the consent of the British Government.

EXTRACT TREATIES CONCLUDED BY THE GOVERNMENT OF FORT ST. GEORGE.

Agreement with the Rajah of Tanjour, 20th October 1771.

IF any Europeans, in the service of the Sircar and Company, have deserted and fled to me, I will deliver them up.

Agreement with the Rajah of Tanjour: 1776.

The Company will be pleased to acquiesce to the following conditions:

Article 3.—No houses shall be built by the Sircar in villages, called Agne, where Bramins reside. No European shall be allowed to dwell near any tanks or ponds belonging to pagodas or Bramin villages.

Treaty with the Rajah of Mysore: 1799.

Article 7.—His Highness stipulates and agrees, that he will not admit any European foreigners into his service, without the concurrence of the English Company Bahaudur; and that he will apprehend and deliver up to the Company's Government all Europeans, of whatever description, who shall be found within the territories of his said Highness, without regular passports from the Company's Government; it being his Highness's determined resolution not to suffer, even for a day, any European foreigners to remain within the territories now subjected to his authority, unless by consent of the said Company.

Treaty with the Rajah of Tanjore: 1799.

Article 11.—His Excellency the Rajah stipulates and agrees, that the said fort shall in no case whatever, become an asylum for public offenders, or for persons desirous of escaping from the jurisdiction of the courts of civil and criminal justice, or from the authority of the revenue officers, or of any other branch of the authority of the Honourable Company; and his Excellency the Rajah further agrees to deliver up all such persons, without delay, on application from such officer or officers as the Governor in Council of Fort St. George shall appoint for the purpose.

Treaty with Azeem-ul-Dowlah, Nabob of the Carnatic: 1801.

Article 11.—The entire defence of the Carnatic against foreign enemies, and the maintenance of the internal tranquillity and police of the country, having been hereby transferred to the British Government, his said Highness engages not to entertain or employ in his service any armed men, without the consent of the British Government, who will fix, in concert with his Highness, the number of armed men necessary to be retained for purposes of state. Such armed men as his Highness may, in consequence of this article, engage in his service, shall be paid at the exclusive cost and charge of the said Nabob.

Treaty with the Rajah of Cochin: 1809.

Article 7.—The Rajah of Cochin stipulates and agrees, that he will not admit any European foreigners into his service, without the concurrence of the English Company Bahauder, and that he will apprehend and deliver to the Company's Government all Europeans, of whatever description, who shall be found within the territories of the said rajah without regular passports from the English Government, it being the said rajah's determined resolution, not to suffer, even for a day, any European foreigners to remain within the territories now subjected to his authority, unless by consent of the said Company.

No. 1.

Extracts from Treaties, relative to Residence of Europeans.

EXTRACT TREATIES CONCLUDED BY THE GOVERNMENT OF BOMBAY.

Agreement with the Marattas: 14th September 1761.

Article 3.—That all Europeans and natives, either soldiers, seamen, or others, in His Britannic Majesty's or the honourable Company's pay, who may hereafter desert from Bombay, shall be immediately secured and returned to the nearest English settlement to such place where they may be apprehended, upon landing in any part of the Maratta country; the governor having promised all such a free pardon, and to pay any reasonable charges that may be incurred on the occasion. In like manner shall be delivered up all deserters, in the English pay, from Surat, on their being known, or immediately on receiving notice of them, within the Maratta limits, it not being in their power to speak more positively with respect to those of Surat, as the country thereabouts is open, and numbers go through it without being known. It is also agreed, that whatever people, Europeans of all nations excepted, who are in the service of Madanao, and may desert therefrom to the English, shall be delivered up on the same terms and conditions.

Agreement with the Shaikh of Bushire: 12th April 1763.

Article 3.—No European nation whatever is to be permitted to settle at Bushire, so long as the English continue a factory here.

Agreement with the Bouncello, concluded at the Fort at Barree: 7th April 1765.

Article 14.—The Bouncello will not entertain in his service any people belonging to the English, whether Europeans or others, nor suffer any European deserters to pass through his districts; but on the contrary, give strict orders to all his officers to seize such as may be seen in his dominions, and return them to the chief of Fort Augustus, on promise of pardon, whether they are applied for or not. The English will observe the same in respect to the subjects of the Bouncello, and slaves to be returned on both sides.

Agreement with the Rannie, at Fort Augustus, 12th January 1766.

Article 10.—Maha Rajah Jeejaboy, the Rannie, will not entertain in her service any people belonging to the English, whether Europeans or others; but, on the contrary, give strict orders to her officers, to seize such as may be seen in her dominions; nor suffer any European deserters to pass through her country, but return them to the resident of the English factory, on promise of pardon, whether they are applied for or not. The English will observe the same in respect to the subjects of the Rannie; and slaves to be returned on both sides.

Treaty with the Nabob of Baroach: 1771.

Article 4.—The Dutch have already a factory at Baroach; but, in future, no other European nation shall be permitted to settle a factory at Baroach, without the consent of the honourable the President and council.

Treaty with Ragobah: 1778.

Article 15.—Ragonath Row Badjerow Purdhan hereby engages and agrees, that no European settlements shall be allowed to be made on the maritime coasts, or in any other part of the Maratta dominions, without the consent of the Company, or of their representatives, being previously obtained; and that no manner of intercourse, or connection, shall be maintained between the Maratta Government and the French Nation; any failure, in which stipulation, will be considered as a breach of the alliance between the Maratta Government and the honourable Company.

Treaty with Anund Row Guicowar: 1805.

Article 9.—The Maha Rajah Anund Row Guicowar Sena Khas Khoyl Shumsheir Behauder hereby engages, that he will not entertain in his service any European or American, or any native of India, subject to the honourable Company, without the consent of the British Government; neither will the Company's Government entertain in their service any of the Guicowar servants, dependants, or slaves, contrary to the inclination of that state.

—No. 2.—

Extracts of the REPLIES of the Zillah Judges of Bengal, Bahar, Orissa, and Benares, to the Thirty-ninth QUERY of the Governor General in 1801, relative to the Conduct of Europeans, not in the Service of The East India Company, residing within their Jurisdictions.

The thirty-ninth QUESTION put to the Zillah Judges of BENGAL, BAHAR, ORISSA, and BENARES, by the Governor General in 1801; with the ANSWERS thereto.

QUESTION.—WHAT is the nature of the general conduct of the Europeans, not in the service of the Company, who reside within your jurisdiction?

ANSWERS.

Magistrate of Jessore, Mr. S. Middleton: 30th November 1801.

They conduct themselves with the greatest propriety.

Magistrate of Midnapore, Mr. H. Strachey: 30th January 1802.

There are no Europeans out of the service constantly residing in this district. A few indigo manufacturers and cloth merchants have, or rather had conside[illegible]le dealings in Midnapore, and occasionally come to look after their concerns. The clo[illegible] and indigo trade have very much fallen off within these few years.

Magistrate of Beerbhoom, Mr. D. Campbell: 25th March 1802.

There is at present but one European of this description in the district, and his conduct, to the best of my knowledge, has been in every respect uniformly correct and proper ever since he settled in this part of the country, now upwards of ten years.

Magistrate of Hooghly, Mr. T. Brooke: 3d May 1802.

With the conduct of Europeans residing in this district, not in the service of the Company, there is no reason whatever to find fault.

Magistrate of Nuddea, Mr. C. Oldfield: 16th January 1802.

It is peaceable, and generally correct.

Magistrate of Burdwan, Mr. G. Thompson: 9th March 1802.

I am happy to have it in my power to say, that it has been such as to meet with my approbation, correct, regular, and moral; and it is a justice I owe them to observe, that I have not known an instance of complaint against any of them since I have been at the station; now three years.

Magistrates of Fouzdarry Adawlut, of the 24 pergunnahs, Messrs. Martyn, Blaquiere, Macklew, and Thoroton: 1st July 1802.

The general conduct of the Europeans, not in the service of the Company, who reside within our jurisdiction, is correct, and very few instances have occurred of any complaint whatsoever having been preferred against them.

Magistrate of Backergunge, Mr. Wintle: 7th January 1802.

The general conduct of the Europeans, not in the service, residing in this district (who are very few) is decorous and proper; I seldom have any complaints against them.

Magistrate of Tipperah, Mr. J. Elliot: 23d April 1802.

The conduct of the Europeans in this zillah, not in the service of the Honourable Company, is in every respect satisfactory.

Magistrate of Sylhet, Mr. Roberts: 1st May 1802.

The Europeans in this district conduct themselves with the greatest propriety; and, generally speaking, the inhabitants are satisfied with the integrity of their dealings.

No. 2.

Replies of Zillah Judges, relative to conduct of resident Europeans, not in the service of the East India Company.

Magistrate of Momensing, Mr. J. Stracey: 29th January 1802.

There are no Europeans in the district, out of the service, excepting one Frenchman, who carries on a trifling trade, and is a very quiet well-behaved man.

Magistrate of Chittagong, Mr. Molony: 27th March 1802.

They have conducted themselves heretofore, in general, with great propriety, and much to my satisfaction.

Magistrate of Dacca and Jelalpore, Mr. J. Paterson: 28th July 1802.

There are no Europeans, not in the service of the Company, in this district.

Magistrate of the City of Moorshedabad, Mr. Sturt: 17th March 1802.

With respect to the nature of the general conduct of the Europeans, not in the service of the Company, who reside within my jurisdiction, there are only two of the description alluded to, viz.—Mr. Holst, who has been permitted, with the sanction of Government, to continue in charge of the Dutch factory at Calcapore, and a Frenchman, also resident at Calcapore, whose sole occupation is that of a confectioner, and who is, I understand, a quiet sober character.

Magistrate of Rajshahy, Mr. C. Greme: 10th April 1802.

The Europeans, not in the Company's service, who reside within this jurisdiction, have, since I have been in the district (which is now four years and a half) behaved themselves in the most orderly and correct manner; so much so, that I do not recollect any complaint having ever been preferred against one of them.

Magistrate of Bhaugulpore, Mr. J. Wintle: 31st May 1802.

The general conduct of the Europeans, not in the service, residing in this district (who are but few) is decorous and proper; I seldom have any complaints against them.

Magistrate of Dinagepore, Mr. Burges: 15th January 1802.

The conduct of the few Europeans, not in the service, resident in this district, I have ever found to be peaceable and correct.

Magistrate of Purnea, Mr. Thornhill: 19th December 1801.

The Europeans residing in this district have, during my time, conducted themselves with propriety.

Magistrate of Zilla Moorshedabad, Mr. J. Becher: 31st December 1801.

The few Europeans, not in the honourable Company's service, residing in my district, behave with great propriety in all respects.

Magistrate of Rungpore, Mr. J. Wordsworth: 13th April 1802.

The conduct of the Europeans, not in the service of the Company, who reside within my jurisdiction, has ever been of the most exemplary nature; and to them have I been often indebted for important information; and the country, in a great measure, for its present improved and improving state of manufactures, cultivation and commerce.

Magistrate of Sarun, Mr. Boddam: 16th December 1801.

There are only three Europeans, not in the service of the Company, who reside in this district; but others go to Boggah, at the proper season, to purchase timbers. Mr. Blake has a considerable indigo work at Acherpoor; Mr. M'Eatie has one at Dironly, on the banks of the Dewa, but he principally trades in timbers; and Mr. Massyck has a small indigo work near to Mr. Blakes. I have never received a single complaint against either of these gentlemen; on the contrary, I have every reason to believe, that the inhabitants of that part of the country in which they reside, are perfectly satisfied with their conduct, and reap great benefit from the money expended by them in their manufactories.

Magistrate of Behar, Mr. A. Tufton: 9th December 1801.

I am most happy to bear testimony to the good conduct of the Europeans in this district. Two complaints only have been made against them within these last four years; and they arose, not from any dishonesty or oppressive conduct, but from that haste and want of consideration which Europeans, not conversant with the people, and strangers to the language, are sometimes apt to indulge in. The natives are, however, grown very impudent.

Magistrate of Shahabad, Mr. G. Webb, 11th December 1801.

The conduct of the Europeans, not in the service of the Company, who reside in this district, has been very correct.

Magistrate

No. 2. Replies of Zillah Judges, relative to conduct of resident Europeans, not in the service of the East India Company.

Magistrate of Ramghur, Mr. W. T. Smith: 21st December 1801.

There are no Europeans of this description residing in this jurisdiction.

Magistrate of Tirhoot, Mr. G. Arbuthnot: 22d December 1801.

Having never had any serious charge preferred against any of the Europeans, not in the Company's service, who reside in this district, I naturally conclude, that they conduct themselves in a quiet and peaceable manner.

Magistrate of the City of Benares, Mr. 17th December 1801.

I never have heard any complaints on the subject.

Magistrate of Juanpore, Mr. A. Willand: 17th December 1801.

The conduct of Europeans, in this district, is mostly applied to the manufacture of indigo, and to concerns in the traffic of cloths. The encrease of the circulation of money in consequence, is of considerable benefit; but scarcely one among them has been successful in his speculations, and some appear to be suffering under severe privations and distresses.

Magistrate of Mirzapore, Mr. R. Ahmuty: 30th November 1801.

No complaint of a violent tendency has ever been brought forward against any of the Europeans who reside in this district, out of the service; and they have, on all occasions, conducted themselves with perfect humility, and the utmost deference to the rules and orders of Government.

—No. 3.—

RETURN to the Order of the Honourable House of Commons, dated the 2d April 1813; requiring, "Copy of the fourth, fifth, ninth, "tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, nineteenth, and twenty-second "Paragraphs of the REPORT on the External Commerce of India, "dated the 28th December 1804."

RETURN to the Order of the Honourable House of Commons, dated the 2d April 1813; requiring, "Copy of the fourth, fifth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, "thirteenth, nineteenth, and twenty-second Paragraphs of the REPORT on "the External Commerce of India, dated the 28th December 1804."

THE entire Reports of the External Commerce of Bengal, from 1795 to 1811, having already been presented to the House, the Extracts required by this Order will be found in the Volume containing these Reports.

Examiner's Office,
East India House.

—No. 4.—

Extract of the BENGAL Judicial Consultations in the Criminal Department of the 13th of July 1810; containing a Letter from the Justice of the Peace at Benares to the Secretary to the Government of Bengal, dated the 5th of May 1809, transmitting his Proceedings on certain Charges preferred by a NATIVE SUBJECT against Mr. JAMES TITCHBORNE, for an Assault and false Imprisonment; together with the Enclosures referred to in that Letter.

EXTRACT BENGAL JUDICIAL CONSULTATIONS,

the 13th July 1810.

(Criminal.)

No. 54. Justice of the Peace at Benares to George Dowdeswell, Esq. Secretary to Government, Fort William.

SIR,

I have the honour to inclose, for the information of the right honourable the governor general in council, all the proceedings held by me in English and Persian, on the charges preferred by Ram Gholam against Mr. James Tichborne, for an assault and false imprisonment; and in the full discharge of my duty, I have deemed it expedient to commit Mr. Tichborne to take his trial before the Supreme Court of Judicature, on the grounds of the depositions of the prosecutor and his witnesses.

I have the honour to be, &c.

Benares, 5th May 1809. (Signed) W. T. Smith, Justice of Peace.

No. 55. The information and deposition of Ram Gholam, prosecutor, taken upon oath before W. T. Smith, Esq. one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the city of Benares, the nineteenth day of April 1809; who, on his oath, saith; My name is Ram Gholam, my father's name is Munsa, I am of the cast of Aheer, I reside at Fardonce, in the district of Goruckpore, I am about 50 years of age, and have been in the employment of Mr. Tichborne from the commencement of the year 1803 until the period of my imprisonment by Mr. Tichborne, in the month of Assin 1808. In the month of September Mr. Tichborne complained against me to the magistrate of Goruckpore in the Foujdarry Adawlut, for the sum of 5,572 rupees, the price of timber. Mr. Ahmuty, the magistrate, consequently placed a chupprassy named Seta Ram, over me, who conveyed me to the Court, where I gave in a reply to the complaint, and I petitioned the Court to depute an aumeen to enquire into the nature of Mr. Tichborne's complaint against me; security being required from me by the Court, directed a chupprassy to proceed with Mr. Tichborne's mootsuddies and my own mootsuddies to enquire into the accounts, and bring them before the Court for examination, who would afterwards decide upon what was proper to be done. Mr. Tichborne beat Rugbunsee Loll, for not making out these accounts in the manner Mr. Tichborne wished, and the nephew of Rugbunsee Loll consequently preferred a complaint to the Judge of Goruckpore, who sent Emmaumbux to protect the mootsuddies, and to prevent their being beaten by Mr. Tichborne in future; after this, Mr. Tichborne confined me on board one of his boats, from the 22d September until the 24th December 1808; in consequence of this dispute about accounts, on the 24th of December I asked Mr. Tichborne why he confined me? when Mr. Tichborne answered, do you want your discharge? I would expend 2,000 rupees to take your life away. On the 22d September Mr. Ahmuty's chupprassies enquired of Mr. Tichborne where he was taking me to; and Mr. Tichborne replied, I am going to Ragepore, come along with me; to which the chupprassies replied they could not without orders from the Judge; afterwards Mr. Tichborne said to the chupprassies, I know nothing about the Court, you may return. The chupprassies went away, and reported this circumstance to the Judge, when Mr. Tichborne imprisoned me in his boat, and conveyed me to Ragepore; we arrived at Ragepore, where Mr. Tichborne had pitched a tent, and he took me out of the boat, caught me by the neck and [illegible] and beat me, and afterwards tied me by the hands to a bamboo, on which the sail of the boat was suspended, and he caught me by the mustaches, and pulled them violently; after having thus ill-treated me for three hours, he made me over to the custody of the chupprassy, who re-conveyed me on board the boat; when we had left Ragepore, we proceeded two coss below the river, I was again taken out of the boat, and compelled to pull

No. 4. Extract Bengal Judicial Cons in. Crim. Dep. 13 July 1810:— Assault upon a Native Subject by an European.

pull the ghoone of the budgerow; one of Mr. Tichborne's boats sunk a little a-head, in consequence of which Mr. Tichborne came too for the night, when myself, Ajudiah Persaud, and Rugbunse Loll, were placed on board the sunken boat, and kept there under the custody of a chupprassy the whole of the night, up to our middles in water, without food. The next morning we proceeded to Bogalepore, and when we arrived, Mr. Tichborne again took me out of the boat, and beat me in the face; two or three days after this we went to Darowly, when Mr. Tichborne seized all my clothes, and beat me with a rope; from Darowly Mr. Tichborne went on without me, and left me and the other people with Mr. Robinson, who went to Decree Gunge; when I arrived at Revel Gunge, to which place Mr. Furgusson, the magistrate of Chupprah, had wrote to Mr. Tichborne, requiring my attendance; Mr. Tichborne consequently delivered me over to the custody of Mr. Furgusson's peons, who took me to Chupprah, where I was maintained at the expence of Government, and Mr. Furgusson took down my deposition, and sent me to Benares. Calloah chupprassy was placed over me, from our leaving Gorruckpore until our arrival at Darowly; and I was under the custody of Ram Sing chupprassy, from our leaving Darowly, until my arrival at Revel Gunge.

Chunee Lall and Bussunt Lall have absconded, in consequence of an order to do so, from Mr. Tichborne.

(Signed) Ram Gholam,
his mark.

Sworn the day and the year first above written, before me, (Signed) W. T. Smith, Justice of the Peace.

No. 56.

The Examination of James Tichborne, taken before me, W. T. Smith, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the Province of Benares, the 20th of April 1809.

The said Examinant being duly interrogated, saith; I am not guilty of the charge laid against me.

(Signed) Ja. Tichborne.

Taken the day and year first above written, before me,
(Signed) W. T. Smith, Justice of the Peace.

No. 57.

The Information and Deposition of Sook Lall Sookul, 1st witness, taken upon oath, before W. T. Smith, Esq. one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the City of Benares, the 19th day of April 1809; who on his oath saith; My name is Shook Lall Sookool, my father's name Domey Sookool; I am of the cast of Brahmin; I reside at Jullalpore in the district of Mozufferpore; I am about 42 years of age, and I have been in the employment of Mr. Tichborne one year; I know Ram Gholam, he was in Mr. Tichborne's employment, but I do not know how long; in the month of September 1808, Mr. Tichborne complained against Ram Gholam, for the theft of 5,572 rupees, in the Dewanny Adawlut; after which, Mr. Tichborne solicited the Judge of Gorruckpore to sell the effects of Ram Gholam to make good the loss he had sustained, or commit him to prison; the Judge replied, that without enquiry he could not give an order of such a nature, but after examining into the business, proper measures should be adopted; a chupprassy was accordingly sent to summons Ram Gholam, who attended the Court, and gave in his reply to the complaint, and petitioned the Court to depute an ameen to enquire into the number of timbers, and what were the price of them; and if, agreeably to the account, there was any balance in favour of Mr. Tichborne, he would pay it afterwards; Ram Gholam gave in his security into the Court, and Mr. Ahmuty, the Judge, directed Sela Ram to order the two mootsuddies to compare the accounts and to bring them to him, when instructions would be given, when it was ascertained what was right and proper. In the mean time, these accounts had been ready eight days, when Mr. Tichborne told Ram Gholam that his timber boats were going off, and that Ram Gholam must proceed with them. Ram Gholam replied; my complaint, respecting our accounts, is still pending before the Court, without any decision being passed; how can either you or I go away? and Seta Ram, chupprassy, also stated this circumstance to Mr. Tichborne; but Mr. Tichborne replied, that he knew nothing of the forms of the Court, and directed Seta Ram, chupprassy, to proceed with him to Ragepore; the chupprassy replied, that he could not, without orders from the Judge; when Mr. Tichborne told the chupprassy, he might go. The chupprassy went away accordingly; when Mr. Tichborne placed Ram Gholam on board his boat, and proceeded in the month of Cautick to Ragepore; when Mr. Tichborne arrived at Ragepore, he pitched a tent; at which place one of the mhullee, and another person, ran away; when Mr. Tichborne sent for Ram Gholam, and told him to procure the attendance of the mhullee, that had ran away; Ram Gholam replied, you have imprisoned me; how can I obtain the appearance of the mhullee; on which Mr. Tichborne kicked, and beat, and pulled him violently backwards and forwards, and tied him by his hands to a bamboo, and kept him in this state for six hours; when he placed him in the custody of Culloah and Ram Sing, chupprassies, who placed him again on board the boat. In the morning, the boat I was in proceeded on, and Mr. Tichborne and Ram Gholam remained behind; I consequently do not know what happened afterwards; but three days after this, I reached Boglepore, where Mr. Tichborne and Ram Gholam arrived; at this place, one of Mr. Tichborne's boats sunk;

No. 4. Extract Bengal Judicial Cons. in Crim. Dep. 13 July 1810.— Assault upon a Native Subject by an European.

and Mr. Tichborne called Ram Gholam, and ordered him to change the boat, and get another; who replied, where am I to get another boat? when Mr. Tichborne beat him. After this I went to Chupprah, and know nothing more of the business.

QUESTION put to the Witness:

Was Ram Gholam ever placed under your custody?

Yes; I was placed over Ram Gholam, at Mr. Tichborne's bungalow, at Gorruckpore, for three days.

What were the nature of the orders Mr. Tichborne gave you, when you were placed over Ram Gholam?

He directed me to confine Ram Gholam, stating that he would neither settle his accounts with him, or pay him the balance for the timbers.

QUESTION put to the Witness by the Prisoner.

You are a chupprassy. How do you know any thing of this complaint for 5,572 rupees?

I went with yourself, Chunee Lall, and Bussunt Lall, to the cutcherry, and you represented this to the Judge's moonshee, in my hearing.

(Signed) Sook Loll Sookool,
his mark.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me,
W. T. Smith, Justice of the Peace.

No. 58. The Information and Deposition of Kulloot, 2d Witness, taken upon oath, before W. T. Smith, Esquire, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the City of Benares, the 20th day of April 1809; who, on his oath saith; My name is Kulloot; my father's name, Doolum; I am of the cast of Aheer, an inhabitant of Gorruckpore, 22 years of age; I was four months and a half in the employment of Mr. Tichborne; when Mr. Tichborne was about to proceed to Ragepore, in the month of Cautic, he ordered Ram Gholam to proceed with him; Ram Gholam stated, that he had deposited his security with the Judge of Gorruckpore, and asked Mr. Tichborne why he wished to take him away; Mr. Tichborne replied, I shall not release you; I would expend 2,000 rupees to take your life away. Seta Ram, chupprassy, asked Mr. Tichborne what orders he had for him, if he went to Ragepore; and Mr. Tichborne desired the chupprassy to go with him to Ragepore. The chupprassy said he would go to the Judge, and if he got an order to that effect, he would proceed with Mr. Tichborne to Ragepore; when Mr. Tichborne replied, I do not know the business of the Judge, and the chupprassy returned to the huzzoor. Afterwards, Mr. Tichborne having confined Ram Gholam on board a boat, proceeded to Ragepore, where Mr. Tichborne had pitched a tent, and two days after, one of the mhullees of the boat ran away, and Mr. Tichborne ordered Ram Gholam to recover the mhullee, which Ram Gholam stated he could not do, as he was in confinement; when Mr. Tichborne knocked Ram Gholam down, tied both his hands, and pulled him by the whiskers, and threatened him with a stick he held in his hand; shortly after this, Mr. Tichborne left Ragepore, and had proceeded two coss, when he made Ram Gholam pull the ghoon of the boat. The ghoon broke, and Ram Gholam was placed in a dongee, and conveyed into the middle of the boat that was sunk; but not being able to raise the boat, Ram Gholam, Ajudeah Pershaud, and Bundoo Loll, were made over to the custody of Kable Khan and myself. The next morning we left the place, and when we arrived at Boglepore, another boat of Mr. Tichborne's sunk, in consequence of which Mr. Tichborne sent for Ram Gholam, and beat him with his fist, insisting that the boat had sunk from his connivance. Ram Gholam was then made over to a sepoy of Mr. Tichborne's, who was ordered to convey and confine him in the tannah. The tannadar refused to receive charge of Ram Gholam. Chunny Loll Mutsuddy went after this to the tannah and brought Ram Gholam away, and replaced him in Mr. Tichborne's boat. When we arrived at Darowley, Mr. Tichborne seized all the papers and accounts of Ram Gholam, Rugbunee Loll, Chunee Loll, and Bussunt Loll, and beat Gholam and Rugbunee Loll with a rope. Mr. Robinson sent me after this to Chupprah, and I do not know more of the business. When I went to Chupprah, Ram Gholam was in the custody of Ram Sing.

(Signed) Kulloot,
his mark.

Sworn the day and the year first above written, before me,
(Signed) W. T. Smith, Justice of the Peace.

No. 59. The Information and Deposition of Bitchook, 3d Witness, taken upon oath, before W. T. Smith, Esquire, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the City of Benares, the 20th day of April 1809; who, on his oath saith; My name is Bitchook; my father's name, Dolah; I am of the cast of Aheer, inhabitant of Ferdance, in the district of Gorruckpore, 28 years of age, and I have been in the employment of Mr. Tichborne four years, as a bullock-driver; another servant, named Munnoah, who was also a bullock-driver in the employment of Mr. Tichborne, went to Mr. Tichborne at Gorruckpore, in the month of

No. 4. Extract Bengal Judicial Cons. in Crim. Dep. 13 July 1810:— Assault upon a Native Subject by an European.

of Caatic, to get mine and his own wages, who obtained his wages and returned to Fadanee, and stated, that Mr. Tichborne had imprisoned and beat Ram Gholam and Rugbunee Loll, mootsuddies, and told me, Mr. Tichborne would not send me my wages, and that I had better go to Gorruckpore for my wages myself. After this Munnoah collected his clothes, &c. and non * away for the service of Mr. Tichborne, and of this circumstance I went to Gorruckpore to apprize Mr. Tichborne and to get my wages: but Mr. Tichborne observed, that he could not give me my wages, as Ram Gholam and Rugbunee Loll had gone to Ragepore. After this, Mr. Tichborne went to Ragepore, and Lollgraim and myself followed him in two days. There was a balance of wages of 34 rupees due to me from Mr. Tichborne, of which he only paid me five rupees; when at Ragepore, I saw Mr. Tichborne beat Ram Gholam, tie his hands to a bamboo, and threaten him with a stick. He kept Ram Gholam in this situation for three hours, and then released him. In the morning, I went to Boglepore, where I heard, that in consequence of one of Mr. Tichborne's boats having sunk he had beaten Ram Gholam; I also heard, that a boat of Mr. Tichborne's had sunk at another place, and that Mr. Tichborne had placed Ram Gholam in a dongee, and had him conveyed into the sunken boat, and I saw Mr. Tichborne beat Ram Gholam with a rope at Darowlee. After this, I went to another place with Screekishen, and know nothing more of the business.

* Sic orig.

(Signed) Bitchook, his mark.

Sworn the day and the year first above written, before me, (Signed) W. T. Smith, Justice of the Peace.

—No. 5.—

Extract of the BENGAL Judicial Consultations in the Criminal Department of the 20th of July 1810; containing an Abstract of the Cases of Mr. J. L. Turner, R. S. Douglas, T. Gardner, and T. Clarke, Persons accused or tried for serious Offences, committed in the interior of the Country; also, of the Case of Mr. Titchborne, accused of similar Offences; together with the Depositions, &c. referred to in the said Abstract, and Copy of the Proceedings of the Governor General thereon.

EXTRACT BENGAL JUDICIAL CONSULTATIONS,

the 20th July 1810.

(Criminal.)

THE Secretary submits the following Abstract (together with the Depositions on which it is founded) of the cases of the different persons who are stated in the foregoing letters to have been accused of or tried for serious offences, committed in the interior of the country; together with that of Mr. Tichburn, who has been some time in confinement for similar offences. The case of that person is recorded at large on the Judicial Proceedings of the 13th instant.

ABSTRACT.

Mr. J. L. TURNER, Zillah Tirhoot.

Mr. Turner was indicted for murder. The Depositions state, That Mr. Turner having sent peons to seize and bring the deceased and other ryots before him, and having inquired why they had not sown indigo, according to their engagements, Mr. Turner's dewan alleged that the deceased would not sow, unless he were punished. On this, Mr. Turner struck the deceased several times with his fists and kicked him, and then ordered him and two other ryots into the stocks for the night, during which the deceased died. The place where the stocks stood was infested with snakes, and the Jury appear to have given credit to the evidence brought forward to prove that the deceased was bitten by a snake, and died in consequence. They acquitted Mr. Turner accordingly. No. 4.

Mr.

No. 5. Further Extracts from Bengal Judicial Cons. 20 July 1810.—Offences committed in the interior of the Country.

Mr. R. S. Douglas, Zillah Sarun.

Mr. Douglas was charged as an accessory before the fact, in the crime of arson and violent outrage committed at the premises of Mr. Moran; he was further charged with being an accessory after the fact, in having received, harboured and maintained the said natives, knowing the crimes in question to have been committed by them. The remote cause of the outrage seems to have been an attempt made by Mr. Moran to establish indigo works and a haut, in a place which interfered with indigo works before established by Mr. Douglas, and with a haut established by a zemindar connected with Mr. Douglas. The immediate and ostensible cause of the outrage committed, was an attempt on the part of Mr. Douglas and the native landholders, to prevent the people of Mr. Moran from taking water or cutting reeds for building the new factory from a nullah which adjoined Mr. Moran's ground, but was claimed as the property of the native. In the prosecution of this intention, armed men (among whom were the native prisoners who were servants of Mr. Douglas) were sent to enforce the prohibition, and an affray took place between the parties, which ended with a few blows on each side; but a few days afterwards Mr. Douglas's party, having been reinforced by a number of armed men, proceeded to Mr. Moran's premises, severely beat his assistant, Mr. Clark, destroyed every thing moveable, and burnt the huts, containing grain, &c. The Jury found the natives guilty; and as to Mr. Douglas, their verdict of guilty, as accessory before the fact, being coupled with the expression of a doubt, that the natives had exceeded his directions, the Judge refused to receive the verdict; and the Jury, after an hour's deliberation, brought in a verdict of guilty, as accessory after the fact, in having harboured and maintained the others, knowing them to have been guilty of the crimes committed. Sentence, a fine of 1,000 rupees, and 12 months imprisonment.

Mr. Gardiner, Zillah Nuddeah.

Mr. Gardiner was charged with the murder of a clashy in his service. The deceased was employed in superintending the ryots in sowing indigo. It would appear that his master was not satisfied with his activity, and had him and another seized and brought before him, and punished by stripes with a rattan, partly inflicted by Mr. Gardiner, with his own hand; after this, he ordered chillies and salt to be applied to the wounded parts, but salt only was used. The deceased received about 15 or 20 strokes of the rattan on the posteriors and back, after which both of the clashees were sent to another factory. It does not appear that they were confined; but they both declared their intention of quitting Mr. Gardiner's employment. The day after the beating, the deceased was seized by a vomiting and bowel complaint, and continued, during that and the succeeding day, so ill as to be able to take very little nourishment from his relations, who attended him, and drinking only water to assuage a violent thirst, of which he complained. He died towards the latter part of the third night after the day on which he was flogged. The grand jury threw out the bill.

Mr. T. Clark, Zillah Purneah.

No. 4. Mr. Clark was charged with the murder of a ryot. The depositions state, that the deceased had been sent for, to receive advances for the cultivation of indigo; but, in consequence of his stating that he had no bullocks, and therefore could not take advances, nor cultivate to the extent required, Mr. Clark's sircar insisted upon taking a pair of bullocks, at 10 rupees; but the deceased refused to allow more than 8 rupees. His refusal being notified to Mr. Clark, he came and struck the deceased several times with his fists, and kicked him; after which the deceased walked home, having previously received an advance of 4 rupees, and the 2 bullocks at the adjusted price of 9 rupees, which he gave in charge to one of his neighbours, to drive home. The deceased died the next morning in consequence, as the depositions state, of the beating. Verdict, manslaughter; sentence, a fine of 400 rupees, and 12 months imprisonment.

Mr. Tichburne, Zillah Goruckpore.

Mr. Tichburne was accused of the murder of a gomastah, employed in the timber trade. It appears that Mr. Tichburne sent to the deceased, requiring his presence for the adjustment of his accounts; but the hircarrahs sent to bring him returned with information, that the deceased was ill, and unable to come. On this, Mr. Tichburne suspecting collusion, flogged the hircarrahs; and taking them tied in his boat to Goruckpore, sent them again to enforce the attendance of the deceased, who being very ill and weak, was conveyed to Mr. Tichburne in a dooly; when Mr. Tichburne placed him in confinement in an out-house, stated to be a bathing-place, and necessary. Here he remained for 14 days without any food or nourishment, except a little sherbet; stating, that he could not eat food in a necessary, but that if removed to a Hindoo house, he would eat. The deceased at length died. The jury found Mr. Tichburne guilty of manslaughter, and he was sentenced to pay a fine of 400 rupees, and to be imprisoned for 12 months.

Mr. Tichburne was again indicted at the following sessions, for a most aggravated assault and imprisonment of Ramduloll, another of his gomastahs. In this case it appeared that Mr. Tichburne had some trifling dispute with Ramduloll, respecting advances on account of the wages of his woodcutters; in consequence of which Ramduloll was first beaten by his employer, and then had a complaint laid against him, before the magistrate, for withholding advances to the amount of 5,000 rupees. The magistrate directed an adjustment of the accounts by two mutsuddies, who found a balance due from Mr. Tichburne of 3,000 rupees; when Mr. Tichburne, instead of adhering to this adjustment, carried Ramduloll on board his boat, and proceeded down the river; and during several months, Ramduloll was imprisoned in the boats, repeatedly flogged, pulled by the beard, and compelled to pull the ropes of the boat. Mr. Tichburne was found guilty, and sentenced to a fine of 100 rupees, and imprisonment for 12 months.

No. 5. Further Extracts from Bengal Judicial Cons. 20 July 1810.—Offences committed in the interior of the Country.

(A true abstract.)

(Signed) G. Dowdeswell, Sec^y to Gov^t.

DEPOSITIONS in the case of JOHN LATHBURY TURNER.

No. 5.

THE Information and Deposition of Fawruckul Roy, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the Town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the seventeenth day of November 1809; who, on his oath saith; I am a native of Mouzah Koorjena, in pergunnah Bhoosaree, in the province of Behar; and the son of Mootty Roy, the malick or owner of the Mouzah Khoorjeanah. On a Sunday morning, some time in the month of Assaur last, Bhobany Roy, Mosaheb Merdha, and Bhicrary Roy, peons belonging to Mr. John Lothbury Turner, came to my village, and seized my father, Motty Roy, and carried him to the indigo factory of their master at Suvoonny, in Baliah pergunnah, in the same province, at the distance of seven coss; I did not accompany my father to the factory. Early on the following morning, Roop Sing and Ramdyal Roy came to my house, and informed me that my father, Motty Roy, was dead; upon hearing this news, I, Sobha Roy, Jebon Roy, Chironjee Roy, and Soobron Roy, proceeded to the factory, and arrived there on the same morning; we there saw the corpse of my father laying on the ground in an open place. Rutton Laul, a chuprassy belonging to the thannah, was making enquiry, and he desired me to point out to him any marks of beating or violence on the body; whereupon I took off the cloth with which the corpse was covered, and shewed to the chuprassy the marks of a blow on the right cheek, and another on the left; I observed another mark, as if caused by a kick, on the navel, which I also pointed out to the chuprássy; I then observed another mark behind the right thigh, as if occasioned by another kick. These last marks appear to have been done with boots or shoes, from the impression of violence on the body. The blows on the face appeared to have been done with fists; all those marks had become blue. I then put the corpse on a bamboo tatty, and with the assistance of the persons who accompanied me, took the corpse to the thannah. In the way, we met the thannahdar coming towards the factory, in order to make further enquiry; I requested of him to do so, and suffer us to burn the corpse. The thannahdar desired me to take the corpse back to the factory, where he would make the necessary enquiry, and then let us burn it. As we had become faint through fatigue, and unable to proceed further, the tannadar left one of his chuprassies with us, who took care of us, and procured us some nourishment in a village, where he kept us until the next morning. On the following morning, we reached the factory with the corpse. The thannadar sent one of his chuprassies for Choyton Roy, Ojet Roy, and Dhumram Roy, the malicks or owners of the village, and interrogated them as to the murder. The malicks said, there are no dosauds or chowkeedars in the village that can give any account respecting the murder; but they stated to the thannadar, in my presence, that they had been informed by Sitta Matto, Chamon Roy, Runjet Sing, that Motty Roy had been taken to the factory by some peons, and while he was there, the dewan, named Nowrougheelaul, represented to Mr. Turner that Motty Roy was a great hurramzaddah, and unless he was punished, he will not sow indigo; whereupon Mr. Turner beat Motty Roy with his fist, and he kicked him; and then Mr. Turner ordered him to be put into the stocks, which was accordingly done by Bhobany Roy, Mr. Turner's peon; where Motty Roy, in a palar, expired. After the thannadar had closed his investigation, I requested of him to suffer me to have the corpse burnt, which was accordingly granted, and he allowed a chuprassey to go with us. We took the corpse to the bank of the river, and burnt it according to our customs. After the corpse had been burnt, I requested of the thannadar to send his report to the hazoor or presence. He seemed to delay this very much, and threw obstacles in the way, by telling me to bring witnesses. On the fifth day the thannadar went away without making any report to the presence. On the same day, Mr. Turner offered to my younger brother, named Amrow, two hundred rupees to make a sraud in commemoration of my deceased father. He further offered to return a bond of six rupees, which sum my father had received from him in advance for indigo; and likewise the agreement, which my father had entered into with him. This proposal was also made to my brother, by Nowroughee Loll, and Daby Persaud Malick. My brother, in order to obtain his liberty, as he had been ever since detained in the Factory, accepted of the two hundred rupees, and took the bond and agreement, which were put into his hand by Nowrughee Laul, Mr. Turner's dewan. At this time there were present, Ramdial Roy, Sobhaub Roy, and Soobron Roy; this was done in a godown. Having obtained our liberty, we went to our houses, and there I performed the sraud, and then proceeded to Moozopherpore, and made a complaint against Mr. Turner, Nowroughee Laul, and the three peons who had seized and carried away my father. The magistrate heard my complaint, and my witnesses; the three peons did not attend before the magistrate, but Mr. Turner and Nowroughee Laul attended. As the magistrate delayed the investigation very long, and as I saw no probability of its being soon brought to an issue, I presented a petition to the Court of Appeal, whereupon the proceedings held before the magistrate were sent for, and after a perusal of the whole, we were directed to be sent down to Calcutta.

No. 5. Further Extracts from Bengal Judicial Cons. 20 July 1810:—Offences committed in the interior of the Country.

The mark of
⋈
Fuccucul Roy.

Sworn this day and year before written, before me, (Signed) C. F. Martin, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)
(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

No. 6.

The Information and Deposition of Ramdial Roy, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the Town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the 17th day of November 1809; who, on his oath, saith; I am a native of Boosaree in Sooba Bahaur, a farmer, and of the Bramin cast. On the 12th or 13th of Assaur last, answering to the 24th or 25th of June, on a Sunday early in the morning, Bhobany Roy Hircara, Mosahib Merdha Hircara, and Bhecrary Roy, zilladaur (a person that superintends the sowing of indigo seed) belonging to Mr. Turner; the prisoner here present, came and seized me, and conducted me to the indigo factory of Mr. Turner, situated at Soonnee, in the province of Behar. Those persons also seized Motty Roy and Roop Sing, and they were conducted to the aforesaid factory. When we reached the factory, one pahor, or three hours English, of the day was remaining, and Mr. Turner came home about the time we reached the factory; he was in boots, and after dusting them, he went into the house. We were taken near the house, and Mr. Turner asked Nowronghee Laul, who is his dewan, if Tilluck Roy was come? Nowronghee Laul said no: but Motty Roy is brought. Mr. Turner seeing him, asked the reason of his not sowing indigo: Motty Roy answered, "Khodabund; I have sowed three times, but the "soil being moist, the whole has not come up; if you will give me more seed, I will sow "again." Whereupon, Nowronghee Laul said to Mr. Turner, "Sir, he is a great kur-"ramzadah, and unless you punish him he will not sow the seed." Mr. Turner then repeated again what he had expressed before to Motty Roy, and received nearly the same answer as before. Mr. Turner, who was at this time at the distance of about two paces from the deceased, went up to him and gave him four blows with his clenched fists about the cheeks; then immediately gave the deceased two kicks with his foot, one of which struck on the hind part of his right thigh, and the other kick or blow struck him on the belly below the navel; Mr. Turner after this, gave the deceased a slap on the face, which knocked his turban on one side; Mr. Turner then laid hold of him by the throat and pushed him away, and ordered him to be put into the stocks; whereupon Bhobany Roy Hircara took Motty Roy, Roop Sing, and me, near the vat-house, where Bhobany and Peary Laul brought the stocks there, and were proceeding to put our legs into it, when I requested of them not to put Motty Roy into the stocks, as he had been beat. They abused me, and said, if Mr. Turner had heard my words he would take the skin off my back. I saw that the stocks were covered with ants; I told them that the ants would torment us to death; upon which they brushed the stocks, and put our legs into it. Motty Roy was put in the middle; I and Roop Sing on each side of him. When we were put into the stocks, half a pahur, or about an hour and a half of the day was remaining. At half a pahur of the night, Motty Roy complained of a great pain in his belly, pointing to his navel, and he seemed to be so from his movements; whereupon I cried for people to come to the place of our confinement, when I requested him to take Motty Roy out of the stocks; he said he could not do so, without the gentleman's order, meaning Mr. Turner. Ouddon called out to Purlaud, another chokeydar; he came to the place, and remained there; Ouddon then called out for Peeary Laul. Peeary Laul came, and opened the stocks, which was fastened with a padlock and key, and released us. I and Roop Sing helped to lift up the deceased; he could neither walk or stand: we laid him on the ground; he never uttered a word afterwards, but continued to keep his hands upon his belly. While the deceased lay in this situation, a mussulman, whose name I don't know, came to the spot and gave out, that the deceased had been bitten by a snake, and he began to mutter something to remove the poison. While we continued in the stocks, and after we were released, I saw no snake approach us, nor did the deceased complain of having been bit by one; all I observed was, a swelling from the right wrist to the end of the fingers; at one pahor in the night, Motty Roy expired, at the place where we had laid him down. Joud-dowal how Kedar and Roop Sing remained by the corpse the whole night. In the following morning Roop Sing went away; at noon on that day, two chuprassees of the krannah came into the factory and examined the corpse; one of them went away, and the other remained by it. In the afternoon of the same day, Omrow Roy, one of the sons of the deceased, and Domon Roy, Sahaub Roy, Dhooroop Roy, Roop Sing Roy, Poloute Moheto, Tobocole Roy, and Chironjee Roy, relations of the deceased, came to the factory and wished to take away the corpse; the thannadar's chuprassy said, that he could not let it be removed until the thannadar had taken a view of the body. As the corpse was getting putrid, the chuprassy at last consented to its being taken away; we accordingly put the corpse on a bamboo tatty, and was taking it towards the thannah, when we met the thannadar in the way; Omroo, the deceased's son, made his complaint to the thannadar. The thannadar desired us to return back to the factory, as he was proceeding thither to make enquiry; Omroo represented to the thannadar, that the corpse was getting putrid, and heavy; and besides, every one that accompanied the corpse was much fatigued and exhausted. The night advancing, the chuprassy took us to a village, where we laid the corpse and rested a little; one pahor of the night remaining, we proceeded back with the corpse to the factory, and saw the thannadar there. The thannadar, after he had made his enquiry, ordered the corpse to be burnt. In the afternoon Omroo went to burn the corpse; I and Girdhary were detained at the factory; Tawacul was not then present; he went away before the thannadar came to the factory. Omroo came back into the factory, after having burnt his father's corpse. About five or six days after, Nowronghee Laul, the dewan, requested of Girdhary, uncle of the deceased, and Omroo the son, to give a razunama, or release, to the gentleman, meaning the prisoner. After this conversation had passed, Nowronghee Laul, Daby Persaud, and Bany Roy went into Mr. Turner's bungalow; Girdhary and Omroo followed, but remained on the outside of the bungalow; shortly after, Bany Roy and the other two persons came out; Bany Roy went up to the place where Omroo and Girdhary were, with two hundred rupees in his cloth, while the other two persons remained within the bungalow. Bany Roy counted out the money in my presence, and gave it to Omroo; Omroo took the money and gave it to me, and I afterwards returned it to him; we then proceeded to our respective houses. I cannot say, whether Towacul, the prosecutor, partook of any part of these two hundred rupees.

chuprassy

The mark of

Sworn the day and year before written, before me, ✕

(Signed) Chas. F. Martyn, Magistrate. Ramdial Roy.

(A true copy.)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

The Information and Deposition of Samuel Dugdile, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the Town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the seventeenth day of November 1809; who, on his oath, saith; I am fourth officer on board the honourable Company's ship the Retreat; I have known Mr. John Lathbury Turner, the person now present, from his infancy; we were at school together at Exeter, in Devonshire; he is a native of that place, as well as myself, and our parents reside in that city.

(Signed) Samuel Dugdile.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me,

(Signed) Charles F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

The Information and Deposition of Seeta Mahotto, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the Town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the seventeenth day of November 1809; who, on his oath, saith; I am a peasant, and cultivate indigo, rice, &c. and reside at Munjhour, in pergunnah Bhoosaree, in Zillah Tirhoot. On the 13th Assaur, corresponding to the 25th June last, while I was at the factory of Mr. Turner, at Soosnee Gau in Tirhoot, making a bargain with his jamadar poorun for renting a field of mangoe trees, a burkundauge came and took the deceased Motty Roy, together with Ramdial and another person, who were standing near to where I was, and carried them to Mr. Turner's bungalow. I was standing about seven paces distant, and could hear Mr. Turner say to them, "why did you not sow the indigo," Motty Roy answered, he had sown, but that the seed had not come up; Mr. Turner said, "you are only spoiling my seed," and immediately struck him two blows with his clenched fist upon the cheeks, upon which Mooty Roy stooped, and his turban fell off. I did not see any other blows given; Mr. Turner then ordered the burkundauge to take Motty Roy, Ramdial, and the third person to the vat-house, which is about the distance of 2 biggahs or 100 yards. I did not hear Mr. Turner give any order to put them into the stocks, and I did not go to the vat-house, and do not know what happened there. They were sent to the vat-house about 24 minutes before sun-set, and about 1 pahor, or 3 hours after sun-set, an alarm was given by the people of the vat-house, that Mooty Roy had been bitten by a snake, and heard the noise from Poorun's house, which is about 100 yards distant; I went to cook my victuals there on account of night coming on, my house being about 3 coss, or six miles, distant; I saw the corpse of Mooty Roy next morning, covered up with a sheet, lying outside of the vat-house, but I did not examine it, and do not know whether there were any marks on it, or not; I went home on the morning that I saw the corpse of Motty Roy, and know not whether Mr. Turner gave any money to any person, or not; and I know nothing further.

The mark of

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me, ✕

(Signed) Charles F. Martyn, Magistrate. Seeta Mahotto.

(A true copy)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

The Information and Deposition of George Philpott, Esq. taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the Town of Calcutta,

No. 5. Further Extracts from Bengal Judicial Cons. 20 July 1810:— Offences committed in the interior of the Country.

Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the fifteenth day of May 1810, when on his oath, saith; I am an assistant surgeon in the service of the United Company of Merchants trading to the East Indies; I am a relation of Mr. John Lathbury Turner, and have known him for a long time; he was lately a superintendent of some indigo works belonging to Mr. John Kelso, in Tirhoot. Mr. Turner is an Englishman, and from Exeter, in the County of Devon.

(Signed) George Phillott.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me,

(Signed) Charles F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

No. 10.

The Information and Deposition of Roop Sing, taken upon oath before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the Town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the thirtieth day of May 1810, who, on his oath, saith; I am a cultivator, and an inhabitant of Hoorjinna in Zillah Tirhoot, in the province of Behar; I knew Motty Roy, he is now dead; he was malik (proprietor) of village Moozuomabad, and I am malik of village Gunnespoor, which is adjoining the above Zillah Tirhoot. On Saturday about the twelfth or thirteenth of last Aussaur (June) two peons, Bhobany Roy and Mosaheb, and one Zillahda named Bhilkdhary, came from Mr. Turner, who is now in imprisonment, to Mouzomabad, staid there that night, and in the morning following seized Motty Roy, and Ramdyal Roy, and me, and took us all three to Mr. Turner's indigo factory at Soosownee, which is six coss distant from Gunnespore. When above one pahor of the day was remaining, Mr. Turner returned to the factory; whereupon the aforesaid peons, and Zilladar, took us before Mr. Turner. He asked Nowranghee Laul, his dewan, who was present also, whether Tilluk Roy, malik of Dhurmpore, had come; Nowranghee Laul said he was not; but that Motty Roy, the malik of Mouzoomabad, meaning the deceased, was come, and pointed Motty Roy out to Mr. Turner; whereupon Mr. Turner asked Motty Roy, whether he had sowed indigo seed or not? Motty Roy replied, that he had sowed twice, that a part had come up, and requested to be furnished with seed for the remainder of his lands; upon this, Nowranghee Laul said to Mr. Turner, that Motty Roy, the deceased, was a "lewrra haramzada," and told Mr. Turner to punish him; whereupon Mr. Turner struck him four blows with his fist, two on each side of his cheek, and also struck him a slap, and gave him two kicks, one about his navel, and the other on his right thigh. He then shoved him down from the room, which was about waist high from the ground. Mr. Turner then ordered all of us three to be put into the stocks, and we were all accordingly put in the stocks, near an indigo vat; Motty Roy was brought to the stocks, held up by Mr. Turner's peons; and no sooner he reached the place, than he fell down, and remained so from the pain in his belly, occasioned by the kick he had received. He applied his hand to his belly, and appeared restless from pain. When it was about half a pahor of the night, Motty Roy addressed me, and said, "I shall not live; disengage me from the stocks, the pain of my belly is excessive." Upon this, I asked Oodun Chokedar, who was placed to watch us, and told him that Motty Roy was in great pain, and requested that he might be set free. A short time after this, we were all three let out of the stocks, at which time Motty Roy was on the point of expiring, and a mussulman, whose name I do not know, and who belonged to the factory, said that Motty Roy was bit by a snake, and directed that he might be brought to him, and that he would use some spells to cure him; spells were used over Motty Roy, but all in vain; Motty Roy died. When Motty Roy desired me to disengage him from the stocks, I asked him what pain he felt, and whereabout the pain was situated; and, as the place was much infested with snakes, whether he was bit by a snake; he said, he was not; but that the pain in his belly was all that ailed him.

The mark of ✕ Roop Sing.

Sworn the day and year first written, before me,

(Signed) C. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

No. 11.

The Information and Deposition of Rungit Sing, taken, upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, in Fort William, in Bengal, the thirteenth day of May 1810; who, on his oath, saith; I am a native of Munjhowl, in pergunnah Bhoosaree, in Behar. I knew Motty Roy; he is now dead. On a Sunday, in the month of Assaur last (June) I went to Mr. Turner's factory, which is in Sosowny, in Zillah Tirhoot, about three coss from my village, for the restoration of a calf belonging to me, which was detained in the factory. The jemaddar of the factory, Poorun Sing, told me, that the calf would be restored to me the next day, and I was accordingly coming away; when, in my way back, I saw Roop Sing, who is now here present, and Motty Roy, the deceased, and Ramdyal Roy, who is also here, all three in the stocks, in Mr. Turner's factory. I did not speak to them a word, but went my way. I came to the jemaddar, Poorun Sing's lodging, where, at about one pahar of the night, some servants belonging to the indigo factory came and said, that Motty Roy had been

been bit by a snake. I went to see Motty Roy, and others went also; when I came to the spot, I saw Motty Roy expiring. Ramdyal Roy was supporting him on his breast; and a mussulman, whom I do not know, repeated some spells and prayers; but he did not live. I did not examine the body. Roop Sing, one of the three that were in the stocks, said, at the time, "he has been murdered," (mar dala hey).

The mark of

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me, ⋈

(Signed) Cha. F. Martyn, Magistrate. Runjit Sing.

(A true copy.)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

No. 12.

The Information and Deposition of Chhamun Mahots, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the thirtieth day of May 1810; who, on his oath, saith; I am a native of Munjhowl, in Zillah Tirhoot, in the province of Behar. On a Sunday, in the last Aussaur (English date, June) whereabout twelve or thirteen days in the month had passed, I went to Mr. Turner's factory in Soosawnee, in Zillah Tarhoot, in Behar, for the purpose of effecting a settlement in respect of mangoes, which grew in my village, and of which Mr. Turner was thircadar. I continued there for some time after my business was over. Bhobany Sing and Beckdarry Sing, two peons in the service of Mr. Turner, brought Motty Roy, the deceased, Roop Sing and Ramdyal Roy, to Mr. Turner; when about half a pahor of the day was remaining, Mr. Turner asked Motty Roy, why he did not sow indigo? Motty Roy replied, that he had sowed indigo, but that it had not come up; and requested to be furnished with indigo seed again. Bhikdharry said to Mr. Turner, that Motty Roy was a "(dagabaz)" rogue; and that if he were not punished, he would not plant indigo. Whereupon Mr. Turner struck Motty Roy two blows with his fist, which he parried with his hand. Mr. Turner then struck him four blows, two on each side of the cheek; and gave him two kicks with his boots, one on his right hip, and one on the belly. Motty Roy fell down; whereupon Mr. Turner ordered, that he should be put into the stocks; and Bheckdarry and Bhobany Sing, took him away to put him into the stocks. About a ghunee after this, when I was going to Poorun Sing, the jamadar's lodging, I saw Roopsing Ramdyal, and Motty Roy the deceased, in the stocks. At about one pahor of the night, while I was in the lodgings of Poorun Sing, jemadar, I heard that Motty Roy had died from the bite of a snake. I did not go out till the next morning, when I saw the dead body in Mr. Turner's factory, laying covered with a cloth. I did not examine the body.

The mark of

Sworn the day and year before written, before me, ⋈

(Signed) Cha. F. Martyn, Magistrate. Chhumun Mahots.

(A true copy.)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

No. 13.

The examination of John Lathbury Turner, taken before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, and factory of Fort William in Bengal, the eighteenth day of November 1809.

The said examinant, being charged on the oaths of Towakul Roy and Ramdial Roy, with the wilful murder of Motty Roy, late of Mouzah Hoorjeenah, in the province of Behar; and the said examinant, being duly interrogated, says, I am not guilty of the above stated charge.

(Signed) John Lathbury Turner.

Taken, the day and year above written, before me,

(Signed) Cha. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

DEPOSITIONS in the Case of Mr. DOUGLAS.

No. 14.

THE Information and Deposition of Thomas Clark, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the fourth day of December 1809; who, on his oath, saith; I was employed by Mr. Mathew Moran in April 1808, to go and erect a set of indigo works at Mootiharry, in the district of Chupra, on ground belonging to Mr. Moran, which was purchased by him, and the sale sanctioned by the Board of Revenue. I arrived at Mootehary on the 2d May 1808, and was daily prevented by a number of people, said to belong to Mr. Douglas and Motrum Khawn, from taking water from the nulla. In consequence of which, I waited upon Mr. Douglas; who told me, that he did not prevent me from taking water, but that Motrain Khawn would prevent Mr. Moran's people from taking any water, as they had no right to it; and that he,

No. 5. Further Extracts from Bengal Judicial Cons. 20 July 1810:—Offences committed in the interior of the Country.

Mr. Douglas, had sent him one hundred hircarrahs, and would send him four or five hundred more, for the purpose of preventing them from taking water; observing to me at the same time, that he thought I and my family were in great danger by residing there. That in case of any violent affray happening, in which any lives were lost, and which he thought very likely would be the case, that I would be sent out of the country, and then he would provide for my wife and family. Mr. Douglas called at my tent a few days afterwards, when nearly the same conversation took place before my wife. He wished very much, that I would alter the day on which a market was held on Mr. Moran's land, to which I partly consented; but, thinking afterwards, that it would not be proper for me to do so without Mr. Moran's consent, I wrote to Mr. Douglas, that I could not comply with his request, without previously obtaining the permission of Mr. Moran. In answer to this, Mr. Douglas wrote to me, saying, "Sir, you had promised to alter the day of your market, but since you "have changed your mind, I have recalled my people from Mootaharry, and shall prevent "as much as is in my power your establishing a market, or taking water from the nulla." This letter is in the possession of my attorney, Mr. Tylor. Matters remained in this perplexing state, while a great number of armed men, by day and night, paraded at the nullah, on Mr. Moran's ground, preventing my people from taking water. They drove them from the nullah and beat them with sticks; so that in fact, the progress of the building of a factory, for many days was wholly put a stop to for want of water. In consequence of this, I was obliged to commence sinking wells, and as often as I opened them, the same armed persons who obstructed me from taking water at the nulla, came on Mr. Moran's premises, beat away my people, and forcibly filled up the wells. The operations of those armed men had been hitherto confined to obstructing my going on with the buildings; but on the 4th of June 1808, between the hours of three or four in the afternoon, after I had retired from the works to my bungalow, a great number of persons, from seven hundred to a thousand, as I supposed, came armed with swords, sticks, and other weapons, suddenly surrounded my bungalow, and a number of them rushed in. I was then upon a couch. They did not give me an opportunity of asking what they wanted with me, but proceeded to beat me with large bamboos, which cut me upon the right eyebrow in two places, and in several other places of the head. I became senseless from the injury I received; and when I recovered, I found myself lying under a tree about 40 or 50 yards from the bungalow; but how I came there I do not know. I saw the munshee khana, in which the native writers belonging to the factory reside, eat, drink, and sleep, and the granary in which the grain, indigo seed, and other stores of the factory are kept, and all the huts on the premises of Mr. Moran, were on fire; but I do not know who set fire to them. The moonseekhana and granary containing several hundred maunds of different sorts of grain, all the huts and outbuildings were burnt to the ground, and the fire continued for several days. My bungalow was plundered of plate, furniture, wearing apparel, and other articles. They hacked the bungalow with their tulwars, broke my palakeen, carried off my tent, horse, and dogs. The horse and dogs were let loose, but every thing else was carried to Mr. Douglas's factory.

Sworn, the day and year first above written, before me,

(Signed) C. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

No. 15. The Information and Deposition of Mrs. Elizabeth Clark, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justice of the Peace, in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the 5th day of December 1809; who, on her oath, saith; My husband, Mr. Clark, was deputed by Mr. Moran in the month of May 1808, to superintend the building of a set of indigo works, situated at Mootiary, in the district of Chuprah. The work was delayed in consequence of the workmen being constantly interrupted by persons said to belong to Mr. Robert Scott Douglas and Mottram Khawn, the latter of whom is holder of some ground contiguous to Mr. Moran's land. In consequence of those interruptions, Mr. Clark went to Mr. Douglas, to state to him the loss and injury which Mr. Moran was suffering from the unwarrantable interference of his servants; and another object he had in view, was to endeavour to make up the differences between them. This attempt, as I understood from my husband, did not succeed. Mr. Douglas and Mr. Clark had afterwards a conference in our tent at Mooteary, at which I was present. Mr. Douglas came, accompanied with a great number of persons. They were not of that description of people who are the usual attendants of one person paying a visit to another. Many of them were equipped with tolwars and other weapons, and in number and appearance seemed an armed force brought thither to intimidate. In the course of the conversation, Mr. Douglas endeavoured to persuade Mr. Clark to change the market day to that of another, which he declined to do, but having, in the course of conversation, plainly given Mr. Clark to understand, that his wife and child would incur danger by continuing to reside at Mooteary, and that he did not know what steps Mottram Khawn might take to prevent Mr. Moran building his works on land to which he had no right, for if a contest should arise, and any lives were lost, Mr. Clark would most likely be sent out of the country. Mr. Clark did, in consequence, partly acquiesce in changing the market day. Mr. Douglas went away; Mr. Clark, on further consideration, did not think himself authorized to change the market-day without the sanction of Mr. Moran, and he wrote to Mr. Douglas a letter to this purport. The answer returned was of a threatening nature, and Mr. Clark was therein required not to take water from the nullah, or cut reeds from the lake, which were stated to be the exclusive property of Mottram Mottram Khawn, who would do all in his power to prevent Mr. Clark from appropriating either water or reeds to the buildings of Mr. Moran or to his own private use. To obviate those frequent inconveniences, and to avoid as much as possible all disputes, Mr. Clark commenced the sinking of a well; here also he met with every opposition from a number of persons belonging to Mr. Douglas, who, when the well was opened, forcibly came to the place and filled it up. Matters continued in this state until Saturday the 4th of June 1808. Mr. Clark had on that day returned from the works between three or four o'clock in the afternoon, and had gone to lay down on his cot; at this time I was walking with my child in the shade of some trees near the bungalow; I suddenly heard a great noise from the opposite tope, which I at first thought to be the celebration of some holyday by the natives; but on seeing a great number of persons come out of the tope armed with swords, sticks, and other weapons, and approaching the place where I was, I became very much alarmed and ran into the house; I immediately called out to Mr. Clark, that the people were coming, and had scarce time to say more, and got into my room, when the armed multitude surrounded the house, and some of them rushed in and began to beat Mr. Clark; I shut my door, and concealed myself under my cot, and from thence I observed some of the armed men enter my room, tore away the curtains of the cot, took away all the property which was in the room, and destroyed what they could not carry off. My female servant concealed my child behind a large water-jar which stood in the verandah, close to the window of my room. Some of those in the house began to beat my female servant, when others said, "do not beat the woman." This gave me a little courage, and supposing that they would not injure me, I attempted to come out of my room, to go to Mr. Clark, whom I had seen from the window, that the people were using ill at the outside of the house; just as I had opened the door, an hircarrah, named Dirgapaul Roy, belonging to Mr. Douglas, and whom I had noticed when his master came to see Mr. Clark, advanced up towards me with a tulwar, and was about to strike me; a sepoy, dressed in uniform, and whom I had also seen in the retinue of Mr. Douglas, stayed him from striking me, saying, "it was Mr. Douglas's order to "refrain from offering any violence to the babee or child, but to aardallo, or beat "Mrs. Clark, and all people about the place." Mr. Clark was laying about 15 or 20 yards from the bungalow covered with blood; I retired into my room; from the window, I observed the granary, the moonshee khannah, the godowns, and all the huts on fire; who set fire to them I do not know. Previous to the rioters quitting the bungalow, some of them called out to set fire to it; while others said, "no, no, do not set fire to this house, the babee is inside of it;" when they had done all the injury they would, they came up to me, and told me "to make myself easy, as they had killed Mr. Clark, and would not molest me." They then took their departure. Some of our servants, who had made their escape during the committing of the outrages, returned to the house, bringing Mr. Clark with them. He was wounded in several places about the head, bruised all over the body, and covered with blood, as will appear by the cloaths which he wore at the time, and which I still have by me, in the same state they were when he shifted them. When the confusion was over, we discovered that the rioters had carried off all the articles belonging to the factory as well as to the workmen. In the bungalow, they destroyed almost every thing, plundered us of our little plate, broke open several chests, one of which contained some dozens of china-ware, which they smashed to pieces, robbed my female servants of all their toys or ornaments, and even carried away the bedding, palampore, and the pillows of my child. Nothing escaped them, and what they could not carry off, they destroyed upon the spot. The havoc they occasioned, left us so destitute, that we had not a chair to sit down upon, nor in the kitchen a single utensil to dress our food. To the best of my knowledge, one of the prisoners, Pahar Sing, now shewn to me, was among the persons who committed these acts. The other two prisoners I cannot so well speak to, from the consternation and confusion I was in at the time. My cook was so severely beaten, that he constantly complained of the pains he felt, and he died in about two months afterwards.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me: E. Clark.
(Signed) C. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)
(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

No. 16.

The Information and Deposition of Mobaruck Hussain, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the Town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the fifth day of December 1809; who, on his oath saith; I am a servant at present out of employment; but in the month of June 1808, I was in the service of Ally Muzzuffer Khawn, as a tassildar or collector. I lived at the Bowbanypore garden, to the east of Mr. Clark's bungalow, and distant from it about fifty yards. It was on the forty bigahs of land granted by Cazee Assam Khawn to Mr. Moran. I lived in a straw hut thereon, which Mr. Clarke gave me the means of building. There were other straw buildings on the same land. There was also a bungalow, granary, vats, moonshee khanna, botique shops, and bricklayers houses. I eat, drank, and slept in the hut erected for me. None of my family resided with me, there was only a peon. I recollect an affray on the first of last June, on their land. On that day, Mr. Clarke had ordered his people to cut some reeds from the Jeel adjoining the forty begahs, and within that part borders on the Jeel. They were in the act of cutting the reeds, when Dirgassal Sing, Gunga Sing, Sreekissen Sing, Pahar Tacoor, and other men, armed with sticks, came and ordered Clarke's people to desist. I was on the banks of the Jeel at the time. Clarke's people said,

No. 5. Further Extracts from Bengal Judicial Cons. 20 July 1810:— Offences committed in the interior of the Country.

said, they were not cutting reeds on any other person's land but their own. Whereupon some of those in company with Gungah Sing, Sreekissen Sing, and Pahar Tacoor, went into the Jeel, laid hold of Clarke's people, and drove them out of the water, beating them all the way. Meer Phakoo, a peon of Mr. Clarke's, seeing what was going on, went and informed his master, who called Munnoo Tewarry, and he was ordered to repair to the spot with his men, to prevent Clarke's people from being beat, and to tell Douglas's party that the reeds which had been cut down were within Moran's boundary, and it was very wrong to bring on a dispute. Munnoo Tewarry did so; an altercation took place between both parties; from words they proceeded to blows, and after having fought with each other some time with their fists (neither party using their sticks) they parted and went away. I cannot say which side prevailed. They parted as if by consent, but at parting, Gungah Sing said, it was his master's orders to look out for such a beginning as had occurred, and told Clarke's party to take care of the consequences that might follow. In the scuffle some of Mr. Douglas's people might have been hurt, but not considerably, as neither party fought with sticks or swords. Munnoo Tewarry was Mr. Morand's superintendent of the factory; and his people were thus employed under him for the purpose of the business of the factory. On the 2d of June Gungah Sing, and Drogapall Sing, came within the forty begahs, accompanied with about thirty-five men, cut down a mangoe tree close to Clarke's bungalow, and took it away. No resistance was made on the part of Clarke; but some of his people called out "dhwy, dhwy," and desiring Gungah Sing not to cut down the tree, Gungah Sing and Durgopall Sing said, as you went to cut the reeds, so are we come to cut down the tree. While they were taking the tree away they came to a well, which had been dug on the banks of the Jeel, and filled it up, and then went away. On the 4th of June, in the morning, about three gurries after sun-rise, three hundred men, or thereabouts, came in a tumultuous manner, and stood before the bungalow of Mr. Clarke. On this, all the people employed in the factory came to the bungalow, to see why so many persons were assembled. Futty Ally Jemadar, and others belonging to Mr. Clarke, asked the cause of their assembling; but no answer was given. I saw four or five of the rioters come out of the crowd and perform pojah, and having done so, went away without saying any thing. Mr. and Mrs. Clarke were then in the bungalow, and saw what was going on. They did not say any thing to the rioters. The rioters were about the distance of a begah from the bungalow. In the afternoon, three gurries of the day remaining, I was in my house, and two persons came running to me, saying, there was a great mob coming from Mootyary. On hearing this, I looked out, and saw on the bank a few persons, and all of a sudden about six hundred men came out of the Jeel, and stood on the bank, and then went to the same place where they had performed poojah in the morning. I knew some of them; there were among them Gungah Sing, Durgopall Sing, Soobha Tacoor, Pahar Tacoor, Haytoo Khawn, Kullo Khawn, Meer Ahmud Ally, Burson Roy, and Summarum Sing; on their coming to this place, Futty Ally jemadar, and Onoop chokidar, came out of Clarke's bungalow, and called out "dhwy company, dhwy judge saile," and addressed the rioters, saying, why are you assembled here. You came here in the morning, what are you again come for? The rioters gave no answer at first. Some brandished their swords, spears, and sticks, and some were leaping. A little after, Durgapall called out to Futty Ally and Onoop, to hold their tongues, as it was their master's order to spare Mrs. Clarke and child, and to beat that banchute Clarke, and his people, and drive them out. Whereupon Durgapall and Bursun Roy came out of the crowd, and Bursun Roy struck Onoop with a stick, and Durgapall made a blow at Futty Ally also with a stick, but it missed him, and he ran away. Immediately Durgapall Sing, Sreekissen Sing, Pahar Tacoor, Haytoo Khawn, and others, in all ten or fifteen, went into the bungalow, and the rest remained outside, destroying things in the verandah; others were employed in pulling a tent down which stood near the bungalow. I don't know what was doing in the bungalow. I saw Mr. Clarke run out bareheaded, and wounded, and the blood running down; the rioters followed him, beating him with sticks. Mr. Clarke said twice, "dustoor, "dustoor," and then fell down. He raised himself a little, and the rioters repeated their blows till he fell again; he again attempted to rise, and was beat down again, and laid senseless at the foot of a tree. I then went a short distance from the bungalow. Futty Boubut, Clarke's chokidar, who had been absent, returned, and called out "dhwy," on which four of the rioters ran up to him, and one of them cut him with a sword on the right side, and part of the belly; who cut him, I don't know; Futty fell down wounded. The rioters then proceeded towards the vats where the bricklayers were working. The bricklayers, on seeing them, ran away, and the rioters took up the things belonging to the bricklayers. They and others proceeded on to the moonshee khonna; I saw five or seven go in; they were peons, I don't know their names; they took out pots and other things from thence. In the moonshee konnah there was some indigo seed, and Durgapall Sing and Gunga Sing bring fire from opposite, to the shop of Samcbah Saho, a moody, on the forty begahs of land adjoining the moonshee khonna. They gathered some dry grass, put the fire on it, blew it into a flame, and then placed it against the thatch of the moonshee khonna, which took fire, and burnt it to the ground. While the moonshee khonna was burning, one of the rioters, whose name I don't know, took from thence some of the burning straw, and carried it, and set fire to the granary, which was also burnt to the ground. The fire continued to burn for two or three days. My hut was not burnt, only the moonshee konnah and the granary. I did not hear Sreekissen Sing, Summurun Sing, Pahar Tacoor, or Soobhao Tacoor, give orders to burn these places. They were present, while it was burning. Then some of the rioters brought two hackeries to the moonshee konnah, and loaded them, and another which was standing by, with straw belonging to the factory, and set

set them on fire, and burnt the whole. The rioters then went to the bezar, plundered the moody and poddair. They returned again to the bungalow, and some of them went in and brought out different articles of furniture, and took them away. The tent was taken away. Munnoo Tavarry, and other mutsuddies, inhabited the moonshee konnah, eat, drank, and slept there.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me,

(Signed) C. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

No. 17. Deposition of Sadho Ram, 5th December.

The Information and Deposition of Sadho Ram, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the Town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the fifth day of December 1809; who, on his oath, saith; I am at present out of employment; but was formerly a mutsuddy, or writer, in the service of Mr. Douglas, who is an indigo manufacturer at Pepra, in zillah Sarun, in the district of Soubah Behar. Mr. Douglas entertains a number of men in his service, of different descriptions. While I lived with him, he had also armed men, who were ready to fight, or to do any thing else that they were ordered. Among those armed men, he kept in his pay or service, Summarun Sing, jemuldar, Soobhao Tacoor, sepoy, Srie Kessen, jemuldar, and Puhar Tacoor, jemuldar. Those four persons acted under the orders of Mr. Douglas. He dispatched them to Mootyary, and desired me to follow them in four days afterwards. While I was at Mootyary, I, as well as the four above-named armed men, received letters from Mr. Douglas, that in the event of Mr. Clarke's people making any movement, we were not to spare them, but to turn them out of possession of the factory. That letter is not with me, but is deposited in the Supreme Court.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me,

(Signed) Chas. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

No. 18.

The Information and Deposition of Sunt Lall, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the Town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the fifth day of December 1809; who, on his oath, saith; I was formerly employed by Mr. Robert Scott Douglas, and kept the hackeray account, at the factory at Pipra. On the 3d of June 1808, while I was at Pakeree Ossoke, I received a letter from Cherunjeebeg Lall, instructing me to provide 100 or 200 armed picked men, but for what purpose I do not know, and send them to him to the factory at Pipra; and to send them along with Bodekissen, who was the sezawal, and to whom I was a writer. On receiving the letter and reading it, I asked the person who brought it, whose name I do not know, but who is a rajpoot, for what reason Bodekissen had been sent for. He replied, that Sadhooram, who was a tussuldar at Mootyary, on behalf of Mr. Douglas, to leave the business, that he might not be involved in a quarrel that was existing between gentlemen, meaning Mr. Douglas and Mr. Clarke. In consequence of the orders which the letter contained, I took a horse and rode round to all the villages under the sezawal, and desired every body who wanted employment to repair to Moonshee Cherunjuvee Lall, at the factory at Pipra; eight or nine men accordingly went from Bukhree, and four or five persons from Bissumberpore. I do not know whether any person went from any of the other villages or not; on Sunday, in the morning, I went to Pipra, where Bhola Tewarry, a hircarra, belonging to Mr. Douglas, arrived on horseback from Mootyary. He said to me outside of the bungalow, before we had seen Mr. Douglas, We have obtained a victory; Mr. Clarke is wounded (zikiem.) I asked Bhola if he had seen Sadhoram, who was there? he informed me, that Sadhoram had gone to his own house at Surgeca on Friday the 2d; Bhola then went into the bungalow, and I was following him, when I was stopped by Mr. Douglas's chubdar, who said his master had given order not to admit any person while Bhola was inside; I told him I was a servant, and entered into the room, upon which Mr. Douglas said, why do you come so often here; go and attend to your business? I made my salam, and went away. I did not hear any conversation between Bhola and Mr. Douglas; I again went to the factory on the 7th or 8th, and I saw Cherunjuvee Lall receive 600 rupees from Mr. Douglas, and pay it to the armed men who had returned from Mootyary. They were paid up to the 7th of June, and the servants of the Pipra factory, who had gone to Mootyary to fight, received double wages.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me,

(Signed) Chas. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

No. 19.

The Information and Deposition of Sheeib Fyzoolla, taken upon oath before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the fifth day of December 1809; who, on his oath, saith; I am a husbandman, and a native of Mogla, in Zillah Chupra in Soobah Bahar. I remember on the 4th of June 1808, there was an earthquake, about three gurries of the day remaining, and on that day I saw five or six hundred persons coming towards Mootyary, some by land and others by water. Those persons were armed with sticks and tulwars. They first stopt about ten paces distant from Mr. Clarke's bungalow, at Bhobanypore in zillah Chupra, in Soobah Bahar. The armed men afterwards proceeded and came near a mangoe tree, which was about one pace distant from Mr. Clarke's bungalow, when Onoop, Mr. Clarke's chokidar, called for justice: "Dowe, Dowe, in the open face of the day these men are "come to commit a dacorty." Whereupon Sree Kissen Sing, one of the prisoners now present, said, Be quiet, Banchoot, it is my master's orders not to molest the beebee saheb and the baba, but to beat Mr. Clarke and his people, and turn them out from the premises; that he, Clarke, might not be able to erect a factory there. Pahar Tacoor, Sreekissen Sing, Sumrum Sing, and six or seven others, beat Onoop with sticks, which brought him to the ground, and they then forcibly entered into the bungalow. What passed in the bungalow I did not see. Mr. Clarke came out from the north door, and was endeavouring to run away, when he was pursued and beat by the prisoners and others. I heard Mr. Clarke tell the prisoners, that it was against the regulations to beat Europeans. The prisoners and others replied, it was their masters orders; and continued beating him. I saw Mr. Clarke fall down on the ground in consequence of the beating. Mr. Clarke got up, and attempted to run away, but he was brought to the ground a second time. Mr. Clarke got up again, and attempted to effect his escape. He was brought to the ground a third time. In this situation, he continued bleeding much from the face, and I observed blood about the cloaths. The prisoners and others proceeded towards the vats. In their way they met Futty Rawate, a chokidar of Mr. Clarke, whom they beat; and some of them, but whom I cannot say, gave him a cut with a tulwar on the right of the belly. The bricklayers, who were at their work in the vats, on seeing the rioters ran away. The prisoners and others plundered them of their tools and their cloaths. They then proceeded towards the moonsliee khonna, and plundered it of every thing; but they did not touch the grain or the indigo seed. There was some fire at a short distance from the moonshee khonna, which had been left by some person that had cooked victuals at the place. Drupall Sing took some straw from the chopper, and gave to Gunga Sing. Gunga Sing put some fire into the straw, and began to blow at it. Drupall Sing assisted Gopall Sing in blowing it into a flame. I heard four or five others say, in a loud voice, blow up the house, the saheb will be glad of it (meaning Mr. Douglas) and will give us buxsees. This order was again given by the prisoners, and another person of the name of Sabhoo Sing repeated it. I saw the granary and the moonshee khonnah on fire, but I cannot say who set fire to it. Some of the rioters, but who I cannot tell, went behind the moonshee khonnah, and set fire to three hackeries; while the hackeries were burning, the rioters proceeded towards the bungalow, plundered the remaining articles that were in the bungalow, and took a tent, and a horse with them, and proceeded towards Mootyary.

No. 5. Further Extracts from Bengal Judicial Cons. 20 July 1810.—Offences committed in the interior of the Country.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me,

(Signed) C. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

No. 20.

The Information and Deposition of Bhoiro Roy, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the fifth day of December 1809; who, on his oath, saith; I am a peasant, and live at Bilbona, near Motiharee, in the district of Chupra. In the afternoon of a Saturday, four days from the end of Joistee, or June, 1808, I went to the bazar at Bhowaneepore; and finding it shut up, I proceeded towards Mulcharee; and, in my way, I saw five or six hundred people assembled at a bungalow, inhabited by Mr. Thomas Clarke. I saw Bussun Roy strike Onoop, chokidar of Mr. Clarke's bungalow, with a stick. Afterwards Pahar Thacoor, Drupaul Sing, Sree Kissen Sing, Hetoo Khawn, Calloo Khawn, and several other persons, rushed into Mr. Clarke's bungalow; a short time afterwards, I saw Mr. Clarke come out of his bungalow, and much blood flowed from his head; and many of the people were beating him with sticks; and Mr. Clarke fell down twice; and the third time that he fell, he became senseless. Some of them were plundering the bungalow. I saw the moonshee khannah granary, and a hut, and three garries, or carts, on fire; but I do not know who set them on fire. They carried away a horse and a tent, and plundered the bungalow of every thing that they could carry away.

Sworn, the day and year first above written, before me,

(Signed) Cha. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

No. 21.

The Information and Deposition of Radha Kissen, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the fifth day of December 1809; who, on his oath, saith; I was formerly employed by Mr. Douglas, as collector of the village of Chintamonpore. On Friday the 24th of Joyt 1215, (Fuslee), corresponding to the 3d of June 1808, I went to the factory of Mr. Douglas, at Pissera, about eight o'clock in the morning, and saw Cherunjeeree Lall, who was Mr. Douglas's moonshee, engage about forty persons, as servants; and told them, that they were engaged for the purpose of going to Mootyary, to fight Cherunjeeree Lall; went into the bungalow to Mr. Douglas; and when he came out again, he said to the people people whom he had engaged, that Mr. Douglas had ordered them to go to Mootyary, and beat the gentleman, and turn him out of Mr. Moran's factory. He did not mention the gentleman's name, but desired them to turn him out of Mr. Moran's factory, and to prevent him from establishing a factory there. A short time after this, Mr. Douglas came out of the bungalow, and also gave orders to the people to go to Mootyary, and beat the gentleman, and turn him out of the factory. After this, Siodeal Sing, the nephew of Cherinjeevee Lall, said to his uncle, that the villages of Bissumberpore and Bukheria, were inhabited by Rajpoots; and told him to write a letter to Sunt Lall, who was there, with Bade Kissen, desiring him to pick out a hundred, or a hundred and fifty men, and send them also. Cherinjeevee Lall did, in consequence, write a letter, and sent it by a coyst, named Giridhar. Mr. Douglas was walking backward and forward outside of the moonshee khonnah, in the flower-garden. He heard this conversation, and desired Cherinjeevee Lall to write a letter, but did not dictate any particulars. I know nothing about the affray at Mootyary.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me,

(Signed) Cha. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)
(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

No. 22.

The Information and Deposition of Rauj Dhurr Rawoot, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the 5th day of December 1809; who, on his oath, saith; I am a native of Mootyary in zillah Chuprah, in Sooba Behar, and a husbandman. While six days were remaining in the month of Jayt, before the last, one evening a dosand, or chokidar, belonging to Mr. Douglas, came to my house, and desired me to go with him to fight. I told him I did not know how to fight; the chokidar went away, and I, Sobhanny, and Peero, proceeded to the house of Cherungeevee Lall, the mooktear of Mr. Douglas; Cherungeevee Lall took us before Mr. Douglas, and told him we had refused to go to fight. Mr. Douglas spoke something to Cherungeevee Lall, in English, which I did not understand. Cherungeevee Lall came and informed us, that Mr. Douglas said we must go to fight, and if we do not, he would flog us, and take away our lands, and banish us from the village. We went to our homes. On the following day, Saturday, four days of the month of Jayt remaining, a number of persons armed with sticks and tulwars began to assemble early in the morning, at a place called Puttya. I joined them also, through fear of Mr. Douglas's putting his threats into execution. We collected in a large body, and proceeded to Bhabanypore, to Mr. Clarke's factory. We arrived near the factory at about three gurries in the morning. Sriekissen Sing, Pahar Tacoor, and Drapall Sing, the principal jamadars, laid down their arms, and said their prayers, in order to be successful in the fight. They got up, armed themselves, and gave orders to proceed back to Mootyary, the place where they had originally assembled. We went thither, and in about one gurrie and a half we were served with refreshments. When three gurries of the day were remaining, Sheekissen Sing, the prisoner now present, and Drapall Sing, said, "Victory is on our side, let us arise and proceed." We got up and proceeded towards Mr. Clarke's bungalow, which we reached in a short time. When we came near the bungalow, I saw the prisoner Sreekissen Sing, without uttering a word, take his stick, and gave a blow to Goveye, Mr. Clarke's cook, upon the head. Some others beat him also; he fell down on the ground. Onoop, Mr. Clarke's chokedar, seeing what was passing, cried out, "Dowe, dowe," upon which the prisoner Sreekissen Sing abused him, and called out to him to be quiet. He added, I have Mr. Douglas's orders not to meddle with madam and the child, but to beat Mr. Clarke, and to set fire to his bungalow. Whereupon the prisoners, Sreekissen Sing, Pahar Tacoor, and some others, rushed into the bungalow. What passed there, I do not know. Shortly after they had entered the bungalow, I saw Mr. Clarke running out of the bungalow, with his head uncovered. As he was running he was warding off the blows with both of his hands, which the prisoners Sreekissen Sing, Pahar Tacoor, and Drapall Sing, were giving him with sticks. Mr. Clarke fell down twice, and got up, but the third time Mr. Clarke fell upon his face, and could not rise again; Mr. Clarke bled very much from the head, face, and other parts. I was much frightened, and stood at a distance, from whence I saw the moonshee konnah burning; who set fire to it, I did not see. The armed men began to plunder the bungalow. The tent was afterwards cut down by Sobanny. Hattoo, mussulman, belonging to Mr. Douglas, took away Mr. Clarke's horse. We then went away.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me,

(Signed) Charles F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)
(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

No. 23.

The Information and Deposition of Cassem Ally Khawn, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the Town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the fifth day of December 1809; who, on his oath, saith; I am a peon, at present employed by Mr. Smith, the Judge of Circuit at Patna, and was formerly employed by Charles Boddam, the Judge and Magistrate of zillah Sarun. In the month of Joyt 1215, (fulsee) I received a perwannah from Mr. Boddam, and was directed to go to the daroga of Culleanpore, and apply to him for assistance, to bring Foyjun Sicklegur and others; I do not recollect the date, but I arrived there on a Friday; on the Saturday

No. 5. Further Extracts from Bengal Judicial Cons. 20 July 1810.—Offences committed in the interior of the Country.

Saturday morning, hearing that Foyjun had gone to Mootcary to purchase some leather, and that some of the others had entered into Mr. Douglas's service, I went, accompanied by a burkundauze named Emaumbux, and in the way I saw smoke, which appeared to be a fire, in the direction of Mootyary; I mentioned the circumstance to Emaumbux, who said, he supposed that the smoke arose from the burning of Mr. Moran's bricks; when we approached Mootyary, we met four labouring people running away without any cloths upon their heads, and of whom we enquired, what was the matter? they informed us, that they had run away from fear, in consequence of a body of people belonging to Mr. Douglas, that had come to Mr. Moran's factory in a riotous manner, had wounded Mr. Clarke, and set fire to the moonshee konnah. When we advanced a little farther, I saw Futtah Gowallah lying on the ground, and he had received a slight wound by a sword, on the right side; as we passed Mr. Clarke's bungalow, Mrs. Clarke sent Foyjoolla, chuprassy, to call me and Emaumbux; I told him that I was a peon of the court, and then upon duty, and could not go; I also told him, that as there was a quarrel between Europeans, I did not wish to be involved in it, or to be afterwards called upon to give evidence. Foyjoolla came a second time, in consequence of which we went into Mr. Clarke's bungalow, where I saw him lying on a cot, and blood flowing copiously from his brow; Mrs. Clarke shewed us his clothes, covered with blood, and told us the circumstances; but this was after the affray, and the riotous people had all dispersed, and I saw nothing of it. We left the bungalow, and proceeded on our duty to the village of Mooteary, where we saw Mr. Douglas's people making out a list of some European articles, among which were two spoons, which appeared to be silver, two shades, and a bundle wrapt up in a blanket, the contents of which I do not know; Emaumbux informed them, that Mrs. Clarke had related the circumstances to us, and told them that they had done very wrong in beating Mr. Clarke, and plundering his house; they replied, that they had acted according to Mr. Douglas's orders, and that he was responsible for whatever they had done; they further said, they would take every thing to the factory, to their master, Mr. Douglas. In the crowd I saw the three prisoners now present, whose names, I am informed, are Pahar Tacoor, Sree Kessen Sing, and Sumerum Roy.

Sworn the day and year before written, before me,

(Signed) Chas. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

No. 24. The Information and Deposition of James Bruce, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace, in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the 5th day of December 1809; who, on his oath, saith; I am acquainted with Mr. Robert Scott Douglas, of Pepra, pergunnah Majawah Zillah Sarun, and have known him for several years; he is an indigo planter in that district: I have frequently heard him say that he was born in England, though I do not know of what country he is.

J. Bruce.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me,

(Signed) Cha. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

No. 25. The Information and Deposition of Mathew Moran, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace, in and for the town of Calcutta, in Fort William in Bengal, the 5th day of December 1809; who, on his oath, saith; I am an indigo planter at Barah, in the province of Behar. Sometime in the month of April 1808, I employed Mr. Thomas Clarke to go to Mootyary, to superintend the building of a set of indigo works, which I was then erecting at Mootyary, on forty begahs of land, which I had obtained a potah for, from Cazey Hussain Khawn, with the sanction of the Board of Revenue; Mr. Clarke did accordingly proceed to Mootyary, sometime in the month of May 1808. From the time of Mr. Clarke's arrival at that place he frequently wrote to me, stating the improper conduct of the servants of Mr. Robert Scott Douglas, who were continually obstructing the work from going on, and my people from taking water from the Jeel, to go on with the building; in consequence of which I wrote to Mr. Clarke, to dig wells and obtain water, in order to prevent having any altercation with Mr. Douglas or his people; in this attempt he was also opposed by Mr. Douglas's people, who forcibly entered on my premises, and filled the wells up. I had received continual accounts of the interruption my people met with from those of Mr. Douglas, while going on with the building; in consequence of which I wrote Mr. Douglas a letter, desiring him to prevent his people from committing such unwarrantable outrages; in answer to which I received a very dissatisfactory reply. About the 7th or 8th June I received further accounts, that a large body of people, belonging to Mr. Douglas, had forcibly entered on my grounds, and beat and cruelly ill used Mr. Clarke, and other servants belonging to the factory; that they had set fire to a granary, containing a large quantity of different sorts of grain and indigo seeds, moonshee konnah, and several other out-houses, and had carried off almost every thing they could lay hold of, belonging to me and Mr. Clarke, at the factory.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me,

(Signed) Cha. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

The

The Examination of Sreekissen Sing, Someron Roy, and Pahoi Tacoor, taken before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta and factory of Fort William, in Bengal, the sixth day of December 1809. No. 26.

The said examinations being charged on the oaths of Thomas Clarke, Elizabeth Clarke, Mobaruck Hussain, Sadhoram Sunt Lall, Shukh Fyzoolla, Bhairoo Roy, Radho Kissen, Rajdhur Rawoot, Cassim Ally Khan, Mathew Moram, and James Bruce, and with having riotously assembled, and maliciously, wilfully, and feloniously set fire to, and burnt to the ground, one thatched granary, containing eighteen hundred cutcha maunds of different sorts of grain and indigo seed, and a thatched moonshee konnah dwelling, together with divers other straw huts, or dwellings, the property of the said Mathew Moran; and the said examinants, being duly interrogated, say, we are not guilty of the above stated charge.

Taken the day and year first above written, before me,

(Signed) Cha. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

DEPOSITIONS in the Case of THOMAS GARDINER.

The Information and Deposition of Tucktee Buvah, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the ninth day of June 1810; who, on her oath, saith; I am the widow of the late Harro, and an inhabitant of Kurimali, in Zillah Krishnagore, in the province of Bengal. Six days remaining of the month of Choyte, or April last, on a Tuesday, and prohor of the day remaining, Loboye and Huneef, two packs belonging to Mr. Kelso, came to my late husband's house, and said, that Mr. Gardiner wanted him. Harro was at this time smoaking a chillum of tobacco; Cattay Khawn, a brother-in-law of Harro, was with Loboye and Haneef. Harro went along with them, of his own accord. On Thursday Lochum Birwas came to my husband's house, and informed Damoo, my brother, that my husband had been beaten by Mr. Gardiner, Haneef, Loboye, and a sepoy; and that he was kept in the factory, and was not suffered to go home. Lochum Birwas also said, that Harro was very ill, and he was speechless, and there were no hopes of his living; and he said, if Damoo wishes to see him, he ought to go to the factory; whereupon Damoo set off instantly on the same night, or a little of the night remaining. Damoo came home, and gave me tidings of the death of my husband. I lamented the loss of my husband, and remained at home. I did not go to see the corpse of my husband, because it was in the factory, and I was afraid of loosing my cast. Besides which, my husband's lawful wife did not go there herself. In the afternoon that my husband went to the factory, he was not ill; he was in good health, and so for many days prior to his going thither. He was a strong, healthy, middle sized, stout man, and was not old. No. 27.

The mark of

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me, ⋈

(Signed) C. F. Martyn, Magistrate. Tucktee Bewah.

(Signed) J. Gonsalves, Int^r.

(A true copy.)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

The Information and Deposition of Callay Khaun, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the ninth day of June 1810; who on his oath, saith; I am a clashee, in the service of Mr. Kiloo, and am attached to an indigo factory at Tuddoonotpore, in the district of Khrisnagore, in the province of Bengal. On a Tuesday, about two months ago, on the day of the new moon, I was taken from Mirzapore village, where I had been to get indigo seed, sown by Loboye and Hanup chowkeedaurs of the above factory; Haroo, clashee, the deceased, was also taken away along with me. Haroo was seized by the chowkudaurs after I had been in their custody. He was taken at his house at Kurimale village, in the aforesaid district. We were taken to the Tuddolpore factory, and kept in the sircar's writing office, until the gentleman, Mr. Gardiner, had done taking his dinner, when we were produced before him by the said chowkudars, at his outh chatta or bungalow. Mr. Gardiner asked us why we had not sown seed; and he said we had committed a great fault, and for which we must be punished. Mr. Gardiner then ordered Loboye and Haneef to beat us; and Mr. Gardiner brought from a godown two canes, of the length of about two cubits, and of the thickness of my little finger, which he gave to Loboye, and with one of which, Haneef gave Harro, the deceased, five or six strokes about his posteriors. Mr. Gardiner got angry with Haneef, and said you are blind. He snatched the cane from his hand, and then gave it Loboye, and ordered him to beat us; whereupon he gave the deceased four or five strokes upon his posteriors; and afterwards he gave me about ten strokes with the same cane on the posteriors. After this, Mr. Gardiner ordered a sepoy, whose name I do not know, to beat Harro. He gave Harro five or six strokes with one of the canes about his posteriors. After this, Mr. Gardiner took the cane from the hand of the No. 28.

No. 5. Further Extracts from Bengal Judicial Cons. 20 July 1810.—Offences committed in the interior of the Country.

sepoy, and gave Harro about five strokes on his back; Mr. Gardiner then ordered Haneef to rub chilly and salt upon us; Haneef brought some salt only, and rubbed it on the parts where I and Harro had been beaten. I felt a smarting for a short time; the marks swelled a little. Mr. Gardiner then ordered Loboye and Haneef to take us to Juddoonotpore factory, which is from two to three coss distant from this factory. Harro in the way told me that he had not received four months wages; that he would take his wages and leave the service, as he could not bear to be flogged frequently; I and Harro proceeded to the Juddoonotpore factory, and remained in the lodging of the chowkudars who had first brought us under custody. I requested of Harro, who was my brother-in-law, to go home; Harro replied, he would not go away, until he received his wages. On the next day, Wednesday, Harro began to complain of experiencing constant thirst, and he drank much water. Loboye Khawn, a relation of ours, who had come to the factory on his own business, came to the place where we were, and asked us why we had not gone home; whereupon Harro replied, that he had been vomiting, and was taken ill with a bowel complaint, which made him unable to proceed to his home. At this interval, Buxmahomed, another brother-in-law of the deceased, came to the place, and gave him some khoye, or fried paddy to eat; he eat two or four mouthfuls of it, and Buxmahomed went away, leaving us together. On Thursday following, Damoo, another brother-in-law of the deceased, came, and brought him choorah or beaten rice, and washed it in some water, and gave him to drink it. Harro drank some. I and Damoo remained by him on that night. I left Harro on a durmah mat, and went to sleep; at the latter part of the night I was awakened by Mooyden and Hessumdy Piadah. They desired me to go and inform Harro's family of the death of Harro. I came back to the factory, and saw Mr. Gardiner walking about in his bungalow, and the tamah people making investigation. My deposition was likewise taken by the buxey or mohorir. On the second day of Harro's death, the mohorir came and ordered the corpse out of the room where it had lain. It was accordingly dragged out of the room by Buxmahomed and Loboye Khawn, over planks, broken bricks, &c. which rubbed off part of the skin from the right posteriors. Mr. Gardiner requested of the mohorir to hold his inquest in the room where the corpse lay, to which the mohorir paid no attention, but said he would have the corpse out, which was accordingly done. Four days after I was ordered by the mohorir to dispose of the corpse. I and the other relatives of the deceased buried it. We were afterwards taken to the tannah, and from thence sent to Mr. Eliot, the magistrate, who took my deposition, and sent me to Calcutta with the others.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me, The Mark of ✕ Callay Khawn.

(Signed) C. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true Copy.)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

(Signed) J. Gonsalves, Int^r.

No. 29. The Information and Deposition of Nobye, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the ninth day of June 1810, who, on his oath, saith; I am a chowkeidar, attached to the Juddoonotpore indigo factory, belonging to Mr. Kelso, in zillah Kishnagore. In the month of Choyte last (April 1810) on a Tuesday, at about seven in the morning, Mr. Gardiner, the superintendent of four indigo factories of Mr. Kelso, came to the Juddoonotpore factory, and ordered me and Haneef chokeedar, to go and call Harro, the deceased, and Callay Khan, two superintendents in the cultivation of indigo. We proceeded on our errand, and found Callay Khan at Mirzapore village, in the said zillah, to whom we communicated the order. Callay Khan said he was ready, and came along with us. We then proceeded to the house of Harro, the deceased, at Kurimali, in the said zillah. Harro accompanied us to the Juddoopore factory. I went to Mr. Gardiner's bungalow, and informed him that Harro and Callay Khawn were brought, and I was ordered to produce them before him. I did so. Harro and Callay Khawn were asked why they had not sown indigo seed, as this was the time. Harro did not make any answer; but Callay Khawn said he had sown indigo seeds. The gentleman then again asked Harro why he did not sow indigo seeds, for which neglect he ought to be punished. Mr. Gardiner thereupon walked into a room, and brought out from thence a rattan of the length of about two cubits, and of the thickness of my little finger, and gave it to Haneef, and said, lugow, or strike him; whereupon Haneef gave Harro three strokes with the said rattan about his waist, upon the cloth; but as he squinted, and could not see well, Mr. Gardiner snatched the rattan from his hand, and he gave the rattan to a sepoy, whose name I do not know, and desired him to beat Harro. The sepoy gave Harro five stripes with the rattan on the back. Mr. Gardiner then gave the rattan to me, and ordered me to flog Harro with it; I did accordingly give him four stripes about the posteriors. Mr. Gardiner then took the rattan out of my hand, and gave of himself to Harro seven stripes about the back. Mr. Gardiner, after this, ordered Haneef to apply salt to the parts where Harro had been flogged. Mr. Gardiner then went into the cookroom, and brought from thence some black salt, about half a chuttack, in his hand, and gave the same to Haneef, and ordered him to rub the parts with it. Haneef did so. Mr. Gardiner ordered me to rub in chilly, but none was rubbed in, although the same was brought by Hollodhur Baworchy, by the direction of Mr. Gardiner. We were afterwards ordered to go to the Juddoonotpore factory. Harro, as I understood from himself, had been ill about twenty days before, of a bowel complaint.

Neither

Neither Harro or Cally Khawn were put into custody. We proceeded on to the Juddoonotpore factory, where we arrived about seven in the evening. Harro and Callay Khan went to sleep. I went the rounds at daylight in the morning. I got up, and was proceeding to the village, to see indigo seeds sown, when I desired Harro to go also to his duty. Harro said he would not serve any longer; so did Cally Khan. They would wait for their wages, and upon receiving them, they would go away, as Mr. Gardiner had beat them without any cause. About five in the afternoon of the same day, I returned to my lodging from my duty, when I found Harro calling for water frequently to drink. Callay Khan, in my presence, told him to go home. Harro said he expected Mr. Gardiner at the factory; and when he comes he would take his pay, and then go home. Callay Khan eat some rice, but Harro did not eat any. I went to the bungalow, and on my return I enquired of Callay Khan, why Harro had refused to eat rice. Callay Khan said, he did not know why Harro had refused to eat rice. I went to sleep; in the morning I got up, and was about to go to my daily work, when, in my presence, Harro was calling for water to drink. Callay Khan said, if he would eat rice, he would give him water, otherwise not. I gave Harro some rice in a plate; Harro took a mouthful, but he could not swallow, and threw it up. Harro only continued to drink water. I saw him once vomit. I returned from my duty in the afternoon, and found Harro had eased himself in his cloth, and he had also vomited. He complained of a great heat about his body, and was rolling about the hut. Damoo after helped Harro up, and made him sit down; he also took him out whenever Harro wanted to go to ease himself, which might be two or three times on the same evening. About seven or eight I went to my own home at Tangara, and I did not see any thing further of Harro. Two days afterwards two ticka peons of the thannah came to my house, and carried me to the factory, where the corpse lay, and where the buxey took down my deposition. I did not see the corpse of Harro. From the factory I was taken to the thannah by the thannah people, and from whence I was conducted before the magistrate, Mr. Elliot, before whom my deposition was taken, and from whence I have been sent to Calcutta. This is all that I know of this business.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me,
(Signed) C. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

The mark of
⋈
Nobye.

(A true copy.)
A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

(Signed) J. Gonsalves, Int^r.

No. 30.

The Information and Deposition of Haneef, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the ninth day of June 1810; who, on his oath saith; I am a ticca peon, in the service of Mr. Kilso, belonging to his indigo factory, situated at Juddoonotpore, in the district of Kishnagore. Three months ago, on a Tuesday, Mr. Gardiner came to the Juddoonotpore factory, from that of Jadubpore. The gentleman sent for me and Nobye, into his office, and ordered us to go and bring Callay Khawn of Odlossie, and Harro of Hurimate, to the Jadubpore factory. We went to the Mirzapore village, where we found Callay Khawn, whom I told that Mr. Gardiner wanted him; Callay Khawn said he was ready. From thence, with Callay Khawn, we proceeded to the house of Harro, and told him, that Mr. Gardiner also wanted him; Harro accompanied us. In the afternoon we reached the factory, and took them before the gentleman, who asked Callay Khawn why he had not sown indigo seeds; Callay Khawn said he had sown some. After this, Mr. Gardiner asked Harro if he had sown any? Harro said he had not sown any, as the land would be covered with grass; whereupon Mr. Gardiner said to Harro, that he had neglected to do his duty, and he would punish both Callay Khawn and Harro; whereupon Mr. Gardiner ordered me and Nobye to punish them; Mr. Gardiner brought out from a room two pieces of rattan, of about the size of my little finger, and about two cubits long, one of which Mr. Gardiner gave me, and the other he held. I was directed to flog Harro; I gave Harro three stripes on the posteriors. Mr. Gardiner took the rattan from me, saying, I could not flog well, and delivered it to Nobye. Nobye gave four stripes upon the posteriors, the end of the rattan split, and bruised a little of the skin of Harro's waist, of the size of a paddy. The same rattan was taken from Nobye, and given to a sepoy, whose name I do not know; and he was ordered to flog Harro. The sepoy thereupon gave Harro five stripes on his posteriors; the gentleman snatched the rattan from the sepoy, because he gave one stripe on the back; and then Mr. Gardiner gave with his own hand seven stripes on the back. The gentleman, after this, ordered some chilly and salt to be applied to the parts that had been flogged. Some salt and chilly were given to me in a broken earthen pot; I threw away the chilly, because I was told by Nobye and others, that the chilly would burn very much; but I rubbed the salt upon Harro; I do not recollect who gave me the salt and chilly. Callay Khawn was beaten in like manner by Nobye and the sepoy. At this time I went to the sepoy's lodging for a drink of water. I did not see Mr. Gardiner beat Callay, but applied salt to the flagellation, by the order of the gentleman; Mr. Gardiner then ordered me, Nobye, Harro, and Callay Khawn, to go to the Juddoonotpore factory. We accordingly went to the factory at Juddoonotpore. In the way, I desired Harro and Callay Khawn to go to their homes; they replied, that they would not go away until they received their wages; and they further said, that they would not serve Mr. Gardiner any longer, because they were beaten without cause; when we reached the factory, Harro and Callay Khawn requested of me and Nobye to allow them them to remain in the lodging of the peon, and other servants. I took my victuals in the above lodging, and went to watch Mr. Gardiner's office. On Wednesday following I saw Harro drink water frequently. On Thursday following, in the evening, I asked Harro how he was? Harro said he was drinking water, and has been vomiting and purging. After two o'clock in the morning, Hessundy peon came to Mr. Gardiner's office, and informed me that Harro was dead. Every person left the factory, and went away; I also went to my own house. On the third day of Harro's death, some of the tannah people went to my house, and brought me to the factory, where Harro had died; and I was taken into Mr. Gardiner's bungalow, where the bareey took my deposition. I did not see the corpse of Harro; I was taken by the bareey to the tannah, from thence before the magistrate, Mr. Eliot, where my deposition was a second time taken, and from whence I have been sent down to Calcutta.

No. 5. Further Extracts from Bengal Judicial Cons. 20 July 1810:— Offences committed in the interior of the Country.

The mark of
Sworn the day and year first above written, before me, ⋈
(Signed) C. F. Martyn, Magistrate. Haneef.

(A true copy)
(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

No. 31. The Information and Deposition of Damoo Gazee, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the ninth day of June 1810; who, on his oath, saith; I am a cultivator of land, and an inhabitant of Hurimale, in zillah Nuddea, in the province of Bengal; when about six days were remaining in the month of Choyt (April last) on a Thursday, at or a little after one prohor of the day, in the morning, Lochan Biswas, one of the ameens of the Juddoonotpore factory, situated in the aforesaid zillah, and belonging to Mr. Kilso, informed me, at my house, that Harro, superintendent of the said factory, was very ill; I asked Lochim Biswas where Harro was. He informed me, that Harro was in the factory. Lochun Biswas also desired me to take a lotta, for Harro to drink water from. I did not take the lotta with me. About six ghurries of the day remaining, I went to the factory, and saw Harro in the house of the chowkeydar belonging to the factory. I found him laying on a mat. He seemed to be very uneasy, and was muttering some words, which I could not understand. I was at this time standing near the door of the chowkeydar's house, and went close to Harro, and stood by him for some time. He looked at me for a while, and then said, "brother Damoo, are you come, give me some water to drink;" whereupon I took an abkhorra, or a brass cup, belonging to Hassundy Poada, of the factory, and give Harro some water to drink. A little while after, he requested of me to lift him up. I did so several times; and he set down, whilst I supported him. Shortly after, he asked me again for water; and I gave him some. Some time after this, I washed some chooia, or beated paddy, and gave him the water to drink. After this nourishment, he seemed a little easy; but soon after, he became in the same state as before. Upon seeing him in that state, I asked him, what was the matter with him; he said, that the gentleman had beat him, and chilly and salt was rubbed upon the part where he had been flogged. I saw about eight or ten strokes upon Harro's back. They appeared to have been done with a rattan. I saw these marks when I lifted him up, in order to let him sit down. When about one prohor of the day was remaining, Harro, in that uneasy state, requested of me to take him out of the house. I took him out, where he made water, and eased himself; and at dark, I brought him back into the house, where he had been before, and laid him down at the same place. I took leave of Harro, and was proceeding home; and, after I had got to the distance of eight or ten cubits, Haneef chowkeydar called me, and said, Harro wanted me. I returned, and found Harro in the same state. Harro said to me, "brother, remain here this night, and attend upon me." I did accordingly remain with Harro, and attended upon him, and frequently gave him water to drink; that is, as often as he asked me for it. He did not complain of any internal, or external pain, or any other malady. About seven in the evening, I went to lay down near him, on a plank. In about an hour afterwards, I heard him groan. I got up, and went to him, and found him speechless. I repeatedly called him by his name, but could get no answer from him; whereupon I awoke Collye Khawn clashee, and Haram chokiydar; the former was within a fatty or fence, and I and Harro within another. Both of them came up to Harro, and found him groaning. They called him by his name, and could get no answer from him. Near midnight, I found Harro in agony. I went to Hassanidy Peada, who was in another hut, at a short distance, and informed him the state in which Harro was; and said he was at the point of death. I and Hassanidy then proceeded to the house of the dewan, Srieburry Bose, in order to inform him of the state in which Harro was; when we reached the dewan's house, Hassanidy Peadd called out to him, by his name; he did not answer; but another person within replied, that the dewan was asleep; whereupon Hassanidy mentioned to him that Harro would not live. This person desired Hassanidy to go with a chokeydar, and inform the gentleman, Mr. Gardiner, of the circumstance. We did not go to the gentleman, but went back to Harro, whom I found in the state I had left him. I and Hassanidy went again to the dewanjee; and Hassanidy called him out. The dewan asked Hassanidy what he wanted; Hassanidy said Harro was dying, and he requested of him to come and see him. The dewanjee followed us. He came and stood without the house in which Harro was, and asked of Hassanidy, if he, or any one else, could feel the pulse. Hassanidy said he could not, but Moozdeen could; whereupon Hassanidy called Moozdeen, who was at the gentleman's bungalow.

Moozdeen,

Moozdeen, in a short time, came; and the dewanjee desired him to feel Harro's pulse. Moozdeen did so; and said, he would not live. At this time the groaning ceased, and he had a little breath remaining in him. I left him alive at about two prohor, and proceeded to the thannah, in order to give notice. I reached the thannah at about two and a half prohor, and found the jemmedar at the thannah, to whom I related the circumstance. The jemmedar asked, if Harro was dead? I replied, that he was not dead; whereupon the jemmedar desired me to go to the factory, and remain there until Harro died; and to give him notice. I told the jummedar, that I could not go back to the factory, but was going to my own house. Early in the morning I sent to the Jaddobepore factory, in order to inform the gentleman of the situation that my brother-in-law, Harro, was in. I could not find the gentleman there, but was given to understand, by a gomasta of the above factory, that he had gone to the Juddoonautpore factory, the place where my brother-in-law was. I then crossed the bate creek, in order to proceed to Juddoonautpore factory; and, at which place, on the bank of the creek, Sheikh Bhollye, a clashee in the employ of the gentleman, Mr. Gardiner, informed me that Harro was dead; I asked him from whom he had got that information; Bhollye said that he heard it from another person. Bhollye desired me to proceed to the factory with expedition; and he also desired me to give notice at the thannah. I did accordingly go to the thannah, and gave notice to the jemmedar and his buxry, or muhmer; whereupon the thannah people proceeded to the factory. They found the gentleman in his bungalow. The thannah people went into the hut where my brother-in-law lay, and where I saw him lying dead. They received the corpse; some of the thannah people brought some villagers, in order to take a view of the corpse. Before the body was exposed to view, the corpse was brought out of the hut where it had laid by the buxey, who held the deceased by both of his hands; and another person, whose name I do not know, held both of the deceased's legs; and, in this manner the corpse was brought out. I saw, at the time, at the view of the body, that the back and posteriors were covered with dust; I did not see them before, and I cannot therefore say whether the parts were in that state before, or whether it was caused at the time of removing out the body. I also observed the skin on the right posterior rubbed off. It appeared to have been as if the corpse had been dragged over some hard substance. In the afternoon, the thannah people went and brought some villagers, and proceeded in their presence to take down depositions of Callay Khawn, a peon of the factory. I remained there three days; and during my stay there, the thannah people had not finished their investigation. They took down also my deposition. I left the factory on the next day after my deposition had been taken. I did not see how, or in what manner the corpse was disposed of. Some days afterwards I was taken by the thannah people before the magistrate, Mr. Eliot, who took my deposition, and sent me, with others, to Calcutta.

The mark of
Sworn the day and year first above written, before me, ✕
(Signed) C. F. Martyn, Magistrate. Damoo Gauzee.

(A true copy.)
(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

The Information and Deposition of Manick Gauzey, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martin, one of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Begal, the ninth day of June 1810; who, on his oath, saith; I am a cultivator of land, and an inhabitant of Oolassee, in the zilla of Krishnagore. On a Thursday, in the month of Chogte, or April last, about two gurries in the night, I went to the lodging, Sohaye, in the factory of Mr. Kilso, on account of having been overtaken by rain. I there saw two paikes, whose names I do not know, together with Goberdhone, Cally Khawn, Harro, and Damoo. I saw Harro very restless and groaning, and Damoo giving him water to drink. I asked Damoo what was the matter with Harro. He said, that the gentleman, without naming who he was, had beaten him. At about two and a half prohor of the night, Harro seemed in agony, he was groaning and speechless. Upon hearing Damoo say he was going to the Tannah to complain, I quitted the place, and went to my own house; I saw Harro on the night of his death. He vomited twice, and went out once in order to ease himself. I saw nothing further. I did not see his corpse afterwards.

The mark of
Sworn the day and year first above written, before me, ✕
(Signed) C. F. Martyn, Magistrate. Manick Gauzee.

(A true Copy) (Signed) J. Gonsalvez, Int^r.
(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

The Information and Deposition of Moozeen Sirdar, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the ninth day of June 1810; who, on his oath, saith; I am a chowkeedar, in the service of Mr. Kelso, to watch his factory at Juddonothpore, in the district of Krishnagore. On a Wednesday, some time in the month of Choyte last, I returned from Ranaghaut. In the afternoon I went into my lodging in the said factory, where I found Harro and Cally Khaun, both sleeping, and I asked them the reason of their being there; they said that they had been flogged for a trifling fault, and they would not therefore serve the gentleman any longer. I eat my victuals, and went to watch Mr. Gardiner's bungalow, leaving them in the lodging. On the next morning, at about four gurries, I returned to my lodging, and when I saw Harro and Cally Khan, Harro was asking for water, whilst laying on his back. He appeared to be very sick. He vomited twice in my presence, and stooled once, and soiled the place; I went and informed the Dewan Sree Harry Bose of the circumstance; and stated to him, we were not able to take our victuals, owing to Harro's having dirted the room. The Dewan desired me to represent it to the gentleman, as they refused to go away until their wages were paid to them. The gentleman at this time was at Jadoolepore factory; I mentioned the circumstance to Mr. Gardiner, and the gentleman said he would come in the next day and settle the business; and in the mean time he desired me to tell Harro to go home. About two prohor and a half I returned to my lodging, where I found Harro and Damoo; Harro seemed in the same state I had left him, and Damoo was giving him some water from beaten rice. I went and took my victuals, and then I proceeded to watch the bungalow. About a prohor of the night remaining, Hessandy, peada, came and informed me that Harro would not live, and he requested of me to go and see him. I went, and felt his pulse, and found him dead; Cally Khawn and Damoo went away to their houses. I put some oil in the lamp, and fastened the door of the room, and returned back to my post. On the next morning, Friday, a little after sunrise, Mr. Gardiner came to the factory, when we informed him of the death of Harro; the gentleman seemed very much surprised at it. He went and looked at the corpse; about four or six dondo in the morning, the buxey, or mohorir of the thannah, came, accompanied by a number of others, and surrounded the bungalow, seized me, and kept me at a distance. The gentleman was deprived of his breakfast on that morning. Some time after the thannah Jemadar came, and proceeded to take a view of the corpse. The gentleman requested of the buxey to take down the soorotehaul in the room; the buxey refused, and ordered the corpse out; whereupon two persons, Shekh Lobahdy held both hands of the deceased, and Buxoy both of the legs, and dragged the corpse out into a plain, near the door of the room, and then a view of the body was taken. In the course of examination I observed six or seven strokes, as of a rattan, upon the back of the deceased. The skin of the right posterior had been rubbed off; this, I suppose, was done by the dragging of the corpse from the room to the outside, over the planks, coah, gravels, &c. The buxey then proceeded to take depositions from them. I, and the others, were taken to the thannah, from whence we were sent before the magistrate, Mr. Eliot, who took down our depositions, and sent us to Calcutta.

No. 5. Further Extracts from Bengal Judicial Cons. 20 July 1810:— Offences committed in the interior of the Country.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me,
(Signed) C. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

The mark of ⋈
Moozdeen Sirdar.

(A true copy.)
(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

(Signed) J. Gonsalves, Int^r.

The Information and Deposition of Jungly, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the ninth day of June 1810; who, on his oath, saith; I am a chowkeedar, attached to the indigo factory of Mr. Kelso, situated at Juddoonotpore, in zillah Krishneegore. On a Thursday, about three months ago, I came to the above factory, from Ryjolpore factory, at dusk, and went to the lodgings allowed to me and other chowkedars, where I saw Harro, the deceased, lying down, and Callay Khawn, Damoo Harro's brother-in-law, Gobindhone, Manick, and Harrawn Chow keedar; upon seeing them at the lodging, I asked Calley Khawn, what had brought them there? Cally Khawn replied, that they would not serve the gentleman, meaning Mr. Gardiner, any longer; while I was talking to Calley Khawn, Harro, whose face was covered with a cloth, uncovered it, and I asked him the same question as I had put to Cally Khawn. Harro replied, that he would not serve the gentleman any longer, because he beats us frequently for mere trifles. Harro frequently desired Damoo, his brother-in-law, to lift him up; and called for water to drink as often as he sat down; he was supported by Damoo. I saw, during the time I was there, that Harro vomited twice. I asked Harro, why he drank so frequently? Harro said, he could not help it, because he found himself very thirsty, and that he had vomited, and had a looseness. After this I had no further talk with Harro, but left him with his brother-in-law Damoo, who was attending upon him, and taking care of him. I went and took my victuals, and retired to my duty of guarding the store godown and the washerman's house. About two and a half prohor of the night I heard a noise proceeding from the mouth of the deceased, as if he was in convulsions. I desired Damoo to feel Harro's body, whether he had expired; Damoo felt his body, and said the body was cold. I called Hessandy Peon to come and see what was the matter with Harro. Hessandy came, and saw Harro, and said, he is dead. Hessandy desired me to go the cutcherry, or office, and inform Tavildar, cash keeper, of the circumstance. I went away, leaving Harraun in my room. I went and brought the cash-keeper, who saw Harro from a distance; before whom Hessandy said, Harro is gone, or dead; when I returned with the cash-keeper, I did not find Harrawn. I got alarmed, being alone in the room where the corpse was; I therefore went to the gentleman's bungalow, and remained there. At day-light, I went into the village to make some tobacco, and shortly after returned, and went to Moozdeen, chowkeedar of the bungalow, and told him him that I was going to my own house at Carnyado; Moozdeen said, go; and I went to my house, and saw nothing further. I was not present at the investigation, nor have I seen the corpse of the deceased, either before or after his death, consequently I am not able to say in what state it was.

The mark of
⋈
Jungley.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me,
(Signed) C. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy) (Signed) J. Gonsalves, Int^r.
(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

The Information and Deposition of Harrawn, taken before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace, in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the ninth day of June 1810; who, on his oath, saith; I am a chowkeedar, in the service of Mr. Kelso. On a Friday, about three months ago, I came to Juddoonotpore factory, from another factory, upon my master's business; I reached this factory at about two gurries at night; I went to the lodgings allotted to the chowkedars in the said factory, and there I saw Callay Khawn, Harro the deceased, Damoo, Gobordhone, Cayborto, and Manick; I asked Callay Khawn what was the matter with him, and the others; Callay Khawn replied, that the gentleman, Mr. Gardiner, beat him; I then took my victuals and went to shop; about twelve o'clock at night, Jungley, another chowkeedar, awoke me, and directed me to keep chowkee or watch, at the lodging and cutcherry or sircar's office; I got up, and proceeded to do my duty; six dondo of the night remaining, I heard from some one in the lodging, that Harro was dead; I went into the room where the corpse lay, and saw him dead and laying upon a mat: the moment that Harro was dead, the dewan, whose name I do not know, gave me a letter, and ordered me to go to another factory, and to give it to Mr. Gardiner. I went and delivered the letter to Mr. Gardiner at the factory; and I took leave of the dewan of this factory, and went to my own house at Bomny. At the time I mounted guard, I did not consider Harro, the deceased, as my prisoner, nor had I any instruction by my predecessor, about him; I did not even see what kind of beating Callay and Harro had received, nor did Callay Khawn describe it to me; I had no conversation with Harro, but before I had taken my meal, I saw Harro very uneasy and restless: Damoo, a brother-in-law, attended upon him; he frequently called for water; I likewise saw him vomiting three times; I did not see him taken out of the room; I was much fatigued myself, and took my victuals and went to sleep; I was not present when tannah people went there to make investigation. This is all I know.

The mark of
⋈
Harrawn.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me,
(Signed) C. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)
(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk. (Signed) J. Gonsalves, Int^r.

The Information and Deposition of Thomas Paye, taken before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the twelfth day of June 1810; who, on his oath, saith; I am an assistant at Mr. Farrel's academy; I have known Mr. Gardiner nearly six years: he was formerly a midshipman and master's mate on board of His Majesty's ship Trident; since my acquaintance with him, he has frequently spoke to me of his family and connections in the United Kingdom, and that he himself was born in Ireland, though I do not know of what county he is.

(Signed) Thos. Paye.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me,
(Signed) C. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)
(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

The Examination of Thomas Gardiner, taken before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the 12th day of June 1810.

THE said Examinant being charged on the oaths of Tuektee Beeva, Callay Khawn, Nobye Haneef, Damo Gawzy, Manick Gawzy, Moozdeen Sirdar Jungley, and Hurraun, with the wilful murder of Harro; and the said Examinant being duly interrogated, says, I am not guilty of the above charge.

(Signed) Thos. Gardiner.

Taken the day and year first above written, before me,
(Signed) C. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy)
(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

No. 5.

Further Extracts from Bengal Judicial Cons. 20 July 1810.—Offences committed in the interior of the Country.

DEPOSITIONS in the Case of Mr. THOMAS CLARKE.

THE Information and Deposition of Hoolaus Mundle, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the twelfth day of June 1809; who on his oath, saith; I am the son of Mooncoor Bismas, late of Nundenpore, in zillah Purneah; I am also an inhabitant of the aforesaid place. On Saturday, on the day of the full moon, in the month of Ppos last, the date I cannot recollect, my father came home on foot, as usual, from his duty as a teshildar, in the service of Surdharam Cayet, a talookdaur, of Mirpore, in the district of Purneah, at about a phurr of the day remaining, and told me, that he had been very much beaten by Mr. Clarke, because he had refused to receive advance for indigo plants. I know Mr. Clarke, and have seen him often at Cawhyah, in the district of Purneah, at his indigo factory; the European here present is the same Clarke; when my father mentioned to me his having been beaten, I immediately examined him with my hands, and both felt and observed swellings and contusions about one of his temples, his neck, breast, and both of his thighs, and a bruise below one of the calf of his legs; the situation he was in, and the pains in consequence felt, arose, as he said, from the treatment of Mr. Clarke; my father also said, that Dhroop Sing, Mr. Clarke's dewan, gave him four rupees in cash, and two cows valued at nine rupees, as an advance for indigo plants; my father desired me to take the four rupees, and to go before the magistrate of the district, and prefer a complaint in the fouzdarry court against Mr. Clark, in a regular way; and if he should get better, that he would hire a horse and go to Purneah himself; I begged my father to eat something; he said he could not swallow any thing, nor sit up, and besides which, he found himself very restless; upon his expressing himself to be so very unwell, I did not leave him, but continued sitting alongside of him until about the hour of midnight, when he became speechless and fell into convulsions, and began to throw out blood from the mouth and nose; at about two gurries of the night remaining my father died; one gurrey before my father died, I sent Atma and Onoop to inform Mr. Clarke that my father could not live; when Atma and Onoop returned, they informed me that they met Mr. Clarke coming to see my father, and that when they gave him the information of my father's death, Mr. Clarke said, "my going is of no use," and he returned home; No sooner I found my father had expired, than I sent Nunnoo, another person, to inform Mr. Clarke that my father was dead; on the next morning at sunrise, I, with the assistance of fifteen or sixteen other persons, took up the dead body of my father and carried it to Purneah, in order to make a complaint against Mr. Clarke, but in the way I took the dead body of my father into the factory of Mr. Clarke, at Cawbyah, and represented the circumstances, and at the same time I observed, that my father had died in consequence of the beating he had received from him; Mr. Clarke paid no attention to my statement; he got into a buggy, and went to another factory at Phurkyee, which is at the distance of one full coss; upon seeing no kind of regard paid to us, I and my comrades took up the body, and followed him to Phurkya factory, and preserving a due distance from the factory, lodged the dead body on the ground, and waited for Mr. Clark, as I observed his buggy standing on the road; shortly afterwards, Mr. Clarke came out of the Phurkya factory and got into his buggy, and was proceeding towards Purneah; at a short distance from the last-mentioned factory, I laid hold of the bridle of the horse and expostulated with him, when, instead of his hearing me, he gave me a cut with his buggy whip; I did not for all that quit my hold of the bridle of the horse, but secured the bridle with my cloth, and, with the assistance of some of my comrades, I began to lead the horse towards Purneah; while Mr. Clarke continued in the buggy, at the distance of about a coss he dismounted from the buggy, and endeavoured to make his escape; I, with the assistance of my comrades, secured Mr. Clarke with our hands, and I requested him to get into the buggy; Mr. Clarke heard us, and got into the buggy, and on the next morning after sunrise we reached Purneah, and Mr. Clarke wrote a note and dispatched it to Mr. Cornish, the magistrate; shortly after, the magistrate sent some peons to conduct Mr. Clarke before him; I and my comrades, with the body, proceeded to the cutcherry, as directed by the magistrate's peons; sometime afterwards, the magistrate and Mr. Clarke came to the cutcherry, when the magistrate, with his darogah, examined the corpse, in the presence of several other European gentlemen, and on the same day the magistrate took down my deposition, and allowed me to put the corpse into the Ganges; before this was done, the magistrate proposed to me to cut open the corpse, to see what cause led to the death of my father; I remonstrated against it, saying I should lose my cast if it was done; I do not know if Mr. Clarke was put into confinement, because I did not see any person over him; on the eighth day of my arrival at Purneah, I was ordered by the magistrate to go to my house; I went and performed my father's sraud, or funeral obsequies, and after some days I was sent for again, and further examined; about a month and a half ago, I and the other witnesses were sent for, and ordered to proceed to Calcutta, under charge of two peons; Munkhondee, Mr. Clarke's dewan, in the presence of two witnesses, offered me a sum of money to settle the matter, with several other promises, such as making a rich man and his dewan, all of which I refused, and now only seek for justice.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me,

(Signed) C. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

The

The Information and Deposition of Almah Mundle, taken upon oath before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the twelfth day of June 1809; who on his oath; saith, I am a peasant, and an inhabitant of Nimdenpore in zillah Purneah. One day of the full moon remaining, in the month of Poose last, on a Saturday morning, I went to receive advances from Mr. Clark, at his factory in Cabyah in zillah Purneah, and where I saw Monpoor the deceased. A dispute arose between Dhroop Sing and Mr. Clark's sircars, about the price of a pair of bullocks, and for which reason Monpoor refused to receive any advance himself, until he had consulted with Surdoe his employer and others, and rose up to go away. Dhroop Sing sent for him, and told him that he must receive advance, and desired him to set down until he had mentioned it to Mr. Clark. Dhroop Sing went and spoke something to Mr. Clark. Mr. Clark came out of his bungalow, and gave five or seven blows with his clenched fist, upon Monpoor's temple, neck, face, and other parts of his body, when Monpoor fell down on the ground; and then I saw Mr. Clark give Monpoor two or three kicks with the fore part of his foot. Mr. Clark had shoes on at the time, similar to those generally worn by gentlemen. I observed the kicks to strike about the thighs and private parts of Monpoor. I picked up Monpoor's turban when he fell down, and I gave it to him afterwards. Caroo Mundle began to call out "Doal, Doal," and Mr. Clark ordered his servants to seize him, when Mr. Clark went into his bungalow and brought out a whip in order to beat Caroo Mundle; but when Caroo Mundle was brought before him he did not beat him, because Carroo Mundle promised to receive advance. During this time Monpoor got up, and was going towards his house, I saw Munkhondee, Mr. Clark's duwan, go up to Monpoor, and brought him back with some flattering words, and made him receive advance. Moonpoor received four rupees in cash, and two bullocks valued at nine, in the whole thirteen rupees. Monpoor requested of me to conduct the bullocks he had taken to his house; I consented, and he went away. Shortly after, I went and conducted the bullocks, and in the way I met with his children, and told them to take the bullocks to Monpoor's, as they were brought by him; they took the bullocks away, and I went home. Before daybreak in the next morning, some of Monpoor's relations came to my house, and requested of me to go and acquaint Mr. Clark, that Monpoor could not live. I accordingly got myself ready, and almost instantly proceeded, and went to the factory at Phurkger, and informed Mr. Clark of the situation in which Monpoor was. Mr. Clark said he would go and see Monpoor, and got his buggy ready, and he proceeded in it; and I told him, that I could not run by the side of his buggy. Mr. Clark desired me to remain, and follow him. In the way, I met with Nunnoo, who informed me that Monpoor was dead. I observed Mr. Clark had gone into Cabyah factory; I went and informed him, that Monpoor was dead. Mr. Clark said, he could not help it. I went to Monpoor's house, and saw him lying dead. Shortly afterwards, I and the deceased's son, and several others, took up the corpse, with a resolution to take it to Purneah, and prefer a complaint against Mr. Clark. In the way, at a place called Khurentta we met with Mr. Clark, when Hollan's, the deceased's son, and some others, secured him; and the son said, "Sir, you have killed my father, and I shall not suffer you to run "away, but will deliver you over to the magistrate; and likewise, I will produce the corpse "of my deceased father before that gentleman." Mr. Clark once dismounted from the buggy, and attempted to run away, when the son of the deceased secured him, and repeated what I have already stated, that he would not suffer him to escape. Mr. Clark seeing no alternative, went into the buggy, and suffered himself to be conducted until he was taken charge of by the magistrate, Mr. Cornish, at Purneah, who examined the corpse of the deceased, and took down my deposition; and after some time I was sent down to Calcutta with others. The European now here present, Mr. Clark, is the very person who beat Monpoor in the manner I have described. I saw Monpoor a day before this occurrence took place, when he appeared to be in perfect good health.

The mark of
⋈
Almah Mundle.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me,
(Signed) C. F. Martyn, Magistrate.
(A true Copy.) (Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

The Information and Deposition of Caurroo Mundle, taken upon oath, before me Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the twelfth day of June 1809; who on his oath saith; I am a peasant, and live at Nundinpore in zillah Purneah. One day of the full moon remaining, in the month of Poose last, on a Saturday, in the morning, I accompanied Monpoor Biswas to Mr. Clark's factory, situated at Cunbyah in the above zillah, in order to receive advance for indigo plants. I, and Monpoor, on our arrival at the factory, went to Dhroop Sing, Mr. Clark's sircar, who requested us to receive fresh advances; upon which Monpoor Biswas said he had no bullocks to plough his ground, and therefore he could not receive fresh advance. Dhroop Sing sircar said, take bullocks from the sircar, meaning from Mr. Clark. Dhroop Sing sircar desired me to go and bring two bullocks from a number that were grazing in a field near to the factory. I accordingly went and brought two bullocks before Dhroop Sing sircar, who said the value of them was ten rupees; upon which Monpoor replied, that they were not worth more than seven, or at the most eight rupees. Dhroop Sing sircar said he would not take less than ten rupees. Monpoor refused taking the bullocks. Dhroop Sing sircar then offered Monpoor money. Monpoor said he could not take money, until he had consulted his son and Surdharam Cayet his employer. Dhroop Sing sircar told Monpoor, "You shall not be allowed to go away from here until you receive advance." In this interval, Mr. Clark came out of his bungalow, and went near Dhroop Sing sircar, and asked him the reason of the people's making a noise; upon which Dhroop Sing sircar told Mr. Clark, "Sir, Monpoor does not wish to receive advance." Mr. Clark also asked Monpoor the reason of his refusing to take advance; Monpoor said he could not receive any until he had consulted his son. Monpoor was then standing very near Mr. Clark, who upon hearing Monpoor's refusing to receive the advance, he, Mr. Clark, began to beat him with his clenched fist, about Monpoor's face, neck, and head; and Mr. Clark also kicked him about Monpoor's legs and private parts, which brought Monpoor instantly flat on his back to the ground; and while he was lying in this condition, I saw Mr. Clark give him a kick, which struck him on the private parts. Monpoor, upon receiving the kick, began to cry out "Father, Father." I began to cry out, "Daac Company, Daac Company," and ran at a distance. Mr. Clark gave orders to his servants to lay hold of him, when about seven or eight of them came and seized and carried me before Mr. Clark; and Mr. Clark brought out a whip to strike me with, but he did not do so, and he asked the reason for my making a noise. Mr. Clark after this, went into the bungalow, and I went away to my house, leaving Monpoor in the aforesaid factory. On the same evening, about one pohore, or eight o'clock, I went to the house of Monpoor, in order to see him; when I got into the house, I saw Monpoor laying down on a mat, and I told him to take his victuals. Monpoor said he could not, because he was not able to swallow any thing, and that he found his liver bursting. On Friday, the day before he was beaten, I saw him take his victuals as usual, twice, once in the morning and once in the evening; and besides which, he appeared to me to be in very good health. I left him and went to my own mansion, which is situated very near to that of Monpoor; very early, before daylight, I heard Monpoor's sons, Hoolans and Coskie, crying; I went and saw Monpoor in convulsions and bleeding much from his nose and mouth, and he expired at daybreak. On the following morning, I accompanied Monpoor's corpse, with several others, and carried it to Purneah; and in the way, at Khurentta, we saw Mr. Clark going in a buggy towards Purneah. Hoolans, the eldest son of the deceased, upon seeing him, secured him, by laying hold of the bridle of the horse, when I saw Mr. Clark give Hoolans a cut with the buggy whip he had in his hand at the time; nevertheless, Hoolans and Coskie, another person that was with us, secured the horse with their cloaths, by tying their cloaths with the bridle, and in this manner they led the horse, while Mr. Clark continued in the buggy. On the Monday following, in the morning, we arrived at Purneah, Mr. Clark in the way, once dismounted from the buggy, and attempted to run away; but the sons of the deceased and some others prevented his escaping; and when he saw no alternative he got into the buggy, and suffered it to be led until we arrived at Purneah, and delivered him over to the magistrate. Mr. Cornish, who examined the corpse, and took my deposition, and some time afterwards sent us to Calcutta. The European here present is Mr. Clark; and he is the same person that beat Monpoor at his factory at Cunbyah, as I have before described. I have every reason to suppose Monpoor died in consequence of the beating he had received from Mr. Clark; because I saw him throw up much blood from his mouth and nose; and besides, the deceased complained to me that he could not swallow any thing, and that he felt pains about his neck, breast, and other parts of his body.

No. 5. Further Extracts from Bengal Judicial Cons. 20 July 1810:— Offences committed in the interior of the Country.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me.

(Signed) C. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.) (Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

The Information and Deposition of Tillokee Mundle, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the fifth day of June 1809; who, on his oath saith; I am an inhabitant of Nundunpore, in zillah Purneah, and following the occupation of a peasant. One Saturday morning in the month of Poose last, the date I cannot recollect, in consequence of a message which I received from Mr. Clark's servant, to come and take advance, I, Atma Monpoor Mundul, and Cawroo Mundul, went to Mr. Clark's indigo factory, situated at Cawbyah in the above zillah; we went to Dhroop Sing, Mr. Clark's sirkar, who desired us to wait a little, that he would give us our advances. One ghurry after we went to Munkhurdhe Mundul, a person in the service of Mr. Clark, who also desired us to wait for one ghurry, and that he would see our advances given to us. About half a ghurry after this conversation, Monpoor Mundle went to Dhroop Sing sirkar, who desired Monpoor to choose two bullocks, and take them to him; Monpoor and Atma remained by the sircar, I and Cawroo Mundle went to the place where a number of bullocks belonging to Mr. Clark commonly graze in a field, and brought three into the factory, two for Monpoor, and one for myself. In the way I met Munkhurdhe Mundul, who asked me the reason and by whose order I was taking the bullocks away; I answered, that the sirkar had desired me to take two bullocks before him; upon which I left the one, and carried two before the sircar, who said to Monpoor, the price of them is ten rupees. Monpoor offered to give eight rupees for them; the sircar refused to let him have them for that price; upon which I and the other person before mentioned, took our leave of the sircar, and said, we were going to our houses. The sircar said he would not suffer us to go away, unless we received advances and executed bonds for the same; Monpoor observed to the sircar, that he used to receive advances in the month of Assum (September) why now in Poose (December) and he refused to receive the advance, until he had seen his ground. The sircar went and informed Mr. Clark, who said to Monpoor, "you must take your advance to-day." Monpoor refused, as before; upon which Mr. Clark gave Monpoor five or six blows with his his clinched fist about Monpoor's face and neck. On receiving the blows, Monpoor fell down on the ground, when I saw Mr. Clark likewise give to Monpoor two or three kicks with the fore part of his foot; he then had on shoes. I and my comrades that went with me on seeing Mr. Clark beating Monpoor, began to cry out, "Doie sahebka, doie sahebka;" when Mr. Clark asked the sircar who we were. The sircar said, that we were Monpoor's brother's; then Mr. Clark gave orders to some of his peons to lay hold of Cawroo Mundul, and bring him before him, Mr. Clark; Cawroo Mundul was seized and taken before Mr. Clarke; I likewise followed him, and assigned the reasons of our crying out for mercy, that is, because he had beat Monpoor Mundul. Monpoor Mundul was going away, when Munkhundhee, Mr. Clark's mundul, went up to him, and entreated of him very much with flattering words, to receive his advances; whereupon Monpoor Mundul came and received four rupees in cash, and two bullocks which had been valued at nine rupees, in all making thirteen rupees; and on the receipt of them he executed a Bengal bond, as usual. Monpoor and Atma went away from the factory, and I remained for one ghurry, and went away to my house after dusk. On the same night, after I had taken my victuals, I went to the house of Monpoor, which is at a short distance from mine. I found Monpoor lying on a mat, and his victuals ready; I requested of him to take his victuals, when he mentioned to me, that he found himself unwell, and his throat so swollen, that he could not swallow any thing; this, he said, was in consequence of the beating he has received from the sahib, meaning Mr. Clark. I remained with Monpoor for a short time, and went to my house. On the third day I was informed of Monpoor's death. I was afterwards taken to Purneah, before the magistrate, where I gave my deposition. I did not see the corpse of Monpoor. The European here present is called Mr. Clark, and he is the person that beat and kicked Monpoor in the manner I have before described.

The mark of ✕

Sworn the day and year before written, before me, Tillokee Mundle.

(Signed) C. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

DEPOSITIONS in the Case of JAMES TICHBORNE.

THE Information and Deposition of Ram Golaum, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the fourteenth day of June 1809; who on his oath, saith; I have been in the service of Mr. Tichborne for five years past, as a gomastah, and continued in this capacity until the month of Assim, or September 1808, when, one day in that month, which I do not recollect, I was put under the charge of a peon of Mr. Tichborne's, and kept in his house until the next day, when Mr. Tichborne sent me under charge of a peon, named Seetoram, belonging to the court of the magistrate Mr. Ahmuty, under an accusation of having made away with four thousand five hundred and seventy-two rupees. The magistrate called upon me to give an answer to Mr. Tichborne's complaint. I presented a petition to the Court, that an aumeen might be deputed to examine my accounts. The magistrate did not comply with my request, but sent two office peons with me back to Mr. Tichborne's house, to prepare my accounts, and then bring them to him; I accordingly returned to Mr. Tichborne's house, and desired his sircar, Raghoobunse Lall to make out the accounts. Mr. Tichborne would not permit him to do so, but beat him with his fist, and kicked him. In consequence of this treatment, the nephew of Raghoobunse Lall presented a dhurkhaust to Mr. Ahmuty, and another chuprasy was sent from the Court to prevent Mr. Tichborne from beating the persons who were preparing the accounts. During the time the accounts were preparing (about a month) I was kept under constraint in the bungalow of Mr. Tichborne, with the peons over me by day, and Mr. Tichborne's people by night. At last the accounts were got ready, and on Mr. Tichborne seeing that there was a balance in my favour, he ordered a number of his people, consisting of sepoys and others, to take charge of me, and to conduct me into his boat, which lay at Dum Duma ghaut, at Chomckpore, about a coss distant from his bungalow. I remonstrated with Mr. Tichborne, and represented, that as I had given security to the Court, and the accounts were ready, I was desirous to go before the Court. He said, "Do you wish to have your employment? I will not discharge you at present, and will expend two thousand rupees to take away your life." This was in the presence of Seetaram, chuprasy, Emaum Ally, or Emaumbaux, chuprasy, Basout Lall, Roghooburse Lall, Jaddoopersaud, and Kullot. The chuprasies said to Mr. Tichborne, "you are taking Ram Gholaum to Rajpore, what orders do you give to us?" Mr. Tichborne replied, I am taking him to Rajpore, do you go also. The chuprasies replied, we cannot go without the Judge's order. Mr. Tichborne then said, "what, are you talking about the Judge's order? You may go away." This was about the middle of Cattick, I do not recollect the particular date. Mr. Tichborne ordered me to be taken from the bungalow to Dhoom Dhooma ghaut, at Gorruckpore, where I was put on board an oulac. He himself came there shortly afterwards, and got into the boat, and we proceeded to Rajpore; four days after leaving Dhoom Dhooma ghaut we reached Rajpore, the distance being about twenty coss. At Rajpore, Mr. Tichborne desired me to procure him some dandies. I answered, that being in confinement, I could not procure any; whereupon Mr. Tichborne gave me several blows with his fists, and kicked me, and threw me

No. 5. Further Extracts from Bengal Judicial Cons. 20 July 1810:—Offences committed in the interior of the Country.

me down; afterwards he tied me up by the hands to one of the bamboos which supported a pal or sail, as a cover which he had pitched on the bank of the river near the ghaut, at Rajpore. When I was tied up to the bamboo, Mr. Tichborne pulled my mustachios violently; then took a walking cane and threatened to poke into my face, but did not strike me with it. I remained tied up to the bamboo, as I have described, for about four gurries, or about an hour and a half. He then untied me, and sent me on board the boat which lay at the ghaut. On the following day, the boats set off from Rajpore, and were proceeding to Calcutta; when we had proceeded about two coss, one of Mr. Tichborne's boats sunk. There were sixty boats laden with timbers, which Mr. Tichborne then desired to be anchored for the night. He then sent for me, and desired that I would pull the tow rope of his budgerow along with the dandies. Ojoodya Persand, and Raghoobunse Lall, were also desired to pull the tow rope of the budgerow; and Mr. Tichborne said to us, it is through the fault of you three that the boat has sunk; when Mr. Tichborne's budgerow arrived in the evening, at the place where the boat had sunk, Mr. Tichborne had sent me, Ojaadya Pursand, and Raghoobunse Lall, to drag the boat which had sunk; and we went into the water up to the middle, and endeavoured to drag the boat on shore, but were not able; night coming on, she was left there, and Mr. Tichborne kept us three in the same boat, with our wet clothes on, under charge of chuprasies; we remained sitting upon one of the four beams which were laid across the boat for the purpose of fastening the timbers to, all three wrapt in one blanket. It was very cold, and we continued there without victuals, and under charge of a chowkedar named Cutloot, who was sent in a dingy to watch us, that we might not make our escape. We were landed on the next morning, and after changing our clothes and taking some refreshment, we proceeded to Bhagulpore, where another boat sunk, and Mr. Tichborne again sent for me, and desired me to bring a boat in the room of the second boat which had sunk. I represented to him that I was in confinement on board the boat, and had no charge of any thing, how could I bring a boat? He then gave me one blow with his clenched fist in the cheek, and put me in charge of one of his sepoys. Two or three days afterwards, we arrived at Darraly, where Mr. Tichborne forcibly took possession of all my papers and accounts, and then he beat me with a rope. Mr. Tichborne went away, leaving me in charge of Mr. Robinson and Ram Sing, chuprasy, who conducted me from village to village; and when we arrived at Revel Gunge, a chuprasy of Mr. Ferguson, the magistrate of Chupra, and Mr. Tichborne, came on board of the boat where I was detained, and Mr. Tichborne delivered me over to the chuprasy of Mr. Ferguson, who took me before that gentleman on the third day, where I was maintained at the expense of that gentleman, and he took down my deposition, and sent me to Benares; Cuttoah, one of Mr. Tichborne's chuprasies, was placed over me at the time of leaving Goruckpore, and in whose custody I remained until I was brought to Durraly. I was put into the charge of Ram Sing, another peon of Mr. Tichborne, who brought me from thence to Revil Gunge, from whence I was taken, by the magistrate's peon, to Chupra.

Signed by Ram Gholaum.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me,

(Signed) Chas F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

The Information and Deposition of Sookhloll Sookul, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the Town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the fourteenth day of July 1809; who, on his oath, saith; That I am an hurcara, a Brahmin by cast, and native of Jillalpore, in zillah Mozufferpore, within Soobha Behar. I have been little more than a year in the employ of Mr. James Tichborne, timber merchant, at Billeher in sircar Sarun, under the Sooba Behar, in the capacity of a hurcara. I know Ramgolam; he is Mr. Tichborne's gomastah. In Cartick (October) last, Mr. Tichborne went to Goruckpore in zillah Goruckpore, in Soola Oude, under the English dominions, in order to institute a suit against his gomastah, Ramgolaum, who lived at Gorruckpore aforesaid, and I accompanied Mr. Tichborne. He instituted a suit in Cartick (October) last, for five thousand five hundred and seventy-two rupees, against Ramgolum, before the Judge at Goruckpore, charging Ramgolaum with having made away with this sum, and Ramgolum being sent for, while the Court moonshee was interpreting to Ramgolam, I understood that Mr. Tichborne wanted of the Judge either to cause Ramgolum to pay the money, or to put him in confinement; and that the Judge replied, that he could do neither, unless an investigation was made; and Ramgolum entered into particulars of the purchases he made for Mr. Tichborne, in his defence; whereupon the Judge directed a chuprassy, named Sitarum, to go with Ramgolum and see that the accounts of the mootsuddies of both the parties were compared, and to bring them to the Court; eight days after this, when the accounts were got ready, Mr. Tichborne directed his chuprassy, Catlay Khan, to carry Ramgolum to a budgerow on the Raplee, the Goruckpore river; upon which Sitarum, the Judge's chuprassy, said to Mr. Tichborne, I was deputed to have the accounts compared and closed; they are done so; you have directed that Ramgolum be carried to the budgerow. What do you direct me to do? Mr. Tichborne said, you will also go with me, I am going to Rajpore; the chuprassy said, get me orders from the Judge to go with you, and I will do so; upon which Mr. Tichborne said, I do not know intricate words (oolta poolta lat) about the Judge, go away; and Sitarum went away; and the same day Mr. Tichborne set off for Rajpore in the above Goruckpore zillah, and Ramgolum likewise proceeded in another boat; we arrived at

Rajpore

Rajpore in about eight days, and on the day following our arrival at Mulla (a dundee) of a boat laden with timbers ran away, upon which Mr. Tichborne sent for Ramgolum, and required him to produce the mulla; he replied, you have confined me, from whence can I bring the mulla? upon which Mr. Tichborne struck Ramgolum with his clenched fist, kicked him, and pulled him by his whiskers, and bound him to the post of a temporary shed, which had been erected to keep off the sun for Mr Tichborne's convenience, and Ramgolum continued bound to the post for about two gurries; after which I was directed to untie him, and Kulloot hircara to watch over him on board the oolack; on the morning following, I was directed to go with the boats under my charge, and advance before the rest, and arrived at Bhaugalpore in the above zillah Goruckpore, after two days. After my arrival, Mr. Tichborne also arrived with the other boats. A boat had sunk one day before Mr. Tichborne's arrival, and he came and sent for Ramgolum, and required him to give a boat, instead of the one which had sunk; Ramgolum replied, he could not, as he had been all along in confinement; upon which Mr. Tichborne flew into a passion, and beat Ramgolum with his double fist. After this circumstance I went on the boats of which I had the charge, and thence proceeded to Darrowly in Sircar Sarim, within Soola Behar, from whence I came to Revil Gunge, in the above Soola Behar. I did not see any further ill-treatment received by Ramgolum, than what I have already related.

(Signed in the Nagree character, by the witness.)

Sworn the day and year before written, before me,

(Signed) Charles F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)

(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

The Information and Deposition of Kulloot, taken upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace, in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the 13th day of June 1809; who, on his oath saith; I am an hircara, and a native of Hansoopore, in the town of Gorruckpore, in zillah Gorruckpore, in Sooba Oude, in the English dominions. In October last I entered into the service of Mr. James Tichborne, in the capacity of a hircara, at Gorruckpore aforesaid, where Mr. Tichborne had come upon some business; about twenty days after I had been in his employment he directed, one day, his hircara, Giridharee, and a sepoy in his service, named Bhowanee, in my presence, to take Ramgolaum, his gomasta, into custody, and carry him on board a boat which was on the Gorruckpore river, called the Ruptee, upon which Ramgolaum said to Mr. Tichborne, you have had my accounts and papers explained to you, why will you ruin you? to which Mr. Tichborne replied, you want to get released; I will spend two thousand rupees, and take your life away, by dissolving you (gullae kemarda lega); after these words, Ramgolaum was taken to the boat by the two above-mentioned persons; I continued standing at the door of Mr. Tichborne's bungalow at Gorruckpore aforesaid, when Sitaram, a chuprassy in the employment of the Judge of Gorruckpore, said to Mr. Tichborne, "What are your orders as to me?" Mr. Tichborne said, I am going to Rajpore, do you also come along with me; the chuprassy Sitaram said, if you get the Judge's order I will go; to which Mr. Tichborne said, go away; I do not know the Judge, and the chuprassy went away; on the day following, Mr. Tichborne got on board of another boat, and went to Rajpore, for which place I also set off by land the same day, and arrived at Rajpore, which is about twenty coss from Gorruckpore, in the above zillah of Goruckpore, after two days, and staid there for two days more, waiting Mr. Tichborne's arrival; and four days after his coming there, a mulla of a boat laden with timbers, belonging to Mr. Tichborne, ran away; upon which Mr. Tichborne sent for Ramgolaum aforesaid, from the boat where he was in custody, and required Ram Gholam to produce the mulla, Ram Gholam said, I have been in confinement; where can I bring the mulla from? whereupon Mr. Tichborne knocked Ram Gholam down, bound him to the post of a temporary shed, which had been made with boat sails to keep off the sun for Mr. Tichborne's use, and began pulling his whiskers, and menaced him with a rattan which Mr. Tichborne held in his hand, but did not strike him with it; some few days after this, I cannot say how many, Mr. Tichborne and all of us set off from Rajpore, and proceeded the distance of about two coss in the Gorrukpore zillah, when a boat laden with timbers grounded on a shoal; Mr. Tichborne made all his people, as also the said Ram Gholam, and one Ojaadea Persaud, and one Raghoo Bungsee Lall, pull the boat the whole day, in order to extricate it, but which not being effected, Mr. Tichborne directed me to keep the above-named three persons, Ram Gholam, Ojaadea Persaud, and Raghoo Bungsee Lall, in custody, on a dingy, and I, as likewise one Callay Khan, hircara of Mr. Tichborne, kept them under watch the whole night in the dingy, and on the morning following they were put on a large boat under mine and the above Callay Khan's custody, and we proceeded for Bhagulpore, in the above zillah of Gorruckpore, where on our arrival a boat sunk, and Mr. Tichborne had Ram Gholam taken to him, and he beat Ram Gholam with his clenched fist, saying, that the boat had sunk by his means; he then desired Bhowany, sepoy, to take Ram Gholam to the thanna, but the thannadar would not confine him; Chooly Lall, Mr. Tichborne's mutsuddy, went about four gurries afterwards and brought him away; some few days after this, I cannot say how many, but suppose less than a month, we arrived at Durraly, under the chupra jurisdiction in zillah Sarun, within Sooba Behar, and in the evening Mr. Tichborne forcibly took all the papers and accounts from Ram Gholam's mutsuddies, Ojaadea Persaud and Roghoo Bunsee Lall, and also from Choony Lall, Mr. Tichborne's mutsuddy; and the next morning Mr. Tichborne sent for Ram Gholam and his two mutsuddies, and asked them for some paper; I do not know what paper; I do not know what answer was given; but Mr. Tichborne beat Ram Gholam and Raghoo Bunsee Lall with a rope, after which I was relieved by Ram Sing, chuprassy, and Mr. Tichborne sent me to Patna, on a boat laden with timbers.

No. 5. Further Extracts from Bengal Judicial Cons. 20 July 1810:— Offences committed in the interior of the Country.

The mark of ⋈ Kulloot.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before me,
(Signed) C. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)
(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

The Information and Deposition of Bheekook, taken, upon oath, before me, Charles Fuller Martyn, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the town of Calcutta, at Fort William in Bengal, the 14th day of June 1809; who, on his oath, saith; I have been four years in the employment of Mr. Ja[s] Tichborne, timber merchant at Belliher, in Surcar Sarun, within Sooba Behar, in the capacity of a bullock driver; and, before that time, I used to be employed in tillage, and other rural business. I am an Aheer by cast, and native of Cuttar, in zillah Gorruckpore. In Cartick last, when I went for my salary to Gorruckpore, in zillah Gorruckpore, in Sooba Oude, under the English dominions, where Mr. Tichborne had gone, Mr. Tichborne told me, that he could not pay it to me, because Ram Golaum, his gomastah, and Rugbunselall, his mootsuddy, were not at Gorruckpore, but at Rajpore. Two days after this I went to Rajpore; and while I was there, I saw, one day, Mr. Tichborne beat Ram Golaum; when he first kicked, then knocked him down by shoveing him in the neck, and bound him to a post belonging to a shed, which had been erected by Mr. Tichborne; and Ram Golaum continued thus bound for about two ghurries, after which he was untied. Some days after this, I do not know the length of time that had elapsed, we arrived at Derrawly, in Surcar Sarun, within Sooba Behar, where I saw, upon one day, while standing on shore, Mr. Tichborne hold a small written paper in his hand, on board the budgerow, which was at the distance of about twenty or twenty-five cubits from me, and say to Ramgolaum and Rug Cunselott, who were also in the same budgerow, what sort of paper is this? (i.e. Keysa Kajeezhey) shewing the paper to them, and beating them at the same time with a rope; whereupon Ramgolawm said, "I do not know how to read and write; if one was to read it over to me, I could then say what paper it is." Seeing and hearing this, I went away from thence, and did not see any further violence used by Mr. Tichborne on Ramgolaum. Ramgolaum was under confinement, as I saw him at Rajpore aforesaid, and Bhaugulpore in Gorruckpore above mentioned, and at the said Derrowly, always under charge of peons, who watched him at his bathing time, and at other avocations, and necessary calls.

The mark of ⋈ Buhkoopk.

Sworn, the day and year first above written, before me,
(Signed) Cha. F. Martyn, Magistrate.

(A true copy.)
(Signed) A. H. Smith, Head Clerk.

THE Governor General in Council having taken the foregoing cases into mature consideration, resolves, that the licences for residing in the interior of the country, held by the following persons, be withdrawn:

Mr. J. L. Turner.
R. S. Douglas.
T. Gardiner.
T. Clark.

Ordered, That the necessary information be transmitted to the Magistrates of Tirhoot, Sarum, Nuddiah, and Puneah respectively.

Ordered, That the Company's attorney be directed to report, whenever the period of imprisonment to which Mr. Tichborne has been sentenced, may expire. His Lordship in council will then pass such further orders respecting that person as may appear to Government to be proper.

Ordered, That a copy of such parts of the above Depositions, in the case of Mr. Douglas, as relate to the establishment of a haut by Mr. Moran, be transmitted to the Board of Revenue, with directions to make the necessary enquiries on the subject, and report to Government the result.

The

No. 5.

Further Extracts from Bengal Judicial Cons. 20 July 1810:—Offences committed in the interior of the Country.

The following Circular Order was transmitted to the several Magistrates throughout the provinces, on the 13th instant:

(Circular.) To the Magistrates.

Sir,

THE attention of Government has recently been attracted in a particular manner to abuses and oppressions committed by Europeans, who are established as indigo planters in different parts of the country. Numerous as those abuses and oppressions have latterly been, the Right Honourable the Governor General in Council is still willing to hope, that this imputation does not attach to the character of the indigo planters generally, considered as a body or class of people. The facts, however, which have recently been established against some individuals of that class, before the Magistrates and the Supreme Court of Judicature, are of so flagrant a nature, that the Governor General in Council considers it an act of indispensable public duty, to adopt such measures as appear to him, under existing circumstances, best calculated to prevent the repetition of offences, equally injurious to the English character and to the peace and happiness of our native subjects.

The offences to which the following remarks refer, and which have been established beyond all doubt or dispute against individual indigo planters, may be reduced to the following heads:

1st. Acts of violence, which, although they amount not in the legal sense of the word to murder, have occasioned the death of natives.

2d. The illegal detention of the natives in confinement, especially in stocks, with a view to the recovery of balances alleged to be due from them, or for other causes.

3d. Assembling in a tumultuary manner the people attached to their respective factories and others, and engaging in violent affrays with other indigo planters.

4th. Illicit infliction of punishment, by means of a rattan or otherwise, on the cultivators or other natives.

You must, of course, be sensible, that it is your bounden duty to bring every act of violence of the above nature to the knowledge of Government, and under the cognizance of the Supreme Court of Judicature. In order, however, to prevent, as far as depends on the Executive Government, the repetition of any offence of that nature, the Governor General in Council desires, that you will particularly attend to the following instructions:

First. You will take the necessary measures to ascertain without loss of time, whether any of the indigo planters, resident in the district under your charge, keep stocks at their factories; and, if so, you will require them immediately to destroy the stocks. Should any hesitation occur on the part of the indigo planters, in complying with this requisition, you will report the circumstance to Government, when the Governor General in Council will order such person to quit the district, and repair to the Presidency.

Second—Without encouraging vexatious and litigious complaints, you will exert yourself to prevent the practice Government has reason to believe is too prevalent on the part of the indigo planters, of inflicting illegal corporal punishment on the ryots and others. Whenever cases of this nature may occur, which may not appear to be of so aggravated a nature as to form the ground of a criminal prosecution in the Supreme Court of Judicature, you will report the facts to Government, in order that his Lordship in Council may take into his consideration the propriety of withdrawing the licence which the offender may have obtained, for residing in the interior of the country.

Third—As opportunities may arise of personal communication with the indigo planters, you will endeavour to impress on their minds, the firm determination which the Governor General in Council has adopted, not only uniformly to prosecute all offences of the above description, which can properly be brought under the cognizance of the Supreme Court, but likewise to exercise to the utmost extent, the powers possessed by the Governor General in Council, of preventing the residence of any European in the interior of the country, who shall not conform to the spirit of the present resolutions of Government.

Fourth.—Should it occur to you that any other measures can be adopted, calculated for the attainment of the important objects above noticed, you are desired to submit your sentiments on the subject to Government.

I am, &c.

Council Chamber, the 13th July 1810.

(Signed) Geo. Dowdeswell.
Secretary to Government, Judicial Department.

On the 13th instant, Copies of the above Order were transmitted to the Nizamut Adawlut, and to the several Provincial Courts, with directions to afford their aid to the full extent of the legal powers vested in those Courts, in giving effect to the resolutions of Government contained therein.

There

No. 5. Further Extracts from Bengal Judicial Cons. 20 July 1810:— Offences committed in the interior of the Country.

There being grounds to apprehend, that many of the manufacturers of indigo are in the habit of compelling the ryots to receive advances for the cultivation of the indigo plant;

Ordered, That the following Supplementary Orders be transmitted to the several Magistrates throughout the Provinces:

(Circular.) To the Magistrates.

Sirs,

In continuation of the Orders of Government of the 13th instant, I am directed to acquaint you, that the Right Honourable the Governor General in Council has reason to believe, that European indigo planters are in the habit of obliging the ryots who reside in the vicinity of their respective factories, to receive advances, and of adopting other illicit and improper means to compel them to cultivate indigo. You are accordingly directed to report all instances of that nature which may come to your knowledge, and which you may consider to be founded in fact, to the Governor General in Council, in order that Government may take into its consideration the expediency of withdrawing the offender's licence to reside in the interior of the country, and at the same time adopt such other measures as the circumstances of the case may appear to require.

I am, &c.

Council Chamber, the 20th July 1810.

(Signed) Geo. Dowdeswell,
Secretary to Government, Judicial Department.

Ordered, That Copies of the above Supplementary Orders be transmitted to the Nizamut Adawlut, and the several provincial Courts, in continuation of the Orders of the 13th instant.

—No. 6.—

Copy of a LETTER from the Governor General in Council, to the Secret Committee of the Court of Directors, dated 2 November 1807; relating to THE MISSIONARIES.

To the Honourable the SECRET COMMITTEE of the Honourable the Court of Directors.

HONOURABLE SIRS,

WE deem it proper to avail ourselves of the dispatch of the honourable Company's extra ship the General Stuart, to report to your honourable Committee, our Proceedings on the subject of a Pamphlet, printed in the Persian language at the press of the Society of Missionaries established at Serampore; purporting to be an address to all persons professing the Mahomedan religion; which we had reason to apprehend had obtained circulation in the city of Calcutta; and which contained the most direct and unqualified abuse of the principles and tenets of that religion, and of its Founder. After having regularly related the whole course of our proceedings on this occasion, we shall submit to the consideration of your honourable Committee, such remarks in addition to those recorded on our proceedings, as the subject appears to us to render necessary.

2. The pamphlet in question was delivered to the secretary in the secret, political, and foreign departments, by the professor of Arabic and Persian in the College of Fort William, who received it from the chief native preceptor in that department; who stated, that it was put into his hands by the son of a Mogul merchant residing at Calcutta, with a request that he would prepare an Answer to it, with a view to vindicate the credit of their common religion.

3. Enclosed we have the honour to transmit a translation of such parts of the pamphlet, as relate to the character of the Mahomedan religion, and of its Founder. (No. 1.) see page 47, infra.

4. On a perusal of the above-mentioned document, we recorded the following Observations and Resolutions:—That the language of that extract was in the highest degree injudicious and improper; and exclusively calculated to irritate the minds, and inflame the religious zeal of the class of musselmen to whom it is addressed. That the public safety, therefore, might seriously be endangered by the diffusion of this pamphlet. That the public faith had repeatedly been pledged, under the express injunctions of the Legislature, to leave the inhabitants of these dominions in the full, free and undisturbed exercise of their respective religions. That to permit the issue and diffusion of a publication containing the most direct and unqualified abuse of the principles and tenets of the religion of the country, proscribing its ordinances, and vilifying its founder and professors, would be a departure from that principle of toleration which the Legislature had prescribed, which this Government had uniformly professed, and to which its faith was solemnly pledged.

5. That it was the duty of Government, therefore, with a view both to the public safety and to the maintenance of public faith, to oppose the circulation and prevent the revival of such inflammatory publications. That the full extent of the measures which it might be necessary to adopt for this purpose, must depend upon the receipt of further information with regard to the manner and the degree in which the pamphlet had been circulated; but that the object of immediate urgency was to suppress the further diffusion of it. That with this view, it would be proper immediately to apply to the authority of the Governor of Scrampore (the press of the Missionaries being established under the license and protection of the Danish government) requesting his Excellency to prohibit the issue of any more copies of the pamphlet in question, or of any other publication of a similar description; to require the Missionaries to deliver up all the remaining copies of it; and to ascertain from the Missionaries to what extent, and in what manner, the pamphlet had been circulated, with a view to enable this Government to counteract its dangerous effects in those places within the limits of the British authority or influence to which it might have been conveyed.

6. In conformity to the preceding resolutions, we addressed a Letter to his Excellency the Governor of Serampore, of which a copy is enclosed for your honourable Committee's information. (No. 2.)

7. We at the same time directed the secretary to send for the Rev. Mr. Carey (the principal member of the Society of Missionaries, and at present holding the situation of Professor of the Sanskrit and Bengallee languages in the College of Fort William) to interrogate him on the subject of the pamphlet, and to require him to employ every means in his power for the purpose of preventing the further diffusion of the pamphlet, and of withdrawing it from circulation.

8. We have the honour to transmit, enclosed, a copy of the Secretary's Report of his consequent conference with Mr. Carey. (No. 3.)

No. 6. Letter from Gov^r Gen^l 2 Nov. 1807; relating to Missionaries.

9. Your honourable Committee will observe, that Mr. Cary disclaimed all knowledge of the pamphlet in question; stating, that although the Society of Missionaries was in the habit of issuing publications on the subject of the religion of the Hindoos, calculated to convince them of its errors and to convert them to Christianity, the society systematically avoided the language of irritation and abuse, of which he admitted the impropriety and inutility. That he was convinced, that although the pamphlet in question had certainly issued from the press of Serampore, and must consequently be supposed to have undergone the revision of one or more of the Society of Missionaries, none of the society were apprized of the improper language which was introduced into it; observing, that none of them being conversant in the Persian language, they might not have been aware of the force of the expressions which it contained; and that the pamphlet might probably be the composition of one of their proselytes, among whom were a few originally of the Mahomedan faith. Your honourable Committee will further observe, that Mr. Carey was ready to engage (if such should be the pleasure of Government) that no publications should issue from the press of Serampore, without being previously approved by Government; observing, that the Missionaries were disposed to conform, in all respects, to the wishes of Government; and expressing at the same time a hope that it was not our intention to prohibit them from endeavouring to convert the natives by the only means which they were disposed to employ—fair argument and persuasion.

(No. 4.) 10. From a Letter received from Mr. Carey, subsequently to this conference, (a copy of which Letter is also enclosed) it appeared that the pamphlet had been printed about two months; that about 300 copies had been distributed in the vicinity of Calcutta, and that no copy had been sent to any part of the country.

(No. 5.) 11. We have further the honour to transmit, enclosed, a copy of the Reply of his Excellency the Governor of Serampore to our Address above referred to; from which your honourable Committee will observe, that his Excellency engaged that the remaining copies of the pamphlet should be delivered up, and that similar publications should not be permitted to issue from the press of Serampore.

12. At our consultation in the secret department of the 8th of September, the Secretary reported to us, that having desired Mr. Blaquiere, one of the magistrates of the town of Calcutta, to adopt measures with a view to ascertain the proceedings of the Missionaries in disseminating pamphlets of the nature of that which was submitted to Government at the last meeting of council and in meetings stated to be held within the town of Calcutta, for the purpose of exposing to the native inhabitants the errors of their religion, and of persuading them to adopt the Christian faith, Mr. Blaquiere had attended the Secretary's office, and informed him, that being apprized of the practice adopted by the Missionaries, or their converts, of preaching to the multitude every Sunday at a house in the city engaged for that purpose, he had directed a person in his employ to attend one of those meetings, and that Mr. Blaquiere had delivered to the Secretary a Memorandum of what passed at that meeting, drawn up (No. 6.) by the person who attended it. A copy of that Memorandum, we deem it proper to enclose; the Secretary proceeded to state from Mr. Blaquiere's verbal report, that Mr. Blaquiere had at the same time directed a Brahmin in his service to attend the Missionaries, and under a pretended desire to become a convert, to obtain copies of any publications which had been issued under the authority of the Missionaries; that the Brahmin accordingly waited on the Reverend Mr. Ward, one of the society, residing principally at Calcutta, and that Mr. Blaquiere had delivered to the Secretary eleven pamphlets written some in the Bengallee, some in the Hindostanny language, which, on that occasion, the Reverend Mr. Ward had delivered to the Brahmin.

13. The Secretary reported, that those pamphlets for the most part consisted of strictures upon the characters of the Hindoo deities, tending to place them in a hateful or disgusting light, and to deduce from those strictures the fallacy of the Hindoo mythology; of exhortations to the Hindoos, to abandon their idolatrous worship and embrace the doctrines of Christianity; of the translations of the Psalms of David and other parts of Scripture. That two of those pamphlets, however, one in the Bengallee, the other in the Hindostanny language and character, were addressed exclusively to the class of Mahomedans, and contained the same or similar abuse of the doctrines, books, and founder of the Mahomedan religion, as was contained in the Persian Pamphlet laid before the Board at the last meeting of council, and that these two pamphlets were stated to have been printed at Serampore in the year 1806.

14. Having taken into consideration the preceding communications, we recorded the following Observations and Resolutions: That the publications in question, and the practice of preaching to the multitude, described by Mr. Blaquiere, were evidently calculated to excite among the native subjects of the Company a spirit of religious jealousy and alarm, which might eventually be productive of the most serious evils: That the distribution of such publications, and the public preachings of the Missionaries and their proselytes at the very seat of Government, were acts tending to indicate that the proceedings of the Missionaries, in vilifying the religions of the country, were sanctioned and approved by the supreme authority; that the prevalence of such an impression would both augment the danger, and render more difficult the application of a remedy; that if these proceedings should be suffered to continue, until their effects should be manifested in the clamour and discontent of the people, any measure then adopted to arrest the progress of the evil, would necessarily appear to be the result of apprehension. That it was of the highest importance, therefore, to adopt, without delay, such measures as were calculated to preclude a conjuncture so injurious to the authority and dignity of Government, and so hazardous to the prosperity and even the security of these dominions; and finally, that the obligation to suppress within the limits of the Company's authority in India, treatises and public preachings offensive to the religious persuasions of the people, was founded on considerations of necessary caution, of general safety, and national faith and honour.

No. 6. Letter from Gov. Gen. 2 Nov. 1807; relating to Missionaries.

That with this view we deemed it necessary to direct that the practice of public preachings at the house employed for that purpose by the Missionaries in the town of Calcutta, should be immediately discontinued; and to prohibit the issue of any publications from the press superintended by the Society of Missionaries, of a nature offensive to the religious prejudices of the natives, or directed to the object of converting them to Christianity; observing, that whatever might be the propriety of exposing the errors of the Hindoo or Musselman religion, to persons of those persuasions, who should solicit instruction in the doctrines of the Christian faith, it was contrary to the system of protection which Government was pledged to afford to the undisturbed exercise of the religions of the country, and calculated to produce very dangerous effects,—to obtrude upon the general body of the people, by means of printed works, exhortations, necessarily involving an interference with those religious tenets, which they considered to be sacred and inviolable.

16. That the press established at Serampore, being intended for the promulgation of works within the limits of the Company's dominions, it became indispensably necessary that its productions should be subject to the immediate controul of the officers of Government; that with this view the Missionaries should be required to remove their press to the Presidency, where the same controul that is established over presses sanctioned by the Government, could be most effectually exercised.

17. That it was, moreover, advisable to obtain from the Reverend Mr. Carey information with regard to the manner and places in which the pamphlets and treatises above mentioned, or any others of a similar description, which might not yet have come under the observation of Government, had been distributed; and also to require the Missionaries to employ every effort in their power to withdraw them from circulation.

18. In conformity to the preceding Observations and Resolutions, a Letter, of which the enclosed is a Copy, was addressed to the Reverend Mr. Carey, for the notice and guidance of the Society of Missionaries. (No. 7.) A Letter, (of which a Copy is also enclosed) was at the same time addressed by our direction to the magistrates of Calcutta, apprising them of our determination to prohibit the practice of public preaching in the town of Calcutta by the Missionaries or their converts, and of the grounds of that determination. (No. 8.)

19. Subsequently to these proceedings we received from his Excellency the Governor of Serampore, a further Report of the measures which his Excellency had adopted in consequence of the representations contained in our Address of the 1st of September. His Excellency at the same time transmitted a copy of a Memorial addressed to him by the Society of Missionaries, in reply to his Excellency's communication to the Society, on the subject of the Persian Pamphlet. Copies of both those documents, form enclosures in this dispatch. (No. 9.) (No. 10.)

20. Your honourable Committee will observe, that agreeably to our request, his Excellency required the Missionaries to deliver up all the remaining copies of the Persian Pamphlets, a requisition with which the Missionaries readily complied.

21. Your honourable Committee will observe in the Memorial of the Missionaries, a becoming acknowledgment of regret at the unintended introduction into the pamphlet in question, of expressions calculated to irritate the minds of the persons to whom it is addressed, and a statement of the circumstances which occasioned the publication of that objectionable pamphlet.

22. In our reply to the Letters of his Excellency the Governor of Serampore, after expressing the sense which we entertained of the attention to our application manifested by his Excellency, and of the disposition of the government of Serampore to meet the wishes of this Government, we noticed the additional information, which, subsequently to the date of our first Address to his Excellency, we had received relative to the diffusion of printed pamphlets in the Bengallee and Hindostanny languages, similar to the Persian Pamphlet, and to the practice of public preaching in the town of Calcutta, on the topics which formed the subject of those pamphlets, and communicated to his Excellency the measures which in consequence we had deemed it our duty to adopt. We observed to his Excellency, that the works printed at the press of the Missionaries, were expressly intended for promulgation within the limits of the British dominions, and that even the operations of the press were principally supported by the aid and encouragement afforded by the Asiatic Society and the College of Fort William: That the establishment of it at Serampore had no reference to the circulation of its productions within the limits of that colony, but that the press was exclusively directed to the same purposes to which it would be applied, if established at this Presidency; that under these circumstances, therefore, it appeared to us to be obviously regular, as well as highly expedient, that the press of the Missionaries should be placed under the immediate controul of this Government, in the same manner as the presses established at Calcutta; and that with this view we had signified to the Missionaries our expectation that the press should be brought within the sphere of our direct authority, by being transferred to this Presidency; we remarked at the same time, that this arrangement was entirely unconnected with the slightest doubt of his Excellency's disposition to exert his authority in preventing preventing the issue of improper publications; that it was founded exclusively on those general principles which rendered it the duty of every government to reserve to itself the power of restraining irregularities within the limits of its own dominion.

No. 6. Letter from Gov^r Gen^l 2 Nov. 1807; relating to Missionaries.

23. For your honourable Committee's more detailed information, we have the honour to transmit, enclosed, a copy of our Address to the Governor of Serampore, of which the substance is above stated. (No. 11)

(No. 12.) 24. A copy of the Rev. Mr. Carey's Reply to the Letter addressed to him by our authority, is also enclosed.

25. In consequence of the measures which, on this occasion, the obligations of our public duty had compelled us to adopt, the Society of Missionaries addressed to the Governor General a Memorial, containing a detailed statement of their situation, circumstances, views and proceedings, since the period of their establishment in this country, and soliciting the revocation of the order for the removal of the press from Serampore to this Presidency, on the ground of the serious injury which the society would sustain from the execution of that order.

26. We shall have the honour of stating to your honourable Committee, in a subsequent part of this despatch, such observations on this Memorial, as the tenor of it appears to render necessary; in the meantime we beg leave to refer your honourable Committee to the enclosed Copy of it, and also to a copy of his Excellency the Governor of Serampore's Reply to our Letter of the 15th September, (of which the substance has been stated in a preceding part of this despatch) soliciting the revocation of the order for the transfer of the press to Calcutta.

(No. 13.) (No. 14.)

27. Your honourable Committee will observe, that the Governor of Serampore refers in his Letter to an enclosed English version of the pamphlet in the Bengallee language, of which the Persian Pamphlet was intended (as appears by the Memorial of the Missionaries addressed to his Excellency) to have been a translation, although, as observed by the Missionaries, the person employed in translating it, had materially departed from the original text.

28. His Excellency has observed, that on a perusal of the English version of the Bengallee Pamphlet, it did not appear to him that the expressions contained in it were so offensive to the religious prejudices of the natives as those contained in the Persian translation, and that the former had been in circulation since the latter end of the year 1804, or the beginning of the year 1805. His Excellency has further observed, that the Missionaries had been in the habit of preaching publicly in the town of Calcutta for nearly five years past, in which time no notice had been taken of their proceedings, nor, to his Excellency's knowledge, had any disturbance been the consequence of it.

29. With respect to this particular publication in the Bengallee language, although several of the most offensive epithets and expressions applied to Mahommud, to the religion, and to the Koran, which appear in the Persian Pamphlet, are omitted in the former, yet the general substance of the language is the same in both, and is certainly of a nature to excite the indignation and fanaticism of the bigoted class of Mussulmans; that it has not attracted the same notice as the Persian Pamphlet, may be ascribed to the language in which it is written; the oral language of Bengal being familiar only to a few of the lower class of Mussulmans, who are natives of the province, and of them a very small proportion are capable of reading that language.

30. The Persian language however being the general medium of correspondence throughout India, a work printed in that language, is open to the perusal of all ranks of people, and we deem it highly fortunate that the circulation of it has been limited to the town of Calcutta and its vicinity, and that means were afforded to us of seasonably restraining a more extensive diffusion of it.

31. With reference to the observation of the Governor of Serampore, regarding the practice of public preaching, it may be proper to state, that the late Governor General Sir George Barlow, having received information that one of the Society of Missionaries, was in the habit of preaching publicly in the streets of Calcutta, in terms abusive of the Hindoo religion; and that on several occasions the populace had manifested signs of irritation, and on one occasion especially, had proceeded to acts of violence, deemed it his duty to prohibit the Missionary from the prosecution of that practice.

32. We suspend the further remarks, which we deem it necessary to state to your honourable Committee, regarding the tendency of publications such as have been described, and of the practice of preaching publicly in the city of Calcutta, on subjects offensive to the religious persuasions of the natives, for the purpose of concluding the narrative of our proceedings on the present.

33. On a consideration of the circumstances stated by the Society of Missionaries, in their Memorial addressed to the Governor General, relative to the injury to which that Society would be exposed by transferring the press from Serampore to Calcutta, and under the influence of a desire to conform to the wishes of the Danish government, we resolved to revoke our requisition for the removal of the press. Adverting, however, to the obvious necessity of establishing a controul over the publication of works intended for circulation within the territories subject to the British authority, we still deemed it proper to require the Missionaries to submit to the inspection of the officers of Government, works of the above description previously to their publication.

34. In

No. 6. Letter from Gov. Gen. 2 Nov. 1807, relating to Missionaries.

34. In communicating this resolution to his Excellency the Governor of Serampore, we expressed our conviction that the Missionaries would be disposed to observe the restrictions imposed upon them by his Excellency, and by this Government, relative to the publication of works offensive to the religious prejudices of the natives; observing, however, that as the judgment of the Missionaries respecting the tendency of works which they might desire to publish, and which were intended for circulation within the territory subject to the British authority, might possibly differ from our own, we were satisfied that his Excellency would concur in the propriety of subjecting publications of that description to the controul of the British Government.

35. We further stated to his Excellency, that we were fully convinced of the rectitude of the intentions of the Society of Missionaries, and that the precautions which we had deemed it necessary to adopt against the unlimited employment of the press, proceeded exclusively from the duty imposed upon Government, of reserving to itself the authority to determine what publications might or might not expose the public tranquillity to hazard, or involve a violation of public faith, instead of leaving the decision of such important questions to the judgment of others.

36. A copy of the letter which we addressed to his Excellency on that occasion, and also a copy of the corresponding communication to the Reverend Mr. Carey, as the chief member of the Society of Missionaries, are enclosed for your honourable Committee's more detailed information. (No. 15.) (No. 16.)

37. We have since received a letter from the Reverend Mr. Carey, of which a copy is enclosed, expressing the gratitude of the Society of Missionaries for the revocation of the order for the removal of the press, and communicating the ready acquiescence of the Missionaries in the requisition to submit to the inspection of Government, works intended for circulation within the British territories, previously to their publication. (No. 17.)

38. We now proceed to state to your honourable Committee such further observations as appear to be necessary, with reference to the general subject of this despatch, and especially to the contents of the Memorial addressed to the Governor General by the respectable Society of Missionaries.

39. We have great satisfaction in acknowledging the temperate and respectful spirit of that Memorial, and in expressing our entire conviction of the correctness of the statement which it contains, relative to the motives and objects of the zeal of the Missionaries for the propagation of the sacred doctrines of Christianity; and our duty as guardians of the public welfare, and a consentaneous solicitude for the diffusion of the blessing of Christianity, merely require us to restrain the efforts of that commendable zeal within those limits, the transgression of which, would in our decided judgment expose to hazard the public safety and tranquillity, without promoting its intended object; and would be incompatible with a just adherence to the obligations of political interest and of public faith, in the degree in which both are involved in the unequivocal toleration of every religious sect among the inhabitants of these dominions.

40. The Missionaries have related the progress and result of labours similar to their own, during a long course of years, and from the negative fact, that the zeal of the propagandists has not on any occasion produced the dangers which we apprehend, have inferred, that neither the publication of the works which have attracted our attention, nor the practice of public preaching, is calculated to produce them. But two material circumstances, which have escaped the observation of the Missionaries, appear to invalidate the force of this conclusion.

41. While the British Government in India continued to be a subordinate power, the efforts of the Missionaries in the work of conversion, were not likely to excite among the natives of India any apprehension either of the disposition or the power of the British Government to impair the stability of the prevailing systems of religion: possessing under the general system, and even under the specific laws of the British Administration, every degree of security for the free and undisturbed exercise of their religious ceremonies and devotions, they had no cause to connect the proceedings of the Missionaries with the acts of the Government; and, deprived of that connection, the mere personal labours of the former in the work of conversion, were inadequate to produce a general sentiment of religious jealousy and alarm, more especially because the efforts of the Missionaries were almost exclusively directed to the conversion of the class of Hindoos, who are free from that spirit of bigotry and fanaticism which distinguishes the class of Mahomedans.

42. In the present ascendency of the British power in India, however, the natives may naturally be led to apprehend that the augmented efforts of the Missionaries exercised under the immediate protection of the Government, are supported and encouraged by its authority. They may be induced to imagine that the possession of unrivalled power, of a dominion extending over a great proportion of the continent of Hindoostan, and of an ascendant influence or controul over all the primary states of India, may suggest the accomplishment of an object, which the comparative inferiority of our power and influence had hitherto excluded from the contemplation of Government,—the gradual substitution of its religion for the actual religions of its subjects. Under these circumstances, therefore, the labours of the Missionaries are calculated in a far greater degree to excite alarm among our native subjects than they were at any former period of time.

No. 6. Letter from Gov^{r} Gen^{l} 2 Nov. 1807; relating to Missionaries.

43. The second point to which we have alluded, is the prosecution of the labour of conversion by the means of the press. Until works on religious topics addressed to the natives of India, were published in their vernacular language, the proceedings of the Missionaries were not of a nature to attract notice beyond the limits of their personal communication; but when works, expressly directed to the object of subverting the religions of the country, are published in languages intelligible to the natives, the proceedings of the Missionaries must attract attention in proportion to the promulgation of these printed works, and there is just reason to apprehend that a general spirit of irritation and alarm may consequently be excited in the minds of the native inhabitants of India.

44. We have already stated the cause which, in our judgment, has prevented such a consequence of the publications issued in the language of Bengal, and addressed to the class of Mahomedans. It is from the bigotry of that class, that the danger which we have described is principally to be apprehended; but even the jealousy and alarm of the Hindoos may be excited by a more general diffusion of publications calculated to subvert the foundation of their religious persuasions; and works of the latter description, combined with similar attacks upon the credit of the Mahomedan faith, may reasonably be expected to create in the minds of both classes, but especially of the Mussulmans, an apprehension of a systematic design to eradicate both the Hindoo and Mahomedan religion. These publications issuing from a press considered to be established under the protection and authority of the British Government, may readily be supposed to have been sanctioned by that authority, and the project of subverting the religions of the country would consequently be ascribed to the Government itself; and it will not escape the observation of your honourable Committee, that publications of this nature would afford a powerful instrument, in the hands of the disaffected or ambitious, to excite that religious jealousy in the minds of our native subjects, even if that effect should not be produced without the aid of exterior agency.

45. Of the disposition of the natives of this country, especially of the class of Mahomedans, to receive impressions of this nature, even on grounds much less forcible than those which the publications in question would afford, and of the fatal consequences of an excited spirit of religious fury, we have experienced a dreadful example in the massacre of Vellore, of which the industrious propagation of a belief that the British Government entertained the design of converting its native subjects to Christianity, was rendered the efficient instrument.

A. B. C. See pages 65 & 72.

46. Of the nature of the publication which forms the subject of this despatch, your honourable Committee will judge from the enclosed translations of the most material among them. We beg leave especially to draw the attention of your honourable Committee to the translation marked (C.) the original of which is entitled "The Rise of Wisdom," and is addressed to the Hindoos generally, but particularly to the class of Brahmins.

47. Your honourable Committee will observe that this work, far from being composed in the language of persuasion and conciliation, contains no trace of argument or dispassionate discussion, but consists almost exclusively of denunciation, and reproach directed against that class which is revered as sacred by the whole body of the Hindoos; that its tendency is to set one part of our native subjects at variance with another; to excite the enmity of the Brahmins especially against the British nation, and to irritate the minds of all the other classes of Hindoos.

48. Although the limited circulation which this work may hitherto have obtained, its being excluded from general perusal by the abstruseness of metrical composition or the natural apathy of the Hindoos, has prevented a manifestation of the effects above described, yet it cannot be supposed that a work of this nature is calculated to convince the persons to whom it is addressed of the errors of their persuasion. The good sense of the Missionaries indeed has led them to admit that the language of opprobrium and abuse is calculated rather to create resistance than to promote conviction, and have professed to regulate their proceedings according to the impression of this truth. The error of their judgment therefore, so strongly manifested in the publications to which we have adverted, evidently points out the necessity of that controul which we have deemed it our duty to establish over the operations of the press of Serampore.

49. Your honourable Committee will be satisfied by the observations stated in this despatch, that the publications in question having hitherto failed to produce among our native subjects a sensation of alarm, by no means warrants a conclusion that a more extended circulation of such works in a form which would render their contents accessible to all ranks of our native subjects, would not create the danger against which we have deemed it our duty to guard, by the suppression of them.

50. On a view of all the circumstances stated in this despatch, your honourable Committee may be disposed to admit the expediency of adopting such measures as your wisdom will suggest, for the purpose of discouraging any accession to the number of Missionaries actually employed under the protection of the British Government in India in the work of conversion.

51. That meritorious spirit of religious zeal which animates those respectable persons who deem it their duty to exert their endeavours to diffuse among the misguided natives of India the truths and blessings of the Christian Faith, can seldom be restrained by those maxims of prudence and caution which local knowledge and experience can alone inspire, and without which, the labours of the Missionaries become a source of danger, and tend to frustrate, rather than promote, the benevolent object of their attention.

No. 6. Letter from Gov^r Gen^l 2 Nov. 1807; relating to Missionaries.

We have the honour to be, with the greatest respect,
Honourable Sirs,
Your most faithful humble servants,

Fort William,
2d November, 1807.

(Signed) MINTO,
G. HEWETT,
G. H. BARLOW,
J. LUMSDEN.

—No. 7.—

Copies of all DOCUMENTS enclosed in a Letter from the Governor General of India to the Secret Committee of the Court of Directors, dated the 2d November 1807; in so far as the said Documents relate to The MISSIONARIES:—And, Copy of the ANSWER from the Court of Directors to the said Letter, so far as relates to the said subject of The MISSIONARIES.

TRANSLATION of an ADDRESS from the Missionaries at Serampore.

To all Persons professing the Moohummudan Religion.

JOYFUL TIDINGS!

Behold, O brethren! We are come to convert you from a distant country.—You have many well-wishers in England, who are continually anxious for your welfare, and are constantly enquiring about the state of your religion, of which they have received much information. The intelligence which they have received, has been to them a source of sorrow, and they have seen with pain, that nothing but the affairs of this world is able to engage the smallest portion of your attention, which is never occupied by good and virtuous objects.

For this reason they earnestly urge you to consider, that the only object of this life is to prepare us for a better; according to the Arabic proverb,—"This world is the field to be sown, the harvest is to be reaped in a future state." Until you shall reflect seriously on this subject, you will never so live in this world, as to deserve happiness hereafter. It is in your creed, that there is only one God the Creator of all things, and that He has not given equal understandings to all; that is to say, that there are many beings in nature, who are incapable of comprehending the attributes of God. The beasts and birds, for example, cannot distinguish good from evil, but you are capable of that distinction, and therefore an account will be demanded at your hands. The Creator hears and observes all that you say and all that you do; He knows all your thoughts; and in the last day, when He shall sit in judgment, you will know how you can obtain His approbation. Have you ever reflected that all created beings owe their lives and happiness to Him, and that it is your most important duty to give praise and thanksgiving to Him?

If you have not considered this subject before, reflect on it now, lest (which God avert) the Creator of life should say, after your death, "I have fed and preserved these men from all misfortunes, and they have not paid the smallest attention to my commands, let them be condemned for ever to the torments of Hell."

You say that God, who communicated the Old Testament through the means of the prophet Moses, has there commanded all men to reverence their Creator, and to love their neighbours as themselves. This is the most excellent of all commands, for He is the most bountiful and the most merciful, and on Him only depends the happiness of mankind. All men are descended from the same common parent (Adam), and to indulge mutual enmity is to disobey the commands of God himself. It is indeed the source of the greatest evils, and of the displeasure of God himself.

The evils and misfortunes of life belong to God, who has said, that He will burn all sinners for ever in Hell fire. In the inspired books of Moses, it was written, that those who should not obey the commands recorded there, should suffer the pains of Hell. Alas! alas! for your miserable state, O you Mohummudans! who have perverted his commands, and thereby incurred the wrath of God, reflect seriously how deserving of punishment are those who do evil with their eyes open.

How will you ward off the torments of Hell, or how will you be able to bear those torments? How will you wipe off the stain of your evil actions, or how will concealment or deceit avail you, you, when called to judgment before God? Since you cannot move the ocean or the stars, which are among the least of His works, it is clear that you will fail in the accomplishment of these more arduous undertakings.

No. 7. Enclosures in Gov^r Gen^l's Letter, 2 Nov. 1807; relating to Missionaries.

O brethren! we bring you the joyful tidings, that though you and we are great sinners, and have both of us incurred the displeasure of our God, yet He in his endless bounty and mercy has appointed an all-powerful Saviour and Intersessor to effect the salvation of you and of us. Through Him only we can be saved; and that happiness which we have lost, we may again recover through His means. On our death we must look for consolation to Him alone, &c. &c.

[It is conceived that the remainder of this Address may be omitted, as it contains no observations particularly insulting to the Moohummudan religion, or any expressions tending to inflame the religious prejudices and jealousy of the natives for the freedom of conscience which they have hitherto enjoyed.——I proceed to the next Address, which professes to give an account of the Life of Moohummud, who is described under the term (Zaulim) or, the Tyrant.]

An Account of a certain TYRANT, from his Birth to his Death:

His father Abdoolla died young and left his son an orphan. His son inherited nothing but five camels and a female slave, and he was born of the tribe of Kooreish, in the city of Mecca, 572 years after the birth of Christ: his father died when he was about 13 years old, at which period his uncle took upon himself the care of his education, and appointed a widow to attend him: after some time he married the widow, whose great wealth enabled him to obtain distinction among his countrymen, and subsequently he conceived the desire of setting up for a prophet. From motives of policy he frequented a certain hill every year, and after some years he conducted his tribe and dependents thither, and told them that he had been visited by an angel from Heaven, who informed him that God had made him a prophet. His wife and his cousin (Allee) believed him, and were converted. These were the absurdities and lies which he preached. When he attained his fortieth year, being three years after the promulgation of his infamous mission, certain persons (the lamp of whose judgment was extinguished) embraced his creed, and in the progress of time many others were induced to follow this example. At the age of 52 he told his followers, that one night during his abode in Mecca, he ascended into Heaven, accompanied by an angel, and having passed through Eer and Sulum, was admitted into the presence of God himself, with whom he even pretended to have held a conversation. Many of his followers quitted him on the instant of their hearing of this boastful conversation.

In this manner he continued to flatter and mislead men until he attained the age of 53 years; he then directed his counsellors to slay those who should refuse to embrace his faith, pretending that he had received the good news (of this permission to slay his enemies) from the Deity himself.

According to his desire, they began to practise evil, and all the inhabitants of Mecca having obtained intelligence of their tyranny and violence, prepared to put him to death. The origin and source of all this mischief being thus reduced to extremities, fled to Medeena with his friends and followers. After a short time he began a war on the inhabitants of Medeena, in which he was sometimes victorious and sometimes defeated. At last, however, he got possession of many cities, such as Mecca, &c. which he plundered with the hand of violence and tyranny, having converted the inhabitants to his own false religion.

Eleven years after his flight to Medeena, he quitted this world, and his followers subsequently took forcible and violent possession of many cities. During his lifetime he had composed some pages in Arabic (the Kooran) which he locked up in a chest; after his death the chest was opened by one of his followers, and these leaves were collected into a volume, which is still extant. His lost followers, under the influence of ignorance, consider the reading of this book as a means of salvation; but during his lifetime—[the Persian is here utterly unintelligible]—he sacrificed the lives of thousands to his reputation; and under all these circumstances of injustice, it is clear that no wise man will believe in his creed, which is only the source of mental darkness. He has borrowed in the Kooran much matter from many books, and thus the charge of theft [plagiarism] is proved against him. Moreover, the plainest atrocities are inculcated as necessary or expedient, according to the principles of his book; whereas every vice is prohibited in the Old and New Testament, and in the Psalms of David, nay the man who shall think evil, is there declared to incur the Divine wrath.

The book of those who are wandering in the paths of error (the Kooran) cannot in any point of view be considered as the word of God, for it is there said, that those three books (the Bible and the Psalms) were superseded by the commands of God; whereas it is declared in those divine books, that whoever shall act in a manner inconsistent with the precepts which they contain, is guilty of evil: moreover, it is stated in the Kooran, that the salvation of man is ensured by fasting and prayer, and the pilgrimage to Mecca; whereas it appears from the word of God (that is to say, from the Old and New Testament, and the Psalms of David) that good actions are not in themselves sufficient for the salvation of man, except through the means of God's goodness.

Even Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, David, and the other prophets, have repented of their sins, and rested their hopes of pardon on the Messiah alone. O my friends! there is no no hope of the salvation of man according to those three books, but only through the medium of Jesus Christ.

The aforesaid tyrant Moohummud has published a law directly opposed to that which is contained in the scriptures invented by himself, and infinitely remote from the comprehension of the wise. He has affirmed that the same lustful gratifications which arise in this world from an intercourse with women, will constitute the reward of good men in Heaven; he (the tyrant aforesaid) has also commanded, that those who shall not embrace his religion, shall be put to the sword and consigned to infamy.

Think, O brethren! of these evil actions, and then say whether this tyrant, or the Messiah, the Spirit of God, will be the intercessor between God and man. It is stated in the true Scriptures that the pure in spirit shall enjoy in Heaven the same kind of happiness which arises to men from the practice of virtue in this world. It is affirmed by the aforesaid tyrant, that the good or evil which men do, is to be ascribed to the decrees of fate; and led away by this fallacy, the ignorant take no pains to ascertain the truth, believing that every thing which happens to them must be ascribed to the principle of predestination.

It appears from the Scriptures, that all the good actions of men must be ascribed to God, and that evil actions owe their origin to the Devil. It also appears that those who believe in Christ, and act according to his precepts, will be saved from the world, and obtain the reward of everlasting life. Quit, O brethren! the lying religion which you have been taught to believe, and embrace the faith of Jesus Christ, who took on himself the sins of all men, and sacrificed his life to effect their redemption. Amen.

Printed at Serampore near Calcutta, in the year 1213.

(A true Copy.) N. B. Edmonstone,
Secretary to Government.

(Copy.)

To his Excellency the honourable J. Krefting, Esq. &c. &c. &c.

Sir,

WE deem it necessary to bring under your Excellency's notice, the enclosed translation of an extract from a Persian Pamphlet printed at the press established at Serampore, under the superintendence of the Society of Missionaries residing at that place, and circulated, as we are informed, among the Mussulmen inhabitants of this presidency by direction of that society.

2. It is superfluous to point out to your Excellency, the dangerous tendency of language so abusive of the Mahomedan religion and of its founder, as that which is contained in the enclosed document, when circulated among a people distinguished for their devoted attachment to their faith. It must be evident to your Excellency, that the style and tenor of that document can have no other effect than to irritate the minds, and inflame the religious zeal of the class of Mussulmen to which it is addressed; our duty as guardians of the public safety, therefore, would alone require that we should employ our utmost exertions to prevent the diffusion of a publication by which that safety may so seriously be endangered: but an additional obligation to oppose the circulation, and preclude the revival of such inflammatory productions, is imposed upon us, by the necessity of maintaining the public faith repeatedly pledged under the express injunctions of the legislature in England, to leave our native subjects in India, in the full, free, and undisturbed exercise of their respective religions. To permit the issue and diffusion of a publication containing the most direct and unqualified abuse of the principles and tenets of the religion of the country, proscribing its ordinances, and vilifying its founder and professors, would be manifestly a departure from that principle of toleration which the British legislature has prescribed, which we have uniformly professed and observed, and to which the faith of Government is inviolably pledged.

3. We have not yet formed our determination with regard to every specific measure which, with a view to the preservation of the public tranquillity, and to the vindication of our public faith, it may be necessary to pursue on the present occasion. But the object of most immediate urgency, is to suppress the further diffusion of this inflammatory pamphlet; with which view, we have judged it necessary to trouble your Excellency with the present Address.

4. We are satisfied that your Excellency will duly appreciate the importance of this object, as it affects the welfare of every European Settlement in India; and our experience of your disposition to promote the wishes of this Government, and our confidence in your Excellency's wisdom and discernment, leave no room to doubt your Excellency's acquiescence in the application which we have now the honour to submit to you.

5. The press of the Missionaries being established under the licence and protection of the Danish Government, we solicit the interposition of your Excellency's authority to prohibit the issue of any more copies of the pamphlet, which is the subject of this Address, or of any other publications of a similar description; and we further beg leave to suggest the expediency of requiring the Missionaries to deliver up all the remaining copies of the pamphlet in question. We further take the liberty to propose to your Excellency the necessity of ascertaining from the Missionaries to what extent, and in what manner, the pamphlet has been circulated, with a view to enable us to counteract its dangerous effects in those places within the limits of our authority or influence to which it may have been conveyed.

No. 7. Enclosures in Gov^r Gen^l's Letter, 2 Nov. 1807; relating to Missionaries.

6. It is superfluous to express our entire conviction that this publication has been framed and issued without your Excellency's knowledge, and that if apprised of its nature and tendency, your Excellency's judgment and discernment would have induced you to exercise your authority for its suppression.

We have the honour to be, &c.

Fort William, 1st Sept. 1807.

(Signed) MINTO,
G. H. BARLOW,
J. LUMSDEN.

(A true Copy.)

(Signed) N. B. Edmonstone,
Secretary to Government.

(Copy.)

Wednesday, 2d September 1807.

In obedience to the orders of Government, the Reverend Mr. Carey was desired to attend at the Chief Secretary's chambers this morning.

Mr. Carey was first requested to state, whether he knew of a certain pamphlet printed in the Persian character and language, at the press of the Missionaries at Serampore, containing strictures on the Mahomedan religion, and circulated among the native inhabitants of this Presidency. In reply, Mr. Carey expressed his entire ignorance of any such pamphlet, observing, that neither he nor any of the society were conversant in the Persian language. He added, however, that he by no means meant to assert that no such pamphlet had issued from the press, but merely that he himself was not apprized of it, and he took occasion to advert to some tract or tracts on the subject of the religion of the Hindoos, which had been translated into the Hindoostanny language under the superintendence of the Missionaries, but disclaimed all knowledge of any such on the subject of the Mahomedan religion and in the Persian language.

The Secretary then informed Mr. Carey of the general nature of the pamphlet in question, and of the mode in which it had been brought under the notice of Government, and read to him the translation of that part of the pamphlet which immediately respects Mohummud and his religion.

Mr. Carey having observed that he did not perceive any particular impropriety in the general substance of what had been read to him, and that it appeared to him merely to contain arguments in favour of the Christian religion, opposed to that of Mohummud, the Secretary proceeded to point out to him the objectionable nature and dangerous tendency of the publication, by observations similar to those which are contained in the letter of the Right honourable the Governor General in council to the Governor at Serampore.

Mr. Carey said that he by no means approved the introduction of abusive language directed to the religion and its founder, that he was aware that no good end could be answered by it. That it was certainly calculated to irritate, and that to irritate an opponent was not the way to convince him of his errors. That such was not the practice of the Missionaries, in endeavouring to convert the the natives to Christianity. Mr. Carey frequently repeated the expression of his own ignorance of the pamphlet in question, and added, that he could venture to declare that none of his brethren were apprized of the improper language which was introduced into it. That none of them understanding Persian, they might not know the force of many Persian words which it contained. That as a body, the pamphlet, as it now stood, could not be ascribed to them, and Mr. Carey intimated that it might be the composition of one of their proselytes, and that although to be printed at the press of the Missionaries, it must be supposed to have undergone a revision by one or more of their number, yet that probably it had not been revised with sufficient accuracy, and that in consequence of their ignorance of the language, the objectionable words had eluded observation.

These explanations were produced by the obvious enquiry, whether the Missionaries were not necessarily acquainted with, and responsible for, whatever issued from their press.

Mr. Carey observed, that the Missionaries were disposed in all respects to conform to the wishes of Government; that it was only necessary for them to know the will of Government to obey it, but that he hoped it was not the intention of Government to prohibit them from endeavouring to convert the natives, by the only means which they were disposed to use, namely, fair argument and persuasion: that all idea of compulsion was entirely out of the question,—that they merely employed arguments to convince the natives of their errors.—The Secretary here informed Mr. Carey, that he was not authorized to state the wishes or intentions of Government upon this point, but that so far he was at liberty to observe, that Government, as the guardians of the public safety, would consider it to be its duty to adopt such measures as were necessary to counteract whatever tended to endanger that safety. Mr. Carey adverted to the success which had attended their efforts, stating, that numbers of the Hindoo persuasion, from the Brahmin to the lowest cast, had been converted; that they had even succeeded in converting a few Mahomedans; instancing one, a syed or descendant of Mohommud, who had embraced the Christian Faith, and had in consequence become, from an idle profligate character, a man of industry and exemplary sobriety and correctness of conduct. He observed, that in employing these means of conversion, it was impossible that they should speak well of the Mahomedan religion and its founder, for that would be to utter falsehood; but that they disclaimed the practice, and admitted the inutility, of employing abusive epithets, such as are contained in the pamphlet.

Mr. Carey (who acknowledged his influence over the Society of Missionaries) engaged, if it should be desired, that no publication should issue from the press at Serampore, without being first approved by Government.

The Secretary stated in reply, that he was not authorized to signify either an acceptance or rejection of that proposal.

Mr. Carey added, that he would adopt immediate measures to suppress the pamphlet, and withdraw it from circulation, if it had been circulated.

Mr. Carey was questioned regarding the correspondence of Missionaries with any gentlemen employed in the work of the mission in the interior of the country, and at the subordinate settlements, with a view to learn whether it was probable that the pamphlet had been transmitted to other stations, and to the coast.—From Mr. Carey's answers it did not appear that a regular and systematic correspondence, of the nature above mentioned, was maintained; Mr. Carey stated his opinion, that the pamphlet had not obtained any extensive circulation. He promised, however, to ascertain that point, and to put a stop to its further promulgation, both here and at any other place to which it might have been transmitted.

To these points Mr. Carey's immediate attention was particularly enjoined by the Secretary.

(Signed) N. B. Edmonstone,
Secretary to Government.

(A true Copy.)

(Signed) N. B. Edmonstone,
Secretary to Government.

(Copy.)

Dear Sir,

I FIND that a letter from the Right honourable the Governor General in council, has been sent to the Governor of Serampore, respecting the Persian Pamphlet which you mentioned on Wednesday last:—As that gentleman will make a report to Government on the affair, it would be improper for me to anticipate it by mentioning any particulars.

I may however observe, that on enquiry I am informed that the pamphlet was printed about two months ago; that about three hundred copies have been distributed in the vicinity of Calcutta, and that no copy has been sent to any part of the country.

I am, &c. &c.

4th September 1807. (Signed) W. Carey.

(Copy.)

To the Right honourable Lord Minto, Governor General, &c. &c. and Supreme Council.

My Lord, and honourable Sirs,

1. I HASTEN to acknowledge the honour of your Lordship's letter of the 1st instant, which came to hand yesterday evening about seven o'clock.

2. Having made myself acquainted with the contents thereof, I immediately took the necessary measures, and prohibited the issue of any more copies of the pamphlet regarding the Mahomedan religion and its founder.

3. I beg leave to assure your Lordship and the gentlemen of the Council, that so far from my having any previous intimation of the circulation of such a pamphlet, I even was ignorant thereof till the moment I had the honour of receiving your letter.

4. As your Lordship's letter requires some correspondence on my part with the Missionaries residing here, I am under the necessity of deferring my final answer till a few days hence, when I shall have the honour to transmit my correspondence with them to the British Government. I only beg leave now to add, that all copies of the said pamphlet shall be delivered up, and no circulation whatever of such or similar papers will in future be permitted from the Missionaries press at Serampore.

I have the honour to be, with great respect,
My Lord, and honourable Sirs,
Your most obedient humble servant,
(Signed) J. Krefting.

Fredericksnagore, 3d September 1807.

(A true Copy.)

(Signed) N. B. Edmonstone,
Secretary to Government.

No. 7.

Enclosures in Gov. Gen'l's Letter, 2 Nov. 1807, relating to Missionaries.

Copy of a Memorandum from Mr. Blaquiere.

Sunday, 6th September 1807.

The ceremony was began by an elderly Bengally, on whose coming and standing in the pulpit, all the audience, who were sitting down before on benches, stood up, when the old man began preaching in the Bengallee language, beseeching his congregation to observe that Yudkistkena, who had never spoken a lie, was persuaded by evil men to utter a falsehood, for which he was sent down to Hell.

The preacher then observed, that even Brahmins and other people of respectability, live a sinful life abroad with women of the town, having at the same time wives at home; that they drink liquor in the public shops, and that in the commission of all these unrighteous acts, they are not forced by any one, but prompted by their evil inclination. He then questioned the difference between Brahmins and other men, seeing they are both liable to sin equally—that if both these classes are equally liable to sin, why then the Sudras and others are required to expiate their sins, and why not the Brahmins?—that Brahmins cannot forgive sins.

That the annual religious festivals are not expiatory of sin, but productive of it, &c. &c.

The people continued standing all the while that the Bengally preached.

Then began the singing psalms in the Bengally language to European tunes.

After this, an European ascended the pulpit, and preached a sermon in English.

The hearers were, some Armenians, some native Portuguese, and some native Portuguese women; two Bengallies that are converted, sat on a bench on the left of the pulpit. There was no other Bengally or Mahomedan sitting, but a croud of them was collected at the door. Among the hearers I did not see a single person of any respectable character, but such as I recognized lead an irregular life. I am given to understand, the Missionaries have some Christians in their employ who use persuasive means to make converts.

(A true Copy.) (Signed) N. B. Edmonstone,
Secretary to Government.

(Copy.)

To the Reverend W. Carey.

Sir,

THE substance of your replies to the verbal communications which I had the honour to state to you on the 2d instant, by direction of Government, having been reported to the Right honourable the Governor General in council, I am directed to request that you will communicate to the Society of Missionaries the observations and suggestions contained in this Address.

2. Since the day of your attendance at the Chief Secretary's office, various pamphlets and treatises in the Bengallee and Hindostanny languages, containing strictures on the religions of the Hindoos and Mussulmen, and purporting to have issued from the press at Serampore, have been submitted to Government: among them are two pamphlets, one in the Bengallee, the other in the Hindostanny language, addressed exclusively to the class of Mahomedans; containing the same or similar abuse of the doctrines, books, and founder of the Mahomedan religion, as is contained in the Persian Pamphlet from which I read to you a translated extract.

3. The Governor General in council has also been informed that the practice of public preaching on topics of that nature, prevails at a house engaged for that purpose by the Missionaries, in the town of Calcutta.

4. The issue of publications and the public delivery of discourses of the nature above described, are evidently calculated to produce consequences in the highest degree detrimental to the tranquillity of the British dominions in India, and it becomes the indispensable duty of the British Government to arrest the progress of any proceedings of that nature. In the present instance, this obligation is enforced by the necessity of maintaining the public faith, which, under the express injunctions of the legislature, has been repeatedly pledged to leave the native subjects of the Company in India, in the full, free, and undisturbed exercise of their respective religions. To permit the issue and diffusion of printed treatises, and the delivery of public discourses in the languages of the country, replete with the most direct and unqualified abuse of the principles and tenets of the religion of the people, is manifestly authorizing an opposition to the full, free, and undisturbed exercise of it.

5. Upon these grounds the Right honourable the Governor General in council deems it necessary to desire that the practice of preaching at the house employed for that purpose in the town of Calcutta, be immediately discontinued.

6. The Governor General in council also deems it his duty to prohibit the issue of any publications from the press superintended by the Society of Missionaries, of a nature offensive to the religious prejudices of the natives, or directed to the object of converting them to Christianity; observing, that whatever may be the propriety of exposing the errors of the Hindoo or Mussulmen religions to persons of those persuasions who may solicit instruction in the doctrines of the Christian faith, it is contrary to the system of protection which Government is pledged to afford to the undisturbed exercise of the religions religions of the country, and calculated to produce very dangerous effects, to obtrude upon the general body of the people, by means of printed works, exhortations necessarily involving an interference with those religious tenets which they consider to be sacred and inviolable.

No. 7. Enclosures Gov^r Gen^l's Letter, 2 Nov. 1807; relating to Missionaries.

7. The Governor General in council further observes, that the press now established at Serampore, being intended for the promulgation of works within the limits of the Company's dominions, it is indispensably necessary that its productions should be subject to the immediate controul of the officers of Government. With this view I am directed to desire, that you will signify to the Missionaries the expectation of the Governor General in council, that the press be transferred to this Presidency, where alone the same controul that is established over presses sanctioned by the Government can be duly exercised.

8. I am further directed to desire, that you will ascertain and report to Government in what manner and in what places the pamphlets and treatises to which this letter refers, or any other of a similar description which may not yet have come under the observation of Government, have been distributed; and also that the Missionaries will employ every effort in their power to withdraw them from circulation.

Fort William, 8th September 1807.

I have the honour to be, &c.
(Signed) N. B. Edmonstone,
Secretary to Government.

(Copy.)

To G. Dowdeswell, Esq. Superintendant General of the Police, and Magistrates for the town of Calcutta.

Gentlemen,

THE attention of Government having been lately attracted to a Persian Pamphlet printed at the press of the Society of Missionaries established at Serampore; and supposed to have been circulated among the native inhabitants of the town of Calcutta, containing the most direct and unqualified abuse of the Mahomedan religion and its founder, and Government having reason to believe that public discourses of a similar tendency are publicly delivered by the Missionaries, or their converts, in the town of Calcutta, Mr. Blaquiere was verbally requested to adopt measures with a view to ascertain the proceedings of the Missionaries in disseminating pamphlets of the nature above described, and in prosecuting the objects of conversion by the means of public preaching. From the result of Mr. Blaquiere's enquiries, it appears that numerous pamphlets, written some in the Bengalee and some in the Hindoostannee language, in terms highly abusive of the religious systems of the Hindoos and Mussulmans, have been printed at the press of the Missionaries at Serampore, and circulated among the native inhabitants of this city; and Mr. Blaquiere at the same time delivered in several pamphlets or treatises of the above description. Mr. Blaquire further reported, that discourses on similar topics, were delivered every Sunday by the Missionaries or their converts, at a house within the town of Calcutta, engaged by the Missionaries for that purpose.

2. The Right honourable the Governor General in council, adverting to the dangerous consequences of these proceedings, has adopted the necessary measures for preventing the issue and distribution of publications, such as are above described; and the immediate object of this communication is to inform you, that the Missionaries have been required to discontinue and prevent the practice of public preaching at the house engaged for that purpose in the town of Calcutta.

Council Chamber, 8th September 1807.

I have the honour to be, &c.
(Signed) N. B. Edmonstone,
Sec^y to Gov^t.

(Copy.)

To the Right honourable Lord Minto, Governor General, &c. &c. &c. and Supreme Council at Fort William.

My Lord, and honourable Sirs,

I HAD the honour, on the 3d instant, to address your Lordship and members of the Supreme Council at Fort William, in a letter to be considered as a preliminary reply to that of the 1st of September, wherein I gave myself the liberty to state what steps I had taken for the suppression of a Persian Pamphlet regarding the Mahommedan religion and its founder. I did in the same letter intimate the necessity on my part, to enter into a correspondence with the Society of Missionaries at this place, thereby to ascertain the number of pamphlets distributed by them, and in what manner, &c. &c. I further gave myself the honour to promise, that all the remaining copies of the said pamphlet should be delivered up, and no circulation whatever of such or similar papers be permitted in future from the Missionaries press.

2. The society of Missionaries having complied with the orders I deemed it proper to prescribe with regard to the said pamphlet, I have the honour, as a measure of the respectful attention I owe to you my Lord and honourable Sirs, now to transmit all the printed copies remaining in the hands of the said society, amounting to 1,700, out of 2,000, as only 300 copies copies appear to have been distributed either at Chinsurah, Serampore, Calcutta, or the neighbouring villages.

No. 7. Enclosures in Gov^r Gen^l's Letter, 2 Nov. 1807; relating to Missionaries.

3. The subjoined copy of a letter I received from the Missionaries on the 8th instant, will fully convince you my Lord and honourable Sirs, of my having disapproved of their conduct in the present instance; and as I fully coincide in the political principles laid down in your letter of the 1st instant, I can only assure the Supreme Council, that the government of Serampore will never permit any act to be committed which might in any degree give offence to the British Government, whose prosperity the Danish nation in particular always will regard as their ultimate wishes.

4. The answer of the Missionaries will also I hope be considered as satisfactory, and as a pledge to you my Lord and honourable Sirs, that they never in future will attempt to print any thing by which the preservation of order and tranquillity might be endangered; and as their sentiments in their reply to my letter, manifest the fullest regret on their part, I humbly request that no further specific measure may be taken, as I, on the least application from your Government, always will be ready to check abuses, which in the present case appears merely to derive from a misapplied religious zeal.

I have the honour to be, with the highest consideration and respect,
My Lord, and honourable Sirs,
Your, &c.
(Signed) J. Krefting.

Fredericksnagore,
the 10th Sept. 1807.

(A true Copy.) Signed) N. B. Edmonstone,
Secretary to Government.

(Copy.)

To His Excellency the honourable Jacob Krefting, Esq. Governor of Serampore, &c. &c. &c.

Honourable Sir,

WE have been favoured with your Excellency's communication of the 5th instant, stating your having received a letter from the Right honourable the British Governor General and Council of Fort William, dated the 1st instant, which noticed a Persian Pamphlet lately circulated under our direction, as containing expressions tending to irritate the minds of the class of Mussulmans to whom it was addressed; expressing your sorrow at such a circumstance having occurred; prohibiting the further distribution of the said pamphlet; and requiring us to deliver up the remaining copies now in our hands; as well as to give you every degree of information relative to the actual distribution of the pamphlet in question.

2. On carefully examining this pamphlet, we feel it our duty to declare our sincere regret, that any expressions tending to irritate rather than convince the mind, should thus have issued from our press; and we feel that justice to our own characters requires us to state to your Excellency the circumstances under which it happened.

About three months ago we delivered to a Moonshi, formerly a Mussulman, but who had for some time professed an attachment to the Christian religion, a short abstract (in the Bengallee language) of the life of Mahomet, taken almost verbatim from Sale's preliminary discourse prefixed to his translation of the Koran, desiring him to translate it into Persian. The confidence we had in this man altogether, with the hurry of business, occasioned our putting the translation to press without a previous revisal; and we now find to our great regret, that he has departed from his original, not only by foisting in epithets which were not in the copy, but by making a number of alterations in the ideas themselves. We do not mention this for the sake of exonerating ourselves from blame (we are aware that such an act of negligence does not prevent its being our act) but merely as a fact in the history of the pamphlet. Should your Excellency wish it, we will send you either the original itself, which after much search we have found, or an English translation of it, that your Excellency may satisfy yourself of the truth of the fact.

3. We are happy to find, that of 2,000 printed of this pamphlet, 1,700 remain in our hands; the other 300, as far as we can ascertain, have been distributed either at Serampore, Chinsurah, or Calcutta, or the neighbouring villages. We suppose that none of them have gone to a greater distance. We hope, and indeed have reason to believe, that no apprehension need be entertained from those distributed, as from the indifference and disregard manifested by natives in general to things of this nature, it is more than probable that by far the greater part of them are thrown away or destroyed.

4. We cheerfully send your Excellency the remaining copies, and pledge ourselves that it shall never more issue from our press in any form whatever. Relative to similar papers in any future time, we beg leave to assure your Excellency, that our lively sense of the favour and countenance we have so long experienced from the Danish Government, both in Europe and India, and particularly from your Excellency, would alone prevent us from doing any thing which might in the remotest degree tend to give your Excellency pain. But it cannot be unknown to your Excellency, that we need no inducement of this kind to urge us to a conduct to the public tranquillity; we are thoroughly convinced that the Christian religion, so far from requiring the aid either of coercion or of irritating and opprobious epithets, expressly disallows them; and we feel certain that no one was ever made a sincere convert to Christianity by means like these.

No. 7. Enclosures in Gov. Gen'l's Letter, 2 Nov. 1807; relating to Missionaries.

5. Indeed, were we in the course of our missionary labours here, to pursue a different line of conduct, we should not only violate those feelings of attachment and respect to the British Government, and the members who compose it, which none in India possess in a higher degree than ourselves, but act as contrary to the dictates of common sense, as to those of Christianity. If, as your Excellency justly observes, the safety of every European settlement be connected with the preservation of order and tranquillity in the British dominions in India, how much more deeply must our personal safety, and the safety of our families, be involved therein, since our very existence in this, a heathen country, is suspended on the prosperity of the British empire in India.

6. As a proof however of the real tenor of our conduct, we are happy in being able to appeal to evidence stronger than mere assertions,—your Excellency's personal knowledge. Nearly eight years have elapsed since we first had the honour of enjoying the patronage and the countenance of the Danish Government in India. We feel therefore peculiar satisfaction in appealing to your Excellency, whether our conduct, both as individuals, and as a Missionary body, hath not been agreeable to the sentiments we have just expressed; and we beg leave to assure your Excellency, that every view of the nature of Christianity, confirms us in the conviction of its being our duty to persevere in the use of the mildest, most inoffensive, and conciliatory methods in our intercourse with natives of every description, conscious that by these alone we can impress them with an idea of the true nature of Christianity. And we feel high pleasure in the thought, that while thus obeying the dictates of our own consciences, we have the happiness of perfectly coinciding with the wishes of your Excellency and of the Right honourable the Governor General of the British dominions in India.

We have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) Wm. Carey,
Wm. Ward,
Josh. Marshman,
Wm. Moore,
Josa. Rowe,
Felix Carey.

Serampore,
Sept. 8th, 1807.

(A true Copy.) Prinzling, Secretary to Government.

(A true Copy.) (Signed) N. B. Edmonstone,
Secretary to Government.

(Copy.)

His Excellency the honourable J. Krefting, Esq. &c. &c. &c.

Sir,

WE have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Excellency's letters under dates the 3d and 10th instant, the former in reply to our Address, the latter received on the 11th instant, communicating to us the result of the measures which your Excellency had been pleased to adopt in conformity to our request for the suppression of publications obnoxious to the religious persuasions of the natives of India, and enclosing a copy of an Address to your Excellency on the subject from the Society of Missionaries at Fredericksnagore.

2. We request your Excellency to accept the expression of our cordial acknowledgments, for the attention which your Excellency has manifested to the request contained in our letter of the 1st instant, and for the measures which your Excellency adopted, with a view to ascertain the extent to which the pamphlet reflecting on the Mussulman religion had been circulated, and to prevent the future distribution of works of that description.

3. We have duly received the copies of the pamphlet which your Excellency had the goodness to require from the Missionaries and to transmit to this Presidency.

4. Your Excellency's assurance of the disposition of the Government of Serampore to meet the wishes of the British Government on all occasions, is consistent with our experience, and demands our cordial thanks.

5. Subsequently to the despatch of our letter to your Excellency's Address, we received information of the distribution of other pamphlets and treatises in the Hindoostanny and Bengally languages, printed at the press of Serampore, containing strictures on the religions of the Hindoos and Mahomedans, equally offensive with those contained in the pamphlet of which we had the honour to transmit to your Excellency a translated extract. We were also informed that the Missionaries and their converts were in the habit of preaching publicly in the town of Calcutta on similar topics.

6. In our letter of the 1st instant, we observed to your Excellency, that we had not then formed our determination with regard to the specific measures, which, with a view to the preservation of the public tranquillity, and to the vindication of our public faith, it might be necessary to pursue on the present occasion. With the additional information above

No. 7. Enclosures in Gov' Gen'l's Letter, 2 Nov. 1807, relating to Missionaries.

above described, however, we have since resumed the consideration of the subject, and the measures which we adopted in consequence, were carried into effect previously to our receipt of your Excellency's despatch of the 10th instant.

7. The works which are printed at the press of the Missionaries are expressly intended for promulgation within the limits of the British dominions, and even the operations of the press are principally supported by the aid and encouragement afforded by the Asiatic Society of the College of Fort William. The establishment of it at Serampore had no reference to the circulation of its productions within the limits of that colony, but is exclusively directed to the same purposes to which it would be applied if established at this Presidency. Under these circumstances, it appeared to us to be obviously regular, as well as highly expedient, that the press of the Missionaries should be placed under the immediate controul of this Government, in the same manner as the presses established at Calcutta. And with this view we signified to the Missionaries our expectation that the press be brought within the sphere of our direct authority, by being transferred to this Presidency.

8. We are satisfied that your Excellency will believe this arrangement to have been entirely unconnected with the slightest doubt of your Excellency's disposition to exert your authority in preventing the issue of improper publications, and will consider it to be founded exclusively on those general principles, which render it the duty of every government to reserve to itself the power of restraining irregularities within the limits of its own dominion.

9. For your Excellency's more detailed information, we have the honour to transmit, enclosed, a copy of the letter addressed by orders to the Rev. Mr. Carey, under date the 8th instant, communicating our desire that the press be immediately transferred to this Presidency, and prohibiting both the practice of public preaching at Calcutta, and the issue of publications directed to the object of converting the natives to Christianity.

10. The existence of a press at Serampore, being (as we have already observed) obviously unnecessary for the purpose of circulating works within the limits of that settlement, and exclusively applicable to the purposes of similar establishments of this Presidency, we confidently trust that your Excellency will not only concur in the expediency of the measure which we have adopted, but will withhold your consent to the establishment of any other press under the protection of the Danish flag.

11. We have perused with great satisfaction the Memorial of the Missionaries, and are entirely convinced of the rectitude and propriety of their intentions; but it will not escape your Excellency's observation, that the purposes of the press are liable to abuse without their knowledge and concurrence, since it appears from the tenor of the Memorial, that the Missionaries were not only uninformed of the objectionable nature of the Persian Pamphlet which has excited our attention, but that works of a similar nature in the Bengallee and Hindoostanny languages have been published at the press of Serampore, the contents of which were previously unknown to them.

We have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) MINTO,
G. H. BARLOW,
J. LUMSDEN.

Fort William,
15th September 1807.

(A true Copy.)

(Signed) N. B. Edmonstone,
Secretary to Government.

To N. B. Edmonstone, Esquire.

Sir,

1. I HAVE the honour of acknowledging the receipt of a letter from you, dated the 8th instant, requesting me to communicate to the Society of Missionaries at Serampore, the observations and suggestions contained therein.

2. In reply thereto, I have the honour to inform you, that I have communicated to the Society of Missionaries the contents of the said letter, agreeably to the request contained therein.

3. I have the honour to observe, in reply to the eighth paragraph, that I will endeavour to ascertain and report, for the information of Government, the places where these or any other pamphlets have been circulated. At present I am able only to say, that although pamphlets have been in circulation for several years, no one instance has come to my knowledge, of the least symptom of alarm having been excited either among Hindoos or Mussulmans in consequence of such circulation.

I have the honour to be, &c.

Serampore,
15th September 1807.

(Signed) W. Carey.

(A true Copy.)

(Signed) N. B. Edmonstone,
Secretary to Government.

To the Right honourable Gilbert Lord Minto, Governor General of India, &c. &c. &c.

My Lord,

1. THE Society of Missionaries residing at Serampore, entreat permission to lay before your Lordship, with the greatest submission, a full and undisguised statement of their situation,

No. 7. Enclosures in Gov^r Gen^l's Letter, 2 Nov. 1807; relating to Missionaries.

situation, circumstances, and views; humbly casting themselves on your Lordship's clemency, and imploring such relief as your Lordship's candour and wisdom and attachment to the Protestant religion may suggest.

2. Your Lordship's Memorialists beg permission humbly to represent, that in the year 1792 a number of ministers and others of the Baptist denomination, reflecting on the blessings they enjoyed through the Christian Revelation, and feeling it their indispensable duty to attempt imparting the same to the heathen, formed themselves into a voluntary society, by the name of the Baptist Missionary Society; and that your Lordship's Memorialists, influenced by the same views, by the advice of this society, engaged in a mission to India.

3. They entreat permission further to state, that one of your Lordship's Memorialists and his friend, since dead, landed at Calcutta in the year 1793; who being soon after entrusted by a gentleman high in the service, with the care of two indigo works in the district of Dinagepore, began to learn the Bengallee language, translate the Scriptures and dispense Christian instruction to the natives of that and the neighbouring districts; and although this was continued for six years, nothing appeared on the part of the natives but the highest satisfaction.

4. That the Right honourable Lord Teignmouth, being then Governor General of India, was pleased to grant these two Missionaries the covenants of that time, granted to British subjects in India.

5. They entreat permission further, humbly to represent that in the year 1799, four other Missionaries arriving at Serampore, were invited by his Excellency Colonel Bie, late Governor of Serampore, to settle in that colony, open an European school, set up their printing press, and instruct the natives of that settlement in Christianity, under the patronage of his Danish Majesty; and that your Lordship's Memorialists felt it their duty to accept his Excellency's invitation.

6. That in consequence of a representation made by his Excellency Colonel Bie, his Danish Majesty was pleased to direct the Royal College of Commerce at Copenhagen, to signify his pleasure to the Governor of Serampore, that the Society of Missionaries be considered as under his Majesty's protection and patronage, which they accordingly signified by a letter bearing date September 5th, 1801.

That, thus encouraged by the Danish Government, your Lordship's Memorialists proceeded to print the Scriptures in the Bengallee language; and, by preaching and diffusing religious tracts, to instruct the native inhabitants of that settlement in the Christian religion; and that his Excellency the late Colonel Bie was pleased, at the baptism of the first Hindoo convert, to honour the Missionaries with his presence.

8. That, after the Scriptures were published, many came to Serampore from different parts of the country to request copies, and to seek Christian instruction; and that a considerable number, at different times, have received Christian baptism.

9. That of those who thus came from a distance, some entreated your Lordship's Memorialists to accompany them to their respective homes, for the sake of instructing their neighbours and friends, who, though equally desirous of Christian instruction, were unable to take so long a journey; that in several instances they complied with these invitations, and invariably found these excursions attended with perfect quietness as well as safety to their own persons, although they appeared simply as Christian teachers; and the people whom they thus visited, were in several instances Mahomedans.

10. Your Lordship's Memorialists entreat permission farther to represent, that on occasion of the printing presses at Calcutta being placed under the controul of Government, the Most noble the Marquis Wellesley was pleased to enquire respecting the press at Serampore; but on being informed that, (official papers for the Danish Government excepted,) the Missionaries confined its operations to printing the Scriptures and religious tracts, and made it an invariable rule to print nothing of a political nature, his Lordship was pleased to express his satisfaction at the press of Serampore being thus employed.

11. That his Lordship was pleased soon after to accept a copy of the New Testament, translated by the Missionaries into the Bengalee language, and to express his approbation of the undertaking.

12. That in 1801 his Lordship was pleased to appoint one of your Lordship's Memorialists, teacher of the Bengalee and Sangskrit languages, in the College of Fort William.

13. That his Lordship was pleased soon after to direct the Missionaries to prepare and print the Psalms of David, and the Book of Isaiah, as a class-book in the Bengalee language, for the use of the college.

14. That on a subsequent occasion, his Lordship was pleased to assure one of your Lordship's Memorialists, that he was perfectly acquainted with all the concerns and operations of the Missionaries at Serampore, and felt great satisfaction at their affairs being attended with such a degree of success.

15. They entreat permission also to represent, that in the year 1803 a copy of the New Testament, and the Pentateuch, in the Bengalee language, were presented to His Majesty by R. Bowyer, esq. of Pall Mall, and that His Majesty was pleased graciously to accept them, and to direct that His Majesty's thanks be given to the Baptist Missionary Society.

No. 7. Enclosures in Gov^r Gen^l's Letter 2 Nov. 1807 relating to Missionaries.

16. They humbly beg leave further to represent, that early in the year 1804, reflecting on the situation of the different countries around, as destitute of the Holy Scriptures, your Lordship's Memorialists felt it their duty to request the assistance of the public in Europe, in the work of translating and publishing the Scriptures in the languages of India.

17. That in the year 1805, a letter was received from the British and Foreign Bible Society, of which the Right honourable Lord Teignmouth is President, and the Bishops of London, Durham, Exeter, and St. David's, the Right honourable Lord Radstock, Admiral Gambier, Sir W. Pepperell, William Wilberforce, and Charles Grant, Esq. Vice Presidents; the following extract from which, they humbly entreat permission to submit to your Lordship.

London, July 23d, 1804.

"Resolved,—That George Udny, Esq. the Reverend David Brown, the Reverend "Claudius Buchanan, and Messrs. Carey, Ward, and Marshman, be requested to form "a Committee, and to correspond with the Society respecting the best means of pro- "moting the objects of this Institution, with regard to the Eastern languages."

(Signed) John Owen, Secretary.

18. That in the year 1806, your Lordships Memorialists published a Memoir, in India, relative to the translations of the Scriptures, of which copies were transmitted to the honourable the Court of Directors, the Right honourable the President of the British and Foreign Bible Society, the Right Reverend the Bishops, the Universities in Britain, and a number of public bodies and private gentlemen.

19. That in consequence of this Memoir, a considerable sum was subscribed by gentlemen at this Presidency to carry forward the work; and that subscriptions have been received on the same account from England and Scotland, and also from the United States of America.

20. Thus have your Lordship's Memorialists, humbly relying on your Lordship's clemency, laid open in the most unreserved manner the whole of their circumstances; conscious of no evil design, they have never attempted concealment, but have year by year laid the whole of their conduct before the public, both in Britain and India. And they entreat permission farther humbly to state, that in the course of their missionary labours, they have baptized upwards of a hundred natives, including Hindoos and Mussulmans; of these, the first ten were inhabitants of Serampore, and the rest such as came from different parts of the country seeking Christian instruction. Among these, twelve were Brahmins, sixteen of the Writer cast, and five Mussulmans. Your Lordship's Memorialists entreat permission to add, that neither the baptism of the Brahmins, nor Mussulmans, created any kind of alarm, although the circumstances attending them were perfectly well known to a great distance around.

21. Your Lordship's Memorialists humbly entreat permission further to represent, that in thus affording Christian instruction to natives, they were perfectly unconscious of acting contrary to the declared will of the British nation and Legislature, or to the existing regulations of the honourable Company. Conscious of the salutary effects in renovating the mind and regulating the passions, they wished to impart the blessing to their Hindoo fellow subjects, happy in the idea that in every real convert they were securing to their country a friend, a subject obeying from new principles, and cordially attached to the British nation by new and inviolable ties.

22. They entreat permission further to represent, that though perfectly acquainted with, and highly revering the principles which induced the British Legislature to guarantee to their Indian subjects the full and undisturbed possession of their different religious opinions, your Lordship's Memorialists were perfectly unconscious of violating those principles, inasmuch as the most solemn engagements of this nature in Britain are never supposed to preclude religious discussion; and from the liberal and generous nature of the protestant religion, they were led to imagine that a protestant nation, while utterly averse to coercion, could not but wish their Hindoo subjects might in some prudent and safe method receive Christian instruction.

23. They humbly entreat permission further to state, that this supposition was strengthened by perusing in Russell's collection of Statutes concerning the Incorporation, Trade, and Commerce of the East India Company, printed at London in 1786, and dedicated to the Right honourable Henry Dundas, an abridgment of the Charters of Incorporation granted to the several East India Companies, which abridgment, among others, contains an abstract of the charter granted to the honourable Company by his Majesty King William the Third, and bearing date September 5th, 1698; in which it is stipulated, page xx. of the abridgment, that "the ministers of the honourable Company are to "learn the Portuguese and Hindoo languages, to enable them to instruct the Gentoos, &c. "in the Christian religion."

24. Your Lordship's Memorialists humbly acknowledge to your Lordship, that the conduct of other protestant nations towards their Indian subjects, has also tended to confirm them in this supposition, particularly that of the United States of Holland, who, while they allowed their Cingalese, Malabar, and Malay subjects, the free exercise of their different religions, at the public expense translated the sacred Scriptures into the former and latter of these languages, and employed Missionaries and Catechists to instruct the natives in the Christian religion; from which conduct your Lordship's Memorialists have never heard that in one single instance any alarm or disturbance arose, but that, on the contrary, these converted natives were often of the highest political service to their respective governments.

No. 7. Enclosures in Gov^r Gen^l's Letter, 2 Nov. 1807; relating to Missionaries.

25. That the conduct of his Danish Majesty Frederick the Fourth, who in 1705, at his own expense, sent Messrs. Zeigenbaly and Grundler to found the Protestant Mission at Tranquebar, tended still more to confirm their minds in this idea, particularly when connected with the subsequent conduct of the British nation towards that mission; for your Lordship's Memorialists entreat permission to represent, that on the return of the Missionary Zeigenbaly to Europe, nine years after the commencement of the mission, he was invited to a sitting of the Bishops and others, in the Society for promoting Christian Knowledge; and that after his return to India, he was presented with a printer's press, to encourage him in the publication of the sacred Scriptures; that this press the Missionaries set up at Tranquebar, where it still remains employed for Missionary purposes, under the patronage of his Danish Majesty.

26. That the gracious condescension of his Majesty George the First, by no means tends to weaken those ideas; for, in addition to the encouragement afforded these Missionaries by his subjects, his Majesty was pleased to write them two letters, in the first of which, bearing date August 23d, 1717, his Majesty was pleased to express his satisfaction at the success of their labours, and to assure them of the continuance of his royal favour; and in the second, dated February 23d, 1727, twenty-two years after the mission had been founded (a period in which the dissemination of the Scriptures and the baptism of a multitude of the natives had fully developed its nature and tendency) his Majesty was pleased to express his satisfaction in terms still stronger, to assure them that a constant account of the progress of their mission would be acceptable, and to "pray that they "might be assisted in this good work, that its perpetuity might not fail in generations to "come."

27. Your Lordship's Memorialists humbly entreat permission further to represent, that the conduct of the honourable Company towards the Missionary servants lately deceased, has tended to convince them, that in attempting to afford Christian instruction to the Hindoos, they were not acting contrary to the will of the honourable Company. In confirmation of this idea, they entreat permission to refer to the cenotaph, which the honourable Company has been pleased to erect at Madras to the memory of this Missionary, directing that the inscription be translated into the different languages of the country, that the natives may understand the sense they entertain of his transcendant merit in "abstracting himself from "temporal views, and for a period of fifty years going about doing good," in the character of a Christian Missionary.

28. Your Lordship's Memorialists most humbly entreat permission to appeal to your Lordship, whether their circumstances and employment in translating the Scriptures, and quietly dispensing Christian instruction, be not similar to those of Zeigenbaly and Swartz.

They acknowledge that their efforts bear no proportion to the labours of these excellent men, but entreat permission humbly to represent, that their motives and the nature of their labours are exactly the same.

29. They also entreat permission further to represent, that from the peculiarly delicate circumstances in which the efforts of the Missionary Swartz were made, among natives whose bigotry greatly exceeds that of the natives of this Presidency, and in the neighbourhood of the most inveterate and formidable Mahometan power which has ever opposed the British nation, they were led to suppose that if in these circumstances, attempts to instruct natives in the Christian religion were not injurious to the public tranquillity, but rather meritorious, they could not be of a different nature in this Presidency, freed from every powerful Mahometan neighbour, and when the natives, divided into numerous sects, indulge in literary and religious discussion to an almost unbounded degree.

30. That all they have had an opportunity of observing relative to the natives, has convinced them of this being their true state and disposition. They have found that in numerous instances discussion has been desired by their native teachers and approved by the multitude, even when it has ended to the disadvantage of their spiritual guides; that Christian instruction has been sought both by Hindoos and Mussulmans; that the prudent dissemination of Christian instruction for thirteen years, the baptism of more than a hundred of the natives, and the circulation of several thousand copies of the Scriptures, has created no alarm, nor excited among them the least dissatisfaction during the whole of this period. They entreat permission also to add, that one of your Lordship's Memorialists has been in the habit, for more than five years, of dispensing Christian instruction in Calcutta to his servants, and such other natives who choose to attend, without observing the most distant appearance of discontent.

31. Your Lordship's Memorialists humbly entreat permission further to intrude upon your Lordship's clemency, and to represent, that about a year ago a number of Americans and Protestant Portuguese, natives of Calcutta, stated to them that they wished for Christian instruction, but were too little acquainted with the English language to receive it at the English church, they therefore entreated your Lordship's Memorialists to afford it them in Bengalee, the only language in which they could receive it, one of them offering to fit up a part of his house for that purpose. Not imagining that by thus affording instruction to protestant natives, they were acting contrary to the will of Government, your

No. 7. Enclosures in Gov. Gen'l's Letter, 2 Nov. 1807; relating to Missionaries.

your Lordship's Memorialists felt it their duty to comply with this request. And it is with the deepest concern they learn that this has been mentioned to Government, as an attempt to inflame the minds of the natives, and disturb the public tranquillity.

32. They humbly beg leave to represent, that hearing instruction in their own language natives have occasionally listened without, but that not the least appearance of dissatisfaction has been observed among those who have thus occasionally listened.

33. Your Lordship's Memorialists humbly implore permission to represent, that it is with the deepest concern they understand apprehensions for the public tranquillity have been entertained from the productions of their press.

34. They therefore humbly entreat permission to lay before your Lordship a correct list of the pamphlets which have issued therefrom, with a brief view of their contents:

1. "The Gospel Messenger," a short Bengalee poem, written to announce the translation of the Scriptures. By a Hindoo Pundit, favourable to Christianity as an object of discussion, but still professing Hindooism.
2. "The Dawn of Wisdom." By the same Pundit. Written to invite his countrymen to the investigation of Christianity.
3. "News relative to the Salvation of Men."
4. "A Summary of Christian Doctrine."
5. "The Words of Affection," a Summary of Christianity, with an invitation to the Hindoos to examine it.
6. "An Address to the Worshippers of Juggernaut,"—4 pages.
7. "The Difference," a comparison between Khrishna and Christ. A translation of this, and the 1st, 5th, and 6th Articles, have been published in England.
8. "The Sure Refuge," "Salutary Counsel," and the "Enlightening Guide," three short pieces addressed to his countrymen the Hindoos. By Pelumber Sing, an aged native Christian.
9. "An Address to Mussulmans," with an Appendix containing some account of Mahomet.

35. Your Lordship's Memorialists humbly entreat permission to represent, that these pamphlets, with a few Catechisms (two of them Dr. Watts's) include every thing they have printed in the native languages, except the Scriptures, a book of Hymns, and the elementary books printed for the College of Fort William. The appendix in the 9th article, is the Pamphlet, a Persian translation of which was laid before your Lordship. This is the only one which your Lordship's Memorialists have at any time addressed to the Mussulmans, as they have generally found them less fond of discussion than the Hindoos. They entreat permission to add, that the Address was written and printed in England several years ago, and was selected by your Lordship's Memorialists, on account of its conciliatory tendency; that the appendix was drawn up by your Lordship's Memorialists, about three years ago, at the request of a number of Mussulmans highly fond of religious discussion,—that none of those epithets were used respecting Mahomet, which appeared in the Persian translation, and that your Lordship's Memorialists never heard of any Mussulman being displeased by the perusal in the Bengalee of the original copy, although it has been read for nearly three years. They entreat permission however to represent, that on receiving the first information of your Lordship's pleasure, they withdrew it from circulation in every form.

36. They entreat permission to assure your Lordship, that nothing can be farther from them, than an indifference to the public tranquillity. Convinced as they are, by all the observations they have been able make, that the British Government is the greatest national blessing vouchsafed by Divine Providence to India for many ages, and that the safety of themselves and their families, and of their native converts, depend in a peculiar manner on the permanent prosperity of the British Government, they entreat your Lordship to judge whether the dictates of religion do not concur with those of the soundest reason, in urging them to promote by every possible means, the peace, tranquillity and prosperity of the British Empire in India.

37. Your Lordship's Memorialists humbly entreat permission farther to represent, that they now have in the press translations of the Scriptures in the Sangskrit, the Bengalee, the Hindee, the Orissa, the Mahratta and the Guzzeratter languages, which they have pledged themselves to the public in Britain, America, and in India, to print at a stipulated price, a price precluding any profit arising to themselves from this work of public and gratuitous benevolence.

38. That for the sake of executing these works, and others which they are printing at a stipulated price for the College of Fort William and the Asiatic Society, and the accommodation of those concerned in them, they have been obliged to purchase and fit up premises at an expense of more than sixty thousand rupees, an expense involving them in debts which the most persevering industry and the most rigid economy has not enabled them in seven years wholly to liquidate. They humbly entreat permission further to state, that these premises, if abandoned, could be let only for a small monthly rent, and would indeed be ineligible to any single family, or to persons in a different line of business; while premises equally spacious and convenient could not be obtained in Calcutta for the monthly rent of a thousand rupees.

39. That in consequence of the difference in the price of house rent and other necessaries of life naturally existing between the metropolis of India and a small country town, the wages of native workmen in the printing line at Calcutta, are nearly double those given at

No. 7.
Enclosures in Gov. Gen.'s Letter, 2 Nov. 1807, relating to Missionaries.

at Serampore. Such works however as your Lordship's Memorialists have engaged in, with a view to public sale, relating chiefly to Oriental literature, are exceedingly limited and precarious in the sale, and will permit no addition being made to their price.

40. That your Lordship's Memorialists, with their wives and children, forming a family of more than thirty Europeans, are by their missionary circumstances laid under the necessity of adopting a degree of economy and frugality, practicable only in a retired country situation, as well as of training up their children (twenty in number) in the same course; they therefore entreat permission to represent to your Lordship's consideration, that these circumstances constrain them to contemplate a removal to Calcutta with the utmost dread, as involving the speedy and inevitable ruin of themselves and their families.

41. They beg leave therefore to cast themselves on your Lordship's clemency, and with the utmost deference to submit their circumstances to your Lordship's humanity and wisdom, humbly imploring the great Author of the Christian religion to pour down on your Lordship his choicest blessings, that your Lordship's Government, tranquil and happy to your Lordship, may be productive of the most beneficial and lasting effects to the millions confided to your Lordship's care; and that at a very distant period your Lordship may receive from his gracious hand a crown of glory that fadeth not away!

We have the honour to be, &c. &c.

(Signed) W. Carey, Wm. Moore,
Jo. Marsham, Josh. Rowe,
Wm. Ward, Felix Carey.

Mission House, Serampore,
30th Sept. 1807.

(Copy.)

To the Right honourable Lord Minto, Governor General, &c. &c. &c. Supreme Council, Fort William.

My Lord, and honourable Sirs,

I HAVE the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship's letter, dated the 15th instant. The necessity of a reference to the Missionaries, in order to enable me to answer your public letter, has precluded me from transmitting an earlier reply thereto.

2. It gives me great pleasure, my Lord and honourable Sirs, from the general tenor of this letter, to perceive your Lordship's acquiescence in the measures I have adopted, as well to ascertain the extent to which the pamphlets respecting the Mussulman religion have been circulated, as to prevent the future distribution of works of that description.

3. I am also informed, that the several copies I did myself the honour to send down to Fort William on the 10th instant have been received.

4. Your Lordship in council have been pleased to observe, that subsequently to the despatch of your first letter, information had been given of the distribution of other pamphlets and treatises printed at the press of Serampore, containing strictures on the religion of the Hindoos and Mahomedans, equally offensive with those contained in the first translated extract; moreover, that the Missionaries and their converts were in the habit of preaching publicly in the town of Calcutta.

5. Having considered it my duty to ascertain all facts with regard to this unpleasant affair, in order thereby to convince my superiors of the absolute necessity on my part to suppress the issue of all works regarding religious discussions from the press of Serampore, I have directed the Missionaries to furnish me with a translated copy of the pamphlet in the Hindoostanee and Bengalee language, which I have now the honour, enclosed, to transmit for your Lordship's inspection. The errors of the Mahomedan and Hindoo religion are (as cannot be denied) developed in this pamphlet; but I humbly beg leave to observe, that I do not find the expressions made use of so offensive, as those contained in the Persian pamphlet, in which the Mussulman religion and its founder are exposed in a manner I certainly did not approve of; I further beg leave to observe, that the Bengalee pamphlet alluded to in the 5th paragraph of your Lordship's letter, is not the production of yesterday, or of a late date, but has been in circulation since the latter end of the year 1804, or from the beginning of the year 1805. The habit of the Missionaries of preaching publicly in the town of Calcutta, on the topics of religion, is also nothing new, but will on due examination be found to have been practised there by them for nearly five years back, in which time no notice has been taken of their proceedings, nor has disturbance to my knowledge been the consequence thereof.

6. As it appears by the 9th paragraph of your public letter, that your Lordship in council entirely disapprove of the Missionaries issuing publications directed to the object of converting the natives to Christianity, I have, in order to evince the British Government of my utmost desire to manifest every practicable attention to the fulfilment of their wishes, prescribed such rules for the Missionaries, as will effectually preclude them from the possibility of acting contrary to your Lordship's political views in future. The press at Serampore is consequently suppressed. As far as may concern religious matters, the translation of the Bible and the New Testament is forbidden, until I can have the honour of of your advice and sentiments, whether the circulation of the Bible in the Bengalee language is to be included in your Lordship's prohibition.

No. 7. Enclosures in Gov^r Gen's Letter, 2 Nov. 1807; relating to Missionaries.

7. Having now, as I hope, given the strongest proofs of my readiness to meet your Lordship's wishes, and also my determination to restrain such irregularities as might give offence to the British Government in India, I humbly request that your Lordship in council will desist from urging the measure of having the press transferred to the Presidency of Fort William, a step which will not only cause the ruin of the Missionaries, but will likewise be highly prejudicial to his Danish Majesty's settlement Fredericksnagore, where the press is constantly made use of, as well with regard to the publishing of regulations within our own limits, as also for advertisements of all public and private sales.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew the high consideration and respect with which I have the honour to be,

My Lord, and honourable Sirs,

Your most obedient and most humble servant,

(Signed) J. Krefting,

(Signed) Printzling,

Secretary to Government.

Fredericksnagore, the 30th September 1807.

Some Account of Mohummud.

THE name of Mohummud's father was Abdulla; he died while young, and Mohummud was very poor, having only five camels and one maid servant. 571 years after the birth of Jesus Christ, Mohummud was born at Mecca in the Khoreish tribe. When he was 13 years of age, his uncle took care of him, and placed him in the service of a widow, whom he afterwards married; and by her wealth, became one of the richest men in Mecca.

From that time he, forming the idea of becoming a prophet, retired every year to a cave in the mountain Hara, and after some time, taking his family thither, told them that the angel Gabriel had appeared to him, and said "God has appointed thee to become a prophet." His wife and his uncle's son hearing this, believed it. Mohummud declared this at the age of forty, and very few became Mussulmans till after he was forty-three years of age, but by degrees his followers increased. When he was fifty-two years old, he told the people that one night he had gone from Mecca to Jerusalem with an angel, and from Jerusalem to Heaven, and had conversed with God; but when some of his followers heard this imposture, they deserted him. Mohummud, till he was fifty-three years of age, gained disciples by persuasion, after which, he declared that God had commanded those who would not embrace the Mussulman faith to be destroyed, and upon this, his enemies at Mecca sought to kill him, wherefore he fled to Medina. After this, he made war with his enemies, in which sometimes he prevailed, and sometimes they.

Seven years after his flight, he sent messengers to the neighbouring princes, attacking those who despised his message. Eight years after his flight he conquered Egypt, Syria and other countries, and also made himself master of Mecca: eleven years after his flight he died, but all Arabia were Mussulmans before his death. After his death, his followers by war obliged Hindoostan and other countries to embrace the Mussulman faith. The leaves of the Koran had been found in a chest after his death, and Abubeckar, one of his followers, putting those together, formed the Koran as it now is.

Mohummud had nine wives, and occasioned the death of many thousands of people, on which account we say that he is not a true prophet, nor in any respect the friend of God, as a murderous robber cannot be the friend of the governor general.

Mohummud deceiving, said, "I received the Koran by degrees from the angel Gabriel." When he wanted to delude the people, he would say, "I have this command from God through the angel Gabriel."

Many of the words of the Koran are found in other books; how therefore could Mohummud say, that he received the whole from God by the angel Gabriel?

We say that the Koran is not the book of God, because it does not prohibit all sin: it encourages men to commit adultery, to fight and to destroy others; but the Law, the Psalms and the New Testament, prohibit every sin and every sinful thought.

We say that the Koran cannot be the word of God, because Mohummud said, he was a prophet to establish the Law, the Psalms, and the Gospel; but in the Gospel it is written, that whoever adds any thing to these three by any other book, God will cast him into Hell. Why then did Mohummud write the Koran?

We say that the Koran cannot be the word of God, because in it is a very great mistake —the way of salvation. Behold, in the Koran it is said that men go to Heaven by these four works: alms, prayer, fasting, and pilgrimages to Mecca; but the Law, the Psalms, and the New Testament, firmly declare, that none can go to Heaven by his own works: and that Adam and Noah, and Abraham and Moses and David, and all the other prophets mentioned in the Law and the Psalms, repenting of their sins, rejected their own righteousness and trusted in the death of Jesus Christ. The Law, the Psalms, and the Prophets declare from beginning to end, there can be no other way of salvation besides dependance in the death of Christ. Therefore in the Law, the Psalms, and the New Testament, this the way of salvation is ascertained; but the Koran leaving this way, has instituted another. How therefore could Mohummud say that these three books and the Koran are equally the word of God? for God has instituted only one way of salvation.

No. 7. Enclosures in Gov^r Gen^l's Letter, 2 Nov 1807; relating to Missionaries.

We say that the Koran cannot be the word of God, for it is written therein that the happiness which people will obtain in Heaven, will be such as arise from a man's committing adultery with many women. But the Bible says, that the happiness of Heaven consists in constant purity of mind, in the joy of the heart and abhorrence of sin.

We say that the Koran cannot be the word of God, because it is said therein, that every thing comes by fate, from which, all say when they have sinned, "we do just what God causes us to do;" and thus have no fear respecting sin. The Bible says, that man sins voluntarily, and that God never causes man to sin.

As the Hindoos having forsaken God, worship idols, that is, praise, serve, and sacrifice to Devils; so you likewise forsaking God, perform prayer, oblations, &c. before peers; but what are peers besides idols? And as the Hindoos having made an image, call it Krishoo Doorga, and worship it, so you, calling a Darga the soul of a departed saint, offer to praise and worship it; therefore, both they and you, leaving the true God, serve another. There are also among you other customs of the worshippers of Devtas particularly, you regard cast, which the Mussulmans of other countries do not; disregarding the purity or impurity of the mind, you, like the worshippers of Devotas, regard only the purity or impurity of the body; at the feast Sabrat you perform the Shraddha for fourteen generations, and mentioning their names, pray to the peer for their salvation. At the time of Bukreed, he whom you call Rozdar, making a place in the earth, remains therein only through pride, and for the sake of a little gain. At the time of the Mohurrum, you make images of Hussen and Hosein, and worship and praise them, and the people ranging on the two opposite sides of Hussen and his adversary, take weapons and fight, and sometimes many are killed. At the festival Bara, you making a number of images, worship them, and indeed at all your festivals you make illuminations and other unmeaning shows, and not praying to God in secret, read your prayers in public, merely to be seen by men; and indeed they who read the Koran, instead of reading in private, that their minds may be fixed on God, read with a loud voice in public, only to be heard by men; and he who gives alms, only does it to be seen of men. Where many are collected, there you, on an elevated seat, sit and dispense your alms.

By all these and many other proofs, we know that the way of the Mussulmans shaster is certainly wrong, for of those who are great sinners, no one has a wish to leave sin, nor to obtain a pure heart through the favour of God; but innumerable sinners, believing in Christ, have forsaken sin and obtained purity of heart.

O beloved Mussulmans! why are you absorbed in this destructive delusion? Pray to Jesus Christ,—no one can serve you but he alone: He has been more gracious to you than any one, for to save your souls he gave his own; and the sins of all who trust in him, he hath borne in his own body; and he by the Holy Spirit prepares their minds for the enjoyment of the eternal happiness of Heaven.

(A true Copy.) (Signed) J. Marshman.

(True Copy.) (Signed) N. B. Edmonstone,
Secretary to Government.

(Copy.)

His Excellency the honourable J. Krefting, Esq. &c. &c. &c.

Honourable Sir,

WE have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Excellency's letter, under date the 30th ultimo, in reply to our Address of the 15th of that month, and to repeat the expression of our cordial thanks for the additional proof which the contents of it afford of your Excellency's disposition to promote the wishes of this Government. Actuated by a corresponding solicitude to accede, on every practicable occasion, to any proposition on the part of your Excellency, directed either to your individual accommodation or to the interests of the Danish Government, we have great satisfaction in revoking the requisition for the transfer of the press of the Society of Missionaries from Serampore to this Presidency.

2. We have no doubt that the Missionaries will be disposed to observe the restrictions imposed upon them by your Excellency, and by this Government, relative to the publication of works offensive to the religious prejudices of the natives; but as the judgment of the Missionaries respecting the tendency of works which they may desire to publish, and which are intended for circulation within the territory subject to the British authority, may possibly differ from our own, we are satisfied that your Excellency will concur in the propriety of requiring the Missionaries to submit to the inspection of the officers of the British Government, works of the above description, previously to their publication.

3. We are fully convinced of the rectitude of the intentions of the Society of Missionaries; and the precautions which we deem it necessary to adopt against the unlimited employment of the press, proceed exclusively from the duty imposed upon Government of reserving to itself the authority to determine what publications may or may not expose the public tranquillity tranquillity to hazard, or involve a violation of the public faith; instead of leaving the decision of such important questions to the judgment of others.

No. 7. Enclosures in Gov^r Gen^l's Letter, 2 Nov. 1807; relating to Missionaries.

4. Your Excellency having been pleased to refer to us the question, whether a translation of the Bible in the Bengallee language, is included in that description of books of which we are solicitous to prevent the circulation, we have the honour to state, that we are not aware of any objection to the promulgation of the Scriptures in that language, unaccompanied by any comments on the religions of the country.

We have the honour to be, &c. &c.

Fort William, 5th October 1807. (Signed) MINTO, G. H. BARLOW, J. LUMSDEN.

(A true Copy.)

(Signed) N. B. Edmonstone, Secretary to Government.

(Copy.)

To the Reverend W. Carey.

Sir,

I AM directed to inform you, that on a consideration of the circumstances stated by the Society of the Missionaries, in a Memorial addressed to the Right honourable the Governor General, under date the 30th ultimo, relative to the injury to which the Society would be exposed, by transferring the press from Serampore to Calcutta, the honourable the Governor General in council has been pleased to revoke the requisition to that effect, communicated to you in my letter of the 8th ultimo; the Governor General in council, however, deeming it his duty to establish a controul over the publication of works intended for circulation within the territories subject to the British authority, thinks it necessary to require the Missionaries to submit to the inspection of the officers of Government, works of the above description, previously to their publication.

2. ON this occasion, I am directed to state, that the Governor General in council is fully convinced of the rectitude of the intentions of the Society of Missionaries; and that the precautions which Government deems it necessary to adopt against the unlimited employment of the press, proceed exclusively from the duty imposed upon Government of reserving to itself the authority to determine what publications may or may not expose the public tranquillity to hazard, or involve a violation of the public faith, instead of leaving the decision of such important questions to the judgment of others.

I have the honour to be, &c. &c.

Fort William, 5th October 1807. (Signed) N. B. Edmonstone, Secretary to Government.

(True Copy.)

(Signed) N. B. Edmonstone.

(Copy.)

To N. B. Edmonstone, Esq.

Sir,

I HAVE had the honour of receiving yours of the 5th instant, stating that the Right honourable the Governor General in council had, in consideration of circumstances, been pleased to dispense with the requisition relative to transferring the press to Calcutta, communicated in your letter of the 8th ultimo, although deeming it his duty to establish a controul over the publication of works intended for circulation within the British territories, his Lordships in council had thought it necessary to require the Missionaries to submit to the inspection of the officers of Government, works of the above description, previously to their publication.

2. The Society of Missionaries desire me on this occasion to communicate to you, that they cannot but feel duly affected with this instance of the consideration and goodness of the Right honourable the Governor General in council, and entreat you to convey to his Lordship in council their deep sense of this favour.

3. The Missionaries desire me also to express the sense they have of the goodness of the Right honourable the Governor General in council, in entertaining so favourable an opinion of the rectitude of their intentions, and to add, that conscious of their earnest wish to promote the public tranquillity by every means in their power, they shall feel happy in complying with the wishes of the Right honourable the Governor General, as expressed in the first paragraph of your letter.

I have the honour to be, &c. &c.

Mission House, Serampore, 20th October 1807. (Signed) W. Carey.

(True Copy.)

(Signed) N. B. Edmonstone, Secretary to Government.

A.

DISTINCTION.

No. 7. Enclosures in Gov^r Gen^l's Letter, 2 Nov. 1807; relating to Missionaries.

BELOVED Hindoos! attend to language of affection. Why do you constantly say that Crishn and Christ are the same? I will point out the Distinction, and do you judge; for he is a brute, who will not make enquiry. Let him be espoused who upon enquiry shall be found to be the true Lord; be not fearful in so doing.

Crishn was incarnated for the destruction of Cangsa—Christ incarnated to ransom sinners. Crishn was incarnated on account of a war. Know verily that Christ is the redeemer of all. Crishn called the attention only to worldly prosperity—Christ instilled doctrines for redemption in the next world. Chrishn only studied his own comfort; the distress of sinners never occurred to his mind; he passed his time in gambols with the milkmaids and playing the flute.—Christ always spurned at his own comfort, and with his own body washed away the distress of sinners: He gave sight to the blind, life to the dead, speech to the dumb, hearing to the deaf: He is God, who has compassion and mercy. Beloved brethren! hear and judge. When Crishn fought with the Demon Saloo, he was not capable of protecting himself, and if India had not assisted him, Crishn would have been killed by the hands of the Demon Saloo.—The Lord Christ of his own mercy wiped away sins for the salvation of sinners. He endured endless sufferings in body to avert the punishment of sinners in hell.

When the bosom friend of Crishn fell into misfortune, Crishn was unable to go to his assistance.—Christ was capable of all things, at all times; and on all those who put their trust in him, he has bestowed salvation. When sinners come, he takes them under his protection, and they obtain salvation for ever from the torment of hell.

He is the true Redeemer and Omnipotent. Brethren, take heed and judge. Crishn was very angry when he suffered reproach: he abused India on account of the flower Parijaut—Christ was firm under the greatest reproach, and studied to return blessings.

Crishn was the instigator of a very great war between two parties and therein an army of eighteen* Aeshauhini was killed—Christ shed his own blood to atone for sinners, and thereby innumerable sinners have obtained salvation.

He whose forgiveness is infinite is the true God. O beloved Hindoos! judge of this: Crishn caused his pious friend Judhisthir to speak falsehood, for which Judhisthir was cast into hell. But how much distress did Christ suffer for his enemies, to procure them eternal happiness in heaven.

Those who worship Crishn do not ever obtain purity in mind. But many wicked sinners who have undertaken to serve Christ, have renounced sin and become pure in mind—He who teacheth wicked sinners to become faithful.

Hear, O beloved brethren! he is the true Redeemer. Why do you worship one who has neither compassion, mercy, the power to save, religion, or power,—why is he your all?

What salvation can he bestow on you, who plungeth his own friend into sin,—can he who has not power to save himself, redeem you?

O beloved Hindoos! worship him who is infinite mercy, who has compassion, holiness and power: He is the Redeemer of all, who is called Christ: He has power to grant salvation to the greatest sinners.

He calls and says, receive my words and be delivered from terrible hell, you shall obtain the remission of sins. O holy minded and true, in the next world he will give you the eternal riches of heaven. Hear, brethren hear, why do ruin your own souls, why do you not accept of such inestimable salvation? If you accept it, you will quickly be wafted over the ocean of sin; but if you do not, you will never obtain salvation.

Printed at Serampore, 1807, or 1213. (True Copy.) (Signed) N. B. Edmonstone, Secretary to Government.

B.

The FORERUNNER of the HOLY BIBLE.

HEAR, O worldly men! hear with an attentive mind, how you may obtain salvation from terrible hell. None of you seek for that; your thoughts are constantly employed about money, about all these trifles, and this world; every one of you is incessantly contemplating this world; all these things will be necessary but for a short time; after death you will by no means have property. Know all of you, that on being born you must die, and that after death you must either go to heaven or to hell, and without remission of sins you cannot go to heaven; with downcast countenance you will be cast into awful hell. What is hell like, or what sort the torments in it? Be informed, no one of you thinks of making himself acquainted with that. Insufferable hell is filled with everlasting fire, which will never be extinguished. On falling therein, brethren, there is no further preservation, the end of eternity is a beginning to it. Ye are afraid, but afterwards fall into this awful hell. Beware, beware of this inextinguishable fire, make Christ your asylum, take an asylum, for without that, no one of you will obtain salvation. Both Hindoos and Mussulmen

* An army consisting of 21,870 chariots, 21,870 elephants, 109,350 foot soldiers, 65,610 horses.

No. 7. Enclosures in Gov^r Gen^l's Letter, 2 Nov. 1807; relating to Missionaries.

Mussulmen have many sasters, the object whereof we have strictly examined, and there is no work of time redemption among them; they are sasters for the amusement of children, they are like tales.

In the Hindoo susters there is an account of ten incarnations; let me plainly state them, and listen. In the first place there was Narrayn in the form of a fish, for the protection of Sateebroto.

The second was a tortoise, for the support of the earth; the third a boar, to lift it up; the fourth was the man lion, to destroy the demons; in the fifth, the dwarf took Bali to hell; in the sixth, Parrusram destroyed the Khitrees; in the seventh, Ramchunder killed Kabon; in the eighth, Christna killed Cangra; and in the ninth, Buddha manifested the Buddhites. And if the story of the nine incarnations be true, still there is no redeemer. What will you do, how will you be redeemed from sin?—but we will point out a remedy.

We formerly had a similar sastra, but when we obtained the Great Sastra, we renounced that. Allow us to give you some information concerning it. If you be desirous of a remedy, attend and hear.

At that time, when the Almighty had finished the creation, he gave a mighty order to all men. He gave an account of heaven and hell. He pointed out the distinction between right and wrong. Hear all of you my infallible order, what I say, I will do, that is certain. If any be pure and practise holiness, I will give them matchless glory in heaven; but if any one sin, I will certainly cast him into eternal fire.

This is the primary order of God, after which mankind became wicked, and God knew it, but there was no redemption, and he ordered that some remedy should be provided. Through his mercy there was a provision for the redemption of sinners. If any person should assume birth on earth, and take upon himself the torment of sinners, those sinners who sincerely believe in him should be redeemed; and there was an incarnation of Jesus, the protector of the unprotected, full of the splendour of God, having been separated from his body in a column of splendour before him. He said, "I "will take birth on earth, and suffer all the "torment of sins on my body. Whatever "sinners take refuge under my protection, "you will grant them salvation." God said, "Yes, this is my promise, I will redeem "them. Mortals are under thy protection." After which, the Lord was conceived in the country of Judea, according to prophecy, in the womb of a woman. During his life on earth, he took the name of Jesus Christ, and he performed many miracles in various places. The blind received sight, the dead, life; he did many such miracles, he was so great. And he fulfilled the sayings of the prophets, and was killed by the hands of the people of his own nation, and gave up his life under various kinds of torment, and after three days he arose again; and because he suffered torment in his body for sins, therefore he was denominated Saviour of Sinners.

Christ did not die like people in general; he suffered much torment, and died miraculously.

When he took upon himself to suffer for us, his torment was intolerable; amidst these sufferings, he called out and said, "O God! why hast thou forsaken me, and left me in the hands of sinners?" And they spit upon him, vexed him and mocked him, and put a crown of thorns upon his head, and fixed his feet and hands upon a cross with nails, and when they had inflicted severe punishment upon him, they killed him; they pierced his breast with nails, and exhausted him, and when he shed his blood, they caused him to drink vinegar mixed with galls, and having tormented him in this manner, they killed him; they fastened two thieves, one on his right hand and one on his left, and when they had disgraced him in this manner, they killed him. In this manner died the Saviour of the World. On his own body he suffered the torment of sinners; and it was requisite for him to do so; without that, God would not have redeemed mankind. He paid the ransom of all sinners, and according to the security which he gave, so it came to pass. His death was the preservation of our life; his sufferings were the source of joy to the whole of us; the sufferings of Jesus Christ atoned to God for the torment of eternal Hell fire. God accepted of all that, and the faith of Jesus Christ, for the sake of sinners. He accepted of the death of Jesus Christ in exchange for the eternal death of sinners. As righteousness was the garment of Jesus Christ, so let us make faith in him our vesture. We go before God after death. Can you go in the presence of God? You cannot go before God by taking the name of Ram Chrishn Sheeb, or any other deity, seeing all those sinners was an abomination to the Lord. They will suffer eternal torment in awful Hell; but it is a great consolation to his mind to hear of the works and name of Christ.

Christ is now with God for the redemption of sinners who worship him. Those who die worshippers of him on earth, he cheerfully takes to the mansion of Heaven. Hear, hear, O people! hear my words. A copious work on this subject, named the Gospel, was first in the Hebrew and Greek; from these, the English made a translation of it; but not they alone; various other nations made a translation of this great and principal Sastra. The French, Dutch, Germans, Danes, Armenians, and various others, copied it. It went to America and Africa, and all other countries, and to all the principal islands. This holy book went to all these countries, and even in Malabar it was translated into Hindee. Whoever obtained this holy book renounced all previous sastras, and espoused it. It has now been translated into the Bengally language, and printed. Any one who wishes to hear this work, may come to Serampore, and we will read it to him.

Printed at Serampore, 1806—1213.

(A true Copy.) (Signed) N. B. Edmonstone,
Secretary to Government.

C.

Book called "The RISE of WISDOM."—(In verse.)

No. 7. Enclosures in Gov^r Gen^l's Letter, 2 Nov. 1807; relating to Missionaries.

1 Hear a mortal with an attentive mind, this discourse about Salvation, a mysterious subject.

2 If you be not saved, and fall downward, thy misery then, O brother! will be great.

3 Who can describe the extent of that misery? it cannot, O brother! be conjectured by the deepest reflection.

4 You know nothing of it, you have not heard of it, how can you know then the reality of it?

5 In that unquenchable fire which is beyond the power of description or contemplation, they who are in hell are crying and lamenting.

6 What will be the remedy, O brother! if you fall into it, the torments are manifold, where will you find an end to them?

7 The sufferings of hell, O brother! are endless; there is no end to them, and they are extremely severe.

8 Many of you have the sastras compiled by men, and say, "if we commit deadly sins "now,"

9 "We shall remain some time in hell, "and having received due punishment, be "born again on earth."

10 All these are vain hopes, false and deceitful; no wise man entertains them.

11 You do not know the distinction between Righteousness and Sin, or Heaven and Hell; you have become ignorant, from the use of the misleading shastras.

12 Moreover, the shastras of this country say, that men who reason the truth of the Vielas, will be born Chandalas.

13 Through this fear nobody investigates them, in consequence of which, this pernicious shastra is not exposed.

14 The Brahmans, with a view to their private gain, never allow the Shadras to read them.

15 The ignorant Shadras, who are not remarkable for understanding, dance about by command of the Brahmans, as the monkies of a monkey dancer.

16 They put the most implicit confidence in the words of Brahmans, not knowing that the Brahmans are deceitful and wicked.

17 The Brahmans composed written works for their own gain, to deceive the Shadras.

18 Hear, hear, O Brahmans! we speak to you all. It is but just to assist those who are under your protection.

19 All the Shadra race that are here, serve you as your servants.

20 They are perfectly confident that they will obtain salvation from the feet of Brahmins.

21 But you have propagated false and deceitful shasters, in order to take their property.

22 What conduct is this that you practice, O Brahmins! how can you practice so much fraud through coveteousness for wealth?

23 Had you taken the money of the Shadras by practising any other mode of fraud, so many of them would not then be doomed to hell.

24 They take your words to be the doctrine of righteousness, while you do evil actions and deceive them.

25 Let riches be lost, and even put life out of the question; but you have made them depart from righteousness, and doomed them to hell.

26 Many have fallen in that vast and unextinguishable fire of hell, and are incessantly crying out, O save, save, save!

27 Now what are they to do, say, O Brahmins! what remedy is there for them?

28 You diffused a false doctrine for the sake of wealth, and have effected the total ruin of all.

29 You have thrown a vast number of the most excellent of the creation, into hell fire; do not suppose your ancestors have escaped safe.

30 They are likewise suffering great torments in hell, with their families.

31 You will not believe that now, you are intoxicated with pride, and hearing you will not hear.

32 Discontinue this deception, O Brahmins! free yourselves from pride, never put deception and guile into practice any more.

33 All these Shadras are ignorant, and have no understanding; they immediately do whatever you tell them.

34 They are entirely under your protection; what great advantage is there in deceiving the protected?

35 For the sake of trifling gain to destroy those who have no other asylum left, is certainly a great injustice.

36 Hear, O Brahmins! you will never derive any good by deceiving all those ignorant people.

37 For a transient pleasure in this world, do not thus consume in hell those who have taken your protection.

38 Who else has such refuges? for the Shadras say, the Brahmins are gods.

39 Say, O Brahmans! what honour is there greater than this, they reverence you as gods, while you are the most despicable of men.

40 They have such faith in your words, that they all say, all the holy places are concentrated in the foot of a Brahman.

41 They receive the water of your feet, and believe it to be the Supreme God himself; and apply some of it to their breast, some on the head, and drink part of it.

42 All the Sadras have ever been under your subjection, as dogs are ever attendant on European gentlemen.

43 They do whatever the European gentlemen direct them, and throw themselves into water on a signal given.

44 All men serve you in this manner; the women also, confiding on what you say, commit themselves to flames on the death of their husbands abroad.

45 They take your words to be the most essential; they believe them, and sacrifice themselves.

46 Speak, O Brahmans! such you have seen occur

No. 7. Enclosures in Gov^r Gen^l's Letter, 2 Nov. 1807; relating to Missionaries.

occur in the world, still you have not the smallest grain of compassion.

47. You are ever meditating how you will obtain their property, by rehearsing deceitful shastras to them.

48 What sort of men are you, and what sort of usage is yours; is there not the smallest degree of pity and compassion in you?

49 They put confidence in your words and believe them; but how are they to know that you are treacherous?

50 You are deceivers; malicious, artful, pernicious and profligate, and thus destroy those who are under your protection.

51 What do you think in your own minds? speak, speak, O Brahmins! declare the truth.

52 Perhaps you say, "We are born Brahmins, eminent above the four classes, and are very great men."

53 "We will pass our days here, practising fraud, and ascend heaven in a car in glory.

54 "We are tutors of all, being of the Brahmin tribe, and the Lord of creation will not write down our sins.

55 "But should there be sins laid against us at any time, we will say the Gayatri once, and wash them away."

56 With such sentiments, and practising fraud, you conceive that the dangers of this life are to be surmounted.

57 You are perhaps confident of this thought, "We are the most rare race of created beings in this world.

58 "We shall never be subject to torments for sin; we shall go to heaven after death in the most easy manner."

59 This hope shall vanish. Hear, O Brahmins! you are all the meanest of mankind in this world.

60 All other people committed sin through ignorance, but your sufferings shall be greater than theirs.

61 You are deceivers, the betrayers of confidence and profligate; you have destroyed others by deception.

62 You now hope to go to heaven in an easy way; never entertain such a vain hope.

63 You are the greatest sinners in this world, and have moreover deceived every one by deception.

64 There is not deception only, but breach of confidence; who else can be greater sinners than you?

65 Treachery in this world is but a slight matter; they do not practise it in the next world, therefore your hopes are vanished.

66 What have you done, O Brahmins! what have you done! you have afflicted those who took refuge with you, and have thrown yourselves into hell.

67 Why have you committed such foul actions, O evil minded! if you desist now, you will be saved.

68 Do not be angry, O Brahmins! we are giving you good advice; be attentive and hear a wonderful story.

69 You do not daily compose, we suppose, such useless shastras as are extant now.

70 You are now obtaining the means of your livelihood through all these shastras and ancient books.

71 You know yourselves, that your ancestors composed all these.

72 They wrote all these false shastras for the purpose of elevating their own tribe.

73 Such is the root of this your trade; you deceive, take money, and preserve your tribe and families.

74 Hear—we speak to you by entreaty—never commit such foul actions.

75 Do not be guilty of sin, we tell you, O Brahmins! and do not burn yourselves in hell so easily.

76 Hell-fire is dreadful, in which there is nothing but torment; and what those torments are no body can describe.

77 In hell the torments are infinitely greater than can come within conception.

78 Those sufferings are eternal. Hear, O Brahmins! he who once comes under them, 79 Has no relief from the same at any time, he is without remedy; know this for truth.

80 Your ancestors lived before you, and died in the practice of these deceitful shastras.

81 Who can describe their misery, O brethren! they are lamenting in hell, from which there is no relief.

82 You will not believe all this now, but you will know it immediately after you quit your bodies.

83 When your souls quit your bodies, your understanding will be as radiant as the sun.

84 Then your soul will see all clearly, and perceive all that you have been, either good or bad.

85 After death the righteous are exceedingly happy, but the sinners are unhappy in the same degree.

86 Hear, O despicable Brahmins! and be attentive, if you are in the practice of these acts.

87 No sooner you are dead than your souls shall quit your bodies, and have a clear understanding.

88 Whatever you have done shall then clearly appear; you will be exceedingly astonished and tremble inwardly.

89 You will then see all these things yourselves, and know that there is no remedy.

90 You will then see that there is no place to flee to, you will lament and fall downward.

91 "What have we done—what has happened to us—why did we sin?"—You will reflect thus yourselves and be afflicted.

92 "O there is no remedy left for us!"—You will say thus, and all of you go to hell.

93 The vast hell-fire is burning in great flames; the fire of hell is not trifling.

94 That hell from which there is no relief, is the wrath of God; it has no end, nor is there any likeness thereof.

95 Such will befall those who are thrown into it, there is death, but the torments are great.

96 The body will not be consumed at once, but will burn by slow degrees as sawdust.

97 When it has burnt for an eternal length of time, even then not a single hair of the body shall be consumed to ashes.

98 Nothing can be said of the torments in hell, such dreadful sufferings shall be your lot, O Brahmins!

99 Do not be angry, O Brahmins! I will relate you something else—attentively hear it.

100 You do not know all this, but you think and say, "We act according to our "own shastras.

101 "Our shastras are great, they are dictated by God, there is no doubt of this.

102. "We perform the acts enjoined by "religion, and he who acts otherwise shall "go to hell.

103 "We perform the morning avocations, bathe in the morning, and say the "morning prayers, and perform the religious "ceremonies; and also perform the noon "and evening ceremonies without interruption.

104 "We are always pure, and never "commit any sin; we say the Gayatric in "the day and night.

105 "We have frequented many holy "places, and bathed in the Ganges; we "have lived at Benares for a long time.

106 "We have atoned by expiations the "sins we committed willingly.

107 "We have many times bathed in the "Ganges, by which act men are rendered "free from sins.

108 "Some of us have families and manage household affairs, and perform the "anniversary funeral obsequies of our departed parents, and other religious acts.

109 "Some of us become Sanysis, and "roam about the world, having abandoned "our wives.

110 "We variously worship the images "and other things that we make, and also "worship Crishna.

111 "Having performed such pious acts, "we shall after death go to heaven in a "celestial car.

112 "But should we have ever committed "any sin, we have made an equivalent expiation, which is an atonement enjoined by "religion.

113 "Sins are washed away by expiations, "we shall therefore easily go to heaven, there "is no doubt."

114 "But should any die without performing expiatory acts, he shall receive the "rewards and punishments of his good and "evil acts.

115 "He shall receive the punishment "due to his sins in hell, and come back again "and be born on earth.

116 "We perform the expiations enjoined, and shall go to heaven chearfully after "death.

117 "We have done all this, and shall "certainly go to heaven;" but Carey says, "You have all fallen in a great error."

118 All these shastras were not composed by God; men wrote them for their private gain.

119 These are not shastras, but vulgar stories, and you never examine them.

120 If you investigate all those shastras, they will immediately appear to be vulgar stories.

121 There was some one vulgar and profligate person, he was evil minded, and acquired knowledge by personal exertions.

122 He composed those deceitful shastras, became himself a sufferer, and made others sufferers also.

123 Your pride is very great in the confidence of such shastras, the very hearing of which is considered sin.

124 Do you come, I will discuss your shastras, and convince you these are vulgar deceptions.

125 Relate the particulars of shastras, O Brahmins! a true shastra describes the path which leads to God.

126 Your doctrine says, "a man who dies "in this world,

127 "Goes either to heaven or hell, in "order to suffer for his actions, and after "some time is born again.

128 "After having passed eighty hundred "thousand different wombs, he is born of "the human kind;

129 "And having performed good actions, "he receives final salvation: after which, he "has no more trouble."

130 This is the language of a child, and a mere tale—how can such things be probable?

131 Answer all the questions which I put to you, O Brahmins! and your deception will immediately appear.

132 God is eternal; you do not know his end; his greatness is boundless, and his attributes infinite.

133 The universe consists of fourteen worlds, which the immense Male holds in the cavity of a single hair.

134 Such immense Males are created by Lacks every moment—who can ascertain such sports of deity?

135 Consequently no one can say whether God has a shape, or whether he is shapeless.

136 His mercy is eternal, so is his wrath, and his commands are equally so.

137 If God be such, and his commands be so, his anger and his mercy are both infinite.

138 Why do you not understand heaven and hell to be so likewise? righteousness and sin are never otherwise.

139 If one become righteous, he goes to heaven through God's kindness, but he commits the sinner to hell in his wrath.

140 Say, O Brahmins! if God be eternal, his kindness is also eternal, there is no doubt.

141 His anger is also such; it cannot be otherwise; and punishment of hell is likewise of the same kind.

142 If the act which he has forbidden, be called sin, it is a matter of the greatest importance, and not a trifle.

143 His prohibition is durable, as he is himself infinite and beyond conception.

144 God made hell alone to be the place of punishment for such sins.

145 It is boundless and without end, from which there is no exoneration, even in endless duration.

146 Say, O Brahmins! if any falls into it, how can he be delivered from it by trifles?—state the reasons for it.

147 He will receive an endless punishment for an endless transgression,—say, O Brahmins! how can salvation be got by a little?

148 If condign correction be received, it will not decrease even in endless and eternal time.

149 Do not put your trust in false religion, O people! for you shall certainly be undone by it.

150. Speak

No. 7. Enclosures in Gov^r Gen^l's Letter, 2 Nov. 1807, relating to Missionaries.

150 Speak, O Brahmins! how can you say that if one sins, he shall remain for some short time in hell.

151 In the confidence of this deceitful promise of yours, no body has the fear of sin in his heart.

152 I say a word, hear it all men; he who is born of flesh and blood, 153 And is subject to covetousness, forgetfulness, &c. is incessantly inclined to commit sin.

154 Independently of this, they receive hope from you that they will inhabit heaven after a short time.

155 They therefore attach the minds to sin, from which the wicked never return again.

156 People remain joyful in the delights of sin, and commit it by millions, in various modes.

157 In this manner every one gladly commits sin every moment until death.

158 They pass their time in the commission of sin; but Carey says, they will fall into great trouble after death.

159 When the soul quits the body and is off, she will be far from covetousness, stupefaction, desire and anger;

160 She will immediately have a clear understanding, and plainly see what is sin, righteousness, good and evil:

161 She will then see no remedy, and lament, and beat her head in despair.

162 Say, O Brahmins! what remedy shall she adopt—she will know you to be the cause of her ruin.

163 The Sudras are ignorant, their intellects is like that of beasts, and they do not examine this guile.

164 Your religion also directs, hear all men, the worship of the gods for the expiation of sin.

165 If a prince or a sovereign wishes to derive any moral good, you direct him to worship the Gods, and satisfies the Brahmins.

166 You say, worship the God of gods Mahadwa, (great God) who bestows salvation to sinners.

167 Hear, O Brahmins! hear with attention, this is most excellent advice; every one has said so.

168 The God of gods, Mahadwa, is himself God, and not otherwise, it is true.

169 Sins can be cleansed away by the worship of God, but put your belief in his commands, O men!

170 In the worship of God, there is approach to truth; but they did not teach you such, and deceived you.

171 You perform the worship thereof, with various articles, and think thereby to be saved from the torments of hell.

172 The ignorant Sudras say, "perhaps "it is so, and he who worships this Phallas "shall be saved."

173 Hear, O mean Brahmins! what are you? I do not know what sort of people you are.

174 Mahadwa, (the great God) is a word excellent in sound, Mahadwa certainly signifies God.

175 His form, O Brahmins! is unalterable: he is all luminous, and he alone perfectly happy.

176 Who can relate his greatness and his attributes,—you know what Pushadauta said in Mahimnna.

177 Who can tell his greatness and attributes! they are beyond words and conception.

178 Such a God of gods, and Creator of the world, you treat with indecency.

179 You deceive the people, and profane the gods, and say that all this is ordained in the shaster.

180 Hear, O mean Brahmins! you are all shameless. What occasion has God for male and female organs of generation?

181 For the sake of the world, he created male and female beings.

182 Carey says, Tell me, O Brahmins! what will be the case,—how will you get clear of the torments in hell?

183 When sin is committed, there is no relief from terrible hell—how will you receive deliverance from that dread?

184 Your shasters say, on the authority of the orders, that sins are cleansed away by expiation.

185 This is no great wonder, it is true. Suitable punishment is given for transgression.

186 If any one commit sin, and performs an equivalent expiation, he is saved.

187 The commission of that which is prohibited by God, is sin—his fire is eternal,—who knows the truth thereof?

188 As God is, so is his command; and know it for truth, that his prohibition is also the same.

189 Then know that sin is an important thing; it is everlasting, and certainly has no bounds.

190 Say, O Brahmins! that if sin be everlasting, what expiation equivalent thereto has been enjoined by the shastras?

191 You say, that if any one commit sin, he can be delivered from it by expending a few couries.

192 Say, O Brahmins! how have you judged in this matter? can couries of trifling value be an equivalent to eternal sin?

193 The treatise that you have written on expiations, is only to deceive for the sake of gain.

194 Say, O Brahmins! how you consider the case? consider this to be a shameful act.

195 Out of covetousness for a pittance of riches, you are deceiving and throwing people into hell.

196 The people are stupid, and void of understanding as beasts; they take your words to be the truth of all truths.

197 You deceive all these mean people. What good act do you perform?

198 What you relate to the people as a shastra, is not so, but guile and deception.

199 You also say that the Ganges is a deliverer of sinners; if men bathe in it they are free from sin.

200 Say, O Brahmins! what are the criterions of one delivered from sin; to whom do we call cleansed sin?

201 In the shastra it is said that all men are full of sin; know of nobody is free from it.

202 Evil actions and evil disposition are the cause of sin; and covetousness, insensibility, and so forth, are promoters of sin.

203 These

203 These are in every man; all men are sinners; there is no man ever free from sin.

204 The following is the characteristic of one cleansed from sin; it is said in your doctrine, if any person is ever free from sin,

205 He is immediatly endowed with a divine wisdom; and these are the criterions of a divine wisdom:

206 He always considers sin to be like that which is forbidden to be eat, and with him a pious act is like unto a delicious dish.

207 On the sight of sin, he runs away immediately: these are the criterions of one free from sin.

208 He never has an inclination to sin: say, O Brahmins! who ever became so?

209 He who always bathed in the Ganges ever since his birth, was never from his evil intentions.

210 Evil intentions and evil actions are alway equally the same to him; his mind is always the same, and never otherwise.

211 Say, O Brahmins! if the Ganges washed away sins, sinners would receive divine wisdom immediately after bathing in it.

212 All the shastras are nothing but guile and deception; they are false fabrications of yours for your private gain.

213 What abject people are you, confess, O Brahmins! you even define God to be abject.

214 You say that the Ganges is the deliverer of sinners, and that the great Vishnu himself became fluid.

215 The great Vishnu is himself God, and becoming liquid, took up his abode in Nahma's vase.

216 He afterwards took up his abode on the head of Shiva; and thus the great are becoming liquid is the deliverer of sinners.

217 You then describe him as a female, and set forth that he was the concubine of Raja Santanee Raja.

218 What an indecent expression is this, O Brahmins! We know not why you are so vulgar.

219 You deceive men and speak profanely of God; what sort of men are you, O Brahmins!

220 You do not entertain any fear, O eminent Brahmins! respecting that dreadful hell which shall be your lot.

221 You are inebriated with the intoxication of sublunary things, and do not see with your eyes; but dreadful hell cannot be escaped from after death.

222 Nothing can be said of the sufferings thereof; you will even suffer the most excruciating torments.

223 You do not think of these matters yourselves, O Brahmins! you are drunk with the intoxication of sports, and dance both night and day.

224 What do you dance, and what do you sing, or what is your common usage? Hear, there is certainly an awful will after death.

225 Dreadful will be your distress after death; you will fall into hell, and cry out, O save! O save!

226 Who can describe all those sufferings, O Brahmins! such great affliction will be the lot of you all, O brethren!

227 The eye of your understanding is blind; you have no consideration; and consequently, O Brahmins! you do not think of the matter.

228 Hearing these particulars respecting you, many of us were touched with great sorrow.

229 We consulted together, and came from Europe on ships.

230 Our coming here with an afflicted mind is only for the sake of averting your evil.

231 Hear, hear, O all men! hear the truth! We are sensibly afflicted with grief on your account 232 You and we are all born from the same stock, and therefore verily know that we are brothers.

233 If our brother falls into distress, the other brothers of his are never easy.

234 We see your distress in the same manner, and cannot close our eye-lids through grief.

235 Hearing all this in Europe, we have come here at different times.

236 We have seen here, after our arrival, more than we heard in Europe.

237 What is this that you do, O Brahmins? you make an image, and say, this is the most immaculate.

238 You bring heaps of eatables, and place the same before it, and worship it.

239 Say, O people, what is this style of judgment? You ridicule God! O licentious!

240 These terrible sins shall never be washed away, O people! What perdition is this that you effect without cause?

241 You will certainly receive punishment for all these acts, and not be saved from hell, out of which there is no release.

242 There is an immense fire in awful hell; they are crying and lamenting there.

243 There is no remedy when one falls into it; its torment does not decrease even in eternal duration.

244 Therefore, then shall be mighty affliction after death; but if care is taken now, it can be averted.

245 If your fear of hell be great, we can tell you the remedy thereof.

246 If you be attentive and hear, and if you keep this word in mind, 247 We can tell you a remedy, if you will abandon deception and fraud.

248 Hear all men; keep your mind steady; the words conveying the means to obtain salvation, are an ocean of nectar.

249 Attentively listen, all ye men, and we will recount the particulars how sins can be washed away.

250 Such was also the usage in our country in ancient times, afterwards teachers came there themselves.

251 They came and communicated this news, from which were received means to obtain salvation.

252 They brought happy tidings to our country, and thence was published the Book of Righteousness.

253 Such was also our religion before; after receiving the Book of Righteousness we were satisfied.

254 You are in the same manner great sinners, you do not in the least reflect on righteousness or sin.

255 You are all void of sense, and have no eyes to your understanding, and consequently are not at all uneasy about sin.

256 If

No. 7. Enclosures in Gov. Gen's Letter, 2 Nov. 1807; relating to Missionaries.

256 If you receive this Book of Righteousness, the eyes of your understanding will be opened, and you will see all.

257 Be attentive and hear with a steady mind; we will tell you the truth of happiness, a wonderful discourse.

258 Be attentive and hear; we will tell you how you shall be saved, and be washed from sin.

259 You are first anxious to commit sins, and afterwards consider of what has passed.

260 Quit all the worships that are in your country, and do not perform them any more, any of you.

261 Whatever worships and prayers you have made agreeably to your shastras, consider as useless and futile from this day.

262 All your doctrines are guilt and deceit, and are for the private gain of Brahmins only.

263 Forsake them now, and make your mind firm, and hear the word of Wisdom with a fixed mind.

264 Christ descended on earth for the purpose of expiating sins, as is written in the Book of Righteousness the Evangelists.

265 Believe in him and obey his commands; he alone is the protector of the friendless to save.

266 Who he is, where he is, whose son he is, and why he was born here, 267 How he was born, with all these matters, men are to be learnt from the Evangelists.

268 From which we will briefly relate you something, so that this Book of Righteousness be made public.

269 All the acts are therefore fulfilled. O sinners! come now to Christ.

270 The sinner who verily believes in him shall have nothing to fear of hell.

271 In order to expiate for great sinners, Christ received the torments of sin on his own body.

272 Christ suffered and quitted life, and became an ample expiation for sins.

273 Therefore, hear, O men, there is no more fear; come to Christ in order to be saved.

274 Obey his facile commands, and you sinners shall be saved through his righteousness.

275 We therefore have no more to fear, success and welfare are certainly ours.

276 Do not fear any more, O sinners! bear love to Christ, and you will be saved.

277 Do not entertain any fear of cast or race, these are finite and of short duration.

278 Cast never goes with any body after death, is was instituted here by Brahmins for the sake of gain.

279 Be acquainted with the Book of Righteousness, and Christ the essence of all. God says, every one shall be saved through him.

(A True Copy.)

(Signed) N. B. Edmonstone, Secretary to Government.

Extract of a Letter from the Court of Directors, to the Governor General in Council at Fort William in Bengal; dated 7th September 1808.

Para. 1. WE have received by the General Stuart, your letter of the 2d November last, addressed to the Secret Committee, on the subject of certain publications which had issued from the Missionary press at Serampore, and detailing the proceedings which you had thought it advisable to adopt with regard to them.

2. Whatever is connected with an attempt to introduce Christianity among the natives of British India, cannot but be felt as a subject of the greatest importance, and of the greatest delicacy, and we lament that circumstances should have occurred in any part of our territories, to call for the interference of our Government in matters of that description. We are anxious that it should be distinctly understood, that we are very far from being averse to the introduction of Christianity into India, or indifferent to the benefits which would result from the general diffusion of its doctrines; but we have a fixed and settled opinion, that nothing could be more unwise and impolitic, nothing even more likely to frustrate the hopes and endeavours of those who aim at the very object, the introduction of Christianity among the native inhabitants, than any imprudent or injudicious attempt to introduce it by means which should irritate and alarm their religious prejudices. That the publication which first excited your attention, as well as the paper which you transmitted to us, marked C. entitled "The Rise of Wisdom," is calculated to produce those effects, we conceive can admit of no doubt, and we entirely approve of your endeavours to interrupt the circulation of them. Indeed the Missionaries themselves seem to regret and to condemn their publication; perhaps some doubt might be fairly entertained whether a considerable part of the paper marked B. was of a nature to have excited similar feelings, if the other publications did not prepare the mind to receive with some jealousy any works which issued from the same press. In suggesting the possibility of this doubt, we by no means intend to convey any disapprobation of that prudent precaution which led you to prevent the further publication of this last, together with those which appear to us to be more unquestionably exceptionable. It is a matter of great difficulty to draw the line which should at once describe and characterize the publications which might be permitted to be considered as inoffensive; and at the same time distinguish them from those which a proper precaution would suppress; and at this distance from the scene of Government, we can only state to you those general principles which we are desirous should direct your conduct upon this point; for this purpose, we would refer you to a passage in our political letter to Fort St. George of the 29th May 1807, in which we briefly intimated, in the following terms, our sentiments of what the character and conduct duct of Christian Missionaries in India, and the carriage of the Company's Government towards them ought to be. "When we afforded our countenance and sanction to the "Missionaries who have from time to time proceeded to India for the purpose of propagating the Christian religion, it was far from being in our contemplation to add the influence of our authority to any attempts they might make; for on the contrary we were "perfectly aware that the progress of real conversion would be gradual and slow, arising "more from a conviction of the purity of the principles of our religion itself, and from "the pious example of its teachers, than from any undue influence, or from the exertions "of authority, which are never to be resorted to in such cases." In the same spirit we would still wish to affirm as a principle, the desireableness of imparting the knowledge of Christianity to the natives of British India; but we must also contend, that the means to be used for that end, shall be only such as shall be free from any political danger or alarm.

No. 7. Enclosures in Gov. Gen.'s Letter, 2 Nov. 1807, relating to Missionaries.

3. With these two positions, which appear to us to be fundamental on the subject in question, the 30th Para. of your despatch now before us, in substance corresponds, for you there, after acknowledging "your entire conviction of the correctness of the state-"ment, which the Memorial of the Missionaries contains, relative to the motives and "objects of their zeal for the propagation of the sacred doctrines of Christianity," observe, "our duty as guardians of the public welfare, and even a consentaneous solicitude "for the diffusion of the blessings of Christianity, merely require us to restrain the efforts "of that commendable zeal within those limits, the transgression of which would, in our "decided judgment, expose to hazard the public safety and tranquillity, without pro-"moting its intended object." Agreeing then with you in general views on this question, and impressed with the necessity of leaving the application of these principles to the discretion of the Government upon the spot, we feel that we have but little further to suggest to you upon that part of the subject.

4. We observe with great satisfaction the temperate and respectful conduct of the Society of Missionaries, in the discussions which took place on the subject of the publications to which your attention was directed, and of the measures which you felt yourselves called upon to adopt; and we entirely approve of the permission which you granted to them of continuing their press at Serampore. Their residence at that place would probably be attended with little additional inconvenience to your Government, and we conclude, moreover, that the British authority has long ago been established at the different Danish settlements in India. We are well aware that the progress of the Missionaries, both Catholic and Protestant, for a long period of years, has not been attended with injurious consequences: their numbers have not been sufficient to excite alarm, and their general conduct has been prudent and conciliatory; and we have no reason to suppose that the mere circulation, in a peaceable and unobtrusive manner, of translations of the Scriptures, is likely to be attended with consequences dangerous to the public safety.

5. The paramount power which we now possess in India, undoubtedly demands from us additional caution upon this subject; it imposes upon us the necessity, as well as strengthens our obligation, to protect the native inhabitants in the free and undisturbed profession of their religious opinions, and to take care that they are neither harassed nor irritated by any premature or over-zealous attempts to convert them to Christianity.

6. In conveying to you our approbation of the controul which you had determined to exercise with regard to such publications as might issue from the press of the Missionaries, we trust that it will be found not only salutary to the interests of Government, but even satisfactory to the considerate part of the Missionaries themselves. They must be aware that it is quite consistent with doing all justice to the excellency of the motives on which they act, to apprehend that their zeal may sometimes require a check; and that it may be useful and necessary to introduce the controul or superintendence of Government; whose responsibility for the public tranquillity, will force it to direct its views to those political considerations, which the zeal of the Missionaries might overlook.

7. If, indeed, you had foreseen that the Missionaries would have shown that entire and ready submissiveness to Government, which their conduct has manifested, we think you would have doubted of the expediency of holding, under the circumstances you have described, a public proceeding upon their transactions; and we would only suggest, that if on any future occasion any fresh precautionary measures should become indispensable, and the interference of Government be again required, it would be desirable, in the first instance at least, to see whether a private communication from the Governor General might not effect all that is desired, without bringing into view the instrumentality of Government. Its authority cannot be seen actively to controul any of their proceedings, without exposing it to the inference of specially sanctioning and countenancing such publications and such conduct as it does not prevent, and thereby making the Government in some degree a party to the acts of the Missionaries, and making the Missionaries appear in the character of the agents of Government.

8. In adverting to your prohibition of the public preaching in Calcutta to the Hindoos and Mahomedans. At the time when we approve of this measure of precaution, we do not understand you to object to the Missionaries decently performing, at their usual places of residence, the duties of their religion, in chapels or rooms, at which admittance may be given to their Converts or to other Christians. We presume that the number of chaplains which we have appropriated for the performance of religious duties at Calcutta, is sufficient for all the British or other inhabitants of that place who comprehend the English language; but we do not recollect it to have been your intention to preclude other Christians there from hearing Divine Service performed in a language which they understand.

No. 7. Enclosures in Gov. Gen.'s Letter, 2 Nov. 1807; relating to Missionaries.

9. Having thus explained to you, as briefly as possible, the principles on which we wish you to act with regard to the Missionaries, it remains for us only to advert to your suggestion, that we should "discourage any accession to the number of Missionaries actually "employed under the protection of the British Government in India in the work of con-"version." You are of course aware that many of the meritorious individuals who have devoted themselves to those labours, were not British subjects, or living under our authority; and that none of the Missionaries have proceeded to Bengal with our licence.

10. Entertaining the sentiments which we have expressed in the preceding parts of this despatch, we are very far from disapproving of your having refrained from resorting to the authority vested in you by law, and enforcing its provisions in all their strictness against the Missionaries, and we rely on your discretion, that you will abstain from all unnecessary or ostentatious interference with their proceedings. On the other hand, it will be your bounden duty vigilantly to guard the public tranquillity from interruption, and to impress upon the minds of all the inhabitants of India, that the British faith, on which they rely for the free exercise of their religion, will be inviolably maintained.

No. 8.

Copy of a LETTER from the Bengal Government to the Secret Committee of the Court of Directors, dated the 7th December 1807, together with the several Enclosures accompanying the same; on the subject of MISSIONARIES: also, Extract of a Letter from the Court of Directors, dated 7th September 1808; in reply to the said Letter.

To the Honourable the Secret Committee of the Honourable the Court of Directors.

Honourable Sirs,

THE Governor General has judged it to be his duty to communicate to the Board, a Letter and Memorial addressed to his Lordship by the Reverend Mr. Buchanan, one of the Chaplains of this Presidency, in consequence of the measures adopted by this Government, relatively to the proceedings of the Society of Missionaries for the propagation of the Gospel, (the details of which we had the honour to report to your honourable Committee in our despatch of the 2d ultimo.) That Memorial containing animadversions on the measures to which we have adverted, introduced in a manner which we consider to be personally disrespectful to the Governor General, as well as disrespectful to the Government, and ascribing to both, motives and principles of action, of a nature injurious to the character of the British Administration in India; we deem it proper to transmit to your honourable Committee the enclosed copies of that Letter and Memorial, and at the same time to state such observations as the tenor of the latter appears to us to render necessary.

2. Of the acts which Mr. Buchanan has stated as the acts of the British Government in India, and the circumstances of which Mr. Buchanan has explained and censured under the present Governor General's supposed ignorance of them, the principal are those which formed the subject of our despatch to your honourable Committee of the 2d ultimo; and all are referred ostensibly to the prejudices and counsel of the officers of Government; and Mr. Buchanan has ascribed to the late and present Government, the adoption of measures directed to the object of opposing the progress of Christianity in India, on the foundation of opinions inculcated by its officers. The comments on the late measures of the present administration, contained in Mr. Buchanan's Memorial, are founded on the disrespectful and unauthorized presumption, that the Governor General, regardless of the first principle of his public duty, has blindly submitted to the guidance of the subordinate officers of Government, and adopted measures of the highest importance, without a previous consideration of their origin and tendency, and even without a previous knowledge of the nature of them; and your honourable Committee will observe, that Mr. Buchanan has described to his Lordship, as points of information, acts and opinions sanctioned by his own official signature as Governor General in council.

3. It cannot however escape observation, that the real design of the Memorial is to impute to the Government those principles of action which are ostensibly ascribed to its officers; and under any circumstances, it is incumbent on us to obviate a misconception of the motives and objects of the recent measures of this Government, which a perusal of the Memorial might occasion, if the errors of its statements should remain unexplained.

No. 8. Letter from Bengal Gov^t 7 Dec. 1807, on the subject of Missionaries.

4. With this view it is not necessary to enter into a discussion of the accuracy of all the facts alleged by Mr. Buchanan. It will be sufficient to notice those leading points of the Memorial on which is founded the extraordinary imputation of a systematic design, and an actual attempt, on the part of the present Administration, to support the interests of the religions of this country, by preventing the diffusion of Christianity within the limits of the British dominions in India.

5. Mr. Buchanan has contrasted the encouragement afforded to the propagation of Christianity under former Governments, with a supposed opposition to it under the last and present Administrations. It will be found however, that those proceedings of the Missionaries which have attracted the attention of this Government, are of a character entirely new, or such at least as had not come under the observation of Government. We allude to the practice of public preaching in the native language at the seat of Government, and to the circulation of printed works in the same languages, on topics and in terms grossly offensive to the religious prejudices of our native subjects.

6. With respect to the practice of public preaching to the unconverted natives of this country, on topics of this nature, we deem the prohibition of it to be consistent with the principles and practice of those countries in which the most liberal toleration is established for all religions, and consonant specifically with the principles and practice of the British Government and nation. In England, persons who profess the Roman Catholic faith, may assemble and assist at the performance of the rites of their religion in their own chapels, without opposition or molestation from the Government. So may the Jews celebrate the rites of their religion in their own synagogues; but we do not conceive the Catholic or Jewish Priests have ever claimed a right to preach publicly, not to their own flocks, but indiscriminately to His Majesty's protestant subjects, discourses for the express purpose of converting that whole protestant and Christian nation to the Catholic or Jewish religion, much less, publicly to revile and insult, in the most opprobrious and offensive terms, the tenets and ministers of the Church of England. If any indiscreet enthusiast of either of the persuasions above mentioned should hold a conduct so imprudent and so unjustifiable, and the magistrate should intervene and silence him, as he unquestionably would, we are persuaded that so reasonable an interposition of the magistrate would neither fall within the real and odious principle of persecution, nor experience that unmerited reproach from the mouths of the rational and ingenuous members of the religion attempted to be propagated in that manner. The late prohibition of public preaching in the native languages at Calcutta, was given occasion to, and rendered indispensable, by parties similar to those which we have just described, and was called for, also, by some peculiarities in the present times too obvious to need explanation, as well as by some actual indications of solicitude and incipient irritation in the minds of the native public of this city in consequence of those provocations.

7. Whether some regulation may not be devised, under which the celebration of public worship, and the decent performance of the Christian rites, may be allowed to native Christians, is an interesting point, to which we are neither indifferent nor inattentive. The indiscreet mode in which those duties were lately administered, coupled with other considerations of an occasional and we trust temporary nature, required in our judgment for the moment, the immediate suspension of a practice, which, in the form then given to it, threatened consequences prejudicial to the public repose, and not less adverse to the success of the pious purpose proposed by the Missionaries themselves.

8. In India, considerations of public safety are superadded, in a more than ordinary degree, to the obligation contracted by Government of protecting the rights and privileges of the subject; and we cannot doubt that the wisdom of every former administration in India, would have suggested the necessity of prohibiting this practice, if known to prevail in the manner in which it recently prevailed in the seat of Government.

9. Mr. Buchanan, by the tenor of his Memorial, has permitted a conclusion to be drawn, that printed works, of the nature described in the 5th paragraph of this despatch, have been circulated under former Governments without opposition or controul, and that the suppression of them is an innovation in principle, as well as in act, upon the practice of preceding administrations. The existing restrictions upon the press in India, however, have been in force during a long course of years, and it cannot be supposed that any former administration would have deemed it consistent with the public safety, or with the obligation of public faith, as pledged to the native subjects of the Company, for the unmolested exercise of their religions, to permit the circulation of such inflammatory works as those which we have lately had occasion to bring under the notice of your honourable Committee. In support of this opinion, we deem it proper to state the circumstances of a transaction which occurred during the administration of Marquis Wellesley, analogous to the proceedings of the present Government in suppressing the public discussion, either by preaching or by printed works, of topics offensive to the religions of our native subjects.

10. In the year 1804, the following subject of disputation, in the college of Fort William, having been proposed, viz. "The advantage which the natives of this country might derive "from translations, in the vernacular tongues, of the books containing the principles of their "respective religions, and those of the Christian faith:" the prepared discussion of which subject was reported to involve topics offensive to the religious prejudices of the class of Mahomedans: a number of the most respectable and learned of the Mussulman inhabitants of Calcutta addressed a Memorial to the Governor General, Marquis Wellesley, remonstrating strating against this supposed infringement of the unequivocal toleration which they acknowledged with gratitude the Government had till then afforded to the unmolested exercise of the religions of its subjects. In reply to this Memorial, a declaration was addressed to the memorialists, in the name and by the authority of the Governor General, in which, after adverting, as a fundamental principle of the British Government, to the solicitude with which Government not only abstained from all interference in the religious concerns of its Mussulman and Hindoo subjects, and from any endeavour to disturb their faith or to impede that full and free exercise of their respective religions which they enjoyed under the Mussulman Government, but even afforded additional facilities to them in the observance of all the rites, ceremonies, and duties of their respective persuasions; and after explaining to the memorialists the error of their apprehensions regarding the object and design of the disputation which had been proposed, and the real purpose of the disputations annually holden in the college of Fort William, and assuring the memorialists that the examination of any question whatever connected with the interests of religion, and especially the degradation of the religions of this country and the propagation of the Christian faith, were entirely foreign to the objects of the institution, the Governor General signified to the memorialists, that although, on perusing the proposed thesis, he perceived no principle of an objectionable tendency, yet that with a view to prevent the possibility of any apprehension on the part of the natives of this country that it might be the intention of the British Government to depart from the system of unlimited toleration which it had hitherto uniformly observed, the moment that the Governor General was apprized of the subject of the proposed thesis, he issued orders positively prohibiting the disputation upon that thesis; and copies of this declaration were circulated to all the principal stations under this Presidency and to the foreign Residencies, with a view to enable the officers and representatives of Government to counteract at those stations any eventual alarm of the nature of that which had been excited at the Presidency.

No. 8. Letter from Bengal Govt 7 Dec. 1807, on the subject of Missionaries.

11. From this transaction may be inferred not only the effect which public discussions respecting the religions of the country are calculated to produce, but also the solicitude of that very administration to which Mr. Buchanan has specially appealed as encouraging the propagation of the Christian faith in India, to suppress discussions such as those which we have deemed it our duty to prohibit.

12. The composition of works directed to the object of converting the natives to Christianity, so naturally leads to discussions of that nature, that the evils resulting from the latter, must necessarily be hazarded by an unrestrained toleration of the former, and our decision upon this new question has been regulated not by any innovation or former established principles, but by those maxims of prudence and precaution which the condition of the British establishment in this country requires, and the neglect of which, would in our decided judgment, not only expose to hazard the stability of the British dominion in India, but would impede the accomplishment of the very object which animates the pious labours of the Society of Christian Missionaries in the work of conversion.

13. These consequences must be hazarded in a peculiar degree by a supposed connection between the efforts thus employed for the conversion of the natives, and the measures of the Government, which, on grounds already stated, have been rendered by the highest prescriptive authority, and by the uniform practice of the British Government in India, systematically distinct; and in our despatch to your honourable Committee, of the 2d ultimo, we have explained the circumstances which, in the present condition of the British power in India, more than at any former period, would tend to establish in the minds of the natives a belief of that conviction under the unlimited toleration of those proceedings on the part of the Missionaries which we have deemed it our duty to repress.

14. The expediency and necessity of protecting our native subjects in the undisturbed enjoyment of their religious opinions and usages, and of carefully withholding the influence of Government for the support of the endeavours of Missionaries to convert the natives to Christianity; in other words, the real principles of action and maxims of precaution which have regulated the proceedings of this Government with respect to the Missionaries and to the productions of their press, have been recognized and inculcated in the most forcible and explicit terms, in the following extracts from the letter of the honourable the Court of Directors to the Government of Fort St. George, dated the 29th of May, on the subject of the mutiny at Vellore.

"In the whole course of our administration of the Indian territories, it has been our "known and declared principle to maintain a perfect toleration of the various religious "systems which prevailed in it, to protect the followers of each in the undisturbed enjoy"ment of their respective opinions and usages, and neither to interfere with them our"selves, nor to suffer them to be molested by others."

"When we afforded our countenance and sanction to Missionaries who have from time "to time proceeded to India, for the purpose of propagating the Christian religion, it was "far from being in our contemplation to add the influence of our authority to any attempts "they might make, for on the contrary we were perfectly aware that the progress of real "conversion would be slow and gradual, arising more from a conviction of the principles "of our religion itself, and from the pious examples of its teachers, than from any undue "influence or from the exertions of authority, which are never to be resorted to in such cases.

15. Your honourable Committee will be satisfied, by the tenor of our present despatch, and of our despatch of the 2d ultimo, that these are precisely the principles which have regulated our late proceedings with regard to the Missionaries, and that Mr. Buchanan, in ascribing to us a disposition hostile to Christianity, has assumed a latitude of censure equally disrespectful in its nature and unwarranted by facts.

No. 8. Letter from Bengal Gov. 7 Dec. 1807, on the subject of Missionaries.

16. With respect to the injurious position stated in Mr. Buchanan's Memorial, that under the proceedings sanctioned by this Government, the tendency of publications directed to the object of converting the natives is submitted to the decision of a Mahomedan or a Hindoo, it is obvious to remark, that Government itself is competent to judge of it through the medium of translation; that the intervention of a native is not necessary to enable us to obtain information regarding the contents of any publication in the Persian, Arabic, Hindostanee or Bengalee languages; and that our late proceedings with regard to the works, of which translations were enclosed in our despatch to your honourable Committee of the 2d ultimo, was the result of our own judgment of the nature and tendency of those works.

17. The intimation contained in Mr. Buchanan's Memorial, that this Government has established a new and specific imprimatur with respect to works on theology, appears to us to require some observations relative to the nature and effect of the restrictions on the press, which since their original establishment have continued to operate without relaxation.

18. This intimation, although bearing reference to those publications of the press of Serampore, which we have judged it necessary to prohibit or restrain, appears to be principally founded on the requisition noticed at the commencement of Mr. Buchanan's Memorial, on the subject of submitting certain discourses on the prophecies, which Mr. Buchanan proposed to publish, to the inspection of Government previously to their publication; it is proper therefore to explain the circumstances of that transaction.

19. The superintendant of the Company's press having received from Mr. Buchanan the draft of an advertisement, which announced the intended publication of Mr. Buchanan's Sermons preached in the Presidency Church, on the Prophecies, deemed it his duty to obtain the sanction of Government to the publication of those sermons, and consequently to the insertion in the Government Gazette, of the advertisement announcing their intended publication, and accordingly communicated the draft of the proposed advertisement to Government through the channel of its officers. Upon this reference, the Chief Secretary was directed to request, that Mr. Buchanan would send the manuscript for the inspection of Government, previously to its publication, and under this order, the publication of the advertisement also was of course suspended. This transaction is considered by Mr. Buchanan to amount to a suppression of the Sermons on the Prophecies, because a condition was attached to the publication of them, which Mr. Buchanan erroneously supposed to be the revision of them by the officers of Government, a condition to which he could not conscientiously accede.

20. Mr. Buchanan however must be supposed to object to the revision of those discourses by the Government itself, as the condition of their publication, because the charge of establishing an imprimatur on works of theology, if it does not refer to the revision of the Government, is founded, as far as relates to the discourses in question, on an erroneous construction of the Chief Secretary's requisition, which expressly declared that the manuscript was to be submitted to the inspection of Government.

21. Not having had an opportunity of perusing those discourses, we can form no judgment of the propriety of their publication. The printing an exposition of the sacred prophecies would certainly, as such, have met with no opposition from us, nor would the prophecy, most disrespectfully and improperly stated by Mr. Buchanan as a particular object of alarm to us, viz. the final conversion of all mankind to the Christian faith, have rendered the publication in our judgment objectionable. At the same time, if in commenting on that prophecy, Mr. Buchanan should have been found to have introduced into his discources strictures on the religion of the Mahomedans and Hindoos, of the nature of those which in the form of works published for the perusal of the natives of this country, we had deemed it our duty to suppress, or to have enlarged on the topic of the immediate and general conversion of our subjects in the East to Christianity, we should probably have judged the promulgation of such remarks from the pulpit of the Presidency and the press of Government, to be unseasonable and inexpedient, in the present conjuncture of affairs.

22. Of this nature only are the restrictions which we desire to impose on the publication of theological works in this country. Those restrictions obviously form a part of that general controul which, in the actual state of our dominion in India, it is indispensably necessary to impose on the productions of the press, for the security of the public interests and the preservation of the public tranquillity in this important branch of the British empire; such restrictions have virtually existed during the whole period of the British supremacy in India; the occasion for the active exercise of them has only recently occurred.

23. Religious discussions, as being calculated in a peculiar degree to affect the public tranquillity, are the direct and proper objects of a general controul, which has been established over the productions of the press, for purposes of national interest and public security; and in India more than in all other countries, the controul of religious publications is indispensable for the public safety.

24. This necessity cannot be exemplified in terms more just or more forcible than in the following extract from a work published by Mr. Buchanan in England, and entitled, "A Memoir on the expediency of an Ecclesiastical Establishment in India."

No. 8. Letter from Bengal Govt 7 Dec. 1807, on the subject of Missionaries.

"The Mahomedans profess a religion which has ever been characterized by political "bigotry and intemperate zeal. In this country that religion still retains the character of "its bloody origin, particularly among the higher classes. Whenever the Mahomedan "feels his religion touched, he grasps his dagger. This spirit was seen in full operation "under Tippoo's government, and it is not now extinguished."

25. The practical effect of this sanguinary spirit of bigotry, as exemplified in the mutiny of Vellore, and in the events which succeeded it, can hardly escape observation; for although Mr. Buchanan, on the ground of his personal communication with some of the natives on the coast, is of opinion that the insurrection at Vellore had no connection with the Christian religion directly or indirectly, immediately or remotely, we are compelled to form a different judgment from the mass of authentic evidence and information on that unhappy event, recorded on the proceedings of Government; and we are satisfied that a persuasion (a most erroneous one indeed, but a firm and sincere persuasion) in the breasts of a great proportion of the Sepoys who were thus betrayed into the execution of the massacre of Vellore, and of those who subsequently manifested a spirit of insurrection, that a design existed on the part of the British Government to operate a general conversion of the inhabitants of India to Christianity, was one of the most efficient causes of that horrible disaster. Responsible therefore to our Sovereign, to our immediate superiors, and to our country, for the security and tranquillity of this empire, we should have neglected a primary obligation of our public duty, if at any period of time, but especially while such impressions were recent, we had permitted the circulation within the British territories, of works reviling the religions of our subjects, and distinctly declaring a desire to convert them to the Christian faith. Under the influence of the same sentiments and circumstances also, we cannot but question the prudence of publishing, with the sanction of the supreme British authority in India, the approaching and instant conversion of the inhabitants of this country to Christianity.

26. The imposition of a restraint, therefore, on the promulgation of writings of the above description, is but the application of a long authorized and existing controul over the conduct of the press, to the most important of the objects for which that controul was originally established; and consequently, as far as the public safety is concerned, works on theology, like works on other subjects, must be considered to be subject to a civil revision.

27. It is true, that no direct controul over the press of the Missionaries at Serampore, had been specifically declared to exist, or had ever been exercised by the British Government, because no abuse of that press had attracted notice. But under the peculiar circumstances of the settlement of Serampore, and of the press established in it, our right to controul the productions of the Missionary press cannot be disputed.

28. The population of Serampore cannot afford employment to a press in any degree sufficient to support the charges attending it. The only purposes connected with the concerns of the Danish Government, or of the inhabitants of Serampore, to which the press of the Missionaries was applied, were (as stated by the Governor of that settlement, in his letter of the 30th of September) the publishing of regulations and advertisements of public and private sales. All works printed at that press were necessarily intended for circulation in the British territories, and were so circulated, and the pamphlets which attracted our notice were sent to this Presidency and its vicinity, for distribution among our native subjects.

29. The Missionaries themselves are all British subjects; Mr. Carey, the chief member of the Society, holds the situation of Professor of the Shanscrit and Bengalee languages in the College of Fort William, and the leading members occasionally reside at this Presidency. The Danish Government permitted, and motives of convenience induced them to establish their press at Serampore. But the press is principally supported by the aid and encouragement afforded by the Asiatic Society and the College of Fort William. It is consequently to all intents and purposes a British press, and its productions must necessarily be considered by the community at large to issue under the patronage and sanction of the British Government. The same considerations therefore which require the exercise of an efficient controul over the presses established at this Presidency, are equally applicable to the press at Serampore. When its productions were found to be of a nature hazardous to the public tranquillity, it became the absolute duty of this Government to give effect to that controul; and adverting to the inconvenience, and in some degree the inefficiency, under which the controul of a press established in a foreign jurisdiction must be exercised, we deemed it advisable to simplify and facilitate the execution of that system, by requiring that a press, the productions of which were to circulate exclusively in the British territories, should be transferred to those territories, and be brought fairly and ostensibly within the scope of that observation which was entitled to controul it. We therefore desired the Missionaries to remove their press to Calcutta, apprising the Danish Governor at the same time, that we had deemed it necessary to signify that desire to the Missionaries, and stating to him the grounds of the measure.

30. The right of the British Government to exercise a controul over the press of Serampore, and for that purpose to require the transfer of it to the Presidency, was not contested by the Governor of Serampore, who far from resisting the demand for its removal, on the plea of the sovereignty of his nation, as erroneously asserted by Mr. Buchanan, merely solicited the revocation of that demand, on the ground of the distress to which the Missionaries would be exposed by our exacting a compliance with it; stating an additional inducement, in the convenience which the Government and inhabitants of Serampore experienced from the use of the press, in publishing regulations and advertisements of public and private sales.

No. 8.
Letter from Bengal Govt 7 Dec. 1807, on the subject of Missionaries.

31. We at the same time received from the Missionaries the Memorial, of which a copy formed an enclosure in our despatch to your honourable Committee of the 2d ultimo, wherein the Missionaries represented the peculiar circumstances of their property at Serampore, and explained the very serious and distressing consequences to the individuals composing the Mission, as well as to the body itself, and to a considerable number of families connected with them as servants and dependants, which would result from the removal of the press from Serampore. Being satisfied of the truth of these representations, and nothing being further from our views and disposition than to effect in the smallest degree either the interests of the Missionary body, or the personal comfort and convenience of those worthy individuals, we withdrew without hesitation that part of the measure, and remained satisfied with the assurance of the Missionaries, that the works to be hereafter printed at Serampore, should be previously submitted to the revision and sanction of our Government.

32. The attention with which we listened to the representations of the Missionaries, concerning the distress which the removal of their press would occasion, was acknowledged by them in terms of fervent gratitude; and in reply to our letter communicating to the Governor of Serampore our compliance with the solicitation of the Missionaries, his Excellency expressed "his most grateful acknowledgments for the moderation we had so "generously manifested" on this occasion.

33. It will be evident, from the facts and observations which we have stated to your honourable Committee, that no innovation has taken place in the principles and practice of this Government relatively, to the controul of the productions of the press; that no new and specific imprimatur has been established for works on theology, but that the restrictions which virtually existed with regard to publications in general, were practically applied to theological works, only when works of that class, containing strictures on the religions of the country in terms the most irritating and offensive, by being circulated among our native subjects, exposed the public tranquillity to hazard.

34. Mr. Buchanan's indecent comments on our reply to the reference of the Governor of Serampore, relative to the translation of the Bible (which reply Mr. Buchanan has communicated to the Governor General, as a point of information, and as a subject of concern to his Lordship) merely suggest the expediency of remarking, that we should deem it our duty to oppose the publication of any strictures on the religions of the country, such as we have already suppressed, whether promulgated in the form of separate tracts, or of prefatory notes to a translation of the Holy Scriptures.

35. Our solicitude for the suppression of publications of that nature, combines with a vigilant attention to the public safety and tranquillity, a regard for the successful propagation of the truths of Christianity among the misguided natives of these distant countries, by the only means which can promote its success,—the operation of example in the conduct of its preachers and professors in the principles which it inculcates, and in the effects which it produces on the dignity of individual character, and on the general happiness and welfare of mankind; united also with the means of instruction, when instruction is desired; but unconnected with the language of irritation, with revilings against the religions of the country, and with prophetic denunciations of their immediate subversion.

36. We shall conclude this discussion by observing, that it has never been in the contemplation, either of the present or the preceding administration of this Government, to controul or impede the pious labours of the Missionaries, while conducted in the manner which prudence dictates, and which the orders of the honourable Court have distinctly prescribed. But when the mistaken zeal of the Missionaries exceeded those limits which considerations of public safety, and even a solicitude for the propogation of Christian knowledge among the misguided natives of these countries, have wisely imposed; when publications and public preachings, calculated not to conciliate and convince but to irritate the minds of the people, were brought to the notice of Government, the interposition of the ruling power became necessary to preclude the apprehended effects of these dangerous and unprofitable proceedings.

We have the honour to be, &c. &c.

Fort William,
7th December 1807.

(Signed) MINTO,
G. HEWETT,
G. H. BARLOW,
J. LUMSDEN.

(ENCLOSURES.)

To the Right honourable Lord Minto, &c. &c. &c.

My Lord,

I BEG leave respectfully to submit to your Lordship some particulars regarding the present state of the Christian Religion in Bengal, which I have thought it my duty to communicate for your Lordship's information at this time.

I trust your Lordship will do me the justice to believe that it is with the utmost reluctance I trouble your Lordship with a letter on such a subject so soon after your entrance on this Government, when as yet few, if any, of the circumstances noticed in it can have come to your Lordship's knowledge.

I have

No. 8. Enclosures in Letter from Bengal Govt 7 Dec. 1807, on the subject of Missionaries.

I have no other view in soliciting your Lordship's attention to them, but the advancement of learning and religion. Perhaps no one has addressed your Lordship on the subject since your arrival, and there are certainly many particulars regarding their present state, which it is of importance your Lordship should know.

Being about to leave India, I feared lest I should hereafter reproach myself, if I withheld any thing at this time which I conceived might be useful, particularly as I have been further encouraged to address your Lordship, by your Lordship's known condescension in receiving any communications which are honestly intended.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,
With much respect, your most obedient humble servant,
(Signed) C. Buchanan.

Calcutta,
9th November 1807.

To the Right honourable G. Lord Minto, Governor General, &c. &c. &c.

My Lord,

1. I HAD the honour to receive a letter from the Chief Secretary to the Government, under date the 11th September, desiring that I would submit, for the inspection of Government, the manuscript of some Sermons on the Prophecies, which I intended to publish. I shall willingly submit these discourses to your Lordship's perusal, and shall be happy to receive such observations on them as your Lordship's learning and candour may suggest; but I cannot submit them to the judgment of the officers of the Government. My reasons for declining to comply with the wishes of Government in this respect, it is incumbent on me to state; and I feel confident your Lordship will consider them to be satisfactory.

2. It will not have escaped your Lordship's observation, even in the short period since your arrival, that some of the officers of your Lordship's Government do not manifest any zeal for promoting the knowledge of the Christian Religion in India: they consider that a zeal in this respect would not be consonant to a wise and prudent policy. I am willing to believe that they advise according to the best of their judgment; but a principle pure and just in itself, if it be not tenderly exercised in reference to their important obligations, may become extravagant or pernicious. For instance, not to promote Christianity may, in certain circumstances, be prudent; but to repress Christianity will not, I think, in any case, be defended. It is not necessary to observe to your Lordship how much the minds of Europeans assimilate to the native character after a long residence in this country, and how difficult it is for men, even of good sense and honest intentions, while involved in the mist of this prejudice, to view the Christian Religion.

3. During the administration of the Marquis Wellesley, the spirit of promoting learning and religion in India, was general and ardent; but after the departure of that nobleman, a great revolution took place. A spirit directly adverse to the diffusion of religion in India, most unexpectedly broke forth, just as if it had been confined by his presence. This spirit appeared long before the insurrection in Vellore. I mention this, lest your Lordship should suppose that it originated with that event; for I understand that the "Massacre at Vellore" has been unaccountably adduced as some sanction to the principle of opposing the progress of the Christian Religion in Bengal. I had opportunities of judging of the causes of that event, which were peculiar. I was in the vicinity of the place at the time; I travelled for two months immediately afterwards in the province adjacent, with the sanction of Government; and I heard the evidence of Christians, Mahometans, and Hindoos, on the subject. That the insurrection at Vellore had no connection with the Christian religion, directly or indirectly, immediately or remotely, is a truth which is capable of demonstration.

4. The spirit so hostile to the progress of Christianity in India, appeared first in operation about two years ago, and has been acquiring strength ever since. It has exhibited itself in a series of acts, the recital of which will sufficiently illustrate to your Lordship the temper of mind which produced them. These acts are, however, not to be considered as the official and acknowledged measures of the respectable persons who preceded your Lordship in the Government. Sir George Barlow has often expressed his approbation of the means used for the diffusion of Christianity in India, and he sincerely desires its success. These measures have not been generally considered as the offspring of his unbiassed judgment. Besides, most of them are extra official, and with some of them he is perhaps yet unacquainted. They will probably appear to your Lordship to have been dictated by a timorous policy, proceeding from minds somewhat agitated by the responsibility of a weighty empire, viewing at the same time Christianity as an innovation in India, and magnifying that innovation, perhaps, into a revolution. The acts which have plainly manifested this alarm are many. It will suffice to notice to your Lordship the four following:

5. First. The withdrawing the patronage of Government from the translation of the Holy Scriptures into the Oriental tongues.

The translation of the Scriptures had commenced in the College of Fort William, at the expense of Government. When the honourable the Court of Directors directed a reduction of the expenses of that institution, it was resolved to make provision for the continuation of the translation of the Scriptures by public subscription, and to exonerate the Government entirely. It was accordingly proposed that a Committee of the College and of others should superintend the translations, and controul the expenditure. This measure had been recommended by certain of the bishops and by some noble persons in England, who wished to aid us in the translation of the Scriptures, and the countenance nance of the college, was merely desired, with the view that the important work might be conducted strictly in the principles of the national church, and not fall entirely into the hands of dissenters, as it has since done. Your Lordship will be surprised to hear that this proposition was rejected. Government withdrew its patronage from the work entirely, and even refused to give its countenance to the subscription. The immediate consequence of this unexpected blow, was the loss of ample funds; for there appeared at the time, throughout all India, a disposition to encourage a literary undertaking which was deemed so honourable to the nation.

Considering the difficulty of obtaining fit instruments for the conduct of such a work, the religious and moral importance of the work itself, and its advantages to the general interests of oriental literature, your Lordship will believe, that this forfeiture of public encouragement, under such auspicious circumstances, has ever been viewed with regret by the friends of learning and of religion in Europe and in India.

This disappointment, however, has had one favourable result; it accelerated the establishment of "the Christian Institution in the East," which carries the translation of the Scriptures, in some of the languages, into regions far beyond the controul of the Bengal Government.

6. Second. Attempting to suppress the translation of the Scriptures.

An attempt was next made to suppress the translation of the Scriptures entirely, and this attempt had almost succeeded.

To suppress the translation of the Scriptures, is to suppress the Scriptures. I can make no further observation on this, in addressing your Lordship.

7. Third. Suppressing the encomium of the honourable the Court of Directors, on their venerable Missionary the Reverend Mr. Swartz.

The honourable Court had sent out to Fort St. George a marble monument to be erected in the church of St. Mary, to the memory of Mr. Swartz, inscribed with a suitable epitaph, and they announced it, in their general letter dated 29th October 1806, as a testimony of the deep sense they entertained of his transcendant merit, of his unwearied labours in the cause of religion and piety, and of his public services at Tanjore, where the influence of his name and character was for a long course of years productive of important benefits to the Company. The honourable Court further adds: "On no sub-"ject has the Court of Directors been more unanimous, than in their anxious desire to "perpetuate the memory of this eminent person, and to excite in others an emulation "of his great example." They direct finally, that "translations shall be made of the "epitaph into the country languages, and published at Madras, and that the native in-"habitants shall be encouraged to view the monument."

The Christians in Bengal were of course rejoiced to hear of the honourable testimony to the apostolic Swartz, and they expected that it would be acknowledged here, as at Fort St. George and Bombay; but they were disappointed; there was no recognition of the venerable Missionary in Bengal. The epitaph was not inserted in the Calcutta Gazette, nor was the slightest notice taken of the circumstance and lest it might be supposed; that it was omitted by accident, the official notice of the Governor in council at Fort St. George, which appeared subsequently relative to the day of commemoration, was also suppressed.

But what followed was yet more painful. Your Lordship will judge of the feelings of the Christians in this place, when they read in the Government Gazette of the week following, an article whose obvious tendency was to bring the labours and character of the Christian Missionary into contempt.* Thus while the honourable the East India Company were adorning the sepulchres of their Missionaries, and embalming their memory in the South, their own servants were treating the character with indignity in the North. We were at first alarmed, lest this might be the signal for the other papers to commence an attack on the humble and defenceless Missionaries; but we were happy to find, that not one of the seven papers of this Presidency followed the example of the official Gazette.

As it is not probable that any of the particulars above-mentioned, have as yet come to your Lordship's knowledge, I beg leave to refer your Lordship to the enclosed printed paper (A.) published by the authority of the Government of Fort St. George.

8. Fourth. Restraining the Protestant Missionaries in Bengal, from the exercise of their functions, and establishing an imprimation for theological works.

Men's minds were prepared, by the preceding circumstances, to expect little indulgence to Missionaries, but they were certainly not prepared to expect the event which followed.

The success of the protestant mission in Bengal, had long been a source of uneasiness to those officers of Government who do not think it right to convert the natives. Some of the native Moonshees attached to the public officers, well knowing, from long acquaintance, their masters sentiments on this subject, have not failed from time to time to urge them to countenance their petitions, and to lend their voice in accusing the Missionaries. Some clamour of this kind was raised at two different times within the last seven years; but it passed away without offence to the Christian religion. The complaint of the Moonshees against the Missionaries, on the present occasion, is not, I understand, so obvious as the former;

* The Mission to Greenland and Labrador, whose civilizing efficiency on the rude inhabitants of those regions, has long been a theme of admiration to the Christian world, is held forth in that paper to public ridicule; and the simple narrative of the pious well-meaning Missionaries, is declared to "exhibit a "degree of canting fanaticism well worthy of the followers of Cromwell."—Calcutta Gazette, 17th September 1807.

No. 8. Enclosures in Letter from Bengal Gov^t 7 Dec. 1807, on the subject of Missionaries.

mer; they complain that the Missionaries have, in a certain paper, "applied abusive "epithets to Mahomet." The Missionaries certainly mistake the proper method of convincing the minds of men, if they use epithets of abuse; the successful method of preaching is by argument and affectionate address; and I presume this has been their general method during the fourteen years of their mission, else we cannot suppose their labours would have been followed with so much success.

At the same time Christian teachers are not to speak with reverence or courtesy of Juggernaut or Mahomet; they must speak as the Scriptures speak, that is, of false gods as false gods, and of a lying prophet as a lying prophet. The Mahometans apply abusive epithets and vulgar curses to the idolatry of the Hindoos and to the faith of Christians; and these epithets are contained in books, and Government might, on the same principle, have been assailed with the petitions of Christians and Hindoos against the Mahometans. If the natives choose to go to hear the preaching, or to read the books of the Missionaries, it is their pleasure to do so—it is no concern of Government. These poor Missionaries are not official characters; they have no power, no authority, no riches; and this the natives well know. They are like the first apostles, contemned and despised by all casts; and if they are bereaved of the countenance of their own Government, they are bereaved indeed

The complaint, however, of the Mahometans has produced a very serious event. The protestant Missionaries in Bengal were prohibited, by order of government dated 8th September last, from preaching to the natives.

The Protestant Mission being situated at Serampore, a town belonging to the King of Denmark, the English Government requested the Danish Governor to give up the Mission press, and ordered the Missionaries to remove to Calcutta. The Danish Governor resisted this demand, on the plea of the sovereignty of his nation; and the English Government revoked their requisition. The English Government then issued an order prohibiting the Missionaries from printing any books, "directed to the object of converting the natives to "Christianity." On this, a question was proposed officially to the British Government by the Danish Governor, a question which your Lordship will be concerned to think should ever have been necessary. It was this: "Whether, among the books prohibited by the "British Government, the Bible in the Bengalee language was included?" The answer to this question your Lordship will read with yet more concern. It was the following: "We "are not aware of any objection to the promulgation of the Scriptures in the Bengalee "language, unaccompanied by any comments on the religions of the country:" that is, the English Government were not "aware that there was any objection to the publication of "the Bible, yet they were not certain." At all events, it must have "no comment on the "religions of the country:" that is, it must not be said of the Bible—"this is the word of "the true God, and more worthy of belief than the Veda of Brahma:" nor must any illustration of its truth be noticed by reference to the Hindoo doctrines, for instance, by appealing to their own ideas of a Trinity, of an atonement, and of the "man twice born."

After some consideration, the English Government qualified, (but did not revoke,) their prohibition respecting works "directed to the object of converting the natives," and informed the Missionaries officially that, "whatever they printed for the future, must be submitted "to the inspection of the officers of Government:" and here the matter ended. An official imprimatur is established for the theological works of the protestant Missionaries; and preaching to the natives beyond the limits of the Danish town, is entirely prohibited: and this, of course, amounts to nearly a total suppression of the mission.

The chief inconvenience of the imprimatur imposed is, not that religious books shall be submitted to the officers of Government, but that they must be submitted to the "native" officers of Government. If, indeed, the Christian officers of Government understood the Bengalee, Arabic, Orissa, Mahratta, and Chinese languages, then might the Missionaries expect that Christians would revise their works; but a Hindoo must revise the Bengalee, and a Mahometan the Arabic. Those very Mahometans who impeached the Missionaries in the first instance, will necessarily be employed next to revise their theology. Was it ever heard that a Hindoo or a Mahometan gave a candid judgment of a Christian book? They will, of course, obliterate all passages which offend their own superstitions, and particularly those quotations from Scripture which speak of lying prophets, or the sin of idolatry.

I now beg leave to request your Lordship's attention to the plea on which these proceedings against the Protestant Missionaries have been grounded. It is this; "that the public "faith has been pledged to leave the natives in the undisturbed exercise of their religions." This is a proper pledge of our legislature. It is proper not to disturb the natives in the exercise of their religion; nor has this pledge ever been broken, directly or indirectly. It is proper not to interfere with, or by violence to prevent, the superstition of the natives, if not criminal in itself, or affecting the public peace. But if, by the expression "not dis- "turbing the natives in the exercise of their religion," be meant that "we are not to use "means for diffusing the knowledge of Christianity among them," then it is to be observed that this pledge has been violated by every Government in India, and has been systematically broken by the honourable the East India Company from the year 1698 to the present time. The fact is, they have pledged themselves to a conduct just the reverse. The East India Company hold this country by a Charter, which expressly stipulates that they shall use means to instruct the Gentoos, &c. in the Christian religion. William 3d, September 1698. And this stipulation is in perfect accordance with their pledge of not disturbing the natives in the exercise of their superstitions by force, inasmuch as it is a very different thing to apply arguments to the mind and to inflict wounds on the body. It is their duty to civilize their barbarous subjects, and to teach them humanity, and for that purpose, to address their understandings and their affections. At the same time it is their duty not to disturb the exercise of their superstition by compulsory acts; and the legislature has stipulated for the performance of both duties; and the first duty is as positive as the second. They first stipulate to do good, and they next stipulate not to do evil; and in consequence of this stipulation, the honourable Company have constantly aided the Christian missions in India, and at this time, they devote a considerable sum annually to their support. The Protestant Mission in Bengal commenced in 1758. The honourable Company's ships brought out the annual supplies for this Mission, and before the year 1770, religious tracts were translated into the Bengalee language; and Hindoo Christians preached to their countrymen, in the time of Hastings, in the town of Calcutta. This Mission continued its labours till about the year 1790, when the supply of Missionaries from Europe failed. It was succeeded by the present Mission at Serampore in 1793.

Enclosures in Letter from Bengal Govt 7 Dec. 1807; on the subject of Missionaries.

The Calcutta Mission was of extensive use in disseminating Christian principles through northern India. They sent Arabic New Testaments to the court of Shah Allum, the Mahometan King of Hindostan, then resident at Allahabad. The priests of his Majesty returned their thanks to the Missionaries, and requested that "the supply might be continued." It was continued for a time, and an investment of Arabic bibles is soon expected, under the sanction of the honourable Company, for a similar purpose. Little of the influence of Christianity in India has come, as yet, to the knowledge of the public. Englishmen in general know as little of the state of Christianity in India, as of the state of Hinduism. Two Christian Missions were at the same period tolerated by Shah Allum, one of which had existed since the time of Akbar the Great, and both of which exist unto this day.

At Seringapatam, under Hyder Sultaun, the Mahometan Prince of Mysore, the most complete toleration was permitted. In the Appendix to the enclosed Pamphlet, your Lordship will see with what ardour the preaching of Swartz was received at Seringapatam, and how the noble Mahometans and Hindoos desired to learn from him what was the "right prayer." Romish Missions were tolerated by Hyder, at the same time. Tippo Sultaun was more intolerant than his father. He was at times a persecutor, yet he did not quench Christianity; and Missions now flourish in various parts of the Mysore country.

After these authorities, we certainly shall not refer to the Mahometan Moonshees in Calcutta, for their opinion on the general relations of religious toleration in India.

I do not know whether your Lordship has been informed, that there are two Roman Catholic Misssions in Bengal and the provinces adjacent. They have existed for a long period of time, and have been tolerated by the Mahometan, Hindoo, Seik, Nepaul, and Tibet Governments. They have preached and published what they pleased, without any official restriction that we have ever heard of, and they now continue to follow their functions under the protection of the English Government, while the Protestant Missionaries are restrained and their theology is subjected to an official licence.

The proceedings against the Protestant Mission will naturally be supposed at home to have been called forth by some public commotion in Bengal, or by the bad moral character of the Missionaries. As to the first, they will be happy to hear, that we are now, and long have been, in a state of almost torpid tranquillity; and as to the character of the Missionaries, the Government has acknowledged them to be men of quiet demeanour, of pious intentions, and as deserving countenance and respect for their literary labours.

It has been the usual conduct of Asiatic Governments to let Christianity alone. In the annals of the British administration in India, has there been no instance of the suppression of a Christian Mission? Our empire here subsists by the discrepancy of religious opinion. It is not good policy to strengthen the Hindoo religion, or to strengthen the Mahomedan religion; but it is good policy to strengthen the Christian religion, because it is as yet the weakest. It is certainly our duty not to oppose it, for if this counsel "be of God, we "cannot resist it." And it would now be as easy to oppose the rushing of the Bore into the river Ganges, as to oppose the entrance of Christianity into the province of Bengal.

9. After the perusal of the foregoing pages, your Lordship will be prepared to understand the cause of the late alarm regarding the Prophecies; not a public alarm indeed, but the alarm of some of the officers of your Lordship's Government.

Having had occasion lately to preach a series of discourses on the Christian Prophecies in the Presidency Church, some of the congregation expressed a wish that I would permit them to be printed, observing, that they had before made a similar request without effect; but as I was now about to return to Europe, they hoped I would bequeath to them these few discourses.

When it was understood by the officers of Government, that the Sermons on the Prophecies were to be published, they were alarmed—your Lordship will scarcely divine the cause—it was this:—It seems these Prophecies declare, "that all nations shall "be converted to the religion of Christ." But if this be true, it was argued, what bad news to the Mahomedans and the Hindoos. In short, the advertisement announcing the intended publication of the Prophecies, which was sent to the Government Gazette, was suppressed; the advertisement itself was delivered in with trepidation to Government, and an order was immediately issued to the printers of the other papers, forbidding them to publish the alarming notice. In consequence of this order, it has been publicly understood that the Christian Prophecies are suppressed by authority.

I now beg leave to submit it to your Lordship's judgment, whether, in the view of the temper of mind displayed above, it would be proper in me to subject my compositions to the opinion and revision of the officers of your Lordship's government. Might there not be some danger danger in committing the Christian Prophecies to be altered and new modelled by men who favour the disciples of Mahomet and Brahma. I incline not to commit them to the hands of those officers, from another consideration; it would be a bad precedent. I would not that it should be thought, that any where in the British dominions, there exists any thing like a civil inquisition into matters purely religious.

Enclosures in Letter from Bengal Govt 7 Dec. 1807, on the subject of Missionaries.

It is now nearly two months since I received the letter from Government on this matter, and I have not yet communicated my intentions. I now beg leave to inform your Lordship, that I do not wish to give Government any unnecessary offence. I shall not publish the Prophecies.

At the same time I beg leave most respectfully to assure your Lordship, that I am not in any way disappointed by the interference of Government on this occasion. The supposed suppression of the Christian Prophecies has produced the consequence that might be expected. The public curiosity has been greatly excited to see these Prophecies: and to draw the attention of men to the Divine predictions, could be the only object I had in view in noticing them in the course of my public ministry. Another consequence will probably be, the Prophecies will be translated into the languages of the East, and thus pave the way, as has sometimes happened, for their own fulfilment.

10. Your Lordship will be enabled better to understand the real nature of this alarm regarding the Prophecies, when you are informed of the alarm which was excited about half a year before your Lordship's arrival, by the ancient "Christian Tablets."

In consequence of the enquiries, sanctioned by the Marquis Wellesley, into the history and literature of the Syrian Christians of Travancore, some ancient manuscripts were announced, and also certain "Brass Tablets" of great antiquity, containing the privileges of these ancient Christians, asserting their rights of nobility, and declaring withal that they had a King. Your Lordship can hardly conceive the apprehensions which were excited by this discovery, in the minds of those who have been lately alarmed by the Prophecies. Even at the first, it was accounted an ominous mission to go "to rake up the ashes of Christianity" in the very midst of the Hindoos: But when it was announced that there were "glowing embers," nothing less seemed to be expected than that all Hindostan would shortly be "in a flame." For if it was true that Christianity once flourished in Hindostan, it followed that it might flourish again. It was devoutly wished "that these Christian Tablets might sink to the bottom of the sea," and even the curiosity of the Hindoo antiquaries was quenched in this horror of Christianity.

That your Lordship may be assured that this alarm was real and not fictitious, it is only necessary to add, that when the article of literary intelligence published in the Bombay Gazette, containing the account of these ancient Christians, and of these "brass plates," (which account was certainly interesting to the Christian world in general, and to men of letters in particular) arrived at Calcutta, it was suppressed by authority as something dangerous to the State, and the Bishop of Llandaff's Letter on the Civilization of India had nearly shared the same fate.

11. It appearing, from the recent events above noticed, that the diffusion of Christianity in Bengal is plainly obnoxious to some of the officers of government, serious apprehensions are now entertained, that the attempt to suppress the translation of the Scriptures will be renewed: I cannot believe that the attempt will be made during your Lordship's Administration. If however any sinister event should afford a pretext for reviving it, I humbly request that the Chinese translation of the Scriptures may be spared; suffer me, my Lord, to intercede for the Chinese. There are three English youths, who have been for two years past under the tuition of the Chinese professor and his two Chinese assistants, and they have now acquired a very considerable proficiency in the Chinese language; and it is my intention to call them to England for public purposes, in three years hence, if their studies be not interrupted. This class has been organized and maintained at a great expense. It is the only regular Chinese class in the world, out of the limits of the Chinese empire, and it will probably be the source of the first regular instruction in the Chinese language in Great Britain.

12. If your Lordship should judge it expedient to investigate any of the facts contained in this Letter, I shall be happy to afford any further evidence or explanation that may be required, before I leave India.

I have the honour to be,
My Lord,
With the highest respect, your Lordship's
Most obedient and humble servant,
(Signed) C. Buchanan.

Calcutta,
7th Nov. 1807.

Extract of LETTER from the Court of Directors to the Governor General in Council at Fort William in Bengal, dated 7th Sept. 1808. No. 8. Letter from Court of Directors, 7 Sept. 1808, on the subject of Missionaries.

Para. 12. SINCE the preceding paragraphs were written, your letter of the 7th December 1807, to the Secret Committee, has been received, with copies of the Letter and Memorial addressed to the Governor General by the Reverend Dr. Claudius Buchanan.

13. We desire to express our entire satisfaction at the explanation which you have thought it necessary to give to your proceedings; and as most of the observations which would naturally have occurred to us on the perusal of those documents, have already been stated in this letter, we deem it unnecessary to enlarge further on the subject.

14. With every disposition to make due allowance in favour of ardent zeal in the cause of religion, it would have been impossible for us to avoid noticing the improper style of Dr. Buchanan's Address to the supreme Authority in India, if his subsequent departure from thence had not in some degree relieved us from that necessity. We shall content ourselves at present, with remarking that Dr. Buchanan, as well as all other Ecclesiastics who promulgate the doctrines of Christianity in India, and who bestow such just and merited encomiums on the conduct of the Missionary Schwartz, would do well to adopt it as the model of their own, and would always recollect that discretion and moderation in their language and actions, are most consistent with the mild spirit of our religion, and are indispensably requisite for those who are employed in prosecuting the laborious work of Conversion.

No. 9.

Copy of a PROCLAMATION of Lord William Bentinck as Governor of Madras; dated the 3d of December 1806.

Extract Fort St. George Secret Consultations, 2d December 1806.

PROCLAMATION.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL, having observed, that in some late instances an extraordinary degree of agitation has prevailed among several corps of the Native Army of this coast, it has been his Lordship's particular endeavour to ascertain the motives which may have led to conduct so different from that which formerly distinguished the Native Army. From this enquiry it has appeared, that many persons, of evil intentions, have endeavoured, for malicious purposes, to impress upon the Native Troops, a belief that it is the wish of the British Government to convert them by forcible means to Christianity; and his Lordship in Council has observed with concern, that such malicious reports have been believed by many of the Native Troops:—

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL, therefore, deems it proper, in this public manner to repeat to the Native Troops, his assurance, that the same respect which has been invariably shown by the British Government for their religion and for their customs, will be always continued; and that no interruption will be given to any native, whether Hindoo or Mussulman, in the practice of his religious ceremonies.

HIS LORDSHIP in Council desires that the Native Troops will not give belief to the idle rumours which are circulated by enemies of their happiness, who endeavour with the basest designs to weaken the confidence of the troops in the British Government. His Lordship in Council desires that the native troops will remember the constant attention and humanity which have been shown by the British Government in providing for their comfort, by augmenting the pay of the native officers and sepoys, by allowing liberal pensions to those who have done their duty faithfully, by making ample provision for the families of those who may have died in battle, and by receiving their children into the service of the honourable Company, to be treated with the same care and bounty as their fathers had experienced.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE the GOVERNOR in COUNCIL trusts, That the native troops remembering those circumstances, will be sensible of the happiness of their situation, which is greater than what the troops of any other part of the world enjoy; and that they will continue to observe the same good conduct for which they were distinguished in the days of General Lawrence, of Sir Eyre Coote, and of other renowned heroes.

THE native troops must at the same time be sensible, that if they should fail in the duties of their allegiance, and should show themselves disobedient to their officers, their conduct will not fail to receive merited punishment, as the British Government is not less prepared to punish the guilty, than to protect and distinguish those who are deserving of its favour.

IT IS DIRECTED, That this paper be translated with care into the Tamul, Telinga, and Hindostany languages; and that copies of it be circulated to each native battalion; of which the European officers are enjoined and ordered to be careful in making it known to every native officer and sepoy under his command.

IT IS ALSO DIRECTED, That copies of the paper be circulated to all the magistrates and collectors under this Government, for the purpose of being fully understood in all parts of the country.

Dated in Fort St. George, the 3d December 1806.

PUBLISHED, by ORDER of the RIGHT HONOURABLE the GOVERNOR in COUNCIL, (Signed) G. Buchan,

Chief Secretary to Government.

— No. 10. —

Copies of all REGULATIONS AND ORDERS, issued, and now in force, under the Bengal Government; respecting the WEAVERS; as well in regard to their connection with the provision of the Company's Investment, as in respect to their employment by Individuals.

A.D. 1793. REGULATION XVII.

A REGULATION for re-enacting, with alterations and amendments, the Regulations passed by the Governor General in Council, on the 20th July 1792, for empowering Landholders and Farmers of Land to distrain and sell the personal Property of under Farmers, Ryots and Dependant Talookdars, and (in certain specified cases) their Sureties, for Arrears of Rent or Revenue; and for preventing Landholders and Farmers of Land, confining or inflicting corporal punishment on their under Farmers, Ryots and Dependant Talookdars, or their Sureties, to enforce payment of arrears.—PASSED by the Governor General in Council, on the 1st May 1793, corresponding with the 21st Bysaak 1200 Bengal Era; the 6th Bysaak 1200 Fussily; the 21st Bysaak 1200 Willaity; the 6th Bysaak 1850 Sumbut; and the 19th Ramzaan 1207 Higeree.

FROM the Regulations not defining the nature and extent of the coercion which landholders and farmers of land might legally exercise over their under farmers, ryots, and dependant talookdars, to enforce payment of arrears of rent or revenue, many landholders and farmers, availing themselves of the sanction of former usage, had recourse to the most oppressive means for realizing arrears, and frequently employed the same severities for the purposes of extortion; whilst others, doubtful what measures they were empowered to adopt to enforce payment from defaulters, and apprehensive of subjecting themselves to prosecution for oppression, refrained from all compulsion, and were often defrauded of arrears to which they were justly entitled. These defects in the Regulations tending to screen oppression and dishonesty on the one hand, and to discourage moderation and good faith on the other; and it being as essential to the prosperity of the country and the punctual collection of the public revenue, that landholders and farmers of land should have the means of compelling payment from defaulters without being obliged to have recourse to the Courts of Justice, and incurring the delay and expense necessarily attending a law process for the recovery of every arrear, as that under farmers, ryots, and dependant talookdars, should be protected from oppression and unjust demands; the Governor General in Council, with a view to the attainment of these important objects, passed certain Regulations on the 20th July 1792: THE RULES and ORDERS contained in those Regulations are hereby re-enacted, with alterations and amendments.

What person, may distrain. Whose and what property is liable to distraint and sale.

II. Zemindars, independent talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, and farmers of land who hold their farms immediately of Government, are empowered to distrain without sending notice to any court of justice or any public officer (excepting the after notice directed to be given in the cases of defaulters employed in the provision of the Company's Investment or the manufacture of salt, as specified in Section XXXI,) the crops and products of the earth of every description, the grain, cattle, and all other personal property whether found in the house or on the premises of the defaulter, or in the house or on the premises of any other person within or without the limits of the estate or farm of the distrainer, belonging to their under renters and ryots and the talookdars paying revenue through them, for arrears of rent or revenue, and to cause the said property to be sold for the discharge of such arrears. The same powers are likewise vested in dependant talookdars for the recovery of arrears of rent from their under farmer and ryots, and also in under farmers who farm lands from zemindars, independent talookdars, or other actual proprietors of land, or dependant talookdars, or farmers of land who hold their farms immediately of Government, to enable such under farmers to enforce payment of arrears of rent or revenue from their ryots, under farmers, or dependant talookdars. The several descriptions of landholders and farmers of land above specified, are to exercise the powers hereby vested in them under the following rules and restrictions.

What property is not liable to distraint and sale.

III. Persons vested with the power of distraint shall not distrain or sell the lands, houses or other real property of their under farmers and ryots, or the talookdars paying revenue through them; nor goods or advances belonging to the Company in the hands of any

No. 10. Regulations and Orders, of the Bengal Government, respecting the Weavers.

Reg. XVII. 1793.

weaver, manufacturer, or other persons employed in the provision of their Investment; nor the loom, thread, unwrought silk or materials of manufacture of any weaver or manufacturer; nor the tools of any tradesman or labourer standing towards them in the relation of under farmer, ryot, or dependant talookdar. All such distraints and sales are declared illegal and void. The defaulter shall stand acquitted of the arrear for which the distress may be levied, and the property shall be restored to him, or the distrainer shall be compelled to make good to him the value of it, if it shall be personal property, and shall have been destroyed, damaged or injured, or shall not be forthcoming, and the distrainer shall be further obliged to pay to him damages adequate to the loss which he may prove to have sustained in consequence of such attachment or sale, with all costs of suit.

Distraint and sale of it illegal and void.

Penalty.

What property is not to be distrained, if other sufficient property can be attached.

IV. The ploughs and implements of husbandry, the cattle actually trained to the plough, and the seed grain of under farmers, ryots and dependant talookdars, shall not be distrained for arrears, provided the defaulter shall possess, and the distrainer shall have it in his power to attach, other cattle, grain, or property, sufficient for the discharge of the arrear. Distrainers are enjoined to attend strictly to this rule, and every deviation from it shall be punished by an award to the party aggrieved of damages adequate to the injury he may have sustained, with all costs of suit.

Penalty.

When under farmers, &c. are to be considered to have defaulted.

V. Under farmers, ryots, and dependant talookdars, shall not be considered to have defaulted until the arrears have been ineffectually demanded from them and also from their surety, if they shall have given security, and the surety shall be forthcoming; and when, as the last resourse, an attachment shall be issued against the property of a defaulter, the responsibility of the surety shall not be thereby in any degree diminished.

Sureties not exonerated by the distraint of the property of Defaulters.

Penalty for attaching property if no arrear be due.

VI. If any person vested with the power of distraint shall attach, or cause to be sold the property of any under farmer, ryot or dependant talookdar, for arrears of rent or revenue, and it shall appear upon trial that no arrear was due, the distrainer shall be compelled to restore the property to the owner, or to make good to him the value of it, if it shall have been sold, damaged, injured or destroyed, or shall not be forthcoming, and to pay to him as damages a sum adequate to the value of such property, and all costs of suit.

Attachment not to take place if the defaulter shall tender the arrears upon demand.

VII. If the defaulter shall tender the arrears demanded of him in the presence of two creditable witnesses to the person deputed to attach his property, such person shall receive the arrears, and shall not proceed to the attachment.

Distrainers to furnish the person they may depute to distrain, with a Writing specifying the amount of the arrear and the date on which it became due.

Copy of the writing with list of the property distrained, name of the place where it is lodged and notice that it will be sold indorsed thereon, to be delivered to the defaulter, or left at his place of residence in case of his absence.

Penalty.

VIII. Distrainers shall deliver to the person whom they may depute to attach the property of a defaulter, a writing under their seal and signature specifying the amount of the arrear for which the attachment may be issued, and the date on which such arrear became due. The person so deputed shall produce this writing as his authority for making the attachment, and on the day on which he may attach the property, shall deliver a copy of it to the stated defaulter, endorsing thereon a list or inventory of the property attached, and the name of the place where it may be lodged or kept, with a notice that it will be sold on the fifteenth day commencing from the day following the day on which the attachment took place, or, if the property attached shall consist of crops or other ungathered products of the earth, within fifteen days calculating from the day following the day on which such crops or products may be stored, as directed in Section XIII.; unless the arrear and expenses of the attachment shall be previously discharged, or he shall contest the demand, and procure the attachment to be withdrawn in the manner hereafter specified. If the defaulter shall be absent, a copy of the above writing with the prescribed endorsement shall be fixed up or left at his usual place of residence before the expiration of the third day, calculating from the day of the attachment. If any person vested with the power of distraint shall cause any property to be attached, without furnishing the agent whom they may employ for that purpose with the writing above directed, or if such agent shall be furnished with the writing prescribed, and shall omit to deliver a copy of it with the required endorsement to the defaulter, or, in the event of his absence, to leave such copy at his usual place of residence within the period limited, the distrainer shall not be entitled to recover the arrear for which the distress may have been levied, and he shall be compelled to restore the property to the defaulter, or the value of it, if it shall have been sold, damaged, injured or destroyed, or shall not be forthcoming, and to pay all costs of suit.

Under farmers, &c. who have not given security for their rent or revenue, and who may contest the arrear, how to procure the attachment of their property to be withdrawn.

To execute a bond with security to try the demand in the Dewanny Adawlut of the Zillah, in fifteen days.

IX. If an attachment for arrears shall have been issued against the property of any under farmer, ryot, or dependant talookdar, who may not have given security to the distrainer for the payment of his rent or revenue, and such under farmer, ryot, or dependant talookdar, shall dispute the justness of the demand, and within five days commencing from the day following the day of the attachment, or if the property attached shall consist of crops or other ungathered products of the earth, within five days calculating from the day following the day on which such crops or products may be stored as directed in Section XIII, shall enter into a bond before the judge of the zillah, the cauzy of the pergunnah, or the distrainer, with good security, binding himself to institute a suit in the dewanny adawlut of the zillah within fifteen days from the date of such bond for the trial of the demand, and to pay whatever sum may be adjudged to be due from him, with interest upon it at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum, to be calculated from the date on which the arrear that may be awarded became payable to the date of the decree, with all costs of suit, the distrainer shall immediately withdraw the attachment and restore the property to the defaulter. If the stated defaulter shall fail to execute the bond within the Attachment to be withdrawn upon the execution of the bond.

the period prescribed, the distrainer shall be at liberty to keep the property under attachment, and to cause it to be sold in the manner directed in Section XXII, unless the arrear with the expenses of the attachment shall be discharged previous to the day of sale. If the defaulter shall execute the bond, but omit to institute the suit in the dewanny adawlut by the time prescribed, the distrainer shall demand payment of the arrear from the surety, and in the event of his not discharging the amount immediately, the distrainer shall be at liberty to issue an attachment against the personal property both of the surety and the defaulter, or the personal property of either of them, and to cause it to be sold, unless the arrear and the expenses of the attachment shall be discharged previous to the day of sale.

Distrainer how to recover the arrear upon the defaulter failing to institute the suit by the time limited in the bond.

X. If an attachment for arrears shall have been issued against an under farmer, ryot, or dependant talookdar, who may have given security for the payment of his rent or revenue, and such under farmer, ryot, or dependant talookdar, shall dispute the justness of the demand, and the surety, within five days commencing from the day following the day of the attachment, or if the property attached shall consist of crops or other ungathered products of the earth, within five days calculating from the day following the day on which such crops or products may be stored, as directed in Section XIII, shall deliver a writing, attested by two witnesses, to the judge of the dewanny adawlut, the cawzy of the pergunnah, or the distrainer, engaging that either he or the stated defaulter will institute a suit in the dewanny adawlut of the zillah, within fifteen days from the date of such writing, to try the demand, and to pay the amount that may be adjudged against them, with interest upon it at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum, to be calculated from the date on which the arrear that may be awarded became payable to the date of the decree, with all costs of suit, the distrainer shall immediately withdraw the attachment. If the surety shall fail to execute such writing within the prescribed period, the distrainer shall continue the property under attachment, and cause it to be sold in the manner directed in Section XXII, unless the arrear and the expenses attending the attachment shall be discharged previous to the day of sale. If the surety shall execute the writing, but fail to have the suit instituted either in his own name or that of the defaulter within the limited period, the distrainer shall demand payment of the arrears from the surety, and in the event of his omitting to discharge the amount immediately, the distrainer shall be at liberty to issue an attachment against the personal property both of the surety and the defaulter, or the personal property of either of them, and to cause it to be sold in the manner directed in Section XXII, unless the arrears and the expense attending the attachment shall be discharged prior to the day of sale. If the surety of the stated defaulter shall refuse or omit to enter into the writing required, or if he shall happen to be at a distance so as to render it impossible for him to execute such writing within the prescribed time, and such defaulter in either of these cases shall give the security required from the defaulters specified in Section IX, the distrainer shall withdraw the attachment, and as far as regards the said arrear, such distrainer, defaulter, and surety, shall be considered in every respect in the same predicament as the distrainers, defaulters, and sureties, mentioned in the said section. Landholders and farmers of land are prohibited distraining or selling the property of the sureties of their under farmers, ryots, and dependant talookdars (nominal sureties excepted as described in Section XXVII) under any pretext whatever, but in the cases specified in this Section and in Section IX. In all other cases landholders and farmers of land are to have recourse to the Dewanny Adawlut of the Zillah for the recovery of any claims which they may have on the sureties of their under farmers, ryots, or dependant talookdars. If any person shall distrain or sell the property of a surety, excepting in the cases above authorized, such surety, provided he be desirous thereof, shall be discharged from his engagement, and the distrainer shall be compelled to restore the property to him, or to pay to him the value of it, if it shall have been sold, damaged, injured or destroyed, or shall not be forthcoming, with all costs of suit.

Under farmers, &c. who have given security for their rent or revenue, and who may contest the arrears, how to procure the attachment to be withdrawn.

Surety to execute writing to try the demand in the Dewanny Adawlut within fifteen days.

Attachment to be withdrawn upon the execution of the writing.

Distrainer how to recover the arrears upon both Surety and Defaulter failing to institute the suit by the time limited in the bond.

Under farmers, &c. how to proceed to get the attachment withdrawn in case of the absence of the Surety, or of his refusing to execute the writing required.

Property of Sureties not liable to distraint or sale, except in the cases herein authorized.

Claim on Sureties on other cases how to be removed.

Penalty for the illegal distraint or sale of the property of Sureties.

XI. If the defaulter shall tender payment of the arrear demanded of him in the presence of two creditable witnesses, after his property shall have been attached, and prior to the day fixed for its being put up to sale, and also of the necessary expenses attending the attachment, the distrainer shall receive the amount of such arrear and expenses immediately upon the same being tendered, and shall forthwith release the property. In case of any dispute arising respecting the expenses of the attachment, it shall be determined by the cauzy of the pergunnah in which the distress may have been levied. The courts of dewanny adawlut are, upon complaint made to them, to punish any distrainer who may act contrary to this Regulation, by awarding against him, in favour of the party injured, damages according to the circumstances of the case, with all costs of suit.

Attachment to be withdrawn if the defaulter shall tender the arrear and expenses of attachment previous to the day of sale.

Penalty.

XII. Distrainers shall not drive or convey distrained cattle or other property out of the limits of the pergunnah in which it may have been attached. The distrainer shall either leave the property upon the premises in the charge of any person he may think proper, or drive or convey it with due care to a proper place as near as possible to the premises within the limits of the pergunnah.

Property distrained not to be taken out of the Purgunnah.

Where to be kept.

XIII. Distrainers who shall attach the crops or any ungathered products of the earth belonging to their under farmers, ryots, or the talookdars paying revenue through them, shall cause such crops or products to be reaped or gathered in due season, and store the same in proper houses, barns or granaries upon the premises, or if there shall be no such places on the premises, in any barn or proper place which can be procured as near thereto

Distrained crops and ungathered products of the earth when to be reaped or gathered and where to be stored.

Reg. XVII. 1793.

as possible within the limits of the pergunnah. The expense of reaping or gathering and storing such crops or products shall be paid by the owner upon his redeeming the property, or from the proceeds of the sale in the event of its being sold.

Distrained Cattle not to be worked, nor goods or effects used. Distrainers to provide food for Cattle or live Stock. Expense how to be defrayed.

XIV. Distrainers shall not work the bullocks or cattle, or make use of the goods or effects distrained. They shall provide the necessary food for the cattle or live stock, the expense attending which shall be paid by the owner upon his redeeming the property, or from the proceeds of the sale in the event of its being sold.

Penalty for distrainers neglecting to take due care of the property distrained.

XV. If property distrained shall be stolen, or lost, or be damaged, injured or destroyed by the weather, or otherwise, whilst in the possession of the distrainer, owing to his not having taken the necessary precautions for the due keeping and preservation of it, he shall make good the loss or damage to the owner.

Distress to be proportionate to the arrear.

Penalty for excessive distress.

XVI. The distress levied shall not be excessive, or in other words the property seized shall be, as nearly as possible, proportionate to the amount of the arrear. If any person vested with the power of distraint shall attach any property, the value of which shall be disproportionate to the arrear, and it shall be proved that he could have seized other property of less value, and which would have been sufficient for the liquidation of such arrear, the court of dewanny adawlut shall award to the owner damages according to the circumstances of the case, with all costs of suit.

Distress to be levied between sunrise and sunset.

Penalty for attaching property after sunset and before sunrise.

XVII. All attachments shall be made after sunrise and before sunset. If any person vested with the power of distraint shall seize or attempt to seize the property of any defaulter after sunset and before sunrise, for the discharge of arrears of rent or revenue, such distrainer shall not be entitled to recover the arrear; and, if the property shall have been attached, shall be compelled to restore it to the defaulter, or the value of it, if it shall have been sold, damaged, injured or destroyed, or shall not be forthcoming, with all costs of suit.

Transfer of a Defaulter's property to prevent distraint, invalid.

Penalty for persons to whom such transfers may be made.

XVIII. If any under farmer, ryot, or dependant talookdar, shall make a fraudulent conveyance or transfer of his property to prevent the attachment of it for arrears, the court of dewanny adawlut, upon proof thereof being made before it, shall cause the property to be delivered up to the distrainer, and compel the person to whom such transfer or conveyance shall have been made, to pay to the distrainer damages adequate to the value of one half of the property, with costs of suit.

Punishment for under farmers, &c. resisting an attachment, or forcibly or clandestinely taking away their property after it has been attached.

XIX. If any under farmer, ryot, or dependant talookdar, shall resist the attachment of his property, or shall forcibly or clandestinely take it away after it shall have been attached, the court of dewanny adawlut shall cause him and all persons who may be proved to have been his aiders or abettors, to be imprisoned in the gaol until he shall restore the property to the distrainer, or the arrear shall have been liquidated by the distraint and sale of other property, or otherwise discharged, with the expenses attending the attachment, and costs of suit.

Punishment for persons not being the owners, forcibly or clandestinely taking away property which has been attached.

XX. If any person, not being the owner, shall be convicted of forcibly or clandestinely taking away property that has been distrained, the court of dewanny adawlut, upon proof thereof being made before it, shall cause such person or persons to be imprisoned until they restore the property, or make good the value of it to the distrainer, and pay to him as damages a sum equal to the value of such property, and all costs of suit.

What places Distrainers may force open to attach the property of Defaulters.

Zenana or women's apartments not to be entered whether the doors be open or shut.

Dwelling houses not to be forced open.

Punishment for entering women's apartments or forcing open dwelling houses.

XXI. Distrainers are empowered to force open any stable, cowhouse, barn, golah, granary, or other building, and to enter any dwelling house, the outer door of which may be open (excepting the apartments in such dwelling house which may be appropriated for the zenana, or residence of women) and to break open the door of any room in such dwelling house, for the purpose of attaching any property belonging to a defaulter which may be lodged therein. But nothing contained in this regulation shall be construed to authorize persons vested with the power of distraint, or their servants or agents, to enter the zenana, or apartments of women, whether the doors or passages leading thereto be open or not; nor to force open and enter any dwelling house, the outer door of which may be locked or barred. Persons entering the apartments of women, or forcing open the outer door of any dwelling house, shall be imprisoned for six months; the distrainer shall not recover the arrear for which the attachment may have been issued, and he shall be compelled to restore to the defaulter any property that may have been attached, or the value of it, if it shall have been sold, damaged, injured or destroyed, or shall not be forthcoming; and the court shall further award against such distrainer heavy damages, with all costs of suit. And if any person shall enter a dwelling house, or break open any stable, cowhouse, barn, golah, granary, or other building, not occupied by or in the possession of the defaulter, to distrain property belonging to him, and no such property shall be found therein, the distrainer shall be liable to prosecution by the occupant or possessor for entering such house or breaking open such stable or other building, and the court shall award to him damages according to the circumstances of the case, with all costs of suit.

Penalty for entering any dwelling house, or breaking open any place not occupied by or in the possession of the defaulter, should no property belonging to him be found therein.

Mode of appraising and selling distrained property.

XXII. After the expiration of the fifth day and before the elapse of the eighth day calculating from the day following the day on which the attachment of the property of a defaulter shall have taken place, or, if the property attached shall consist of crops or other ungathered products of the earth, after the elapse of the fifth day, and before the expiration tion of the eighth day commencing from the day following the day on which such crops or products were stored, as directed in Section XIII, the defaulter shall apply to the cauzy of the pergunnah to have the same appraised and sold. Upon the receipt of such application, the cauzy shall immediately fix up in the head cutcherry of the pergunnah a list of the property attached, with a notice of the day on which it will be sold, which shall be the fifteenth day commencing from the day following the day on which the attachment took place, unless the property shall consist of crops or other ungathered products of the earth, in which case the sale shall be made on the fifteenth day calculating from the day following the day on which such crops or products may be stored, as directed in Section XIII. The cauzy shall nominate two creditable persons competent by their profession, trade or occupation, to appraise the property. The persons so appointed shall appraise the property according to the current price which the several articles may then bear in the country, and shall deliver the particulars of the appraisement in writing, and attest the same with their seals and signatures, and shall make oath before the cauzy, that they have appraised the property according to the best of their knowledge and judgment. The cauzy shall affix his seal to the paper of appraisement, and shall cause it to be stuck up in the cutcherry. The property shall be brought to the cutcherry on the morning of the day of sale, in order that it may be examined by the persons intending to bid, unless it shall consist of grain or other products of the earth, the removal of which would be attended with considerable expense, in which case samples only, indiscriminately taken from each article, shall be brought to the cutcherry and exposed for the purpose abovementioned. The property shall be put up to sale in one lot, or in two or more lots, as the cauzy may think advisable. The sale shall commence at twelve o'clock in the day, and the property shall be disposed of for the highest price that may be offered for it. If the property shall sell for more than the amount of the arrear, the overplus, after deducting the charges attending the attachment and sale of it, shall be returned to the defaulter. If the proceeds of the sale shall be insufficient for the discharge of the arrear and the expenses attending the attachment and sale, the distrainer shall be at liberty to attach other property belonging to the defaulter, and to cause it to be sold to make good the deficiency. The cauzy is in every case to examine the distrainer's statement of the expenses consequent to the attachment and sale of the property, and to reject any part of it that may appear to him unreasonable. If any person vested with the power of distraint shall sell or dispose of property, which he may have attached for arrears of rent or revenue, in any other mode than that prescribed in this section, he shall forfeit the arrear for which the distress may be levied, to the defaulter, and make good to him the value of the property sold or disposed of, with all costs of suit.

Surplus of the proceeds of property selling for more than the arrear, and expenses, how to be appropriated.

Cauzy to adjust the expenses of the sale and attachment. Penalty for disposing of property, except as herein authorized.

XXIII. The cauzy is to be careful to prevent any unfair practices either in the appraisement or sale of property. Upon proof being made before the court of dewanny adawlut of the zillah of his conniving at any such practices, the court shall cause him to make good any loss or injury that the defaulter may have thereby sustained, with costs of suit, and shall immediately report the circumstances of the case to the sudder dewanny adawlut for the information of the Governor General in Council, who, provided there shall appear to him sufficient reason for so doing, shall dismiss such cauzy from his office.

Punishment for Cauzies conniving at unfair practices in the appraisement or sale of property.

XXIV. The distrainer, the cauzy, and the appraisers, are prohibited purchasing, directly or indirectly, any part of the property. Any cauzy or appraiser offending against this prohibition, shall be compelled to restore the property to the defaulter, or the full value of it, in the event of its being injured, damaged, destroyed, or not forthcoming, and shall forfeit the purchase money which shall be appropriated to the liquidation of the arrear, and pay all costs of suit; and the court shall report the circumstances to the sudder dewanny adawlut for the information of the Governor General in Council, who, if there shall appear to him sufficient ground for so doing, shall dismiss such cauzy from his office. Distrainers acting contrary to the prohibition contained in this section, shall be compelled to restore the property to the defaulter, or the full value of it, if it shall have been injured, damaged or destroyed, or shall not be forthcoming, and shall likewise forfeit to him the arrear for which the property may have been attached, and pay all costs of suit.

Distrainer, cauzy, and appraisers, not to purchase the property.

Penalty.

XXV. Neither the defaulter, nor any person on his behalf, shall be permitted to bid for or purchase the property.

Defaulters not to bid for or purchase their property.

XXVI. The property shall be paid for within five days after the sale, and the purchaser shall not be permitted to carry away any part of it which shall not have been paid for. Should the purchaser fail in the payment of the whole or part of the purchase money by the limited period, the whole of the property, or the part of it which may be unpaid for, shall be resold by the cauzy, on such day as he shall fix, for whatever it may fetch. The defaulting purchaser shall forfeit to the distrainer fifteen per cent. on the amount of the price for which he purchased the property so re-sold, and make good to him any loss that may arise on the re-sale. If any profit shall accrue on the resale, it shall be carried to the credit of the defaulter.

Property sold when to be paid for.

Penalty in case of non-payment of the purchase-money.

XXVII. Persons who tenant or underfarm lands in the name of their children, dependants or others, or in the names of fictitious persons, and give themselves as the ostensible sureties for the performance of the agreement, but retain the actual management of the lands and in fact are themselves the under farmers or ryots of such lands, shall, to all intents and purposes, be considered as the under farmers or ryots of such lands, and their property shall be

Persons who under the names of sureties farm or tenant lands in the name of others, to be considered the actual ryots or farmers of such lands.

Reg. XVII., 1793.

be liable to be distrained and sold for arrears under this Regulation, in the same manner as if the engagement for the lands had stood in their own names.

Landholders and farmers prohibited confining or inflicting corporal punishment on defaulters or their sureties.

XXVIII. Landholders and farmers of land are prohibited confining, or inflicting corporal punishment on any under farmer, ryot or dependant talookdar, or their sureties, to enforce payment of arrears of rent or revenue. If any landholder or farmer shall offend against this prohibition, the person so punished or confined, shall be at liberty either to prosecute the offender for assault or imprisonment in the criminal court, or to institute a suit against him in the dewanny adawlut of the zillah, which court shall award damages against such offender, according to the circumstances of the case, with costs of suit.

What persons are to perform the duties assigned to the cauzy in the event of his absence, or of there being no such officer stationed in the pergunnah.

XXIX. In the event of the absence of the cauzy, or of there being no such officer stationed in the pergunnah, the tesildar, or in case of his absence, or of there being no such officer in the pergunnah, then such person as the judge of the dewanny adawlut of the zillah shall think proper to vest with authority for that purpose, may and shall respectively do all such acts as the cauzy is authorized or directed to perform by this Regulation, and under the like restrictions and penalties, as far as the latter can be inflicted.

Heirs and successors of landholders and farmers to distrain for arrears due to the deceased, if entitled thereto.

Managers of estates of disqualified landholders, and managers of undivided estates vested with the power of distraint.

XXX. Upon the death of any person vested with the power of distraint by this Regulation, his heirs or successors who may be entitled to the arrears due to him, shall be at liberty to distrain the property of the defaulters, and their sureties in the cases authorized for the recovery of the same, agreeably to this Regulation. It is to be understood likewise, that managers of the estates of disqualified landholders, and managers of undivided estates belonging to two or more proprietors, all of whom do not come within the description of disqualified landholders, are authorized to exercise the same powers for the recovery of arrears of rent or revenue, as the proprietors of the estates committed to their charge would be entitled to exercise under this Regulation, were they to be entrusted with the management of their own estates, subject however to the several rules restrictions and penalties therein specified.

Explanatory Rule respecting defaulters employed in the provision of the Investment or the manufacture of salt.

XXXI. The several descriptions of landholders and farmers of land, specified in Section II. are empowered under the restrictions contained in this Regulation, to attach and sell the property of persons employed in the provision of the Company's Investment, or the manufacture of salt, for the recovery of arrears of rent or revenue, without previously stating the claim to the Company's commercial representative, or to any salt agent or other officer employed in the salt department. But such distrainers shall within three days, calculating from the day following the day of the attachment, after they shall have attached the property of any weaver or molungee, or other person employed in the provision of the Company's Investment or the manufacture of salt, send information of such attachment in writing to the commercial resident or salt agent, or the nearest commercial factory or salt cutcherry, that the commercial resident or salt agent may satisfy the demand previous to the time fixed for the sale of the property, or cause such steps to be taken in behalf of the defaulter as may be consistent with this Regulation.

Principals responsible for the acts of their agents.

XXXII. If any gomastah, agent, servant or officer of any person vested with the power of distraint, shall attach or cause to be sold the property of any under farmer, ryot, or dependant talookdar, or their sureties, or do any act in the attachment or sale of it contrary to this Regulation, the party aggrieved shall have his remedy against the principal of the offender for such illegal attachment, sale or act, whether the same took place or was done by the orders or with the knowledge of such principal or not. Provided that nothing contained in this Section shall extend to subject a distrainer to imprisonment in the event of any person deputed by him to attach property, entering the zenana, or apartments of women, or breaking open a dwelling house in opposition to the prohibition contained in Section XXI. unless it shall be proved that such acts were done by the order or with the consent or knowledge of such distrainer.

Persons deeming themselves injured by the distraint and sale of their property, may seek redress in the Dewanny Adawlut.

Persons vested with the powers of distraint to have the option of prosecuting in the Dewanny Adawlut for arrears.

XXXIII. Nothing contained in this regulation shall be construed to prohibit persons whose property may have been distrained or sold, from instituting a suit in the court of dewanny adawlut of the zillah against the distrainer, for any injury which he may think he has hereby sustained. Nor to prevent the several descriptions of landholders or farmers of land, or other persons vested with the power of distraint, from prosecuting in the court of dewanny adawlut of the zillah for arrears due to them from any under farmer, ryot, or dependant talookdar, or their sureties, should they prefer the last-mentioned mode of procedure to distraining and selling the personal property of the defaulter, or, in the cases authorized, of his surety, for the recovery of the arrears under this Regulation.

Suits instituted under this Regulation to be tried in preference to all other suits.

XXXIV. All suits that may be instituted under this Regulation, are to be heard and determined previous to any other suits which may be depending.

No. 10. Regulations and Orders, of the Bengal Government, respecting The Weavers.

Reg. XXXI. 1793.

A. D. 1793. REGULATION XXXI.

A REGULATION for re-enacting, with modifications and amendments, the Rules passed on the 23d July 1787, and subsequent dates, for the conduct of the Commercial Residents and Agents, and all Persons employed or concerned in the provision of the Company's Investment.—PASSED on the 1st May 1793; corresponding with the 21st Bysaak 1200 Bengal Era; the 6th Bysaak 1200 Fussily; the 21st Bysaak 1200 Willaity; the 6th Bysaak 1850 Sumbut; and the 19th Ramzaan 1207 Higeree.

THE nature and extent of the commercial concerns of the Company, render it necessary that rules should be prescribed for preventing manufacturers, or other persons in their employ, embezzling the money advanced to them, or disposing of the goods provided with it to individuals, and for ensuring the delivery of the goods agreeably to their engagements. No well-founded objection can be offered to such rules by the manufacturers, or others to whom they may extend, whilst they at the same time establish it as a fundamental principle, that no person shall be compelled to work for the Company, and that those who may engage in their employ, shall always be at liberty to relinquish it, after performing the engagements into which they may have voluntarily entered. It is equally requisite, on general principles, that precautions should be taken to prevent the rules adopted for the abovementioned purposes, being rendered subservient to the private views of the officers employed in the provision of the Investment, to the injury of the manufacturers, and the prejudice of the interests of the Company, both in their commercial capacity, and as rulers of the country. As the most effectual mode of guarding against such abuses, and of ensuring justice to the manufacturers and others in their dealings with the Company, the Governor General in Council has determined that the rules to which persons engaging to furnish goods for the Company's Investment may be subjected, shall be incorporated with the laws and regulations for the internal government of the country, and that the officers employed in the immediate superintendence of the provision of the Investment, shall be liable to be sued for any deviation from those rules in the courts of judicature, that every person who may deem himself aggrieved by their official acts, whether originating with themselves, or done in consequence of orders from the superior authorities, may be able to obtain redress with the same facility as for an injury received from any individual. THE following RULES, being the Rules passed by the Governor General in Council on the 23d July 1787, and subsequent dates, with modifications and amendments, adapted to the principles above stated, have been accordingly enacted.

No Weaver to be compelled to work for the Company.

II. Weavers not indebted, nor under engagements to the Company, shall not be compelled to enter into their employ; and weavers indebted, or under engagements to the Company, on duly discharging such debts or engagements, shall not be compelled to enter into fresh engagements.

Persons under engagements, after fulfilling them not to be compelled to re-engage.

Conditions to which Weavers engaging for the provision of the Company's Investment are to consider themselves subject.

III. First. Weavers who may engage for the provision of any part of the Company's Investment, are to consider themselves as engaging under the following Rules and Conditions.

Engagements to be made in writing attested by not less than two witnesses.

Second. All engagements with weavers, are to be made in writing, attested by at least two credible witnesses. One copy of the writing is to remain with the commercial resident or his officers, and the remaining copy with the other party to the engagement.

Weavers not choosing to take further advances, to give a fortnight's notice.

Third. Weavers under engagements to the Company, and who may not intend to take further advances, shall give at least a fortnight's notice of their intention.

No Weavers to work for individuals, or bazar sales, until they have completed their engagements on account of the Investment.

Fourth. Weavers indebted to the Company, who have received advances from them, or come under engagements to them, shall, in discharge of such debt, advances, or engagements, deliver cloths, according to agreement. They shall on no account give to any other person or persons whatever, European or Native, either the labour or the produce engaged to the Company; and if they have not fulfilled their engagements by the period agreed on, they shall not work for newer engagements, nor for bazar sales, until those engagements are completed.

Peons may be put on Weavers failing in their engagements for the purposes herein specified.

Fifth. When any weaver fails to deliver, by the stipulated periods, the cloths for which he may have engaged, the commercial resident shall be at liberty to place peons upon him, in order to quicken his deliveries, and prevent his infringing the two restrictions in the latter part of clause fourth.

Penalty for Weavers disposing of cloths to individuals whilst they are deficient in their deliveries on account of the Investment.

Sixth. If notwithstanding the restrictions in the latter part of clause fourth, any weaver shall by himself, or by any other person, sell cloths to private merchants, Europeans or Natives, or to dealers or agents of whatever description, whilst he is deficient in his stipulated deliveries on account of the Company's Investment, he shall be liable to be prosecuted in the dewanny adawlut, and upon proof of the fact, he shall be adjudged to forfeit to the Company all that the produce of the cloths so sold, rated either at what he got for them, or their bazar value, shall exceed the ordinary prime cost of the thread in them, with costs of suit besides, and moreover be obliged to complete his engagements.

Penalty for Weavers failing in their stipulated deliveries.

Seventh. Weavers possessed of more than one loom, and entertaining one or more workmen, shall be subject to a penalty of thirty-five per cent. on the stipulated price of every piece of cloth that they may fail to deliver according to the written agreement which they may have executed, in addition to the repayment of the money advanced for the same.

How the penalty in the preceding Clause is to be recovered.

Eighth. The penalty specified in the preceding clause, shall be sued for in the dewanny adawlut, and shall be recoverable, on the agreement with the weaver, and the failure in his deliveries, being proved.

List of Weavers employed by the Company to be fixed up in the Cutcherry of the Collector.

IV. A list or register of the weavers employed in the provision of the Company's Investment in every pergunnah, specifying their places of abode, shall be fixed up by the commercial resident in the cutcherry of that pergunnah, and shall be corrected at the beginning of every week or month, according to the alterations that may have happened in the week or month preceding. The officers of the cutcherry are to give immediate permission for the exhibition of the list, and the commercial resident shall transmit a copy of it in the native languages once in every three months to the judge of the zillah.

Persons procuring from Weavers Cloths made with the Company's advances, how to be proceeded against.

V. Persons procuring from weavers in the Company's employ, by the offer of ready money, or under the pretence of previous engagements which were not avowed, cloths really wrought for the Company, and with their advances, knowing such cloths to be the right of the Company, either by the mark upon them, or the transactions between the weavers from whom they procure them and the Company, or having reason for such knowledge from the notoriety of such weavers being in the Company's employ, or discovering the same by the clandestine methods they take to obtain the cloths, shall be liable to be sued for damages in the dewanny adawlut, and on proof of the fact to its satisfaction, the court shall award to the Company such amount as may appear to it equitable, in addition to the cloths so obtained. But for purchases openly and fairly made in the public hauts and bazars, the buyers shall not be liable to prosecution, unless the cloths have the Company's mark upon them.

No persons to use means to prevent individuals being engaged in the Company's employ.

VI. All officers of government, proprietors and farmers of land, and dependant talookdars, under farmers and ryots, and their agents and dependants, are enjoined not to hinder the commercial residents or their officers from access to weavers or other persons, in order to treat with them about the Company's business; nor are they to use any arts, menaces, or punishments, to deter weavers or other persons from accepting the Company's advances, under pain of being liable to be sued for damages in the dewanny adawlut.

No public Officers or any individuals to behave with disrespect to the Residents or their Officers; nor to impede the business of the Investment, but to assist it to the utmost of their power.

VII. All officers of Government, proprietors and farmers of land, talookdars, under farmers, and ryots, and their agents and dependants, are strictly prohibited from behaving with disrespect to the commercial residents or their officers; and they are required, on application from the commercial residents or their officers, to afford every assistance for the protection of the weavers and other persons employed by the Company, and the security of the Investment, that may be consistent with the powers and authority vested in them, and the Regulations.

Weavers in their capacity of Ryots to be subject to the same Regulations as other Ryots, with the exceptions hereafter specified.

VIII. Weavers employed by the Company, who may cultivate or rent land, are to pay the rent according to their pottahs, in the same manner as other ryots or renters, and under the same rules and regulations, with the exceptions hereafter specified as to the mode of demanding and enforcing payment of arrears of rent due from them.

Rules for the recovery of arrears of rent from Weavers in the Company's employ.

IX. First. To prevent unnecessary interruption to the provision of the Investment, and at the same time that weavers and other persons employed in the provision of it, may not withhold the rent justly due from them for land which they may rent or cultivate, the following Rules are prescribed.

Weavers, &c. in the Company's employ, not to be summoned by any Native concerned in the collections of the Rents or Revenue of Lands.

Second. No weaver, or other manufacturer, gomastah, or other officer or person employed in the provision of the Company's Investment, shall be summoned to the cutcherry of any proprietor or farmer of land, or any native holding or entrusted with the collection of the rents or revenue of lands, under any pretence whatever. If any such persons shall have claims on such weavers, manufacturers, gomastahs, or officer, for or relating to arrears of rent, they shall either distrain for the amount under Regulation XVII, 1793, or sue the defaulter for it in the dewanny adawlut, or state their claim in writing to the commercial resident, who, if the weaver, or other person, be then actually employed by the Company, may, if he shall deem it expedient so to do, cause him to satisfy the claim, or satisfy it himself, and stop the amount by kistbundy from his future advances, so that his labour on account of the Company's Investment may not be interrupted. But the cloth, thread, or advances belonging to the Company in the hands of such weaver, or other person, shall in no case be liable for such demand, but shall be restored to the resident.

How summonses are to be served on Weavers or other persons in the Company's employ, who may be sued in the Dewanny Adawlut.

X. First. Persons instituting suits in the dewanny adawlut against a weaver or other manufacturer, or any officer or person employed in the provision of the Company's Investment, are to specify his being so employed in the bill of plaint. In such cases, the summons, with a copy of the plaint, shall be enclosed to the commercial resident under a sealed cover, addressed to the resident, and superscribed with the official signature of the judge or the register. It shall be at the option of the resident to execute, or to cause one of his officers, or any person whom he may think proper, to execute the security required from defendants by Section V, Regulation IV, 1793, and also the security directed to be taken by Section IX, Regulation VII, 1793, for the fees of the authorized vakeel whom the defendant may entertain, or to leave the party summoned to find such securities, and in the latter case, if the officer of the court bearing the summons, where it shall have been transmitted by an officer, shall entertain any doubt of the responsibility of the security so offered, and the resident shall deem it to be sufficient, the officer shall accept the security. If the resident shall not think it proper to order any of his officers, or any other person to become security, and the defendant himself shall not be able to find security which the resident may deem responsible, he is to cause the defendant to accompany the officer of the court to the court, or, if no officer shall have been sent with the summons, to appear in person before the court, that he may be dealt with in the same manner as other defendants not giving the required security.

officer

Second. The residents are to empower the head officer at each of the different aurungs or kotees subordinate to them, and also an authorized vakeel of the dewanny adawlut, or any other person whom they may think it proper to station at the place at which the court may be held, to execute securities for the persons, and in the cases specified in the preceding clause. The residents are to be careful to keep the judges furnished with a list of the persons so empowered, specifying also the place at which they may usually reside, and the judges are authorized, in instances in which they may deem it proper, either from the distance of the place of abode of the resident from the place at which the party summoned may reside, or other circumstances, to order the summons to be inclosed to one of the persons so empowered to become security, instead of transmitting it to the resident himself, under the preceding clause, in which case, such person shall proceed in the same manner as the resident is directed to proceed, where the summons may be sent immediately to him.

Residents to empower persons to become security, and Judges may transmit summonses to them.

Third. If any person shall prefer a suit in the dewanny adawlut against a weaver or other manufacturer, or any officer or person employed in the provision of the Company's Investment, without specifying that the defendant is so employed, and the summons shall in consequence be ordered to be served on the defendant, in the same manner as on other defendants, the officer serving the same, upon the circumstance of the defendant being so employed, being notified to him by the resident, or any of his officers, or by the defendant himself, shall deliver the summons to the nearest person empowered to execute the securities in the cases specified in clause first, whether the resident, or the head officer of an aurung or kotee, who shall proceed in the manner prescribed to the resident in that clause. If the officer shall receive the notification of the defendant being in the Company's employ, from the defendant only, and shall entertain doubts of his being so employed, or if he shall not entertain any doubt of his being so employed, but shall apprehend that he will abscond whilst he (the officer) is repairing with the summons to the person empowered to execute the securities, he shall in such case, carry the defendant, with the summons, to the person so empowered, and shall not release him, until the required securities have been executed.

How obedience to a summons is to be enforced if issued against a person employed in the Company's Investment, without its having been so specified in the plaint.

Fourth. In cases in which a weaver or other manufacturer, or any officer or person employed in the provision of the Company's Investment, shall be charged before the magistrate with a bailable offence, the warrant shall be served in the manner directed in the preceding clauses with regard to summonses in civil cases, with this difference, that the warrant shall require the party summoned to appear in person, or by vakeel, as the magistrate may think proper, and shall specify the amount of the sum for which the security or recognizance for the appearance of the defendant is to be given, and the amount of which shall be regulated by the magistrate, according to the nature of the charge, and the situation and circumstances in life of the defendant.

How warrants for bailable offences against persons employed in the Investment, are to be served.

Fifth. In all the cases specified in the preceding clauses of this Section, the resident or head officer through whom the summons or warrant may be served, shall return on the back of it in what manner it has been served, and by whom the security has been executed.

Return to be made on the back of summonses, and warrants served as above directed.

Sixth. If a charge shall be preferred to a magistrate against any weaver or other manufacturer, or any officer or person employed in the provision of the Company's Investment, for an offence that is not bailable, and there shall appear to the magistrate sufficient ground for apprehending the person so charged, the warrant for his apprehension shall require him to appear immediately in person, and shall be executed in the same manner as upon persons not so employed. But the officer, after securing the offender, is to give notice of his apprehension to the resident, or the head officer of the nearest aurung or kotee.

Warrants for offences not bailable, how to be executed on persons in the Company's employ.

Seventh. The darogahs of police are to observe the rules prescribed in clauses fourth and sixth of this Section, in complaints that may be preferred to them against weavers or other manufacturers, or officers or persons in the employ of the Company.

Darogahs of Police to observe the rules in Clauses Fourth and Sixth.

Eighth. In all cases in which the residents, or their head officers empowered for that purpose, shall become security under any of the clauses of this Section, for the appearance of any person employed in the Investment, or for the fees of his vakeel, or shall declare any person whom the party summoned may offer as security, to be responsible, the resident is to be considered personally answerable for the due performance of the conditions of the security, in the event of the party for whom the security may be given not performing them himself, or, where the party himself shall have given the security, and it shall have been declared responsible by the resident, or his head officer of an aurung or kotee, in the event of the party or his surety not performing them. It will accordingly be the business of the residents to take care to employ creditable persons only as head officers at the several aurungs and kotees to superintend the business, and become security, and to furnish them with proper instructions, and to take such security from them, as they (the residents) may deem sufficient to indemnify themselves for the consequences that may result from any abuse which such officers may commit in the exercise of their trust.

Residents and their Head Officers to be responsible for the performance of the conditions of the Securities they may execute or approve.

 furnish

Reg. XXXI. 1793.

How Summonses on persons employed in the Investment when required as Witnesses, are to be executed.

Ninth. Summonses to weavers or other manufacturers, or officers, or any persons employed in the Company's Investment, as witnesses, shall be served in the same manner as if they were parties in the cause, but the judges are to be careful not to summon such persons excepting when their attendance shall be absolutely necessary, and on their appearance, to have them examined and dismissed with all practicable dispatch, so that they may be absent from the business of the Investment as short a time as possible.

Residents and their Head Officers forbidden to apply the above Rules to persons not employed in the Company's Investment.

Discretionary power vested in the Judges and Magistrates of causing the immediate attendance of all Natives employed in the Investment.

Restrictions under which this discretionary power is to be exercised.

Tenth. The residents, and their head officers, are declared liable to be sued in the dewanny adawlut, should they apply any of the rules in the preceding clauses of this Section regarding summonses and warrants issued against persons employed in the Investment, to persons not bonâ fide so employed. And as the rules contained in those clauses, are intended only to prevent unnecessary interruption to the Investment, where it can be avoided without impeding the course of justice, the judges and magistrates are empowered in particular cases in which it may appear to them indispensably necessary for the purposes of justice, to order the personal attendance of any native officer or person in anywise concerned or employed in the Investment, whether he may be a party or a witness in the suit or prosecution, notwithstanding any thing that may be said to the contrary in those clauses, and to cause process to be executed upon him for that purpose, in the same manner as upon other individuals; but in such cases, the judges and magistrates are to record their reasons for deviating from the prescriptions contained in the said clauses, which are to be considered as the general rules for issuing and executing such summonses and warrants, and in the summons or warrant, they are to specify that it has been specially ordered to be so executed, in virtue of the discretionary power vested in them by this clause; and they are moreover strictly enjoined to refrain from every unnecessary exercise of this discretionary power.

Transactions between private Traders and Weavers cognizable in the Courts of Dewanny Adawlut, the Judges of which are to decide according to the case and the Regulations.

XI. All complaints of weavers against individual traders, and vice versa, are to be considered as matters of a private nature between the parties, who are to have recourse to the proper courts of judicature, should they have any ground of complaint against each other for breach of engagements, or other cause. The courts are to decide according to the tenor of the engagements between the parties, if any engagements exist, and the regulations: But where weavers are employed at the same time by more than one foreign or private agent, they shall deliver first to the previous contractor, and afterwards to the others, according to priority of engagements.

Decisions in favour of private Traders against Weavers previously in the employ of the Company, to be made with a saving of their claims; which are to be first satisfied provided they be proved.

XII. First. Decisions in favour of private merchants, or other individuals, against weavers who were in the employ of the Company at the time they entered with such private merchants or individuals into the agreements on which they are sued (their having been so employed being proved by the lists of the Company's weavers published at the cutcherries and transmitted to the judge of the dewanny adawlut as directed in Section IV, as well as by the dates of the respective agreements and transactions consequent to them) shall be made with a saving to the Company of their claims on such weavers, which claims also are to be proved in court. And that this rule may be carried into effect, before execution follows at the suit of an individual against any weaver in that list, the Company's commercial resident shall be desired to state whether such weaver was in the employ of the Company when the agreement on which he may be cast was made, as also whether the Company have any and what demand upon him, and to make proof of the same; which being satisfied or secured, the sum decreed against him in favour of the individual shall next be made good from his property, but his person shall not be liable to attachment.

Punishment for Gomastahs, &c. changing cloths, and committing the offences herein specified.

XIII. Gomastahs, deedars, mokeems, and all native servants and persons of whatsoever description, employed under the Company's factories or aurungs in the provision of their Investment, guilty of changing the Company's cloths; accepting of money from individuals for abetting or conniving at the alienation of them by the weavers; writing false balances in the Company's accounts; embezzling otherwise the property entrusted to them; or exacting money in any shape from weavers to whom advances are made; shall, on conviction in the court of dewanny adawlut to which they may be amenable, forfeit double the amount of the value of the property, or the money which they may have embezzled, alienated, or exacted, and shall be further liable to imprisonment for any term that the court may judge proper, not exceeding twelve months, and upon the circumstances being represented by the Board of Trade to the Governor General in Council, he will, if it shall appear to him proper, declare the offender incapable of serving Government in any capacity.

Rules regarding Weavers applicable to others providing goods for the Investment.

XIV. All the rules in this Regulation regarding weavers employed for the Company, are to be considered to extend, in their principles and meaning, to the manufacturers and other persons employed in the provision of raw silk, and of the other articles of the Company's Investment provided within the Provinces of Bengal, Behar, or Orissa.

Rules for Residents trading on their own account.

XV. First. The following Rules are prescribed for the conduct of commercial Residents carrying on trade for themselves.

Resident to supply the Company's goods in the first instance.

Second. The Resident shall supply, or ensure the Company's demand for goods, as far as the ability of his aurung will go, before he provides any for himself.

Third.

To distinguish the Company's provision from his own.

Third. He shall carefully and avowedly distinguish to the manufacturers, between the Company's provision and his own.

Company's prices not to be made the standard of his own trade.

Fourth. He shall give them the price for which they may choose to deal with him, without making the Company's prices a standard for his own trade.

Not to use his official influence to make the Manufacturers work for him in preference to others.

Fifth. He shall not make use of any influence he may possess, as the Company's representative, to induce the manufacturers to work for him in preference to other dealers.

Subject to the same rules as private Traders.

Sixth. He shall be subject to the same regulations, in case of disputes with manufacturers, as other private traders.

To deal on his own stock.

Seventh. He shall not take any commission for agents or others, but deal merely on his own stock as a merchant.

Not to trade in the name of another.

Eighth. He shall not carry on any trade in his aurung, directly or indirectly, in the name of any other person.

His goods not be sold at his own Aurung, nor sent to a foreign Settlement.

Ninth. Whatever goods he may provide of the produce of the aurung where he is stationed, shall not be sold there, nor sent to any foreign settlement, but shall be consigned to some other place, and if brought to Calcutta, or sent by manjee to the upper provinces, shall be registered in his name in the custom-house books.

To deliver an annual Statement of his private trade to the Board of Trade.

Tenth. He shall state to the Board of Trade by the 15th of December in every year, the gross amount of the money invested or to be invested by him on his own account, as nearly as he can judge of the same, from the 1st May preceding to the 30th April following, and the Board of Trade shall thereupon communicate to the Governor General in Council any remarks that may appear to them proper.

Residents and their Officers liable to be sued in the Dewanny Adawlut for breach of Regulations, under the restrictions herein specified.

XVI. The commercial residents and their native officers of every description, are declared liable to be sued in the dewanny adawlut by weavers or others with whom they may use compulsion to make them enter into the Company's employ, or whose names they may improperly insert in the list specified in Section IV, or whom they may not pay for their cloths or goods according to the engagements entered into between them and the Company, or who may not obtain in due time a fair settlement of accounts, or who may suffer unjust exactions from peons put over them; or for any breach of this Regulation, or any other Regulation regarding the provision of the Investment, printed and published in the manner directed in Regulation XLI, 1793. In all such cases, whether the act complained of shall have been done by the resident or any of his officers, the party aggrieved is in the first instance to state his complaint to the resident, and in the event of his refusing to afford the required redress, or omitting to grant it within a reasonable time, the complainant may then sue the resident, whether the injury complained of shall have been done by himself or his officer. But the courts are not to receive any suit that may be preferred against a resident or any of his officers, unless the complainant shall prove to the satisfaction of the court, by oath, or by any other mode which the court may deem satisfactory, that he applied to the resident for redress, and that he refused to afford the redress required, or omitted to grant it within a reasonable time. Either party dissatisfied with the award or decision of a resident, on any complaint made to him under this Section, may appeal from it to the dewanny adawlut.

Resident and his Officers to defend suits instituted against them for a breach of the Regulations, at their own risk.

XVII. In suits instituted against a resident or any of his officers, under the preceding Section, and where the act complained of shall not have been done pursuant to special orders from the Board of Trade, or the Governor General in Council, the party complained against is to appoint one of the authorized vakeels of the court to defend the suit at his own risk.

Residents may take upon themselves the defence of suits instituted against their Officers.

XVIII. The residents may take upon themselves the defence of any suits which may be instituted against their officers, but in such cases the residents are to be answerable for the decree of the court, in the same manner as if the suit had been originally instituted against them.

Process issued against Residents, how to be served.

XIX. When any process shall be issued by a court of civil judicature to a commercial resident, the judge, or the register of the court, is to transmit it under a sealed cover, addressed to the resident in the form of a letter, and superscribed with his name and official appellation. The resident is immediately to acknowledge the receipt of the process by an endorsement to that effect on the instrument, and to return it under a sealed cover addressed to the judge or the register of the court from which it may have issued.

By whom decrees, costs and damages given against Residents and their Officers, are to be made good.

XX. Where the Board of Trade shall approve of decisions given against the commercial residents or their officers, in suits in which they may have been engaged in their official capacity, and which may not have been prosecuted or defended by them, pursuant to orders from the Board, or the Governor General in Council, they are empowered to make the resident, or his officer by whom the act complained of may have been done, responsible for the whole or any part of the costs and damages awarded by the decree, or of the decree itself, if upon a consideration of the merits of the case, and of the conduct of the person against whom the decree may be given, or the act complained of may have been done, they shall be of opinion that the Company ought not to be charged with all or any part of such costs or damages, or decree. But in such cases, the person person whom they may so determine to hold responsible, may appeal the cause at his own risk and cost.

Reg. XXXI. 1793.

Board of Trade may authorize an appeal from any decision passed against the Resident or his Officers.

XXI. If the Board of Trade shall be dissatisfied with a decree passed against a commercial resident or any of his officers, in suits in which they may have been engaged, either with or without their orders, or the orders of the Governor General in Council, they may authorize an appeal from it under the Regulations, in which case the appeal shall be carried on in the provincial court of appeal, and in the sudder dewanny adawlut (should the cause be carried to the last-mentioned court) by the vakeel of Government, or by any other authorized vakeel of the Court into which the cause may be brought, notwithstanding any thing that may be said to the contrary in any Regulation passed on this date.

Security not to be demanded from Residents or their Head Officers for their appearance, or costs, or damages, or decrees.

XXII. Security is not to be demanded from the commercial residents, or the head officers of aurungs or kotees who may be empowered to execute securities, for their personal appearance in any suit in which they may be engaged in their official capacity; nor shall security be required from them for the payment of costs or damages, or for the performance of the decrees or orders of the courts, as Government will be responsible for causing the residents to answer to such suits instituted against them, and to make good the decrees, and will hold them responsible for their head officers of aurungs or kotees answering to such suits preferred against them, and performing the decrees that may be passed therein.

Residents and their Head Officers not liable to prosecution for the acts of their predecessors.

What Suits they are bound to defend after removal from office.

XXIII. The residents, and their head officers of kotees or aurungs, shall not be liable to prosecution for official acts of their predecessors. But persons who may be removed from a residency, or from the place of head officer of an aurung or kotee, are to carry on in the same manner as if they had continued in the office, all suits instituted against them in their official capacity, unless the Board of Trade, upon a consideration of the circumstances of the cases, shall deem it advisable to order their successors to carry on the suits. This rule however is not to extend to suits in which a resident or head officer, who may have been removed, shall have been engaged in virtue of orders from the Board of Trade, or the Governor General in Council; all such suits are to be carried on by the resident for the time being, and at the risk and expense of Government.

Residents and their Head Officers allowed to forward instructions to their Vakeels by the Dawk, free of postage.

Instructions to be sealed and inclosed under a sealed cover addressed to the Register of the Court, who is to deliver them sealed.

The Vakeels may in like manner forward instructions to their constituents through the Register.

XXIV. To facilitate the communication between the residents and their head officers of aurungs or kotees, and their vakeels in the zillah or city courts, or the provincial courts of appeal, and the sudder dewanny adawlut, who may be entrusted with the conduct of any suits or appeals in which they may be engaged in their official capacity, either whilst they may continue in the office, or after their removal from it, they are permitted to forward, free of postage, any instructions which they may have to transmit to their vakeels in those courts. The instructions are to be enclosed under a sealed cover directed to the vakeel. The instructions so sealed and directed, are to be transmitted under a sealed cover, addressed to the register of the court in which the cause may be depending, and superscribed with the name and official appellation of the person dispatching it; or that which he bore when the cause of action arose. The register of the court, immediately on receiving the instructions, is to deliver them sealed to the vakeel to whom they may be directed. In like manner, the vakeels in any of the courts to whom the pleading of such suits or appeals may be committed by commercial residents, or their head officers abovementioned, are authorized, either whilst their constituents remain in such office, or after they shall have been removed from it, to forward any papers which they may have to convey to their constituents by the public dawk, free of postage. The papers are to be enclosed in a cover sealed with the seal of the vakeel, and the judge, or the register to the court, is to transmit the papers so sealed, in a cover sealed and addressed to the person to whom they are to be forwarded, and superscribed with his official signature.

Cases in which the Board of Trade are to take upon themselves the prosecution or defence of Suits or Appeals.

XXV. In cases in which the Board of Trade may judge it expedient, or in which they may receive orders for the purpose from the Governor General in Council, they are to take upon themselves the superintendence of the prosecution or defence of any suit or appeal in which they or their officers may be engaged, either in a zillah or city court, or in a provincial court of appeal, or in the sudder dewanny adawlut, instead of leaving the superintendence of the conduct of the suit or appeal to the resident, or any of his officers.

Residents and their Head Officers not to derive any advantage from Suits.

Nor to sustain any loss if their conduct be be approved.

XXVI. Neither the commercial residents, nor their head officers of aurungs or kotees, are to derive any advantage whatever from suits in the courts of justice in which they may be engaged, or in anywise concerned, in their official capacity. On the other hand, it is not intended, that the residents or their abovementioned officers should sustain any loss in consequence of such suits, where their conduct may be adjudged to be conformable to the regulations, or may be approved by the Board of Trade, or the Governor General in council. The Commercial residents and their head officers of aurungs or kotees, are accordingly to bring to the credit of the Company in their accounts, all sums whatever that may be adjudged to them by any of the courts of justice, and they are to note at the foot of their accounts, or in a separate account, or under a distinct head in their accounts, according as the Board of Trade may direct, all sums which they may disburse, or be adjudged to pay, on account of suits in which they may be engaged, or be concerned, in their official capacity; but no such disbursements or payments are to be considered as passed to the debit of the Company, until the previous sanction of the Board of Trade, or the Governor General in Council, shall have been obtained for that purpose, and until such Sums disbursed by Residents and their Head Officers not to be carried to the debit of the Company without orders from the superior authorities.

sanction

sanction is procured, the residents or the officers making the disbursements or payments, are to be held answerable for the amount. Reg. XXXI. 1793.

XXVII. The rules in this regulation respecting commercial residents, are to be considered equally applicable to their assistants having the charge of the business, or to any other person being a covenanted servant of the Company, and entrusted with the superintendence of the provision of goods for the Company's Investment at any aurung, whatever may be his official appellation. Rules regarding Commercial Residents applicable to their assistants or other servants entrusted with the business.

XXVIII. If a weaver or manufacturer, or any native employed in the provision of the Company's Investment, shall deem himself aggrieved by any act done in opposition to this regulation by a commercial resident, or any covenanted servant of the Company having the charge of the business of an aurung, pursuant to special orders from the Board of Trade, or the Governor General in Council, he will be at liberty to seek redress in the mode prescribed for such cases in Section XI, Regulation III, 1793. Natives aggrieved under this Regulation by special orders of the Governor General in Council, or the Board of Trade, how to obtain redress.

A. D. 1795. REGULATION XXII.

Section LXXXV. In consequence of complaints preferred by the weavers in the sircar ghazeepoor, of the impositions practised on them by the dellols and dustoories, orders were issued on the 22d of March and 22d of July 1790, notifying that the weavers throughout the four sircars, composing the zemindarry of Benares, were to be considered as having the option of carrying on their business, either through or without the interference of the above-named intermediate agents, and that they were at full liberty to bring their cloths into any bezar or market, and freely to dispose of them to the best advantage; and that no person was to presume, on any pretence, to fix any price on their goods; and that they were to sell their fabrics to whomsoever they might think proper, and for such price as they and the purchaser might mutually and voluntarily settle. Reg. XXII. 1795.

A. D. 1799. REGULATION N° VII.

Section IV. The same principle is to be observed with respect to the sale of ungathered products, after the distrainer shall have gathered and stored them, as required by Section XIII, of Regulation XVII, 1793, and which are not to be sold until publication shall have been made, as above directed. In consequence of this alteration, which is made with a view to expedite the sale of distrained property, distrainers when they attach the property of persons employed in the provision of the Company's Investment, or in the manufacture of salt, are to give the notice directed in Section XXXI, of Regulation XVII, 1793, as soon as possible after making the attachment; and in such cases the property is not to be sold until sufficient time has been given to enable the Company's officers to satisfy the demand before the day of sale. The notice required by the above Section, however, may, at the option of the distrainer, be either given to the commercial resident or salt agent, in whose division the defaulter may have been employed, or to the native superintendent of the factory or saltchokey to which the defaulter may be attached. Reg. VII. 1799.

A. D. 1795. REGULATION XLV.

Section III. Persons vested with the power of distraint, shall not distrain or sell the lands, houses, or other real property of their under farmers and ryots, or of the zemindars or putteedars paying revenue through them; nor goods or advances belonging to the Company; nor the loom, thread, unwrought silk, or materials of manufacture of any weaver or manufacturer; nor the tools of any tradesman or labourer, standing towards them in the relation of under farmer, ryot, or dependant zemindar or putteedar: all such distraints and sales are declared illegal and void. The defaulter shall stand acquitted of the arrear for which the distress may be levied, and the property shall be restored to him, or the distrainer shall be compelled to make good to him the value of it, if it shall be personal property, and shall have been destroyed, damaged or injured, or shall not be forthcoming, and the distrainer shall be further obliged to pay to him damages adequate to the loss which he may prove to have sustained in consequence of such attachment or sale, with all costs of suit. Reg. XLV. 1795.

No. 10, Regulations and Orders, of the Bengal Government, respecting The Weavers.

Reg. XXXVII. 1803.

A. D. 1803. REGULATION XXXVII.

A REGULATION prescribing Rules respecting the provision of the Honourable the English East India Company's Investment, in the Provinces ceded by the Nawaub Vizier to the Honourable the English East India Company.—PASSED by the Governor General in Council, on the 24th of March 1803; corresponding with the 12th Choite 1209 Bengal Era; the 16th Choite 1210 Fussily; the 12th Choite 1210 Willaity; the 16th Choite 1860 Sumbut; and the 29th Zekaad 1217 Higeree.

WHEREAS the nature and extent of the commercial concerns of the Company render it necessary, that rules should be prescribed for preventing manufacturers, or other persons in their employment, from embezzling the money advanced to them by the Company, or from disposing of the goods provided with such money to individuals; and also for ensuring the punctual delivery of goods, engaged to be provided on account of the Company: And whereas no well-founded objection can be offered to such rules by the manufacturers, or others to whom they may extend; while it is established by the same rules, as a fundamental principle, that no person shall be compelled to provide goods for the Company, and that those persons who may be employed by them shall always be at liberty to relinquish their employ, after performing the engagements into which they shall have voluntarily entered: And whereas it is equally requisite, on general principles, that precaution should be taken to prevent the rules adopted for the abovementioned purposes, from being rendered subservient to the private views of the officers employed in the provision of the Investment, to the injury of the manufacturers, and to the prejudice of the interests of the Company, both in their commercial capacity, and as rulers of the country: And whereas the Governor General in Council has determined, with a view of more effectually guarding against such abuses, and of ensuring justice to the manufacturers and others in their dealings with the Company, that the rules to which persons engaging to furnish goods for the Company's Investment may be subjected, shall be incorporated with the laws and regulations for the internal government of the country, and that the officers employed in the immediate superintendence of the provision of the Investment, shall be liable to be sued for any deviation from those rules in the courts of judicature, affording thereby to every person deeming himself aggrieved by their official acts, whether originating with themselves, or done in consequence of orders from the superior authorities, the means of obtaining redress, with the same facility as for an injury received from any individual: THE following RULES have been accordingly enacted:—

No weaver to be compelled to work for the Company.

II. Weavers not indebted, nor under engagements to the Company, shall not be compelled to enter into their employ; and weavers indebted, or under engagements to the Company, on duly discharging such debts or engagements, shall not be compelled to enter into fresh engagements.

Persons under engagements, after fulfilling them, not to be compelled to re-engage.

Conditions to which weavers engaging for the provision of the Company's Investment, are to consider themselves subject.

III. First. Weavers who may engage for the provision of any part of the Company's Investment, shall consider themselves as engaging under the following rules and conditions.

Engagements to be made in writing, attested by not less than two witnesses.

Second. All engagements with weavers shall be made in writing, attested by at least two credible witnesses. One copy of the writing shall remain with the commercial resident or his officers, and the remaining copy with the other party to the engagement.

Weavers not chusing to take further advances to give a fortnight's notice.

Third. Weavers under engagements to the Company, and who may not intend to take further advances, shall give at least a fortnight's notice of their intention.

No weavers to work for individuals, or bazar sales, until they have completed their engagements on account of the Investment.

Fourth. Weavers indebted to the Company, who have received advances from them, or come under engagements to them, shall, in discharge of such debt, advances or engagements, deliver cloths according to agreement. They shall on no account give to any other person or persons whatever, European or Native, either the labour or the produce engaged to the Company; and if they have not fulfilled their engagements by the period agreed on, they shall not work for newer engagements, nor for bazar sales, until those engagements are completed.

Peons may be put on weavers failing in their engagements, for the purposes herein specified.

Fifth. When any weaver fails to deliver, by the stipulated periods, the cloths for which he may have engaged, the commercial resident shall be at liberty to place peons upon him, in order to quicken his deliveries, and prevent his infringing the two restrictions in the latter part of Clause Fourth.

Penalty for weavers disposing of cloths to individuals whilst they are deficient in their deliveries, on account of the Investment.

Sixth. If notwithstanding the restrictions in the latter part of Clause Fourth, any weaver shall by himself, or by any other person, sell cloths to private merchants, Europeans or Natives, or to dealers or agents of whatever description, whilst he is deficient in his stipulated deliveries on account of the Company's Investment, he shall be liable to be prosecuted in the court of adawlut, and upon proof of the fact, he shall be adjudged to forfeit to the Company

Company all that the produce of the cloths so sold, rated either at what he got for them, or their bazar value, shall exceed the ordinary prime cost of the thread in them, with costs of suit besides, and moreover be obliged to complete his engagements.

Penalty for weavers failing in their stipulated deliveries.

Seventh. Weavers possessed of more than one loom, and entertaining one or more workmen, shall be subject to a penalty of thirty-five per cent. on the stipulated price of every piece of cloth that they may fail to deliver, according to the written agreement which they may have executed, in addition to the repayment of the money advanced for the same.

How the penalty in the preceding clause is to be recovered.

Eighth. The penalty specified in the preceding clause shall be sued for in the court of adawlut, and shall be recoverable on the agreement with the weaver, and the failure in his deliveries, being proved.

List of weavers employed by the Company, to be fixed up in the cutcherry of the collector.

IV. A list or register of the weavers employed in the provision of the Company's Investment, in every pergunnah, specifying their places of abode, shall be fixed up by the commercial resident in the cutcherry of that pergunnah, and shall be corrected at the beginning of every week or month, according to the alterations that may have happened in the week or month preceding. The officers of the cutcherry shall give immediate permission for the exhibition of the list; and the commercial resident shall transmit a copy of it in the native languages, once in every three months to the judge of the zillah.

Persons procuring from weavers cloths made with the Company's advances, how to be proceeded against.

V. Persons procuring from weavers in the Company's employ, by the offer of ready money, or under the pretence of previous engagements which were not avowed, cloths really wrought for the Company, and with their advances, knowing such cloths to be the right of the Company, either by the mark upon them, or the transactions between the weavers from whom they procure them, and the Company, or having reason for such knowledge from the notoriety of such weavers being in the Company's employ, or discovering the same by the clandestine methods they take to obtain the cloths, shall be liable to be sued for damages in the court of adawlut, and on proof of the fact to its satisfaction, the court shall award to the Company such amount as may appear to it equitable, in addition to the cloths so obtained. But for purchases, openly and fairly made in the public hauts and bazars, the buyers shall not be liable to prosecution, unless the cloths have the Company's mark upon them.

No persons to use means to prevent individuals being engaged in the Company's employ.

VI. All officers of Government, proprietors and farmers of land, and dependant talookdars, under-farmers and ryots, and their agents and dependants, are enjoined not to hinder the commercial residents or their officers from having access to weavers, or other persons, in order to treat with them about the Company's business; nor are they to use any arts menaces or punishments, to deter weavers, or other persons, from accepting the Company's advances, under pain of being liable to be sued for damages in the court of adawlut.

No public officers or any individuals to behave with disrespect to the residents or their officers; nor to impede the business of the Investment, but to assist it to the utmost of their power.

VII. All officers of Government, proprietors and farmers of land, talookdars, under-farmers, and ryots, and their agents and dependants, are strictly prohibited from behaving with disrespect to the commercial residents or their officers; and they are required, on application from the commercial residents or their officers, to afford every assistance for the protection of the weavers and other persons employed by the Company, and the security of the Investment, that may be consistent with the powers and authority vested in them, and the Regulations.

Weavers in their capacity of ryots, to be subject to the same regulations as other ryots, with the exceptions hereafter specified.

VIII. Weavers employed by the Company, who may cultivate or rent land, shall pay the rent according to their pottahs, in the same manner as other ryots or renters, and under the same rules and regulations, with the exceptions hereafter specified as to the mode of demanding and enforcing payment of arrears of rent due from them.

Rules for the recovery of arrears of rent from weavers in the Company's employ.

IX. First. To prevent unnecessary interruption to the provision of the Investment, and at the same time that weavers and other persons employed in the provision of it may not withhold the rent justly due from them for land which they may rent or cultivate, the following Rules are prescribed.

Weavers, &c. in the Company's employ not to be summoned by any native concerned in the collection of the rents or revenue of lands.

Second. No weaver or other manufacturer, gomastah, or other officer or person, during the period he may be actually employed in the provision of the Company's Investment, shall be summoned to the cutcherry of any proprietor or farmer of land, or any native holding or entrusted with the collection of the rents or revenue of lands, under any pretence whatever. If any such persons shall have claims on such weavers, manufacturers, gomastahs, or officer, for or relating to arrears of rent, they shall either distrain for the amount, under Regulation XXVIII, 1803, or sue the defaulter for it in the court of adawlut, or state their claim in writing to the commercial resident, who, if the weaver or other person be then actually employed by the Company, may, if he shall deem it expedient so to do, cause him to satisfy the claim, or satisfy it himself, and stop the amount by kistbundy from his future advances, so that his labour, on account of the Company's Investment, may not be interrupted. But the cloth, thread, or advances belonging to the Company in the hands of such weaver or other person, shall in no case be liable for such demand, but shall be restored to the resident.

Such persons to be liable to the ordinary process, when their engagements have been fulfilled.

Third. The summary process for arrest and confinement, authorized by the six first clauses of Section XXXII, Regulation XXVII, 1803, is hereby declared not applicable to any persons who may be under engagements to the Company for any part of their Investment, or who may be actually employed in providing the same. When such engagements may have been fulfilled, however, or whenever any weaver or other person in the Company's employ may have satisfied all demands upon him on the part of the Company, he will be liable, in common with other under-tenants, to be proceeded against for arrears of rent, as authorized by the above Regulation, or by any other Regulation applicable to persons not in the Company's employ.

How summonses are to be served on weavers or her persons in the upany's employ who be sued in the Adawlut.

X. First. Persons instituting suits in the court of adawlut against a weaver or other manufacturer, or any officer or person employed in the provision of the Company's Investment, shall specify his being so employed in the bill of plaint. In such cases the summons, with a copy of the plaint, shall be enclosed to the commercial resident under a sealed cover, addressed to the resident, and superscribed with the official signature of the judge or the register. It shall be at the option of the resident to execute, or to cause one of his officers, or any person whom he may think proper, to execute the security required from defendants by Section V, Regulation III, 1803, and also the security directed to be taken by Clause Sixth, of Section VIII, Regulation X, 1803, for the fees of the authorized vakeel whom the defendant may entertain, or to leave the party summoned to find such securities; and in the latter case, if the officer of the court bearing the summons, where it shall have been transmitted by an officer, shall entertain any doubt of the responsibility of the security so offered, and the resident shall deem it to be sufficient, the officer shall accept the security. If the resident shall not think it proper to order any of his officers, or any other person, to become security, and the defendant himself shall not be able to find security which the resident may deem responsible, he shall cause the defendant to accompany the officer of the court to the court, or, if no officer shall have been sent with the summons, to appear in person before the court, that he may be dealt with in the same manner as other defendants not giving the required security.

Residents to empower persons to become security, and judges may transmit summonses to them.

Second. The residents shall empower the head officer at each of the different aurungs or kotees subordinate to them, and also an authorized vakeel of the court of adawlut, or any other person whom they may think it proper to station at the place at which the court may be held, to execute securities for the persons, and in the cases specified in the preceding clause. The residents will be careful to keep the judges furnished with a list of the persons so empowered, specifying also the place at which they may usually reside; and the judges are authorized, in instances in which they may deem it proper, either from the distance of the place of abode of the resident from the place at which the party summoned may reside, or other circumstances, to order the summons to be inclosed to one of the persons so empowered to become security, instead of transmitting it to the resident himself under the preceding clause, in which case such person shall proceed in the same manner as the resident is directed to proceed where the summons may be sent immediately to him.

How obedience to a summons is to be enforced if issued against a person employed in the Company's Investment without its having been so specified in the plaint.

Third. If any person shall prefer a suit in the court of adawlut against a weaver or other manufacturer, or any officer or person employed in the provision of the Company's investment, without specifying that the defendant is so employed, and the summons shall in consequence be ordered to be served on the defendant, in the same manner as on other defendants; the officer serving the same, upon the circumstance of the defendant being so employed being notified to him by the resident or any of his officers, or by the defendant himself, shall deliver the summons to the nearest person empowered to execute the securities in the cases specified in Clause First, whether the resident, or the head officer of an aurung or kotee, who shall proceed in the manner prescribed to the resident in that clause. If the officer shall receive the notification of the defendant being in the Company's employ, from the defendant only, and shall entertain doubts of his being so employed, or if he shall not entertain any doubt of his being so employed, but shall apprehend that he will abscond whilst he (the officer) is repairing with the summons to the person empowered to execute the securities, he shall, in such case, carry the defendant, with the summons, to the person so empowered, and shall not release him, until the required securities have been executed.

How warrants for bailable offences against persons employed in the Investment, are to be served.

Fourth. In cases in which a weaver or other manufacturer, or any officer or person during the time he may be actually employed in the provision of the Company's Investment, shall be charged before the magistrate with a bailable offence, the warrant shall be served in the manner directed in the preceding clauses with regard to summonses in civil cases, with this difference, that the warrant shall require the party summoned to appear in person or by vakeel, as the magistrate may think proper, and shall specify the amount of the sum for which the security or recognizance for the appearance of the defendant is to be given, and the amount of which shall be regulated by the magistrate, according to the nature of the charge, and the situation and circumstances in life of the defendant.

Return to be made on the back of summonses and warrants served as above directed.

Fifth. In all cases specified in the preceding clauses of this Section, the resident or head officer through whom the summons or warrant may be served, shall return on the back of it in what manner it has been served, and by whom the security has been executed.

Sixth.

Sixth. If a charge shall be preferred to a magistrate against any weaver or other manufacturer, or any officer or person employed in the provision of the Company's Investment, for an offence that is not bailable, and there shall appear to the magistrate sufficient ground for apprehending the person so charged, the warrant for his apprehension shall require him to appear immediately in person, and shall be executed in the same manner as upon persons not so employed. But the officer, after securing the offender, shall give notice of his apprehension to the resident, or the head officer of the nearest aurung or kotee.

Warrants for offences not bailable, how to be executed on persons in the Company's employ.

Seventh. The tehseeldars, in their capacity of local chief officers of police, and the darogahs of police, shall observe the rules prescribed in clauses fourth and sixth of this Section, in complaints that may be preferred to them against weavers, or other manufacturers, or officers or persons in the employ of the Company.

Tehseeldars and darogahs of police to observe the rules in clauses fourth and sixth.

Eighth. In all cases in which the residents, or their head officers empowered for that purpose, shall become security, under any of the clauses of this Section, for the appearance of any person employed in the Investment, or for the fees of his vakeel, or shall declare any person whom the party summoned may offer as security, to be responsible, the resident shall be considered personally answerable for the due performance of the conditions of the security, in the event of the party, for whom the security may be given, not performing them himself, or, where the party himself shall have given the security, and it shall have been declared responsible by the resident, or his head officer of an aurung or kotee, in the event of the party or his surety not performing them. It will accordingly be the business of the residents to take care to employ creditable persons only as head officers at the several aurungs and kotees to superintend the business, and become security, and to furnish them with proper instructions, and to take such security from them, as they (the residents) may deem sufficient to indemnify themselves for the consequences that may result from any abuse which such officers may commit in the exercise of their trust.

Residents and their head officers to be responsible for the performance of the conditions of the securities they may execute or approve.

Ninth. Summonses to weavers or other manufacturers, or officers, or any persons employed in the Company's Investment, as witnesses, shall be served in the same manner as if they were parties in the cause, but the judges will be careful not to summon such persons, excepting when their attendance shall be absolutely necessary, and on their appearance, to have them examined and dismissed with all practicable dispatch, so that they may be absent from the business of the Investment as short a time as possible.

How summonses on persons employed in the Investment when required as witnesses, are to be executed.

Tenth. The residents and their head officers are declared liable to be sued in the court of adawlut, should they apply any of the rules in the preceding clauses of this section, regarding summonses and warrants issued against persons employed in the Investment, to persons not bonâ fide so employed. And as the rules contained in those clauses are intended only to prevent unnecessary interruption to the Investment, where it can be avoided without impeding the course of justice, the judges and magistrates are empowered, in particular cases in which it may appear to them indispensably necessary for the purposes of justice, to order the personal attendance of any native officer or person in anywise concerned or employed in the Investment, whether he may be a party or a witness in the suit or prosecution, notwithstanding any thing that may be said to the contrary in those clauses, and to cause process to be executed on him for that purpose, in the same manner as upon other individuals; but, in such cases, the judges and magistrates shall record their reasons for deviating from the rules prescribed in the said clauses, which shall be considered as the general rules for issuing and executing such summonses and warrants, and in the summons or warrant they shall specify that it has been specially ordered to be so executed, in virtue of the discretionary power vested in them by this clause; and they are moreover strictly enjoined to refrain from every unnecessary exercise of this discretionary power.

Residents and their head officers forbidden to apply the above rules to persons not employed in the Company's Investment.

Discretionary power vested in the Judges and magistrates of causing the immediate attendance of all natives employed in the Investment.

Restrictions under which this discretionary power is to be exercised.

XI. All complaints of weavers against individual traders, and vice versa, shall be considered as matters of a private nature between the parties, who may have recourse to the proper courts of judicature, should they have any ground of complaint against each other for breach of engagements or other cause. The court shall decide according to the tenor of the engagements between the parties, if any engagements exist, and the Regulations. But where weavers are employed at the same time by more than one foreign or private agent, they shall deliver first to the previous contractor, and afterwards to the others, according to priority of engagements.

Transactions between private traders and weavers cognizable in the courts of Adawlut, the Judges of which are to decide according to the case and the Regulations.

XII. First. Decisions in favour of private merchants, or other individuals, against weavers who were in the employ of the Company at the time they entered with such private merchants or individuals into the agreements on which they are sued (their having been so employed being proved by the lists of the Company's weavers published at the cutcherries, and transmitted to the judge of the court of adawlut, as directed in Section IV. as well as by the dates of the respective agreements and transactions consequent to them) shall be made with a reservation to the Company of their claims on such weavers, which claims also are to be proved in court. And that this rule may be carried into effect, before execution follows at the suit of an individual against any weaver in that list, the Company's commercial resident shall be desired to state, whether such weaver was in the employ of the Company when the agreement on which he may be cast was made, as also whether the Company have any and what demand upon him, and to make proof of the same; which Decisions in favour of private traders against weavers previously in the employ of the Company, to be made with a saving of their claims, which are to be first satisfied provided they be proved.

No. 10. Regulations and Orders, of the Bengal Government, respecting The Weavers.

being satisfied or secured, the sum decreed against him in favour of the individual shall next be made good from his property, but his person shall not be liable to attachment.

Second. The restriction contained in the foregoing clause, that the persons of weavers in the employ of the Company shall not be liable to attachment, in execution of decisions of the civil courts in favour of private merchants or other individuals, is not meant to restrict the confinement, under judicial process, of persons who may have satisfied all just demands upon them on the part of the Company, and who may not have taken new advances from the Company, or entered into new engagements with them, the fulfilment of which would be frustrated by the confinement of the contracting party. The several courts of justice will accordingly observe this explanation of the rule abovementioned in all cases to which it may be applicable.

Punishment for gomastahs, &c. changing cloths, and committing the offences herein specified.

XIII. Gomastahs, and all native servants and persons of whatsoever description, employed under the Company's factories or aurungs in the provision of their Investment, guilty of changing the Company's cloths; accepting of money from individuals for abetting or conniving at the alienation of them by the weavers; writing false balances in the Company's accounts; embezzling otherwise the property entrusted to them; or exacting money in any shape from weavers to whom advances are made; shall, on conviction in the court of adawlut to which they may be amenable, forfeit double the amount of the value of the property, or the money which they may have embezzled, alienated, or exacted; and shall be further liable to imprisonment for any term that the court shall judge proper, not exceeding twelve months; and upon the circumstances being represented by the Board of Trade to the Governor General in Council, he will, if it shall appear to him proper, declare the offender incapable of serving Government in any capacity.

Rules regarding weavers applicable to others providing goods for the investment.

XIV. All the rules in this Regulation, regarding weavers employed in manufacturing cloths for the Company, shall be considered to extend, in their principles and meaning, to the manufacturers and other persons employed in the provision of all other articles of the Company's Investment, provided within the provinces ceded by the Nawaub Vizier to the Honourable the English East India company.

Rules for residents trading on their own account.

XV. First. The following Rules are prescribed for the conduct of commercial Residents carrying on trade for themselves.

Resident to supply the Company's goods in the first instance.

Second. The resident shall supply, or ensure the Company's demands for goods, as far as the ability of his aurung will go, before he provides any for himself.

To distinguish the Company's provision from his own.

Third. He shall carefully and avowedly distinguish to the manufacturers between the Company's provision and his own.

Company's prices not to be made the standard of his own trade.

Fourth. He shall give them the price for which they may consent to deal with him, without making the Company's prices a standard for his own trade.

Not to use his official influence to make the manufacturers work for him in preference to others.

Fifth. He shall not make use of any influence he may possess, as the Company's representative, to induce the manufacturers to work for him, in preference to other dealers.

Subject to the same rules as private traders.

Sixth. He shall be subject to the same regulations, in case of disputes with manufacturers, as other private traders.

To deal on his own stock.

Seventh. He shall not take any commission for agents or others, but deal merely on his own stock as a merchant.

Not to trade in the name of another.

Eighth. He shall not carry on any trade in his aurung, directly or indirectly, in the name of any other person.

His goods not to be sold at his own aurung, nor sent to a foreign settlement.

Ninth. Whatever goods he shall provide of the produce of the aurung where he is stationed, shall not be sold there, nor sent to any foreign settlement, but shall be consigned to some other place, and if brought to any of the stations established for the collection of the Government customs, shall be registered in his name in the custom-house books.

To deliver an annual statement of his private trade to the Board of Trade.

Tenth. He shall state to the Board of Trade, by the 15th of December in every year, the gross amount of the money invested or to be invested by him on his own account, as nearly as he can judge of the same, from the 1st May preceding to the 30th April following, and the Board of Trade shall thereupon communicate to the Governor General in Council any remarks that may appear to them proper.

Residents and their officers liable to be sued in the Adawlut for breach of Regulations under the restrictions herein specified.

XVI. The commercial residents, and their native officers of every description, are declared liable to be sued in the court of adawlut by weavers or others with whom they may use compulsion to make them enter into the Company's employ, or whose names they may improperly insert in the list specified in Section IV, or whom they may not pay for their cloths or goods, according to the engagements entered into between them and the Company, or who may not obtain in due time a fair settlement of accounts, or who may suffer unjust exactions from peons put over them, or for any breach of this regulation, or any other regulation regulation regarding the provision of the Investment, printed and published in the manner directed in Regulation I, 1805. In all such cases, whether the act complained of shall have been done by the resident or any of his officers, the party aggrieved, in the first instance, shall state his complaint to the resident, and in the event of his refusing to afford the required redress, or omitting to grant it within a reasonable time, the complainant may then sue the resident, whether the injury complained of shall have been done by himself or his officer. But the courts shall not receive any suit that may be preferred against a resident, or any of his officers, unless the complainant shall prove, to the satisfaction of the court, by oath, or by any other mode which the court may deem satisfactory, that he applied to the resident for redress, and that he refused to afford the redress required, or omitted to grant it within a reasonable time. Either party dissatisfied with the award or decision of a resident, or any complaint made to him under this section, may appeal from it to the court of adawlut.

Resident and his officers to defend suits instituted against them for a breach of the Regulations, at their own risk.

XVII. In suits instituted against a resident, or any of his officers, under the preceding Section, and where the act complained of shall not have been done pursuant to special orders from the Board of Trade, or the Governor General in Council, the party complained against shall appoint one of the authorized vakeels of the court to defend the suit at his own risk.

Residents may take upon themselves the defence of suits instituted against their officers.

XVIII. The residents may take upon themselves the defence of any suits which may be instituted against their officers, but, in such cases, the residents shall be answerable for the decree of the court, in the same manner as if the suit had been originally instituted against them.

Process issued against residents, how to be served.

XIX. When any process shall be issued by a court of civil judicature to a commercial resident, the judge or the register of the court shall transmit it, under a sealed cover addressed to the resident in the form of a letter, and superscribed with his name and official appellation. The resident shall immediately acknowledge the receipt of the process, by an endorsement to that effect on the instrument, and return it, under a sealed cover addressed to the judge or the register of the court from which it may have issued.

By whom decrees, costs and damages given against residents and their officers are to be made good.

XX. Where the board of trade shall approve of decisions given against the commercial residents, or their officers, in suits in which they may have been engaged in their official capacity, and which may not have been prosecuted or defended by them, pursuant to orders from the Board, or the Governor General in Council, they are empowered to make the resident, or his officer by whom the act complained of may have been done, responsible for the whole or any part of the costs and damages awarded by the decree, or of the decree itself, if, upon a consideration of the merits of the case, and of the conduct of the person against whom the decree may have been given, or the act complained of may have been done, they shall be of opinion that the Company ought not to be charged with all or any part of such costs or damages, or decree. But, in such cases, the person whom they may so determine to hold responsible, may appeal the cause at his own risk and cost.

Board of Trade may authorize an appeal from any decision passed against the resident or his officers.

XXI. If the Board of Trade shall be dissatisfied with a decree passed against a commercial resident, or any of his officers, in suits in which they may have been engaged, either with or without their orders, or the orders of the Governor General in Council, they may authorize an appeal from it under the regulations, in which case, the appeal shall be carried on in the provincial court of appeal, and in the sudder dewanny adawlut, (should the cause be carried to the last mentioned court) by the vakeel of Government, or by any other authorized vakeel of the court into which the cause may be brought, notwithstanding any thing that may be said to the contrary in any regulation passed on this date.

Security not to be demanded from residents or their head officers for their appearance, or costs or damages or decrees.

XXII. Security shall not be demanded from the commercial residents, or the head officers of aurungs or kotees, who may be empowered to execute securities for their personal appearance in any suit in which they may be engaged in their official capacity, nor shall security be required from them for the payment of costs or damages, or for the performance of the decrees or orders of the courts, as Government will be responsible for causing the residents to answer to such suits instituted against them, and to make good the decrees, and will hold them responsible for their head officers of aurungs or kotees answering to such suits preferred against them, and performing the decress that may be passed therein.

Residents and their head officer, not liable to prosecution for the acts of their predecessors.

What suits they are bound to defend after removal from office.

XXIII. The residents, and their head officers of kotees or aurungs, shall not be liable to prosecution for official acts of their predecessors. But persons who may be removed from a residency, or from the place of head officer of an aurung or kotee, shall carry on in the same manner as if they had continued in the office, all suits instituted against them in their official capacity, unless the Board of Trade, upon a consideration of the circumstances of the case, shall deem it advisable to order their successors to carry on the suits. This rule, however, shall not extend to suits in which a resident or head officer, who may have been removed, shall have been engaged in virtue of orders from the Board of Trade, or the Governor General in Council. All such suits shall be carried on by the resident for the time being, and at the risk and expense of Government.

Residents and their head officers allowed to forward instructions to their vakeels by the dawk, free of postage.

XXIV. To facilitate the communication between the residents and their head officers of aurungs or kotees, and their vakeels in the zillah courts, or the provincial court of appeal, and the sudder dewanny adawlut, who may be entrusted with the conduct of any suits or appeals in which they may be engaged in their official capacity, either whilst they may continue in the office, or after their removal from it, they are permitted to forward, free of postage, any instructions which they may have to transmit to their vakeels in those courts. The instructions shall be enclosed under a sealed cover directed to the vakeel. The instructions so sealed and directed, shall be transmitted under a sealed cover, addressed to the register of the court in which the cause may be depending, and subscribed with the name and official appellation of the person dispatching it, or that which he bore when the cause of action arose. The register of the court, immediately on receiving the instructions, shall deliver them sealed to the vakeel to whom they may be directed. In like manner, the vakeels in any of the courts to whom the pleading of such suits or appeals may be committed by commercial residents, or their head officers abovementioned, are authorized, either whilst their constituents remain in such office, or after they shall have been removed from it, to forward any papers which they may have to convey to their constituents by the public dawk, free of postage. The papers shall be enclosed in a cover sealed with the seal of the vakeel, and the judge, or the register of the court, shall transmit the papers so sealed, in a cover sealed and addressed to the person to whom they are to be forwarded, and superscribed with his official signature.

Instructions to be sealed and inclosed under a sealed cover, addressed to the register of the court, who is to deliver them sealed.

The vakeels may in like manner forward instructions to their constituents through the register.

Cases in which the Board of Trade are to take upon themselves the prosecution or defence of suits or appeals.

XXV. In cases in which the Board of Trade may judge it expedient, or in which they may receive orders for the purpose from the Governor General in Council, they shall take upon themselves the superintendence of the prosecution or defence of any suit or appeal in which they or their officers may be engaged, either in a zillah court, or in the provincial court of appeal, or in the sudder dewanny adawlut, instead of leaving the superintendence of the conduct of the suit or appeal to the resident, or any of his officers.

Residents and their head officers not to derive any advantage from suits.

Nor to sustain any loss if their conduct be approved.

XXVI. Neither the commercial residents, nor their head officers of aurungs or kotees, shall derive any advantage whatever from suits in the courts of justice in which they may be engaged, or in anywise concerned in their official capacity. On the other hand, it is not intended that the residents, or their abovementioned officers, should sustain any loss in consequence of such suits, where their conduct may be adjudged to be conformable to the Regulations, or may be approved by the Board of Trade, or the Governor General in Council. The commercial residents, and their head officers of aurungs or kotees, will accordingly bring to the credit of the Company in their accounts all sums whatever that may be adjudged to them by any of the courts of justice, and will note, at the foot of their accounts, or in a separate account, or under a distinct head in their accounts, according as the Board of Trade may direct, all sums which they may disburse, or be adjudged to pay on account of suits in which they may be engaged, or be concerned in their official capacity; but no such disbursements or payments shall be considered as passed to the debit of the Company, until the previous sanction of the Board of Trade, or the Governor General in Council shall have been obtained for that purpose; and until such sanction shall be procured, the residents or the officers making the disbursements or payments, will be held answerable for the amount.

Sums disbursed by residents and their head officers, not to be carried to the debit of the Company, without orders from the superior authorities.

Rules regarding commercial residents applicable to their assistants or other servants entrusted with the business.

XXVII. The rules in this Regulation respecting commercial residents, shall be considered equally applicable to their assistants having the charge of the business, or to any other person being a covenanted servant of the Company, and entrusted with the superintendence of the provision of goods for the Company's Investment at any aurung, whatever may be his official appellation.

Natives aggrieved under this Regulation by special orders of the Governor General in Council, or the Board of Trade, how to obtain redress.

XXVIII. If a weaver or manufacturer, or any native employed in the provision of the Company's Investment, shall deem himself aggrieved by any act done in opposition to this Regulation by a commercial resident, or any covenanted servant of the Company having the charge of the business of an aurung, pursuant to special orders from the Board of Trade, or the Governor General in Council, he will be at liberty to seek redress in the mode prescribed for such cases in Section XV, Regulation II, 1803.

No. 10.
Regulations and Orders, of the Bengal Government, respecting The Weavers.

Reg. IV. 1802.

A.D. 1805. REGULATION IV.

A REGULATION for extending to the Province of Benares, Regulation XXXI, 1793, entitled, "A Regulation for re-enacting, with modifications and amendments, "the Rules passed on the 23d of July 1787, and subsequent dates, for the conduct "of the Commercial Residents and Agents, and all Persons employed or concerned "in the provision of the Company's Investment;" and also, for exempting from duty all goods and articles provided in the Province of Benares, on account of the Investment of the Honourable East India Company.—PASSED by the Governor General in Council, on the 25th April 1805; corresponding with the 14th Bysaack 1212 Bengal era; the 12th Bysaack 1212 Fussily; the 14th Bysaack 1212 Willaity; the 11th Bysaack 1862 Sumbut; and the 24th Mohurrum 1212 Higeree.

WHEREAS it has hitherto been the practice to provide the Investment of the Honourable the East India Company in the province of Benares, by purchasing the goods brought for sale by the manufacturers with ready money; or by contracts made with native dullols, or dustooreeas, for the provision of the goods; instead of making advances to the manufacturers, for the provision of goods of specified dimensions, and of a certain quality; in the manner observed in the provinces of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa; And whereas the adherence to the said system has operated to prevent the desired improvement of the fabrics, and to render the provision of the requisite quantity of goods uncertain: And whereas, by making advances to the manufacturers for goods of the required quality and dimensions, under the rules contained in Regulation XXXI, 1793; and by extending the said Regulation to the province of Benares, the commercial officers of the Company will be enabled to effect the desired improvements in the quality of the manufactures; and to ensure the punctual delivery of the required quantity of goods; and the Company, the weavers, and other manufacturers, and the private traders of every description will, under the protection of the laws, be secured in their just rights, in the transaction of their respective concerns; according to the tenor of the agreements under which such concerns may be conducted: And whereas the objections which formerly existed against the exemption of the goods, provided on account of the Company's Investment, in the province of Benares, from the payment of duties at the custom-houses within that province, have ceased to exist, in consequence of the agreement concluded on the 27th of October 1794, with the Rajah of Benares, regarding the appropriation of the surplus revenue of the said province; THE following RULES have been enacted, and are to be in force in the province of Benares from the date of their promulgation.

Regulation XXXI, 1793, extended to the province of Benares; with alterations and modifications, regarding weavers and others applicable to Benares.

II. The Rules contained in Regulation XXXI, 1793, are hereby declared to extend to the province of Benares, with the alterations and modifications regarding the weavers and others employed in the provision of the Company's Investment, contained in Regulations V, 1800, and IX, 1801; as far as the same are applicable to the province of Benares.

providing goods for the Investment contained in Regulation V, 1800, and IX, 1801, as far as they are Rowannahs to be taken out for the Company's Investment; such goods not liable to duty.

III. Commercial residents or agents, and others employed to provide goods for the Honourable Company's Investment, shall take out rowannahs to accompany the goods, which are to pass a custom-house station. Such rowannahs shall be granted upon official application for them being made in writing to the collectors, but no customs commission or fees shall be levied on such goods.

To the Honourable The Court of DIRECTORS for the Affairs of The East India Company.

HONOURABLE SIRS,

ACCORDING to the intimation which I lately took the liberty of giving, I have now the honour to submit to your consideration, a tract which bears upon a subject pressed by repeated proposals on your attention, namely, the communication of Christianity to the natives of our possessions in the East.

That this is a question of importance, will hardly be denied; and from the numerous letters which have been addressed to the Court, in favour of such communication, as well as from the share of general regard now bestowed on subjects of that nature, it appears to be a question on which an explicit determination, on the part of the Company, is become necessary.

It is therefore in different views, worthy of a full and candid discussion; and such I have been solicitous to give it, actuated solely by motives of duty, arising from the several relations in which I find myself placed. For, in becoming an advocate, as I profess myself to be, for making known to our Asiatic subjects, the pure and benign principles of our divine religion, I not only pay that obedience which is due to its authoritative injunctions, but, in my sincere opinion, highly consult the true interests of the Company, and the general welfare of the many millions living under its government. Nor can I doubt, that this will be the verdict of serious deliberation, however a hasty view of the subject, under some of its aspects, may have unnecessarily excited alarm.

In earlier periods, the Company manifested a laudable zeal for extending, as far as its means then went, the knowledge of the Gospel to the Pagan tribes, among whom its factories were placed. It has since prospered and become great, in a way to which the commercial history of the world affords no parallel; and for this it is indebted to the fostering and protecting care of divine Providence. It owes therefore, the warmest gratitude for the past, and it equally needs the support of the same beneficent Power in time to come; for the "changes and chances" to which human affairs are always liable, and especially the emphatic lessons of vicissitude which the present day has supplied, may assure us, that neither elevation nor safety can be maintained by any of the nations or rulers, of the earth, but through Him who governs the whole. The duty therefore of the Company, as part of a Christian community, its peculiar superadded obligations, its enlarged means, and its continual dependence upon the divine favour, all call upon it to honour God, by diffusing the knowledge of that revelation which he has vouchsafed to mankind.

In urging this momentous work however, I wish to be clearly understood, as connecting with the formation and execution of any scheme for the performance of it, every prudent care, every just precaution, which may be suitable to the nature of the undertaking, and to the wise, humble, mild spirit of that religion which is to be recommended. At present I presume to offer no specific proposal, contending only for the general principle; but if that is recognised, I shall be most ready to submit the ideas I entertain of the manner in which it might be safely brought into operation.

If the considerations already adduced, did not sufficiently guard me against the censure of launching beyond the ordinary lines of business, I might justly plead, that the office which you, Gentlemen, exercise, and which I have the honour to hold in common with you, summons, not unfrequently, your attention to subjects of the highest highest nature,—to the principles of government, and the interests of nations; subjects upon which, having mentioned them, I may be permitted to observe, that even a deliberative voice, though to that you are not restrained, attaches a trust of great importance to the station of a Director.

But with respect to the execution of the treatise which is now offered to your perusal, I am sensible that I need the utmost indulgence. Incapable at best to do justice to the several topics which it embraces, I might yet in India, the centre of materials and information relating to them, have produced something less unworthy of notice; but though I held there the leading opinions now advanced, no idea of giving any publicity to them, by writing, ever occurred to me, until after my return to this country, when persuaded of the expediency of some attempt of that kind, and incited by a particular occasion, I several years ago, hastily drew up the substance of the present essay. It has however since lien by me unused, and my other avocations have allowed me only to revise it, not to form a new work, as would certainly have been desirable. To meet a variety of opinions, and to fortify the argument which is maintained in it, many things are introduced which must be already known to you, and indeed things which in my own first views, I should have deemed superfluous; for according to my apprehension, the main question is so clear as to need little auxiliary illustration. Under all these disadvantages, however, I am content to come forward, at the call of a greater interest, forming no pretension to literary merit, nor having on that score, any higher hope, than that you may be pleased to receive this tract on the footing of one of those many Papers of Business, with which the records of your governments have been furnished, by the observation and experience of men whose time and thoughts have been chiefly employed in the concerns of active life.

I have the honour to be, with the greatest respect,

GENTLEMEN,

Your most obedient humble Servant,

East-India House,
August 16th, 1797.

CHARLES GRANT.

CONTENTS.

CHAP. I.—Introduction; including a brief Review of British Territorial Administration in The East - - - - - - - - - - - - - - p. 5.

CHAP. II.—View of the State of Society among the Hindoo Subjects of Great Britain, particularly with respect to Morals - - - - - - - - - - 25.

CHAP. III.—Causes which have produced the present Situation and Character of the Hindoos - 39.

CHAP. IV.—Inquiry into the Measures which might be adopted by Great Britain, for the improvement of the condition of her Asiatic Subjects; and Answers to Objections - 75.

APPENDIX.—Extracts from the Transactions of the Society for promoting Christian Knowledge; for the year 1795 - - - - - - - - - - - - 113.

OBSERVATIONS,

&c.

CHAP I.

Introduction—including a brief Review of British Territorial Administration in The East.

CHAP. I. Introduction: British territorial Administration in The East.

WHATEVER diversity of opinion may have prevailed respecting the past conduct of the English in the East, all parties will concur in one sentiment, that we ought to study the happiness of the vast body of subjects which we have acquired there. Upon this proposition, taken as a truth of the highest certainty and importance, the following Observations, now submitted with great deference, are founded.

He who ventures to propose a plan which has an air of novelty, at a time when the wildest fanaticism in politics and philosophy is pursuing, with impious and inhuman success, the indiscriminate subversion of received principles and existing establishments, labours under peculiar disadvantages. Truth however, and reason, always the same, are not to be abandoned because they may sometimes be perverted and abused. Of late they have been perverted and abused in a way new in the history of the world. The writer of these observations holds the spirit that has thus broken forth, in the utmost abhorrence, and would stand at the remotest distance from its influence. His aim is to promote the peace and happiness of men, by pacific and rational means, and where he is compelled to speak of past or present errors and defects, he mentions them with no disposition to censure, but solely with the view of doing good. He trusts, that if the opinions which he delivers, and the measures which he recommends in the subsequent pages, be patiently and impartially considered, they will neither be found inconsistent with right principles, nor pointing to any other than the most beneficial consequences.

Although in theory it never can have been denied, that the welfare of our Asiatic subjects ought to be the object of our solicitude, yet in practice, this acknowledged truth has been but slowly followed up, and some of the inferences which are deducible from it, remain, as it should seem, still to be discovered. Of late undoubtedly much has been done, and excellently done, to improve the condition of our subjects in the East; yet upon an attentive examination it may perhaps be found, that much still remains to be performed.

It is now five-and-thirty years since the English East-India Company, and through that Company the British Nation, acquired an extensive political power in Hindostan. Some time before this period, they had been compelled by the ambition of the A. D. 1757. French, to take a part in contests which had arisen among the Mahomedan Princes on the Coromandel Coast; for the representatives of that nation, the first among the people of Europe who conceived the design of procuring a dominion out of the broken empire of the Moguls, pursued their object by entering systematically into the politics of the Decan, and becoming hence the ally of one of the parties contending for the possession of the Carnatic, the English who foreseeing the success which would probably attend the unchecked prosecution of this ambitious enterprize, and in the consequent aggrandizement of their rivals, the ruin of their own commercial establishments, espoused the defensible pretensions of the other side. In this struggle they were finally victorious; they gave a Nabob to the Carnatic, who continued to depend upon them; and were thus advanced to a certain degree of military and political importance in the eyes of the natives of that part of India. But that prince was left by treaty in full possession of the internal government of his territories, and exercised all the powers of sovereignty over the people of them. The only possession which the English retained for themselves, was a narrow tract of land along the Coast of Coromandel, chiefly in the vicinity of their principal settlement of Madras.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

Bengal was destined to be the seat of British empire in the East. The first military operations however of the nation in that province, instead of being prompted by views of conquest, were employed solely for the defence of their principal factory, suddenly, when they thought only of the peaceable pursuits of commerce, wantonly attacked by the Nabob of the country, the recent successor of an usurper, with a numerous army. The English of Calcutta, having neither men nor means adequate to this unexpected service, fell an easy prey, and the survivors of the barbarous scenes then exhibited, were driven from their plundered settlement, and, destitute of every thing, forced to seek a wretched refuge on the water. At this crisis, the warfare and the political transactions into which the English had been led in the Carnatic, appeared of new importance. By the result of them, the government of Madras was itself in a condition to assert by arms the right of the Company and the Nation, to the settlements of which they had been dispossessed in Bengal, and to seek a compensation for the immense property of which they had been despoiled.

That right was unquestionable; it was derived from the lawful sovereign of Hindostan, when the empire was in the zenith of its power, and had long been quietly enjoyed. The struggle made for the recovery and security of it, which was on our part self-defence, ended in the ruin of the aggressor; for after once breaking with us, he never thought himself safe until we should be extirpated. Fresh plots for our destruction soon terminated a pacification, in which he had never been sincere; we were reduced to the alternative of suffering extirpation from our just and ancient possession, or maintaining by force our footing in the country against the oppressive ruler of it; and a handful of foreigners driven to this extremity, accepted the offers of confederacy, which his sanguinary tyranny impelled some of the principal persons living under his government to make, for his deposition, and the substitution of another Mussulman in his room. Perhaps the rigid casuists might not choose to defend the expedient of facilitating the progress of our arms, by leaguing with the subjects of the Nabob, imminent as our danger and theirs was. This point must be left to be tried upon its own merits; but whatever decision may be passed concerning it, two things are in fairness entitled to attention in the general consideration of this subject:—First, that it is probable the Company and the Nation, had they remained without confederates, never would have submitted to be wantonly stript of valuable rights; therefore the maintenance of them, with further accessions of force derived from their own resources, might have produced the discomfiture of their enemy, and by an easy consequence, his loss of power:—Secondly, that the confederation into which the English entered was no part of their original plan, but an incidental circumstance in the sequel of hostilities.

From this circumstance however, viewed in the most unfavorable light, prejudice has taken occasion to characterize the whole of their transactions of that period; and the French, who as has been said, first of the European nations, conceived the scheme of Indian war and conquest, and whose game of wanton ambition ended in the loss of all their possessions in the East, have not failed to describe the revolution in Bengal as originating in our lawless lust of wealth and dominion. Many of the inflammatory misrepresentations which envious disappointed rivalship has prompted them to make, our own countrymen have precipitately adopted, not examining whether, in their readiness to testify an abhorrence of injustice towards the natives of India, they were not inadvertently contributing to do injustice to the character of their own nation. But as in any serious inquiry into the duties which we owe to our subjects in that country, men of correct principles will naturally be led to carry back their view to the first steps by which we acquired power there, it is hoped that some brief elucidation of so important a question, both here and as it may come again into notice in the course of this essay, will be deemed no irrelevant digression.

By the deposition of Surajah Dowlah, the provinces which he had ruled, fell first under the control of the English, and subsequently under their immediate management. They acquired also among the conquests made from the French soon after this revolution, a tract of country on the Coromandel Coast, called from its relative situation, the Northern Circars; and at a later period, the celebrated district of Benares was annexed by cession to their possessions on the Ganges. These countries, thus acquired, and now held in full property by the British Nation, joining with them

Bombay

Bombay and Salsett, are reckoned by that able geographer, Major Rennel, to contain 182,000 square miles, that is 50,000 square miles more than are, according to him, contained in Great Britain and Ireland; and the population of these extensive regions may be estimated at about fourteen millions*. Besides these absolute acquisitions, the fertile territory of Oude, with its appendages, is to be reckoned among the states dependent on the British power, which are governed internally by their own princes; and all the territories which come under this description, are by the same author, computed to contain nearly 100,000 square miles. Supposing their population to be in proportion less than that of Bengal, it may be allowable to state it at six millions. The conquests lately made in the Mysore Country and on the Malabar Coast, are to be added to the account of the territorial property of the British Nation. They have not been directly comprehended in the foregoing enumeration, because it is intended to speak chiefly upon the authority of time and experience; but the observations which these suggest, respecting the people with whom we are already acquainted, will doubtless equally apply to those of the same race and principles, who are recently become our subjects. The number of these last may perhaps be estimated at two millions. Thus the whole aggregate of Asiatics who depend immediately and solely upon us for every comfort and happiness of good government, amounts to sixteen millions†; and those who indirectly and partially depend upon us, by living under princes subject to our control, and therefore considerably under our influence, if we chose to exert it, even in matters of interior regulation, amount, as has been stated, to six millions. Such a charge as this, a charge of no less than two-and-twenty millions‡ of people, must be allowed to be one of the most weighty and serious nature, as it constitutes also one of the largest divisions of the power which is distributed among the rulers of the earth.

What then has been the effect of our administration upon the countries which have thus fallen under our dominion? This is no unfair inquiry, nor is it proposed invidiously, but as having a relation to the main design of the ensuing pages; neither shall it be pursued upon conjectural positions or by problematical reasonings, but rested on the broad basis of general facts, many of which stand conspicuous in the records of our Indian transactions. That the same topics have already been handled by persons of distinguished situations, and especially that abilities have been employed upon them far transcending the humble pretensions of the present writer, would invincibly determine him to abstain from treating of them, if his design did not impose this task upon him, and impose it with a view which other writers have not exactly proposed to themselves. Happily this undertaking calls not for the powers or the details of regular history; nor on the other hand would it be answered by the exhibition of mere results, which would carry more the air of assertions than of facts. Facts therefore so far circumstantiated as to be seen in their truth and their connection, it will be his endeavour to trace with simplicity, and with moderation.

The account of our territorial management in the East, or of the internal exercise of our power in those countries which are now held directly by us, may be conveniently arranged into four distinct periods, of which it will be sufficient here to sketch the prominent features; and as Bengal with its appendant provinces forms both the main portion of our possessions, and the scene of our greatest exertions, experience, and progress, that division shall be the subject of our present brief review, with only such concluding notice of the other parts, as may serve to indicate the state to which they have hitherto advanced.

A. D. 1757 to 1765.

In the first period, comprehending eight years, from 1757 to 1765, the provinces (excepting a few districts ceded to the Company in the course of that time, with the sanction of the Mogul Emperor) were continued under the government of Nabobs, to whom the administration of civil and criminal justice, the collection of the revenues, and the general powers of internal superintendence and regulation, were left. The English reserved to themselves the direction of foreign policy, a controlling military power, a considerable tribute, and advantages in trade more extensive than the grants of the Emperors, or the past usage of the country, had conceded to them.

The

* The latest estimates would make Bengal, Behar, and our part of Orissa, to contain at least twelve millions. If they do, the whole population of these different possessions may amount to sixteen millions.

† Or according to the preceding note, eighteen millions.

‡ Or according to the same note, twenty-four millions.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

The circumstances of the first revolution seemed to dictate such a division of power; of which, the share vested in the Nabob, is usually called in the writings of that time, the Country or the Native Government, as when the mass of both divisions, or the complex power, Native and European was spoken of, it was termed (sometimes in a way of censure) the Double Government. To this arrangement the orders of the Company seem to have at first restricted their servants, who if they had felt themselves more at liberty, would perhaps have deemed it unsafe or inexpedient to enter at once upon the direct charge of a government, to the details of which they were entire strangers.

But plausible as the system, viewed in some lights, appeared, it proved in practice, unsatisfactory to all parties, and especially detrimental to the people. The Eastern governments are in general careless as to the interests of their subjects, and this is particularly true of Mahomedan rulers. The Nabobs created by the English in Bengal, foreign adventurers suddenly raised to power, dependent, suspicious, and rapacious, could have little concern for the lasting prosperity of a country, with the government of which, their connection was so casual and precarious. Whilst they saw with secret indignation the chief attributes of sovereignty in the possession of a handful of commercial men, every way alien to the Asiatic world, and so large a share of the riches of the country, devoted through them to a distant land; whilst they believed also that the favour of these people was uncertain, they could scarcely have any other aim, than to use the time present in making the most of their situations.

And indeed such seems to have been the temper of the other princes more remotely placed, who were stiled the allies, but who in reality were the dependents of the East India Company. Feeling that the same power which supported could also dispossess them, and habituated by the whole history and the manners of Hindostan to the ideas of perfidy and of change, they could have no settled confidence in the solidity of their tenures, but be on the contrary indisposed to that study to which Eastern rulers at the best need a stimulus, the permanent good of their subjects. Asiatics, accustomed either to absolute command or implicit obedience, do not seem well qualified to make a beneficial use of delegated or mixed power. The policy of our dependent allies has in general been directed only to secure themselves in their situations: it has been their aim to please the immediate arbiters of their fate, and they have found either sagaciously or by incidental discovery, that even running largely in debt is one means of interesting many in the stability of their government. But this policy is pursued at the expense of their subjects, and the people, both of Arcot and of Oude, are with too much foundation represented to be in a wretched condition. A state of dependence seems also to unfit or indispose the princes who stand to us in this relation, for any vigorous co-operation in the external defence of their own territories. Perhaps that species of protection to which they have been used, has enervated them, made them unwilling to contribute the funds requisite in such cases, and persuaded them that the English will not suffer those countries of which they are in effect the paramount lords, to be possessed by any other power. Another evil, more formidable possibly than our experience has yet discovered, flows from this system; it enlarges the sphere of advantage to the servants, especially the military servants of the Company, it enlarges the military establishment, military emoluments, and perhaps encourages, in its consequences, the spirit of military independence. The experience we have acquired, may probably establish an opinion of the impolicy of forming any new connections of this nature; but with respect to those which already subsist, as it is our power which maintains the authority of our dependent allies over their subjects, it seems incumbent on us to exert every possible endeavour, consistent with the just sense and faith of treaties, that the governments which we thus uphold may render the people easy and happy.

Where the controlling power of the English and the derived power of the dependent Nabob met in one place, as in Bengal, they could not long exist together without collision. The unwilling submission of the weaker party, and the dominating temper of the stronger, soon became too plain; mutual distrust and aversion succeeded; the excesses of individuals inflamed the animosity on each side, and the country became the unfortunate scene of war. The cruelties, the rapacity, and the expulsion of Cossim Ali, whom an unhappy policy had elevated to power, are sufficiently known. Whether we ascribe his conduct to unprincipled ambition, or the licentious encroachments of Europeans and their dependents upon his proper authority, or with more probability probability to both of these causes, and the maddening effect of events hurrying him to lengths he had not deliberately purposed, it still exhibited this striking spectacle, the English obliged to fight with the creature of their own power, for the continuance of that power, nay even for their existence in Bengal; and the country, instead of being better protected under co-existing authorities, suffering grievously by both, and in their shock convulsed and torn. What had thus happened, however blameable the cause, might happen again; and this experience purchased at so dear a rate, naturally led the way to the acquisition of the Dewannee of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa.

A. D. 1765. This may be considered as a point at which a second period of territorial management commences. The Dewannee is the office of the Dewan, the title of the provincial collector of revenues under the Mogul Emperors, whose policy it was to place the financial administration of the several divisions of the empire, in hands distinct from those entrusted with military command and judicial authority.

The adventurers who upon the decline of the empire, assumed the powers of government in the provinces, assumed also the exclusive administration and appropriation of the revenues, as most essential to their views. The rights of the reigning emperor however, though disregarded, had never been denied. He was induced, in consideration of an annual tribute to himself, and a handsome stipend to the reigning Nabob, who was also a party in this treaty, to grant in perpetuity to the East-India Company for their own benefit, the Dewannee, that is in other words, the revenues of those three provinces. He had not at that time, nor was likely ever to have the least power to assert his rights; his bestowing that grant therefore, on the condition of an ample compensation, was making the most advantageous use he possibly could make of his pretensions. No other power in Hindostan would have given him such favourable terms; and his consciousness of this led him voluntarily to propose a cession of the Dewannee. It is thence to be concluded, that in this transaction he was guided chiefly by the exigencies of his own situation; for his remote distance from the seat of the Company's government must have rendered their influence over him proportionably weak. But at the same time it ought to be acknowledged, that the subsequent proceeding with him, by which the payment of the stipulated tribute was discontinued, appears to be of a more dubious character. This remark also is interjected for the sake of those who question the principles on which our acquisitions have been made.

The Company having before held a controlling military power, were thus put in possession of the finances of the country, which as an immense estate they were henceforth to manage, and to manage for themselves. The collection of the revenues there is known to have been till of late a business of extreme intricacy and detail; the causes of which have been explained in a variety of masterly productions, particularly the excellent writings of Mr. Shore* on this subject; into which, however, it will not be necessary to go farther here than the statement of certain usages which form the first lines of the Indian system of finance. In Hindostan, far the greater part of the revenue of the sovereign arises from land; and it has long been the universal practice to form the assessment of government upon the actual produce of the soil, and to do this annually. Not unfrequently the share of government has been paid in kind. In like manner the land-holder regulates the rent of his inferior tenant annually, and according to the value of the articles which he raises, whether rice, cotton, sugar, or any other of the many productions which the soil furnishes. It will easily be perceived, that this system as it naturally leads to concealment on the one side, requires a constant course of vigilance and laborious local investigation on the other, in every rank of persons employed in the revenue, from the first officer to the lowest farmer of a village. Again, the sovereign is arbiter of the share which he himself shall enjoy of the produce; and though anciently his proportion seems to have been moderate, in modern times it has usually been very large. Despotism being the principle of government, force is the real, though sometimes latent instrument which procures acquiescence in his allotments. Without a compulsory power, ever ready to act, little revenue would be obtained. Arbitrary demand, peremptorily enforced on the one hand, sharpens all the arts of evasion, concealment, and fraud, on the other.

Since

* Now Sir John Shore, Governor-General, in which high station he has largely added to the important services he had before rendered to the Company.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

Since the fall of the Mogul Empire especially, and under the Asiatics, Hindoos, or Mahomedans, who have usurped power, the business of collecting the revenues has been a most debasing struggle between the superior and inferior in every gradation. New taxes upon a thousand pretences, often false and preposterous, have been imposed even in direct breach of agreements before made. The revenue officers of every rank, have exacted for themselves besides collecting the demands of government; and from this fruitful source of injustice, severity, chicane, and meanness, have flowed innumerable evils to the community. Want of principle in the landholders and occupants of the soil, has led the government to give them as little credit for their rents as possible; so that payment may in some places be required at the end of every month, or more often, by eight instalments in the year. From the inferior occupants of the soil, care is taken to secure arrears before the crops are removed from the ground, for otherwise from the property and artifices of that description of persons, those arrears will generally be in effect lost; because if they are recovered at a future period, it is in reality by an application of the produce of a new year, which having its own exigencies, will thence probably also owe a balance at the close. And as hence the necessity of summary proceeding with the renters has been pleaded, their complaints have not been allowed to suspend the payment of the demand on them; but this unremitting exaction has afforded the agent the opportunity of keeping his own malversations covered.

These elucidations may convey a faint idea of the vast detail and attendant difficulty of the Indian system of finance; notwithstanding the apparent simplicity of its fundamental principle*; but they also suggest that the power which enforces the payment of the revenues, as it is operative at all times and comes home to all persons, must be the first in the consideration of the people †.

The Company therefore were now not only to reap the produce of the country, but were virtually invested with the interior government of it, none of the prerogatives of dominion remaining to the Nabob ‡, excepting the judicial power which was attended with no political importance. It was not however the policy of their servants, nor did they at first think themselves able to exercise all this power; but in entering upon their new privileges they made use of ministers who had served the Nabob in the affairs of the revenue. The people were taught henceforth to regard the Company as their masters; but they were treated with through the medium of the same persons with whom, as agents of the Nabob, they had before transacted. No Englishman was employed in the districts, or in the details of the collections, that is to say of the Dewannee lands §. The Mahomedan and Hindoo ministers of the revenue managed the whole, appointing all the subordinate officers, laying their general schemes of assessment before the principal servants of the Company, reporting to them the state of the collections from time to time, and disposing of the money received into the exchequer, according to their orders. The only persons who in the districts represented the Company in the exercise of the new powers they had acquired, were the same persons who on behalf of the native government exercised the like powers in them before; nevertheless, the effects of this change, besides the transfer of the financial rights and profits of the country to new hands, were many and important.

The

* The most methodical and full exposition extant of the Mogul system of finance is to be found in the Analysis of the Revenues of Bengal by Mr. James Grant, a work which though it ought to have been set on foot by government at the moment of acquiring the Dewannee, was never attempted till he, from private curiosity, entered upon it many years afterwards, when the obtainment of accurate information on such a subject was become peculiarly difficult. In this elaborate treatise, he has developed with minute detail, both the principles of the Mogul system of finance and the sources and amount of the revenues collected from every division, great and small, of the soubah of Bengal, as well in remote periods as in the year preceding the assumption of the Dewannee. It contains a more complete account of the lands of Bengal than that rendered to our government by the native ministers in 1765, but is little known, being in manuscript among the records of the Company, and too much loaded with technical and involved language, the fundamental principle also of the Mogul system of finance having since been superseded in our practice; but it is the product of extraordinary disquisitory powers employed upon a curious and interesting subject.

† Strictly speaking, it must be supreme. The power of the Emperor went along with his Dewan. The English possessed the Dewannee only because they had power (which was not used before) to assert the grant.

‡ Who was the descendant of Jaffier Ali Khan, the first Nabob raised by the English, with whom a treaty had been made, in virtue of which, the succession was continued in his family.

§ Some districts, as observed above, were by cession before in the hands of the Company; who also had possessed commercial factories in the provinces above a century.

The wants and desires of the Company at home seemed to grow with this immense acquisition. Their servants abroad were suspicious, and not without reason, that all the sources of revenue might not be fairly disclosed to them; and they were alarmed lest the amount of it should decline under their management. The progressive accessions of the Company also enlarged the views of every European in the provinces, and of the native dependents of Europeans. Power was not, as in the former system of government, inherent in one person only, but in many persons, all of whom therefore it invested with a portion of its consequence. The native ministers of the revenue wished to gratify the eager views of the Company, and to conciliate the general favour of the English. They had likewise their own interests and their numerous dependents to serve, and to serve whilst opportunity lasted; but whatever extraordinary funds they might with these aims seek to possess, as all parties concurred in the urgency of keeping up the standard of the public income, the only means left them, exclusive of the salaries they enjoyed, were private imposts, monopolies, or appropriations of one kind or another; and if, as has been affirmed with great appearance of truth, certain portions of the government lands were omitted in the accounts presented to their new masters, the burthen upon the rest must from this cause, as from others, have fallen the heavier.

Difficulties began to be experienced in realizing the assessment. A set of coercive officers or rather farmers of the revenue were employed in the districts to ensure and quicken the payment. These men, chiefly adventurers from Tartary or Persia, executed their business rigorously. Unfeeling and rapacious, uncertain of holding their employments beyond the year, they lost no time in amassing money for themselves; and the Zemindars, or principal land-holders, made every extraordinary demand upon them, the ground of still more excessive demands upon the inferior tenants.

Compulsory measures came also to be used in providing the investment of the Company. As the new wealth poured into their treasury could be realized in Europe only by the medium of commerce, the orders for that investment were at once augmented two or three fold. The produce of every country and the demand for that produce having a certain relation to each other, it was impossible that the funds now destined for the purchase of commodities on account of the Company, could be invested at once without extruding private merchants. European individuals also, confident now both of protecting and controlling their native agents, employed them in trade all over the country; and the foreign European companies and their dependents, availing themselves of the substitution of the milder genius of English rule, for the prompt despotism of the Mahomedans, every where encreased their pretensions and activity. The manufacturers were not unfrequently obliged to accept the English Company's employ, and even those private agents required a preference to other traders. Some of the native dealers retired. Both natives and foreigners, especially those attached to the other European companies, complained; though the latter not always reasonably nor temperately; and in a word, violence and disorder became too prevalent.

Wherever the native agents of the English traders went, they assumed power; they interfered in the affairs of the country, and even in the proceedings of the courts of justice, which the Company still left solely under the control of the Nabob. These courts, which ought to have been the sure refuge of the oppressed, were before systematically venal, and in a time of divided power and general relaxation, were become so scandalously corrupt, as to constitute one of the most intolerable evils under which the country groaned.

All these causes operating with the energy of a new revolution, produced a great and unhappy pressure upon the country. It was in fact without a proper head. The English administration left the internal government to the native ministers, and these, little under the influence of public spirit, (a rare quality among the Asiatics,) intent chiefly on the affairs of the revenue, were unwilling to offend by honestly resisting the licentiousness of individuals.

With respect however to the Company and to Europeans in general, these various evils proceeded more from the elation of new success, from extravagant notions of the resources of the country, and unreflecting eagerness, than from intentional rapacity. They did not feel that the cognizance of the internal affairs of the country was a duty resting upon them, and they may have implicitly given credit to the ministers, more intelligent than themselves, for a regard to that important concern: From these causes, and the remoteness of the seat of English government, placed near one of the extremities of the country, they remained ignorant of the true state of the interior, nor were they fully aware that the natives whom they employed would exercise against their own countrymen any power, even falsely assumed, in the most unfeeling and iniquitous manner. They had not in fine, at all preconsidered the probable effects of so great a change as the assignment of the Dewannee to the Company *.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

A. D. 1769. In less than four years these effects showed themselves very plainly. The country exhibited unequivocal signs of impoverishment and decay. The trade to the other parts of India was reduced, and the revenues, with encreased exertions, could not be kept up to their first standard. In truth, upon a comparison of the state of the country in the year 1757, after the battle of Plassey, and in 1769, when the power of the English, in one form or another, had predominated twelve years, the result is extremely against the revolution. The English are not directly chargeable with the misconduct of the Nabobs and their ministers to whom they entrusted authority, especially with the ruinous enormities of Cossim Ali; but in the transfer of the country to a set of European merchants, consequences were involved unfavourable to its prosperity. The specie which those merchants and others had for a long series of years annually imported, ceased to flow in. The English Company bought their large investment, encreased to three times the amount at which it stood when bullion was brought to pay for it, with the revenue of the provinces; other companies made their purchases with money received from English individuals, who also derived it from the country; and this was to be the system thence forward, at least for the greater part of the exports. Neither did the evil stop here. Both the Company and private persons exported large sums of specie collected there. The quantity thus extracted from the country, even within the period spoken of, was astonishing. A want of circulating medium began to be felt. These drains, added to the immense treasures which the extortion of Cossim Ali enabled him to carry off, exceedingly reduced the stock of the country, and the disorders which had arisen in the districts threatened to impair its annual produce. The first person who had the integrity and resolution to call the attention of government to the unhappy state of the country, was Mr. Becher, resident at the Durbar.

Certainly a great deal was due from us to the people in compensation of the evils which the establishment of our power had introduced among them; and in return for the vast advantages which we reaped from the change, it was but fit that what the country had suffered, or was subjected unavoidably to lose by being dependent upon us, should be repaid by all the benefits which good government, in consistency at least with that dependence, could bestow. And there was in the national genius of Britain, formed by superior lights and juster principles, and possessed of higher energies, what might still render that country happier than it had ever been before.

A. D. 1769. To discover and suppress the abuse of trust and power in the collection of the revenues, in the purchase of the investment, and in the conduct of the courts of justice †, were the objects of another institution, which forms the commencement of a third period of territorial management. English servants of the Company were sent as supervisors into the districts, and the coercive officers whom the ministers had employed, were withdrawn. The supervisors were furnished with a commission of investigation and active superintendence over the various departments of provincial administration, the state, the peace, and order of the country; but without the direct charge of any department. To many persons in Europe these progressive assumptions of power may have appeared as so many exorbitant encroachments; but whatever may have been thought at first even by judicious men, if we determined to retain the country and to govern it either to the benefit of the people, or to our own, they were necessary. From the first acquisition of a controlling power to the possession of the entire executive government of those provinces, it has been found that there was no point at which to rest. Experience evinced that in every intermediate stage, the interest of the country was neglected, and the abuses of power more felt than its protection. Our national standard of sentiments and morals,

* Mr. Verelst, who was Governor of Bengal during this period, was certainly a man of fair intention and correct in his personal conduct. His successor, Mr. Cartier, was also a very honest and amiable man.

† Private European traders and the Native agents of Europeans, who had in the beginning of the Company's power been guilty of such disorders in the districts, were by this time brought under considerable restraint.

morals, undoubtedly gives a comparative elevation to the character of those who are reared under it. The European servants of the Company therefore, who were also held by greater responsibilities, were worthy of more confidence than transient adventurers, ignorant and barbarous, from the upper Asia. This institution was the first step towards an English provincial administration, and the remote beginning of a new system, more open to the influences of the British genius and principles.

The supervisors rendered considerable service. Their presence in the districts imposed a restraint upon the native officers, and their inquiries and interferences, whilst they evinced the wretched state of the interior, checked many evils. But they had acted only a very short time when the country began to suffer from another calamity, which in the end overwhelmed it in misery, incomparably more dreadful than all it had before endured. This was the famine that began in the year 1769, and continued through the greatest part of 1770; of which, as few circumstantial relations have been given, perhaps the following account may not be unacceptable. A. D. 1769 1770

The principal food of the great body of the people who inhabit our provinces, is rice. Of this, from the fertility of the soil, the joint effect of an ardent sun and of saturating periodical rains, they have annually two crops, besides a variety of other grain and pulse. The first crop of rice is gathered in about the end of August, the second (which is the greatest) early in December; and the other inferior articles from the month of February till the end of April; so that the ground brings forth almost all the year round. In general the produce is so abundant as to render Bengal the granary of India, and it is but at considerably distant intervals that a season fails. The natives indolent, improvident, fatalists, and exposed till of late to be taxed in proportion to the produce they raised, or even to have any apparent superfluity invaded, by their brethren in power, had never adopted the practice of keeping a stock of grain in case of dearth. When a season of drought therefore occurs, the sun, usually the great agent in fertility, parches the ground. Scarcity ensues; a scarcity aggravated by the eagerness which people then show to purchase rice, and by the artifices of the grain dealers, who are skilful in taking advantage of the public apprehension. If drought extended through two successive seasons, it would almost inevitably follow that the quantity of grain in the country would not be equal to the consumption of a people whose lives depend on the supply of this article; for extremity of want will not induce the Hindoos in general to resort to animal food, especially the flesh of the cow, because of the horror with which they regard an act that they are taught to believe would incur the dreadful punishment of loss of caste in this life, and torments or degrading transmigrations in the next. The periodical rains begin early in June, and continue with intermissions till late in October, commonly falling more plentifully in the two last months.

The crops of December 1768 and August 1769, were both scanty; and throughout the month of October 1769, the usual period of heavy rains, which are absolutely necessary for the latter crop of rice, hardly a drop fell. The almost total failure of a third crop, after the deficiency of the two preceding ones, filled all men with consternation and dismay. Some hope was still placed in the crops of inferior grain, usual reaped between February and April, which every endeavour was exerted to increase; but the refreshing showers that annually fall in what are called the dry months, between January and May, also failed, and in the fatal year 1770 there was scarcely any rain till late in May. The heat was insufferable, and every kind of grain or pulse then growing was in a great degree dried upon the ground. Nothing appeared but universal despondence and unavoidable destruction; for the same calamity extended to the upper India, and there was no neighbouring country that had been used to furnish Bengal with rice by sea, or that could afford an adequate supply.

The Company's administration and the native ministers early took the alarm, and entered upon such precautionary measures as were within their power. In September 1769 the English and all their dependents were absolutely prohibited from trading in rice; not because they or any other set of people were at all suspected of having been monopolizing that article, but lest on the temptation of very high prices, European influence should in any form operate to collect such undue quantities as might aggravate the scarcity. General and strict injunctions were also published against hoarding grain, buying or selling it clandestinely, or carrying on any dealings in it but at the public markets; and a stock of rice, amounting to 60,000 maunds, was laid in for the use of the army, a measure to which the preservation of our military power and indeed of the country may be ascribed; for it is not to be doubted that want would have made the soldiery throw off all command, and seek subsistence with their arms in their hands, which must have produced total anarchy. The prime mover in all these measures also was Mr. Becher*, resident at the Durbar.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

The famine was felt in all the northern districts of Bengal as early as the month of November 1769, and before the end of April following, had spread desolation through the three provinces. Rice rose gradually to four, and at length to ten, times its usual price, but even at that rate was not to be had. Lingering multitudes were seen seeking subsistence from the leaves and bark of trees. In the country the highways and fields were strewed, in towns the streets and passages choaked, with the dying and the dead. Multitudes flocked to Moorshedabad, the capital. It became more necessary to draw supplies to that city, and no endeavour was spared to bring all the grain in the country to market. Subscriptions were set on foot. The Company, the Nabob, the Ministers, European and native individuals, contributed for feeding the poor. In Moorshedabad alone 7,000 were daily fed for several months, and the same practice was followed in other places; but the good effects were hardly discernible amidst the general devastation. In and about the capital, the mortality increased so fast, that it became necessary to keep a set of persons constantly employed in removing the dead from the streets and roads, and these unfortunate victims were placed in hundreds on rafts and floated down the river. At length the persons employed in this sad office died also, probably from the noxious effluvia they imbibed; and for a time, dogs, jackalls, and vultures were the only scavengers. It was impossible to stir abroad without breathing an offensive air, without hearing frantic cries, and seeing numbers of different ages and sexes in every stage of suffering and death. The calamity was not less in other quarters; in many places whole families, in others, the people of entire villages had expired. Even in that country there were persons who fed on forbidden and abhorred animals, nay, the child on its dead parent, the mother on her child. At length a gloomy calm succeeded. Death had ended the miseries of a great portion of the people, and when a new crop came forward in August, it had in some parts no owners. The number which fell in this period of horror has been variously estimated, and may perhaps be moderately taken at three millions.

It must be very evident from a simple review of this desolating event that it was the visitation of Heaven, not the work of man. Those Eastern countries have unhappily been too well acquainted with this species of calamity in all ages. Upon turning to the last century only, the records of the Company mention a destructive famine in Surat and the neighbouring countries about the year 1630. Dow gives an account of a prodigious one almost general in the Mogul empire, anno 1661. Instances might easily be multiplied by a more particular research; in our time, we have seen several on the Coast of Coromandel, the last of which a few years ago destroyed multitudes. Since the awful æra of 1770, there have been two seasons of great scarcity in Bengal, the years 1783 and 1788. The dearth in those years was only partial, but the common people were driven to great distress and some perished. Lord Cornwallis seeing how much the country was exposed to calamities of this sort, instituted public granaries in Bengal, in which a stock of grain should always be preserved against emergencies. Indeed if we could suppose that any man or set of men, especially European servants of the Company who had easy means of acquiring wealth, could have been so iron-hearted as to form the design of enriching themselves by with-holding sustenance from their fellow creatures, if we could suppose they could have borne the sight, even for the first week or day, of the miseries under which a whole people were sinking, if we could suppose further that after

* A man noted for his honesty and humanity; whose anxiety and exertions for alleviating the miseries of that whole period ended in an illness that almost cost him his life. Yet on his return to England he found himself traduced as the author of the famine. This calumny is said to have had its rise at the French settlement of Chandernagore, in the vicinity of which an agent of his had in the year 1769, before things came to extremity, some articles of the provisions of the former year selling off, and among them a parcel of rice, in value about 20,000 rupees. Perhaps the purchase of a stock of rice for the Company's troops may also have contributed to suggest the idea of a monopoly. It is from a MS. account, of which the materials were furnished by him when the event was recent, that this relation (of the facts stated in which the writer hereof was also an eye-witness) is chiefly taken.

Another gentleman, still living, was also accused of being the author of the famine, though he was in England when it commenced.

after denying every thing human for the sake of gain, they could so far forego their own object as instead of accepting a four-fold, nay ten-fold price, to allow those who would purchase, to die in immense multitudes for want; if we could entertain all these extravagant suppositions, and the equally extravagant one of a general monopoly of the produce of a great country, still a little cool reflection upon the means of accomplishing a scheme so flagitious, would show that the execution of it would be absolutely impracticable.

It is perfectly established that the dearth was general over the three provinces, and in all ruinously severe. A monopoly therefore, if that had been the cause, must have been general also. It is easy to conceive how one quarter could be deprived of its produce to supply another, but when in all quarters there was a like destitution, if we suppose this to have proceeded from monopoly, we must also suppose not a simple operation of emptying one district to fill another, still less to surcharge any other, because that would be to go from a better market to a worse one; but a local monopoly in every township, keeping up, not sending away, the grain found within its circle. Let us now enquire into the lowest quantity of grain that can be supposed to have been hoarded. In the course of twelve months, three millions of people are estimated to have died; that is, nearly one-third of the whole population; but as a third of the usual allowance of food might have preserved life, we should hence be led to conclude that the grain retailed in that year was two-thirds at least below the quantity usually vended. As, further, the failure would fall chiefly on those who in times of common plenty earned only a subsistence, and these may be computed at eight in ten of the community, the deficiency in the supply of the markets that year may well be rated at two-thirds of the usual consumption of eight millions of people, that is somewhat more than one-half of the whole quantity brought to market in ordinary times: and if this was occasioned by monopoly, so much must have been kept up. But let us assume what would be the most plausible theory, that a real scarcity, to a certain extent, was rendered severely fatal by the supervention of monopoly; of what magnitude must we conceive the monopoly to be, in order to become thus operative? Here we must go on an ample supposition; for if monopolists had thought of contenting themselves with collecting, for instance, only a month's demand at a time, their main purpose would have been defeated, because in the mean while the rest would have found a distribution in the usual way. They must therefore have bought up largely at or before the reaping of a crop, and bought up more than they withheld, because part of their purchases we must suppose would be resold. If then we admit a real scarcity which would have occasioned a mortality of a million of people, (which prejudice has never granted,) and ascribe the mortality of the other two millions who perished, to monopoly, concluding as we are obliged, that this monopoly consisted only of two great operations, that is, on the December crop of 1768, and the August crop of 1769, then the quantity of grain hoarded up will turn out to have been one-third of the market supply of ordinary years: and assigning in such years to ten millions of persons, the young and the adult taken together, half a seer (or a pound) of rice per diem, which is a moderate allowance, that third will amount to six hundred and four millions of seers, or fifteen millions of maunds; which at a rupee each, a probable purchase-price in a time of real scarcity which we here suppose, will amount to fifteen millions or a crore and a half of rupees, one half perhaps of the whole circulating medium of the provinces at that time, and such a capital in the hands of those suspected of being concerned, as no extravagance of credulity can hold to be supposable.

But we have not yet seen all the difficulties. The three provinces contain 150,000 square miles, and if we reckon fifteen square miles for the sphere of one monopoly agent, (which surely, after allowing for water, is an average full as much as he could compass,) and reckon further two assistants only to each agent, we shall have thus ten thousand monopoly stations, and thirty thousand persons employed at them. Such a set of operations, or the hundredth part of them, and operations continued through a whole year, would have furnished uncontroulable evidence to all men. The natives are indeed patient in suffering, when they think suffering inevitable; they suffered in that calamity with wonderful passiveness; but if they had traced their miseries to any source like this, the country would have soon rung with their complaints. They are known to be clamorous even on trivial occasions where any redress is possible. They have been known in a time of scarcity, merely apprehended or artificial, to have carried urgent representations against the grain dealers; they did so at the period spoken of, as long as they thought that those dealers secreted any grain, which according to their usual practice, they may have done, thereby unnecessarily adding to the evil. But very probably, if the people had seen that the calamities of that period proceeded from human hands, they would not have borne them; they would have helped themselves to grain; perhaps have risen upon their European masters. No, they well knew and acknowledged whence their distresses came; they foresaw them in the drought of successive seasons, a drought not confined to their provinces; and felt in them the dispensation of a superior Power. This was one of those severe inflictions of the Almighty, by which offending creatures, who forget their Maker, are reminded of his being, and of his government of the universe. Those poor people sought by superstitious observances to propitiate their deities, but they were "Gods that could not save," and their votaries remained without any moral change.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

The members of administration appointed from England by Parliament in 1773, a few years after the famine, with a special view to the discovery of abuses, men zealous in the execution of their trust, and free in expressing the most unfavourable opinions, never intimated the suspicion of monopoly; but always spoke of the famine as a natural evil of most destructive consequences, still visible in the country. Lord Cornwallis, if he had not judged in the same way, would not have contented himself with proposing only the simple preventive of an establishment for storing part of the surplus produce of plentiful years. Yet wonderful to consider, without any proof, without investigation, without one well authenticated adequate fact, the belief of a monopoly by some servants of the India Company has been, and perhaps may still be, very general in the western world. The French of Chandernagore, like the rest of that nation, too ready to blacken the British conduct in India, are accused, and with apparent reason, of being the authors of this tale. From Chandernagore it first passed to Calcutta, and from these places it was then transmitted to Paris, to London, and to all Europe. It has been registered as truth in the page of history, has been the public subject of religious lamentation, has been embalmed in verse, and still remains such a foul stain upon the British character, as the annals of any people can hardly parallel. Such is the power of credulity. In this case it not only "gave to airy "nothing a local habitation and a name," but it ascribed to a phantom, effects, which had that phantom been a reality, it was incapable of producing. Nothing short of an absolute want of a sufficient stock of food in the country, could have occasioned so dreadful a devastation of the human race. The whole idea of a monopoly of any kind or degree, (unless such a natural aggravation of real scarcity as the eagerness of the people to lay in some store, and the retention of native grain dealers may have created,) the present writer, himself an eye-witness of that dire calamity, and with particular means of information, most assuredly believes to be without foundation, and to have originated in calumny or in error. This testimony, due to truth and to the British character, he is able deliberately and conscientiously to deliver; and though his main design may not have called for so full an exposition of a collateral subject, yet since the current of time swiftly removes the opportunities of giving and receiving information, he hopes he shall be pardoned in availing himself of the present occasion, to perform what he thinks an act of justice and of duty.

A. D. 1772 The subject of territorial administration shall now be continued. In 1772 the principle of sending English supervisors into the districts, considered here as introducing a third period, was enlarged by a very important measure which completed the change begun in the adoption of that principle. The Company stood forth as Dewan: hitherto the office continued to be executed by native ministers, who resided at Moorshedabad, the old seat of government and of the public Exchequer. These ministers, with the officers whom they employed in the districts, were now laid aside, and the Company by the agency of their own servants, took upon themselves the entire care and collection of the revenues. The Governor and Council with their former controlling power, joined that of cognizance and executive management, which had been till then vested in those ministers. They removed the ostensible seat of Government and of the Exchequer to Calcutta, the principal English settlement; they divided the three provinces into collectorships, and stationed an European servant of the Company in each of those divisions as collector.

This change threw also the judicial administration of the country in civil affairs, into the hands of the English. Under the government which the Mahomedans had for many centuries maintained in Bengal, they established also their own system of laws, and it was the standard of decision in all cases civil and criminal, exclusive of those those between Hindoos, which were determined by the code of that people. The Nazim, or ruler, in person executed the office of supreme criminal judge. By deputy he also administered in the principal civil court appointed for the cognizance of all matters of property, excepting claims of land and inheritance, which fell within a third department called the Dewannee Adawlet, or Court of the Dewan, to whom as the Emperor's officer for the collection of the revenues, all causes relating to the details of that extensive province, and particularly to property in land, were referred. From the time of the Company's accession to the office of Dewan, the authority of the Dewannee Court naturally enough encreased, till at length it became in effect, the sole tribunal for civil suits. In this state, as appertaining to the department of the revenues, it fell into the charge of the Company's servants when they assumed the executive management of that branch; and they immediately proceeded to make various regulations and improvements in the administration of civil justice. They appointed a Provincial Dewannee Court in every collectorship, over which the English collector was to preside; they even modified, in some respects, the administration of criminal justice, which was peculiarly the province of the Nabob; appointing inferior criminal courts in the districts, and subjecting them, as well as the principal criminal court, to English superintendence. Thus every interposing medium between the English and their Indian subjects was removed; they came then to transact immediately with each other. The direct authority of the English pervaded the interior of the provinces, and the Native or Country Government, saving only the prerogative of the Nabob as chief criminal magistrate, was in form and in fact done away.

CHAP. I. Introduction: British territorial Administration in the East.

Many obstacles to good government were dissipated by this change. The English administration entered upon their new functions with a tone of intelligence and vigour. Besides introducing more method and order into the conduct of the public business, they set themselves to correct some of the most prominent of those abuses by which the country had been so long oppressed. In collecting the revenue for instance from the ryots or husbandmen, there was no fixed standard. Agreements did indeed pass between the landholders and their tenants at the beginning of the year (for their leases extended only to one year), but as before hinted, those agreements were commonly broken by the stronger party upon a thousand pretences, of which the superior made himself the judge, and this practice opened a door of exaction to every subordinate officer of the revenue. Hence the people never knowing what portion of the produce of their labour would be left to them, were not only impoverished but discouraged from exertion.

Exactions still more scandalous were practised in the judicial courts. The Phousdary, or criminal court, raised a revenue by the imposition of fines upon crimes and misdemeanors tried before it, having thus a direct interest in the multiplication of accusations, and in finding the accused guilty. The government of 1772 styles its exactions, "detestable and unauthorized, but yet imitated by every farmer and "aumil in the province."

The Dewannee, or civil court, in like manner, wherever it could, had recourse to heavy arbitrary fines. Things however sanctioned by the native government even down to the period now spoken of, may give a more striking idea of the state of the country. In law concerns the civil courts were allowed to take a commission, sometimes amounting to one-fourth, upon the sums recovered on their awards; in the revenue, the inhabitants of a town or district, however reduced in number, were obliged to make up the assessment at which that division had been rated by government, that is, to pay the rents of those who were dead or fled, as well as their own. This principle, which must surprise persons unacquainted with that country, was acted upon even after the famine; and the greatest wonder is, how the people could subsist under such accumulated barbarous impositions.

The English government of 1772, appears to have set out in the sincere desire of alleviating the sufferings of that people. But the first great financial measure which they adopted, produced most unhappy effects. In opposition to the annual leases, which were certainly very exceptionable, the idea of farming the lands for long terms of years had been frequently suggested, and came at length to be regarded as a remedy for many existing evils. Sufficient attention however was not paid to the wide distinction which exists between the landholder having an interest in the soil, and the revenue farmer, whose principal object it must ever be not to consider the permanent welfare of a district or an estate, but the best return he can draw from it within the term of his engagement. The desire of keeping up the collections as near as possible to their former standard, still haunted the councils of the Directors at home and of the servants abroad. Under the idea that there were hidden resources in the country, (which might be so far justified, that early subductions and alienations had been made from the exchequer lands, but the resumption of them was become extremely difficult, whilst the general circumstances of the country had decayed,) and in the view of uniting increase of revenue with ease to the people, it was determined to lease the lands of Bengal on farm for five years; and that their utmost value might be ascertained, these farms were put up to public auction. Calcutta banians, money dealers, and adventurers, were among the highest bidders. The country was hence given into their hands, under a positive condition indeed for the equitable treatment of the occupants of the soil; but the ancient usage of collecting the instalment of the month, within the month, was still followed by the farmers; and if there was any interference with even the most violent exercise of their authority, they had to plead the impossibility of realizing the revenue and making good their engagements. The English collectors, afraid perhaps of having a failure in the revenue ascribed to them, were seldom willing to interpose except in flagrant cases; and the poor people preferring often the first loss to subsequent litigations, or wearied out by the protractions of the other party, had little redress. At the end of five years, an immense balance of the stipulated revenue was due by the farmers, and the country having been in effect delivered again into the hands of natives, still continued to suffer.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

It has been said in favour of the English government, that under it, and even within the period of which we now treat, Bengal has enjoyed a tranquillity from hostile assaults and commotions, rarely experienced under its former masters. But though little disposed to panegyrize Mahomedan governments, we must observe, that this comparison can hardly be meant to extend to the times anterior to the dismemberment of the Mogul Empire. The usurpation of Aliverdi Khan, who waded to power through perfidy and blood*, provoked the court of Delhi to encourage an invasion of the country by the Mharattas, and for several years they harassed the districts west of the Ganges, the far larger divisions on the eastern side of that river remaining all the time perfectly safe. But from the establishment of Aurungzebe on the imperial throne, until the invasion of Nadir Shaw, a period of eighty years, Bengal enjoyed profound peace without, and experienced only few, and these transient disturbances, within.

If however, a comparison of this kind is to be instituted, it must be carried much further. Under the government of the last two regular viceroys, Jaffier Khan, and Shujah Khan, who ruled in succession near forty years†, the state of the country was eminently flourishing, and is yet a subject of celebrity. Jaffier Khan indeed appears to have been culpably as well as unnecessarily severe in inflicting personal punishments upon the zemindars, and this part of his conduct has brought reproach upon his memory; but he strenuously protected the common people, and most ably administered the affairs of the soubah. His successor is represented to have been a man singularly beneficent and humane. Under both, the taxes were little felt, and in the time of the latter, though the annual tribute remitted to Delhi was usually a crore of rupees, local collectors were seldom requisite, the zemindars paying their rents immediately into the royal treasury. Even after the usurpation of Aliverdi Khan, that class of persons was so opulent, as at one time to give him a donation of a crore of rupees, and at another time fifty lacs, towards defraying his extraordinary expences in repelling the Mharattas. The general power and authority of the empire were a protection to this dependency of it; its military force, especially during the long administration of Jaffier Khan, was inconsiderable, its civil administration simple and economical, and it had no separate political relations to maintain with neighbouring or foreign countries. Easy, in short, in its finances, moderate in its expenditure, and free from the state, the charges, and cares of independent dominion, its inhabitants enjoyed in the occupations of agriculture and commerce, public peace and abundance. Under the violent assumption of Aliverdi Khan, its connections of a political nature were were still very limited, for it had nothing to fear from its neighbours, except on the western side, and he seems never to have cast an ambitious view beyond the provinces which he wrested from the family of his ancient master. But Bengal, as held by us, possesses the rank of a sovereign state; it is the head member of an empire whose parts are remotely separate from each other, and intermix with the territories of several powerful princes; it contributes to the support and defence of the other divisions of British Asia; and supposing its system of foreign policy to be entirely pacific, it is liable to be affected at so many points, that the government of it requires far greater resources than were necessary when it was merely a dependent province. The tribute then which it pays to us, being at least equal to what the Mogul Emperors derived from it, and neither its population nor produce, as we have already found reason to conclude, greater than in their time, it will follow that the inhabitants must now be more highly assessed than they were under their former rulers, not excepting even the usurpers. And if this state should pursue plans of offensive policy towards its neighbours, it might multiply beyond calculation its exigencies and dangers, and thus aggravate still more the disparity between its actual and preceding situation. It is indeed possible, as has been already observed, to render the country happier under our government than it ever was before; but after it had experienced so many convulsions, we need hardly look even for an equality, in the earlier unsettled stages of our management.

* A. D. 1741.

† Sujah Khan died in 1739, and was succeeded by his son Sirferaz Khan, who was deposed and slain by Aliverdi Khan in 1741. Aliverdi Khan possessed the government fifteen years, and was succeeded in 1756 by his grandson Surajah Dowlah, who was deprived of the musnud and his life in consequence of the battle of Plassey, anno 1757; so that from the death of Shujah Khan to the ascendency of the English power, was only eighteen years.

The time of which we now speak may be called a period of experiment. It is evident that with respect to the revenues, on the due regulation of which the ease of the people so much depended, the great desideratum was to fix a just standard for their amount, and to provide for the certain unoppressive realization of that amount. This was soon perceived; but there were various opinions concerning the best mode of attaining that, in the propriety of which all agreed, and whilst discussions were continued, current exigencies frequently decided. It can be no presumption to assert, that our first and main duty then was to establish a just and comprehensive system of domestic policy, to cherish our subjects, promote internal improvement, and according to the maxim recommended, and thence dignified, by Lord Clive, "to cultivate our garden."

The remote distance of the supreme directive seat of our authority was an obstacle to the settlement of wise plans of internal government. Persons at home could seldom act but upon transmitted information. Distrust produced hesitation. The constitution of the Company left the executive body without sufficient controul, and divisions weakened its energy. Official changes, both here and abroad, interrupted the progress of measures, and though the objects which ought to be pursued were understood, there was still uncertainty as to the sacrifices which might be hazarded in new attempts.

Such considerations as these may, probably, among others, have produced the legislative interference of 1773; by which a new constitution was given to the government of Bengal, and a majority of the members which were to compose it, sent from England, the rest being selected from the former administration. A. D. 1773.

Whatever may be the views which the conviction of the writer has led him to entertain of the affairs of this period, he will surely be pardoned in wishing to avoid, as far as can possibly consist with any fairness to his subject, the introduction of controversial topics, always unpleasant, upon an occasion like the present. Where he is led to notice events which come within that description, his aim will be to consider them, not with relation to the motives which may have produced them, or their intrinsic character, but to their influence upon the condition of the people of our eastern dominions, and as articles of a national account, between those possessions and this country. Instead then, of entering into the merits of the contests which soon arose in the new government of Bengal, we may be allowed to remark, that however well intended the institution of that government might be, it was at first unhappily compounded. Only upon the supposition of a coincidence of opinions respecting past as well as present measures, which from the circumstances of that institution seems not to have been expected, could dissentions have been thought avoidable; and if they should arise, as may more particularly have been apprehended, concerning former acts, a disapprobation of which must implicate the credit both of the preceding administration, and of those connected with it, a divided government and state were naturally to be looked for. That these consequences, proceeding from criminatory retrospections, and the utmost discordance of opinion upon various important questions, did soon follow, is well known. And they produced unhappy effects upon the administration of affairs, upon the European service of the Company, and upon the people. The relief of the country was still suspended; and the failure of the first great measure adopted at home for this end, may have prevented a progress to others of executive and official regulation, probably at that time seen to be requisite, and subsequently included in the parliamentary provisions of 1784. Into the subjects of these we forbear to enter, although after all the candour and discrimination which would be solicitously exercised in treating of them, doubtless they would be found to discover a distinct source of pressure upon the country.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

Hitherto, from the period of the revolution in 1757, we have not seen the English, on the side of Bengal, engaging in any offensive alliances or wars with the neighbouring country powers. The system recommended by Lord Clive and inculcated by the Company, was, to avoid schemes of conquest, and political intrigues with the native princes, improving our domestic state, and making ourselves respected for our moderation and good faith. Upon these principles, his Lordship and his Select Committee* had the magnanimity to restore to Shujah Dowlah the dominion of Oude, after victory had chastised an unprovoked aggression of that prince, and made
A. D. 1774. us the arbiters of his fate†. A deviation from this system began in 1774, having professedly for one object, the pecuniary advantage of the Company; and a much
A. D. 1778. wider departure from it was made in 1778, by carrying offensive war, with a view to the acquisition of territory, into the west of India. The long duration, the external effects, and the issue of this war, are sufficiently known. At home it plunged the government into a sea of military and political cares, that left little time or opportunity for the study and application of those protecting cherishing measures, which the state of the country required; it incurred an enormous expense, a heavy load of debt; and, when the public resources were greatly exhausted, to all these evils succeeded the attacks of Hyder Ali in the Carnatic, and a defensive war against him and the French, the support of which chiefly fell upon Bengal.

Such were the necessities to which our affairs were then reduced, that although we had before acquired a very forbidding experience of the farming system, a temporary recourse was again had to it in several districts, some of which were swept by the renters with a rigour that became afterwards a subject of public inquisition. Thus, notwithstanding the useful regulations begun in 1772, through errors or defects in carrying the designs then adopted into execution, through the effects of intestine divisions, fluctuating counsels, foreign wars, and real or conceived exigencies of government, added to its common cares; a series of twelve years past without the application of any effectual relief to the state of the country, without acting steadily and systematically upon the acknowledged necessity of fixing on just principles the extent of our demand upon the territorial possessions, and giving the people, once for all, rest and exemption from every species of arbitrary taxation.

About this time the legislature again interposed. The parliamentary regulations
A. D. 1784. of 1784 went upon principles well adapted to the correction of the evils which prevailed in our Indian governments and possessions, and to the invigoration of the authority of the home administration over them. If they established a new power in giving the state a controul respecting the affairs of India, they established new responsibility. But after all, it is to be acknowledged, that whatever laws may be enacted for the government of those distant dependencies, inhabited by a people so dissimilar to the European nations, the efficacy of those laws must ever essentially depend on the character of the persons to whom the execution of them is entrusted‡.

The

* Consisting of Messrs. Sumner, Carnac, Verelst, and Sykes.

† In 1764. A time may perhaps come when it will seem less extravagant than it might now be thought, to insinuate, that it had possibly been well for us, notwithstanding the private wealth and even public subsidies derived from our connection with Oude, if we had to the present day adhered to the general spirit of Lord Clive's policy. The late war with Tippoo was a forced departure from the pacific system, and the ambition and perfidy of Indian powers may possibly expose us to new necessities of the same kind, until they are taught a better conduct, by our continued superiority and moderation. But this probable necessity of extending our conquests is one of the disadvantages attaching to our dominion in Hindostan, for the wider it spreads the more vulnerable we become. It was the unwieldiness of the Mogul Empire that accelerated its fall; the loss of distant provinces being the rise of new enemies, and loss of reputation also.

‡ If the sole object of this review were not to treat of measures immediately affecting the natives, an economical retrenchment made at this time in the different departments of the Bengal government, under Sir John Macpherson, would deserve to be introduced here with applause.

The fourth and last period of which it was intended to speak was now approaching, and brought with it a great and happy change for the natives of Bengal. Under the auspices of the parliamentary system just alluded to, administered at home with enlarged and upright views, and seconded abroad by the excellent conduct of Lord Cornwallis, the objects till then ineffectually proposed, have been fully attained. A new constitution has been established for the land tenures of Bengal, whereby hereditary property in them is secured, the tax payable by the proprietors to government is equitably and unalterably settled, industry and improvement are hence encouraged, and provision is made for the extension of the same encouragement, the same enjoyment of rights, to every inferior occupant of the soil. This is in effect the foundation of a constitution for the country, because the government is bound by it as well as the subject. Very essential reforms have also been made by his Lordship in the administration of justice. The office of supreme criminal judge remained still vested in the Nabob, represented by some Mussulman delegate, by whom the inferior courts were filled with mean retainers of his own, who paid for their places. Nothing can be conceived more defective, oppressive, and scandalous, than the administration of these persons. The country groaned under it, the government was reproached by it, yet reluctant to touch the remaining prerogative of the Nabob, it endured this evil long; but seeing no other measures of reform could prosper whilst such a source of flagrant abuse was tolerated, the good of the people at length absolutely demanded an interference, and the Nabob appointed the Company his delegates in the office of supreme criminal judge. The Governor General and Members of Council then took upon themselves the execution of this office. The chief criminal court was removed to Calcutta, the collectors in the districts were invested with the powers of magistracy, for the apprehension and confinement of delinquents. Courts of circuit for the trial of criminals were established in the principal divisions of the country, and filled with English judges selected from the most experienced of the servants of the Company. In a word, this great department, which was before made up of the vilest perversions of legal power, was composed anew, and filled with men of principle and ability, placed under the strongest responsibilities, and acting upon a system which was to carry the inspection and the dispensation of the laws regularly into every section of the country. Even Europeans in the districts were subjected to the authority of the provincial laws, and in civil affairs the Dewannee Court, properly so called, that is the court of the collector for the trial of revenue causes, was abolished: that officer was no longer allowed to judge where he was a party; but all revenue cases, as well as other civil suits, were to be referred to the civil judge of the district, who was to have no concern with the collections, but to be employed solely in the administration of justice; whereby delay in decisions, the consequence of divided attention, and a grievance almost equal to a denial of justice, would be prevented. To his court also, the commercial agents of the Company, who had been, in consideration of the nature of their business, exempted in some degree from the ordinary routine of court processes, were henceforth regularly to refer all matters of litigation occurring within their departments. The law, in a word, is now made the arbiter in all matters of property, even between the government and its subjects*. With regard to the rules by which justice was to be administered, the Hindoo and Mahomedan codes were in general to be the standard for the respective subjects of them, but tempered, in some instances where they are barbarous Commencing in 1786.

* It is to be remembered, that nothing said here or elsewhere in this treatise respecting the administration of justice, has relation to the Supreme Court of Judicature, established by his Majesty at Fort William. That tribunal seems to have been instituted with two views; the first to answer more effectually the purposes for which the municipal court, called the Mayor's Court, had been established at Calcutta in the merely commercial times of the Company, namely, to administer justice to British subjects, and to all persons living under the British flag; the second to answer another purpose, which the acquisition of territory was thought to have rendered necessary, the affording of an asylum to the natives of the acquired provinces who might be aggrieved by the English. The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court therefore, now extends over all British-born subjects residing within the provinces, for all acts done by them against each other or against natives; it extends over some of the immediate native dependents of the English, and over such other natives as may by voluntary agreement, in any case submit themselves to it; and it extends also over all persons, of whatever nation, living within the limits of the English flag, as they were defined prior to our acquisition of territorial possessions. But the Judicial Courts, which the Mogul Emperors had established in those possessions, were continued after the transfer to the Company, and the regulation and controul of those Courts are now vested in the British government of Bengal, independent of the Supreme Court of Judicature; over them that Court has no power; to them only the natives of the provinces, not in the service of the English, that is to say, the great body of the people, are amenable, and it is of them only, and of the reforms made in them, that we all along here treat.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain, barbarous and cruel, by the mildness of British sentiments, and improved in others which have relation to objects of political economy. "These codes," says Lord Cornwallis in his minute introductory of this great reform, "are still in force, as far "as regards religious tenets, marriage, caste, inheritance, and some other points."

Thus by the measures of his Lordship's administration, important rights of property, never before enjoyed, and a meliorated legal constitution, really adequate to the protection of those rights, have been conferred upon our Asiatic subjects in Bengal.

Nor are these the only grand events by which the government of Lord Cornwallis has been marked as a providential blessing, and has become an epoch to that country. He has given a new tone, a new principle of purity and vigour to the British administration there; order and economy, integrity and zeal, pervade all its departments; for, exhibiting in his own conduct an example of equity on the part of government, he has been solicitous that all inferior authorities should follow it; and no where, it may be safely affirmed, throughout his Majesty's dominions, has public business been transacted, so far as the civil servants of the Company are concerned, with more public principle than in Bengal, under the influence of the spirit and the conduct of that illustrious nobleman. Distinguished among many other valuable qualities by good sense and magnanimity, which enable him with ease to meet the most trying exigencies, yet capable of descending to the smallest concerns, acquainted himself with all affairs and with the officers employed in them; by his intelligence and the uprightness of his own character he has overawed corruption, and by kind conciliating manners, flowing from a generous and modest mind, has produced, in the midst of a system of reform, attachment both to himself and to that system.

It would be easy and gratifying, if it came within the scope of this essay, to dilate upon other parts of his Lordship's character; his justice and good faith towards the Indian powers, his atchievements in war, and his moderation in victory: but it may suffice to say, that whether we look to his internal administration or to his foreign policy, to his talents for civil government or for military affairs, to his conduct towards the Natives or Europeans, towards enemies or friends, we must rejoice that such an example of character, and of British character, has been displayed to the inhabitants of the East. Let it not then be imagined that any remarks which are made in the following pages are intended to derogate, or can justly be conceived to derogate from the merit of his administration. Even had there been any grounds which could give colour to such an attempt, one who can neither speak of his government, nor of himself without sentiments of respect and attachment, would have been among the last to engage in it.

It will now be fit to advert to the other Indian possessions held by the Company in full property; and after what has been said, a very brief notice of their state will be sufficient. Benares, which is completely incorporated with our dominions on the Ganges, has received the full benefits of the improvements made in Bengal. The Northern Circars have continued, until very lately, in a situation similar to that of Bengal under the second period of our management, and have suffered extremely from the mal-administration of the natives. The Bengal system, as nearly as it can be adapted to them, is, we understand, intended to be established in them and in the Company's jaghire lands, which have been more under European inspection. The same system, we may presume, will also, as speedily as possible, be extended to our newly acquired lands in the Carnatic and on the Malabar Coast.

If after this review, in which it will not be asserted that any excess of colouring has been employed, we proceed to form an estimate of the general effect of our early conquests, upon the state of the countries and the happiness of the subjects acquired by them, however we may be inclined to avoid censuring individuals, we can hardly fail, on the whole, to admit some humiliating conclusions. The history of our rule in Bengal is in great part a history of our own errors, or of the abuses public and private of power derived from us; and the brightest portion of our administration there, is that which has been employed in applying remedies to the political diseases, which either have arisen, or become more inveterate, in the country, in our time. Our accession to the government of it has been productive of prodigious changes; and if we take the result of them for thirty years together, from the elevation of Mhir Jaffier, we shall be compelled to allow, that at the end of that long period, the country and the people were not in so good a condition as that in which we found them. Doubtless the ravages of the famine greatly reduced the cultivation for a time,

time, as well as the number of inhabitants, which will account for a decrease of the national revenue, but not for decay in the circumstances of surviving individuals, either of the poorer sort or middle classes; because the natural effect of great depopulation was rather to enhance the value of labour and lessen the cost of subsistence, as also to leave the field of traffic in fewer hands.

Persons who remember the state of the country in the beginning of 1769 and in 1787, (the thirtieth year of the revolution,) think that it exhibited more appearance of opulence at the former period than at the latter; and it is clearly acknowledged in the Bengal records, not only that the country declined considerably in the twelve years anterior to 1769, but that various causes of its decline continued to operate after the calamity of the famine, though perhaps with less activity*. It will likewise be granted, that the wars in which we were engaged subsequent to that event, were unfavourable to internal prosperity, and whatever may be urged in vindication of our governments, as to the grounds on which they were undertaken, yet with respect to wars of offence, not even a remote necessity or interest of the people of Bengal, can be pleaded for making that people parties in them.

But exclusive of all local mismanagement, the nature of that subjection in which Bengal is placed to this country, will alone account for a wonderful change in its internal state. All the offices of trust, civil and military, and the first lines of commerce, are in the hands of foreigners, who after a temporary residence remove with their acquisitions in constant succession. The government is foreign. Of native rulers, even the rapacious exactions went again into circulation, and the tribute formerly paid to Delhi, passing chiefly by the medium of private commerce, when a general communication throughout the empire gave Bengal great advantages, was little felt. But the tribute paid to us extracts every year a large portion of the produce of that country without the least return. It may not perhaps be too much to say, that in the thirty years following the acquisition of the Bengal provinces, this nation, by public and private channels, derived from them alone, exclusive of its other Eastern dependencies and of the profits of goods remitted, fifty millions sterling.

These observations and the review which precedes them, are intended forcibly to impress upon the mind, the sense of those peculiar obligations under which we lie to the people of our Asiatic territories, on account of the benefits we draw from them, the disadvantages they have suffered, and must still in certain ways suffer from their connection with us, and the relation in which they stand to us as our subjects. True, we have corrected abuses in the internal government of these possessions, we have encouraged our Hindoo subjects, we have at length given to them the secure enjoyment of property, both inherited and acquired. All these events were most desirable and important, and to accomplish them was a work singularly arduous. But does nothing further remain to be done? In decreeing that our subjects shall be delivered from oppression and injustice, in setting an equitable limit to our own demands, and in establishing rights of property never well ascertained nor respected before; have we done all that the circumstances of the Hindoos require, all that is incumbent upon us as rulers? That by many this inquiry has not been seriously made, nor our obligations deeply considered, may be ascribed to several causes. There is a description of persons to whom the whole subject of India is confused and obscure. They know not what to believe or conclude; and a few there have been, who with very good meaning have thought of eluding all difficulties by giving back our territories to the natives, not reflecting that we should thus abandon them to new distractions, to adventurers of less pretensions than ourselves, and most probably to a rival European power. No, we cannot now renounce them without guilt, though we may also contract great guilt in the government of them.

It was long before our acquisitions in India, even those provinces which we professedly held in perpetuity, came to be regarded here as permanently our own. A secret idea of their insecurity prevailed, and our conduct towards them was perhaps influenced by this apprehension. We were eager to acquire, but slow to cherish. A better acquaintance with their natural and political advantages, and the experience of thirty years passed under trying vicissitudes, have now established an opinion,

* See the letters of Governor Verelst and Mr. Beecher, in 1769, in the Appendix to Verelst's View of Bengal; in Mr. Francis's Original Minutes, page 100; and Bolt's Considerations, Vol. III. page 199. See also Lord Cornwallis's Letter to the Court of Directors of August 2d, 1789.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

opinion, not only of the practicability of maintaining them, but with many, a confidence approaching to presumption that they cannot be lost. Were we indeed to become secure in this notion, it would be one of our greatest dangers. We are no doubt internally strong, especially in Bengal, and whilst we retain our superiority at sea, we have a peculiar and essential advantage over all enemies, European or Indian. But we ought still to remember that Hindostan is the region of revolutions. A few more successful turns in Benares on the part of so inferior a chief as Cheyte Sing*, would have put all Bengal in commotion. We ought also to remember how much the authority of a handful of strangers depends on opinion. To reduce the sources of prejudice against us, and to multiply impressions favourable to us, by assimilating our subjects to our modes of thinking, and by making them happy, and teaching them to understand and value the principles of the people who confer happiness upon them, may be some of the surest means of preserving the footing we have acquired. Under the influence of their original notions, it is impossible they can regard any foreign yoke with a greater degree of predilection than may arise from their deeming it preferable to some other foreign one.

It is indeed no uncommon idea among us, that our only duty towards our Hindoo subjects is to protect them from oppression, and that doing this, the more we "leave them to themselves" the better. But to evince that this vague hypothesis, like some others which have a currency on Indian subjects, must have been hastily adopted from its show, without serious examination, it may be sufficient to observe, that the code of the Hindoos, which they regard as divine, and which establishes not only principles but a multitude of positive minute laws, all held to be immutable, has received no addition for many ages; and as in all societies and affairs of men, the course of time must produce many changes, many new circumstances and combinations, which will require a succession of legal provisions, a code formed in an early stage of society in many respects rude, can never be adequate to the exigencies of all future generations. "These codes," (the Hindoo and Mahomedan) says Lord Cornwallis in the minute before quoted, "are in many respects inapplicable "to the internal government of the country." The Institutes of Menu seem to leave a latitude to the sovereign (who was to be of the kheteree or military caste), with the advice of his Brahmins, to make new regulations according to occurrent necessities. But the Hindoos with whom we have chiefly to do, have had no sovereign of their own faith for many centuries; nor is it to be supposed that their original code has hitherto proved sufficient, even in causes between parties; for the institutions, or personal decisions of their Mahomedan conquerors, must have superseded an appeal to it in many cases. And there is reason to believe that the Hindoo rajahs, whom those conquerors found in possession of the provinces which had before formed a Hindoo empire, as lately they formed the empire of the Moguls, dispensed justice in cases not provided for by the code, according to their own discretion, by a summary verbal process and decision; a practice† not unusual with rulers in Hindostan, which tended however to derogate from the dignity of the courts of justice, and may account in part for our meeting with no ancient judicial records or precedents. From these considerations then it may be concluded, that when the state of society among the Hindoos calls for any new provision, it must be proper and even necessary for us to interfere.

But not to pursue these incidental discussions, since we treat our Indian possessions as permanent and consolidated parts of the British empire, and the impolicy of governing them on any other principle, even if the tenure were uncertain, is well understood, doubtless we stand charged with the duties resulting from a permanent relation: and surely a relation of so serious a nature cannot fail to be productive of numerous duties. It must involve in it various points highly important to the happiness of our subjects, and therefore various corresponding obligations.

If we have appropriated those territories in perpetuity to ourselves, if we have assumed the sovereign dominion of them, if we apply a large portion of their annual produce to the use of Great Britain, if we are avowedly resolved to maintain our possession by arms against all pretensions, foreign or local; if by these measures, as well as by specific declarations, we show that we regard the inhabitants as exclusively and absolutely our subjects,—all the duties of rulers must be incumbent upon us.

We

* A. D. 1781.

† The Brahmins, in countries under foreign rulers, are often made referees; but from their general character are little competent, excepting in cases respecting caste.

We are not only concerned to free the people placed under our dominion from evils connected with taxation, such as feudal oppressions and official abuses, which may be termed extraneous grievances, but to look into evils and disorders which arise among themselves, which prevail in their society, and destroy their peace; to enact and enforce wholesome laws for their internal regulation, and in a word, with the affection of a wise and good superior, sedulously to watch over their civil and social happiness. No laboured argument drawn from the nature of government, is necessary to prove this position; the consideration which has been just adverted to, seems naturally to establish it; nor could it ever suit the principles of this nation to hold the Hindoos under its power as slaves, whose labours are exacted without a due return of benefits. Besides, such a system would soon defeat its own end, by reducing the value of the subjugated country. It is a truth perfectly obvious, that our own interest recommends the happiness of that people. The primary object of Great Britain, let it be acknowledged, was rather to discover what could be obtained from her Asiatic subjects, than how they could be benefited. In process of time it was found expedient to examine how they might be benefited, in order that we might continue to hold the advantages which we at first derived from them; and now when we have wisely and for ever fixed a limit to our demand upon them, duty calls upon us to accomplish the remainder of our progressive work, and to exert that solicitude for the gradual improvement of their condition in all points wherein it is still capable of amendment, which is due to them as useful subjects and as fellow creatures, whose happiness is committed to our care.

To elucidate some of those points which thus demand our attention, and to suggest such means of melioration as we may with safety use, is the design of the ensuing pages; in which the method of proceeding shall be; first, to give a view of the present state of our Hindoo subjects with respect to society and morals, illustrated by authentic documents; secondly, to enquire into the causes which have produced that state; and thirdly, to propose remedies for the evils of it, with answers to such objections as are likely to be made to the plan which shall thus be offered to consideration.

CHAP. II.

View of the State of Society among the Hindoo Subjects of Great Britain, particularly with respect to Morals.

IN prosecuting the proposed inquiry, the state of society and manners among the people of Hindostan, and more particularly among those who inhabit our territories, becomes in the first place a special object of attention. It is an object which perhaps has never yet received that distinct and particular consideration, to which from its importance in a political and moral view, it is entitled.

It has suited the views of some philosophers to represent that people as amiable and respectable; and a few late travellers have chosen rather to place some softer traits of their characters in an engaging light, than to give a just delineation of the whole. The generality however of those who have written concerning Hindostan, appear to have concurred in affirming what foreign residents there have as generally thought, nay, what the natives themselves freely acknowledge of each other, that they are a people exceedingly depraved.

In proportion as we have become better acquainted with them, we have found this description applicable, in a sense beyond the conception even of former travellers. The writer of this paper, after spending many years in India, and a considerable portion of them in the interior of our provinces, inhabited almost entirely by natives, towards whom whilst acknowledging his views of their general character, he always lived in habits of good will, is obliged to add his testimony to all preceding evidence, and to avow that they exhibit human nature in a very degraded humiliating state, and are at once, objects of disesteem and of commiseration. Discriminations in so vast a body as the whole Hindoo people, there must be; though the general features are very similar.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

Among that people, the natives of Bengal rank low; and these as best known and forming the largest division of our Asiatic subjects, are held more particularly in view in this essay. The Mahomedans who are mixed with them, may, in regard to manners and morals, often be comprehended under the same observations; but something distinct shall afterwards be subjoined concerning them.

Of the Bengaleze then, it is true most generally that they are destitute, to a wonderful degree, of those qualities which are requisite to the security and comfort of society. They want truth, honesty, and good faith, in an extreme, of which European society furnishes no example. In Europe those principles are the standard of character and credit; men who have them not are still solicitous to maintain the reputation of them, and those who are known to be devoid of them sink into contempt. It is not so in Bengal. The qualities themselves are so generally gone, that men do not found their pretension in society upon them; they take no pains to acquire or to keep up the credit of possessing them. Those virtues are not the tests by which connections and associations are regulated; nor does the absence of them, however plain and notorious, greatly lower any one in public estimation, nor strip him of his acquaintance. Want of veracity especially, is so habitual, that if a man has truth to defend, he will hardly fail to recur to falshood for its support. In matters of interest, the use of lying seems so natural, that it gives no provocation, it is treated as an excusable indulgence, a mode of proceeding from which general toleration has taken away offence, and the practice of cheating, pilfering, tricking, and imposing, in the ordinary transactions of life are so common, that the Hindoos seem to regard them as they do natural evils, against which they will defend themselves as well as they can, but at which it would be idle to be angry. Very flagrant breaches of truth and honesty pass without any deep or lasting stain. The scandalous conduct of Tippoo, in recently denying to Lord Cornwallis, in the face of the world, the existence of that capitulation* which he had shamefully broken, was merely an example of the manners of the country, where such things occur in common life every day.

In the worst parts of Europe, there are no doubt great numbers of men who are sincere, upright, and conscientious. In Bengal, a man of real veracity and integrity is a great phenomenon; one conscientious in the whole of his conduct, it is to be feared, is an unknown character. Every where in this quarter of the globe, there is still much generous trust and confidence, and men are surprised when they find themselves deceived. In Bengal, distrust is awake in all transactions; bargains and agreements are made with mutual apprehensions of breach of faith, conditions and securities are multiplied, and failure in them excites little or no surprise.

A serious proposal made to a native, that he should be guided in all his intercourses and dealings by the principles of truth and justice, would be regarded as weak and impracticable. "Do you know," he would reply, "the character of all those with "whom I have to act? How can I subsist if I take advantage of nobody, while "every person takes advantage of me?" Frauds, deceptions, evasions, and procrastinations, in every line of life, in all professions, perpetually occur, and forgeries also are often resorted to with little scruple.

If confidence is from necessity or credulity at any time reposed, it is considered by the other party as the season of harvest. Few will omit to seize such an opportunity of profit. The chief agent or steward of a landholder or of a merchant, will commonly endeavour to transfer to himself what he can gradually purloin of the property and the influence of his principal; this agent is in the mean time preyed upon in a similar way, though on a smaller scale, by his dependents, especially if prosperity has rendered him less vigilant. But suppose him, by a slow, silent, and systematic pursuit, to have accumulated a large fortune, and to leave it on his death to his son; the son, rich and indolent, is in turn imperceptibly fleeced by his domestic.

Menial servants who have been long in place, and have even evinced a real attachment to their masters, are nevertheless in the habitual practice of pilfering from them. If a nephew is entrusted by an uncle, or a son by his father, with the management of his concerns, there is no certainty that he will not set up a separate interest of his own. Wardships and executorships, trusts of the most necessary and sacred kind, which all men leaving property and infant children must repose in surviving surviving friends, are in too many instances grossly abused. The confidence to which the Bengaleze are most true, is in the case of illicit practices, on which occasions they act upon a point of honour.

* Of Coimbetore.

Even the Europeans, though in general possessed of power and of comparative strength of character, which makes them to be particularly feared, yet as often as they are careless or credulous in their transactions with the Bengaleze, find that they have fallen into the hands of harpies*.

Through the influence of similar principles, power entrusted to a native of Hindostan seldom fails of being exercised tyrannically, or perverted to the purposes of injustice. Official, or ministerial employments of all sorts, and in all gradations, are generally used as means of peculation.

It has already appeared that the distribution of justice, whenever it has been committed to natives, whether Hindoos or Mahomedans, has commonly† become a traffic in venality; the best cause being obliged to pay for success, and the worst having the opportunity of purchasing it. Money has procured acquittance even for murder. Such is the power of money, that no crime is more frequent, hardly any less thought of, than perjury. It is no extraordinary thing to see two sets of witnesses swearing directly contrary to each other, and to find, upon a minute investigation, that few probably of the evidences on either side have a competent knowledge of the matter in question. Now as these corruptions begin not in the practice of the courts of law, but have their origin in the character of the people, it is just to state them in illustration of that character; for although the legal reforms introduced by Lord Cornwallis will purify, it may be hoped, the fountains of justice, yet the best administration of law will not eradicate the internal principles of depravity.

Selfishness, in a word, unrestrained by principle, operates universally; and money, the grand instrument of selfish gratifications, may be called the supreme idol of the Hindoos. Deprived for the most part of political power, and destitute of boldness of spirit, but formed for business, artful, frugal, and persevering, they are absorbed in schemes for the gratification of avarice.

The tendency of that abandoned selfishness is to set "every man's hand against every man," either in projects, or in acts of open force. From violence however, fear interposes to restrain them. The people of the lower provinces in particular, with an exception of the military caste, are as dastardly as they are unprincipled. They seek their ends by mean artifices, low cunning, intrigue, falshood, servility, and hypocritical obsequiousness. To superiors, they appear full of reverence, of humble and willing submission, and readiness to do every thing that may be required of them; and as long as they discern something either to expect or to fear, they are wonderfully patient of slights, neglects, and injuries. But under all this apparent passiveness and meanness of temper, they are immoveably persisting in their secret views. With inferiors, they indemnify themselves by an indulgence of the feelings which were controuled before; and towards dependents, especially towards those whom an official situation subjects to their authority, they carry themselves with the mean pride of low minds. In the inferior, and by far the most numerous class of the community, where each man is nearly on a level with his neighbour, the native character appears with less disguise. The passions have a freer range, and new consequences are seen to result from the absence of the primary virtues of society. Discord, hatred, abuse, slanders, injuries, complaints, and litigations, all the effects of selfishness unrestrained by principle, prevail to a surprising degree. They overspread the land, they come perpetually before all men in authority. The deliberate malice,

* If the reader should here advert to the many large fortunes which are brought from India, and thence infer that the Europeans make their own part good there, notwithstanding all the dishonest artifices of the Hindoos whom they are obliged to employ, he may be answered, that according to the judgment of the person who writes this, the great mass of the fortunes now acquired, is not by any mode of extortion or exaction taken out of the pockets of individuals. A considerable portion of it is derived from the offices, salaries, contracts, and emoluments, enjoyed under government. Another portion from commerce, particularly foreign commerce, in which Europeans have superior superior enterprize, character, and advantage. And if any part is obtained by forbidden means, still the acquisition may in general be traced ultimately to what is strictly public property, not the property of private individuals. These slight remarks are thrown out as worthy the consideration of those persons, who without examination or inquiry are apt to suspect, that every fortune gained in India is got by extortion. More might be added upon the subject, but it would not suit the design of the present work.

† There may be exceptions. Ibrahim Ali Khan of Benares is reckoned a man of probity.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

malice, the falshood, the calumnies, and the avowed enmity with which the people pursue each other, and sometimes from father to son, offer a very mortifying view of the human character. No stranger can sit down among them without being struck with this temper of malevolent contention and animosity, as a prominent feature in the character of the society. It is seen in every village, the inhabitants live among each other in a sort of repulsive state, nay it enters into almost every family. Seldom is there a houshold without its internal divisions, and lasting enmities, most commonly too on the score of interest. The women partake of this spirit of discord. Held in slavish subjection by the men, they rise in furious passions against each other, which vent themselves in such loud, virulent, and indecent railings, as are hardly to be heard in any other part of the world.

Though the Bengaleze in general have not sufficient resolution to vent their resentments against each other in open combat, yet robberies, thefts, burglaries, river piracies, and all sorts of depredations where darkness, secrecy, or surprize can give advantage, are exceedingly common, and have been so in every past period of which any account is extant. There are castes of robbers and thieves, who consider themselves acting in their proper profession, and having united their families, train their children to it. No where in the world are ruffians more adroit or more hardened. Troops of these banditti, it is well known, are generally employed or harboured by the zemindars of the districts, who are sharers in their booty. They frequently make attacks in bodies, and on those occasions murder is very common. But besides these regular corps, multitudes of individuals employ themselves in despoiling their neighbours. Nor is it only in large and populous places and their vicinity, that such violences are practised; no part of the country, no village is safe from them. Complaints of depredations in every quarter, on the highways, on the water as well as the land, are perpetual. Though these are the crimes more immediately within the reach of justice, and though numbers of criminals have been, and are executed, the evils still subsist. Doubtless the corrupt administration of criminal justice in Bengal, for many years under the authority of the Nabob, has greatly aggravated disorders of this nature; but they have their origin from remoter springs. Robbers among the Hindoos, and frequently thieves also, are educated from their infancy in the belief that their profession is a right one. No ray of instruction reaches them to convince them of the contrary, and the feeble stirrings of natural conscience are soon overborne by example and practice. Besides this, they hold, in common with other Hindoos, the principle of fatalism, which in their case has most pernicious effects. They believe that they are destined by an inevitable necessity to their profession, and to all that shall befal them in it; they therefore go on without compunction, and are prepared to resign life, whenever the appointed period shall come, with astonishing indifference; considering the law that condemns them, not as the instrument of justice, but as the power of a stronger party. And here again it is evident, that a radical change in principle must be produced, before a spirit of rapine, thus nourished, can be cured.

Benevolence has been represented as a leading principle in the minds of the Hindoos; but those who make this assertion know little of their character. How is it possible that benevolence should be vigorous where justice, truth, and good faith are so greatly wanting? Certain modes indeed of distributing victuals to mendicants, and a scrupulous abstinence from some sorts of animal food, are prescribed by the religion of the Hindoos. But the ostentatious distribution is frequently commutative; an offering from the gain of iniquity bestowed on idle and sturdy priests. And though a Hindoo would shrink with horror from the idea of directly slaying a cow, which is a sacred animal among them, yet he who drives one in his cart, galled and excoriated as she often is by the yoke, beats her unmercifully from hour to hour, without any care or consideration of the consequence. Though therefore the institution of the two practices in question, may be urged as an argument for the originally benevolent turn of the religion which enjoined them, it will not at all follow that individuals, who in future ages perform them in obedience to that religion, must also be benevolent; and he who is cruel even to that creature for which he is taught by his religion to entertain the highest reverence, gives the strongest proof of an unfeeling disposition. It is true that in many cases they are strict in observing forms. These are indeed their religion, and the foundation of their hopes; their castes are implicated in them, and in their castes their civil state and comfort. But of the sentiments which the forms would seem to indicate, they are totally regardless.

Though

Though from the physical structure of their bodies they are easily susceptible of impressions, yet that they have little real tenderness of mind, seems very evident from several circumstances. The first that shall be mentioned is the shocking barbarity of their punishments. The cutting off legs, hands, noses, and ears, putting out of eyes, and other penal inflictions of a similar kind, all performed in the coarsest manner, abundantly justify our argument.

A similar disposition to cruelty is likewise shown in their treatment of vanquished enemies. And in general a want of sensibility for others is a very eminent characteristic of this people. The apathy with which a Hindoo views all persons and interests unconnected with himself, is such as excites the indignation of Europeans. At any rate his regards extend but to a very narrow circle. Patriotism is absolutely unknown in Hindostan.

These observations lead us to another striking proof of want of benevolence in the Hindoos; namely, their deficiency of natural affection. It is admitted that examples are not very uncommon of parents who show much tenderness to their children, especially during their infancy; but instances on the other side are so general, as clearly to mark the dispositions of the people. The following fact is one out of many, by which this assertion might be justified. In the scarcity of grain which prevailed about Calcutta in the year 1788, a gentleman then high, now still higher in office there, ordered his servants to buy any children that might be brought for sale, (for in times of dearth Hindoo parents frequently sell their offspring,) and to tell their mothers, that when the scarcity should be over, they might come again and receive their children back. Of about twenty thus humanely preserved, most of whom were females, only three were ever enquired for by their mothers. The scarcity was neither extreme nor long. The unnatural parents cannot be supposed to have perished from want, for each received money for her child, and by the liberal contribution of the inhabitants of Calcutta, and chiefly of the Europeans, rice was distributed daily to multitudes at various stations about the city. And yet notwithstanding this facility of obtaining food, a woman was at that time seen, in broad day, to throw away her infant child upon the high road. Most of the slaves in Hindostan (where they are used only for domestic services) have lost their freedom by the act of their parents. If the necessity is such at times as to lead to this expedient, is it not also an occasion to call forth the warmth of parental affection? Filial and paternal affection appear equally deficient among them; and in the conjugal relation, the characteristic indifference of the people is also discernible among those who come most within the sphere of European observation, namely, the lower orders.

The domestic state of the better ranks is more concealed from general view; but from the knowledge which is acquired, and from the peculiar usages by which marriage is governed among the Hindoos, we have no reason to believe that it is often sweetened by generous attachment or rational enjoyment. The parties betrothed by their parents whilst mere children, transplanted, with minds uncultivated and inexperienced, from the maternal zenana* into one of their own, united whilst reason is still in its infancy, can give little more account of the situation in which they find themselves than animals of a lower species. Affection and choice have had no influence in this connection, nor does it often happen that the former is studied and improved. The parties continue passive under that law which first brought them together. According to the despotic manners of the East, the husband is lord, and the wife a servant; seldom does he think of making her a companion or a friend. Polygamy, which is tolerated among the Hindoos, tends still more to destroy all rational domestic society. The honour of the family, and the preservation of its caste, the most awful of its concerns, depends on the reputation of the wife. She is secluded from all eyes but those of her nearest relations, and the most terrifying and disgraceful punishments are held out against misconduct. From so early an union, and such subsequent care, Europeans may suppose that order and decorum reign in the Hindoo zenanas; but the conclusion is founded on conjecture, rather than upon actual knowledge. The profound reserve and caution observed by the men in their conduct, and even in their conversation, respecting their family connections, keep all foreigners at a distance; and it is to the honour of the English, that there is perhaps no instance of their attempting an invasion of the domestic recesses of the Hindoos. But those who have an opportunity of living among the natives in the interior of the country,

* The private apartments of the women.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

country, see reasons for apprehending that the purity of the female character is not always so well preserved in reality, as in appearance.

In a residence of several years entirely among the natives, the present writer heard so many charges of irregularity, and saw so many disorders among the inferior ranks, that he could not but believe the existence of a gross laxity of behaviour and principle in this great branch of morals, in some degree at least reaching to the better classes. But the disgrace and loss which follow to the family from the proof of dishonour in the wife, are such as to induce the parties concerned to hush up all matters of that sort, and to take their revenge in some secret way; they will seldom seek redress openly, unless the affair has already become notorious. Accusations by others of such contaminations in families, are very common among the lower Hindoos, and scandals of the same kind pass among the higher orders. Enmity, it is true, may be supposed to have its share in these charges; it may occasionally fabricate them, and is undoubtedly active in bringing them forward; but that it should always invent them, and should persevere in a succession of inventions which experience was ever ready to discredit, is not to be conceived. The truth is, the Hindoo writers, and the Hindoo laws, express the worst opinion of their women, and seem to place all security in vigilance, none in principle. And indeed what fund of principle can minds which have received no improvement in education, and in which reason as yet has hardly begun to act, carry into a premature and unchosen conjugal relation? a relation, the early commencement of which, is probably to be ascribed to the apprehension of parents for the conduct of their children. Imperious dominion, seclusion and terror, are the means afterwards used, to enforce the fidelity of the wife. But opportunities of guilt are not wanting. In the hours of business, men are generally at a distance from the retirements of the women; they are often, and for considerable periods, far from home; females, who are the great instruments of corrupting their own sex, are permitted access to the zenanas; besides the Hindoo law allows women to converse with Soneassees, a set of vagrant devotees, some of them most indecent in their appearance. The consequences are such as might be expected.

It is not however asserted or believed, that the infection of depravity has overspread the whole mass of females, many of whom, doomed to joyless confinement through life, and a violent premature death, are perhaps among the most inoffensive and suffering of the Hindoo race. As to the men, they are under little restraint from moral considerations. The laws of caste impose restrictions and fines for offences of the nature in question, so far as that distinction is concerned, but leave great scope for new connections, and for promiscuous intercourse, which is matter of little scruple or observation. Receptacles for women of infamous character are every where licensed, and the women themselves have a place in society. The female dancers, who are of this order, make the principal figure in the entertainments of ceremony given by the great. Indecency is the basis of their exhibitions; yet children and young persons of both sexes are permitted to be present at these shows, which have admittance even into the principal zenanas*. Licentious connections are therefore most common, though subsisting apparently without that intoxication of passion which hurries on the mind against conviction, and carried on without much concealment, nay almost with the insensibility of brutes. On such points, the Hindoos seem to advert to no rule except what the law enjoins; there is no sentiment, diffused at large through society, which attaches shame to criminality. Wide and fatal are the effects of this corruption of manners; a corruption not stopping here, but extending even to the unnatural practices of the ancient Heathens, though in these the Mahomedans are still more abandoned.

Europeans who not having resided in Asia, are acquainted only with a few detached features of the Indian character, may possibly feel some doubt whether this sketch, which professes to trace but the greater and more palpable lines, is to be received as a sober and faithful representation. They will reason concerning the Hindoos from what they have seen of human nature elsewhere; and it is unquestionably true, even that part of Europe which is most corrupt, offers no such picture as that which has been drawn in the preceding pages. They may be staggered too by having heard many discordant opinions on this very subject. For some modern philosophers already hinted at, whose aim has been to subvert, together with revealed religion, all ideas ideas of the moral government of the Deity, and of man's responsibility to him, have exalted the natives of the East, and of other pagan regions, into models of goodness and innocence. Other writers, with far better views, indignant at the alledged delinquencies of Europeans in Hindostan, have described the natives of that country as a harmless, kind, peaceable, and suffering race. Others again, speak rather from an admiration inspired by the supposed past state of the Hindoos, mixed with pity for their present situation, than from experience of their actual qualities and dispositions. And there may be others still, who have not had much personal experience of the evils resulting from the state of society among the Hindoos, but being pleased with their obsequiousness, and easily acquiescing in the licenciousness prevalent among them, have been willing to treat of their character and proceedings with indulgence. The doubts, however, arising from these sources, will it is hoped, be entirely removed by the corroborating testimonies now about to be produced.

* Lord Cornwallis, soon after his arrival in Bengal, refused to be present at an entertainment of this sort, to which he was invited by the Nabob.

It is indeed true, that travellers are apt to form their opinions of countries and of nations from what they have themselves happened to see; and it is also to be remembered, that of the many Europeans who have visited India, especially in later times, the opportunities, the means, and perhaps the desire, of information, have been very different. We may all be sensible that more accurate observation, and mature experience, often correct the first impressions we receive, even of European countries or places new to us; and that it is no easy work to attain to a just and comprehensive knowledge of the character of any people. Whilst an European, deriving a superiority from his race, or from the station he is appointed to fill, regards only in a distant speculative way the effeminate exterior, adulatory address, and submissive demeanor of the Hindoos, he naturally enough conceives them to be a people in whom the mild and gentle qualities predominate. He is apt to consider them with a mixture of complacency and contempt; and even the bad dispositions towards each other, which he soon discovers to exist in them, he may view with feelings analogous to those which the petty malignity of children, or of beings of a diminutive species, might excite. But let him enter into dealings with them, let him trust them, or become in concerns of importance dependent on them; let him in short by these, or any other means, come more upon a level with them, and he will then learn better to appreciate their real character. Let it therefore be recollected, that as members of the same community they always stand, in many respects, on such a level with each other, suffering continually from mutual injuries; and that it is in thus viewing them, in considering not so much the mischiefs which they can do to us, as the evils which they diffuse through their own society, that we shall assign to them their true place in the moral scale. Whether that is done here, shall therefore be chearfully left to the determination of those who have had a long residence among them, and extensive dealings with them. It is believed, that no person of this description will think the picture now given, adds fictitious features, or aggravates real ones *.

It will not however be understood, that what is here advanced generally, is to be applied to the utmost extent to every individual, and every transaction; it is the universality of great depravity that is here insisted on,—a general moral hue, between which, and the European moral complexion, there is a difference, analogous to the difference of the natural colour of the two races.

There is a standard to which, for the elucidation of this subject, we may largely appeal,—the records of the East-India Company, which contain an immense collection of facts respecting the Hindoos, and relating to various subjects, political, judicial, financial, and commercial. Those records, less frequently profess to treat of character and common life, than of matters of business; but it continually happens, that they incidentally develope the principles and conduct of the Hindoos, and that in a more convincing way than if the primary object had been to describe them.

Nor

* It may be proper to remark, that the features here delineated, are taken from the Hindoo character as it generally exists in civil life. Those gentlemen who have passed their time chiefly in our Indian armies, may not have seen it with exactly the same aspects. The military caste of the Hindoos have a portion of those qualities which usually accompany the profession of arms: better pay, better treatment, and our high reputation in war, make it their interest to attach themselves to our service; they are withdrawn from many of the collisions of civil affairs, and they are under the powerful control of military discipline, which, with the habits of military life, must throw a perceptible distinction into their character, at least while they remain embodied in our employ; but when they retire and separate, they assimilate more to the rest of their countrymen.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

Nor do they contain the mere representations of Europeans, who might be suspected of a tincture of partiality in this case, but the natives are themselves brought upon the stage, and heard concerning each other. These records will be found abundantly to substantiate all that is here advanced.

To introduce a great variety of quotations from so copious a source, (as numerous as they must be, to do justice to the subject,) is not within the compass of the brief exposition here intended; but after having previously stated the opinion of an intelligent traveller, who observed the manners of the Hindoos in the last century, we shall select a few extracts, containing the sentiments of persons of distinguished information and respectability, writing at different periods, without any concert with each other, and under no temptation to depreciate the people of whom they speak.

BERNIER, about 1670.

"Ces sortes de rois barbares n'ont aucune véritable générosité, et ne sont guères "retenus par la foi qu'ils ont promise, ne regardant qu'à leurs intérêts présens, sans "songer mêmes aux malheurs qui leur peuvent arriver de leur perfidie, et de leur "brutalité.

"Pour se tirer de leurs mains, il faut être ou le plus fort, ou n'avoir rien qui "puisse exciter leur avarice."

"Je ne sai s'il y a au monde, une nation plus avare et plus sordide que celle-là."

"Les Brahmens entretiennent ces peuples dans ces erreurs et superstitions, et passent même jusques à des fourberies et à des vilainies si infâmes, que je ne les aurois jamais pû croire, si je ne m'en étois pleinement informé*."

MR. SCRAFTON, 1759.

"The Gentoos are found still more cruel and rapacious than their foreign masters, "and what is more extraordinary, the Brahmens still exceed the rest in every abuse "of power, and seem to think if they bribe God, by bestowing part of their plunder "on cows and faquirs, their iniquities will be pardoned."

"Loyalty and patriotism, those virtuous incentives to great and noble actions, are here unknown; and when they cease to fear they cease to obey."

"Such of the Brahmens as engage in the world, are generally the worst of all the "Gentoos; for persuaded that the waters of the Ganges will purify them from their "sins, and being exempted from the utmost rigour of the courts of justice under the "Gentoo government, they run into the greatest excesses†."

GOVERNOR HOLWELL, about 1760.

"A race of people, who from their infancy are utter strangers to the idea of com- "mon faith and honesty."

"This is the situation of the bulk of the people of Indostan, as well as of the "modern Brahmins; amongst the latter, if we except one in a thousand, we give "them over measure."

"The Gentoos in general, are as degenerate, crafty, superstitious, litigious, and "wicked a people, as any race of people in the known world, if not eminently more so, "especially the common run of Brahmins; and we can truly aver, that during almost "five years that we presided in the Judicial Cutchery Court of Calcutta, never any "murder or other atrocious crime came before us, but it was proved in the end a "Brahmin was at the bottom of it."‡

LORD CLIVE, 1765.

"The inhabitants of this country we know by long experience, have no attach- "ment to any obligation.§"

GOVERNOR

* Voyages de François Bernier, Tome I. page 150, 162. et Tome II. page 105.

† Reflections on the Government of Hindostan, by Luke Scrafton, Esq. pages 26, 27. See in the same work, page 19 & seq. a striking character of the Mahomedans of rank in India.

‡ Holwell's Historical Events, Vol. I. page 228, and Vol. II. page 151.

§ Cited by Bolt's Considerations, Vol. III. Appendix A, page 33.

GOVERNOR VERELST*, about 1768.

" It is customary with these people to spin out treaties to an immoderate length; " avaricious in the highest degree, they endeavour by every artifice to encrease " their exorbitant demands; and faithless themselves, they are suspicious of the " faith of others."

" His (Haffez Rahmet Caun's) character has little to distinguish it, except that low " cunning, intrigue, and deceit, so general in this country."

" The Nabob Sujah-al-Dowlah, is our next ally, and if gratitude can be any tie " on an Hindostan heart, we have every reason to look upon him as connected with " us by the most indissoluble bonds."

" His (Jewhar Sing's) character, like the majority of the great in Hindostan, is " that of a man absorbed in pleasure and luxury, weak, vain-glorious, aspiring, with- " out experience or abilities."

" The body of the people are in a manner formed to bear the yoke. They possess " nothing of the inquisitiveness of the European nations, and the most slender arts " (i. e. in things unknown to them) are sufficient to obscure their understanding, and " fit them for implicit submission."

" It would be as easy to change the genius and manners of the people, as to " prevent the Banians and followers of men in station, from abusing their master's " name. Chastisements may deter the oppression for a moment, but in such " cases, the servility of the people must be removed before oppression can be " eradicated."

" An Englishman will ever be unfit to follow the subtle native through all his arts. " The treachery of Hindostan professions will prepare him better for the frank " declarations of his English allies."

" The venality which forms part of the genius of the people, and which is known " to be openly exercised, or tacitly allowed by government, without drawing any " shame or discredit on the guilty, or being thought any peculiar hardship on the " injured . . . . . ."

" Every person of any substance or character in this country, has been successively " tried in the department of the collections. Fear, reward, severity, and indulgence, " have all failed, and ended in a short political forbearance, or additional acts of " dishonesty and rapine."

" The evasions and artifices which are familiar to the natives of this country, have " often been successful in screening them from that open and manifest detection " which can justify punishment."

" Certain it is, that almost every decision of theirs (the Mahomedan judges, who " continued to decide in criminal matters to the time of Lord Cornwallis) is a " corrupt bargain with the highest bidder. The numerous offences which are com- " promised by fines, have left a great latitude for very unjust determinations. Trifling " offenders, and even many condemned on fictitious accusations, are frequently " loaded with heavy demands; and capital criminals are as often absolved by the " venal judges."

" The peculiar punishment of forfeiting castes, to which the Hindoos are liable, " is often inflicted from private pique and personal resentment among themselves †."

The GOVERNOR (MR. HASTINGS) and COUNCIL of BENGAL, about 1772.

" The deceits of Bengal are not, like the robbers in England, individuals driven " to such desperate courses by sudden wants. They are robbers by profession, and " even by birth; they are formed into regular communities, and their families subsist " by the spoils which they bring home to them; they are all therefore alike criminal; " wretches who have placed themselves in a state of declared war with government, " and are therefore wholly excluded from every benefit of its laws. We have many " instances of their meeting death with the greatest insensibility."

" The

* Besides what has been already said of him, we may add that he was a well informed servant of the Company; and that many papers in the Appendix to his " View of Bengal," are valuable.

† Verelst's View of the English Government in Bengal; Original Papers in the Appendix, pages 58, 102, 103, 105, 108, &c.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

" The litigiousness and perseverance of the natives of this country in their suits " and complaints, is often productive, not only of inconvenience and vexation to their " adversaries, but also of endless expence and actual oppression."

" To curb and restrain trivial and groundless complaints, and to deter chicane " and intrigue, which passions amongst these people often work to the undoing of " *their neighbours. . . . . ."

MR. SHORE†, about 1783 or 1784.

" The natives are timid and servile. As individuals they are insolent to their " inferiors; to their superiors, generally speaking, submissive, though they are to " them also guilty of insolence when they can be so with impunity. Individuals have " little sense of honour, and the nation is wholly void of public virtue. They make not " the least scruple of lying where falsehood is attended with advantage; yet both Hin- " doos and Mahomedans, continually speak of their credit and reputation, by which " they mean little more than the appearance they make to the world."

" Cunning and artifice is wisdom to them. To deceive and over-reach, is to acquire " the character of a wise man. The greatest disgrace they can suffer, is to lose their " caste, or as we say, to be excommunicated. This punishment is inflicted for the " breach of the injunctions of their religion, or what is the same, of the ordinances " of their priests."

" To lie, steal, plunder, ravish, or murder, are not deemed sufficient crimes to merit " expulsion from society."

" With a Hindoo, all is centered in himself; his own interest is his guide; " ambition is a secondary quality with him, and the love of money is the source of " his passion."

" The advantage they derive over Europeans, is by practising those arts of mean- " ness, which an European detests. A MAN MUST BE LONG ACQUAINTED WITH " THEM‡, before he can believe them capable of that barefaced falsehood, servile " adulation, and deliberate deception, which they daily practise. It is in vain that we " search for men of enlightened understanding, deep reasoning and reflection, among " the natives. The education of the Hindoos is confined to their being taught their " own language. The Mahomedans are little better instructed: the acquisition of a " few moral or political maxims, which in practice they neglect, is all they know of " the art of government: if exceptions can be found, they are very rare. An " Englishman cannot descend to those little practices of oppression, or extortion, so " familiar to the natives, his mind revolts at the idea of them. And admitting even " that some are by habit, connection, or necessity, become depraved, there is, after " all, in every breast, a sense of honour and virtue that recoils from the low vicious " acts of a native of Bengal. It is the business of all, from the Ryott to the " Dewan, to conceal and deceive; the simplest matters of fact are designedly covered " with a veil, through which no human understanding can penetrate§."

SIR JOHN MACPHERSON, Governor General, about 1785-6.

" I am afraid that the picture which he (Mr. Shore) draws, and the low ebb at which he states the popular virtues of the Bengalize, are not fictitious repre- sentations‖."

COLONEL SIR ROBERT BARKER.

" It is well known that neither promises nor oaths, have been able to bind this " treacherous sect of people to their engagements. Sujah Dowlah was like all other " Indostanners, not observing much faith when it was his interest to do otherwise¶".

The transcriber of the preceding pages, writing at a distance from public offices, and possessed of few unpublished documents, is not able to adduce any comprehensive

* Reports of the Secret Committee of the House of Commons, 1772. Appendix, No. 2.

† Now Governor General of Bengal.

‡ To this declaration from a witness eminently competent, attention is particularly requested.

§ The whole of this curious paper is inserted in the Parliamentary proceedings against Mr. Hastings, Appendix to Vol. II. page 67.—The Remarks in the preceding sheets were penned before this document was examined by the writer of them.

‖ Parliamentary Proceedings against Mr. Hastings, Appendix to Vol. II. page 65.

¶ Ibid. Appendix to Vol. I. page 229. and Vol. II. page 8.

sive opinion delivered by Lord Cornwallis, respecting the natives; but in the many papers on almost all subjects connected with his government, which his Lordship has entered on the records of the Company during his administration, his sentiments must be abundantly seen, and to those papers the reader is referred, without fear of their contradicting the views here given. A government of reform, like his Lordship's, implies a sense of many existing evils, and the conduct in one striking instance, of a person so considerate and humane, is entitled to particular notice. Though civil and attentive to the natives, he has reposed no confidence in any one of them, nor has he had a single individual, either Hindoo or Mahomedan, about his person, above the rank of a menial servant, contrary to the general usage of men occupying such stations as he filled.

Upon one very important subject, the criminal justice of the country, to the administration of which, Lord Cornwallis has given a new constitution, some of his observations, written as introductory to that essential improvement, are here exhibited.

3d DECEMBER, 1790.

" The regulation of justice in criminal cases, although constituting one of the most " essential requisites of good government, yet never appears (as far as can be traced) " to have received the attention it so well merits, under any system, either of the Mogul " or Hindoo administration, in India.....The next alteration I would propose is that " already alluded to, in regard to the option left to the next of kin, to remit the sentence " of the law and pardon the criminal. The evil consequences, and the crimes which " hereby escape punishment, are so manifest and frequent, that to take away the dis- " cretion of the relations, seems absolutely requisite to secure an equal administration " of justice, and will constitute a strong additional check on the commission " of murder, and other crimes, which are now no doubt often perpetrated, under the " idea of an easy escape through the notorious defect of the existing law, which at " first perhaps was confined to appeals, or private prosecutions, by the next of kin, " and had no application to public prosecutions in the name of the sovereign; and " which is besides peculiarly inapplicable to this country (however it may have " suited the society it was orignally intended for); because where Brahmins commit " murder on any person of the Hindoo religion, they know that they do so with almost " perfect impunity, since in most cases it cannot be expected that any Gentoo will " ever desire, or be consenting to the death of a Brahmin, of which a case exactly " in point, is now depending before the Board, from Benares, where a Brahmin having " wantonly killed his wife, has, although confessing and convicted of the crime, been " pardoned by her relations. But it is unnecessary to have recourse to the testi- " monies of the magistrates, to prove the abuses practised in these courts. The " multitudes of criminals with which the jails in every district are now crowded, the " numerous murders, robberies, and burglaries, daily committed, and the general inse- " curity of person and property, which prevails in the interior parts of the country, " are melancholy proofs of their having long and too generally existed. The " inefficacy of the clause in the engagements of the land-holders, making them res- " ponsible for all robberies, has been long experienced, and so far from protecting " the country, they or their police officers (who in general purchase their appoint- " ments, or pay an annual consideration for them) are but too often concerned in " the enormities it is their duty to prevent."

When this great change in the administration of criminal justice was in contemplation, various queries were proposed to the English magistrates, stationed throughout the country, respecting the existing state of the police. Their answers, which are inserted at length in the records of the Bengal government, present a scene of shocking disorder. As it would be too tedious to insert the whole of them upon a subject so little questionable, one only, which goes into character as well as facts, shall be quoted. It is from Mr. Rocke, the magistrate of Jessore.

DECEMBER, 1789.

" The punishments however, though they exceed in variety and severity, those " inflicted by a British court of justice, do not appear at all adequate to the suppres- " sion of crimes; and of this the Fougedary records, to the present hour, will bear a

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

" melancholy testimony, as well with regard to the number, as the nature of the " offences, always to be found in the calendar. The partiality of the natives of this " country to a profession they have once embraced, and their extreme reluctance to " quit it, are notorious. The same principle and inherent prejudice, which attach " the mechanic to his particular line of profession, operate equally upon the robber, " house-breaker, or murderer, who, desperate as his occupation is, cherishes it " as much, holds it as dear, and follows it as systematically, as the peaceful merchant " his easy and lucrative one. Besides this, the constitutional apathy of the natives " of this country, and the patience with which they endure pain, and even resign life, " render them, for the most part, regardless of corporal sufferance; and principally " to this cause may be ascribed the reason, why crimes of all descriptions still " continue to be perpetrated, although such frequent sacrifices are made to the " offended laws."

" Of the effects produced by the different modes of punishment in this country, " we have frequent experience. It may be needless to particularize the milder ones " inflicted for trifling offences, as their effects may be judged of from what we see " produced by those of greater magnitude, and more severe nature. Perpetual im- " prisonment is, I think, improperly regarded as a punishment of a higher order. " To British minds, the idea it conveys is indeed dreadful; but there is nothing in it " so terrible to a native of Bengal, to whose natural indolence and inactivity, a life of " this nature is perfectly congenial, and whilst the necessaries and comforts of life " are within their reach, the restraint they are under is a circumstance of no great " hardship to them, being seldom or never so close as to debar them from intercourse " with the rest of the world. The effects of this punishment are, I apprehend, " never such as must evidently have been expected from it, as being in rank imme- " diately next to a capital one. Loss of a hand, or a foot, is undoubtedly a punish- " ment of a very severe nature, as being not only a painful and dangerous operation, " but at once depriving the body of a most useful limb, and stamping a mark of " indelible infamy upon it, and yet this is so little regarded, that many an offender, on " apprehension, is found to have already forfeited a limb, and sometimes even two, to " the laws. Death, the last, and in the general opinion of mankind, the greatest of " all punishments, fails here greatly of its intended effect. Fortified by their strong " religious prejudices and notions of predestination, and not unfrequently elated with " the idea of suffering as martyrs to the cause, and amidst the prayers and applauses " of their confederates, criminals in this country, meet death with indifference and " composure."

Authentic relations of the transactions of Hindoo nations, and Hindoo individuals with each other, would constitute a very satisfactory kind of evidence in the illustration of their character. But of true history they possess few records. The genius of the government, and the genius of the people, were alike unfavourable to that species of composition. Such accounts however as have reached us of their ancient wars, exhibit pictures of eminent cruelty and injustice.

Of recent times, the public occurrences, in which Europeans have been parties or witnesses, are generally diffused through voluminous official writings, which if accessible, could not be perspicuously contracted within one division of this limited work; and of private observation and experience, which might have furnished many curious and instructive collections, seldom has it been the practice to register accurate details. But happily one testimony presents itself, which unites with unquestionable authority, views of Hindoo character, in a country never under a Mahomedan power. This country is Nepaul, and the relation is given by Father Joseph, a Romish missionary of known respectability in Bengal, from whom it was communicated by Mr. (now Sir John) Shore, to the Asiatic Society*. Father Joseph was in Nepaul in the year 1769. Three chiefs of that region then contended for sovereignty, and some of their proceedings are described in the following extracts.

" The inhabitants of Certipore, receiving no support from the King of Lelit- " Pattan, to whom they were subject, applied for assistance to Gainprejas, who " immediately marched with his whole army to their relief, gave battle to the army " of the King of Gorc'ha, and obtained a complete victory. A brother of the King " of Gorc'ha was killed on the field of battle, and the King himself, by the assistance " of good bearers, narrowly escaped with his life by fleeing into the mountains.

" After

* Asiatic Researches, Vol. II. page 307.

" After the action, the inhabitants of Certipore demanded Gainprejas for their " King, and the nobles of the town went to confer with him on the business; but " being all assembled in the same apartment with the King, they were all surprised " and seized by his people. After the seizure of those persons, Gainprejas, perhaps " to revenge himself of these nobles for having refused their concurrence to his " nomination as King (upon a former occasion) privately caused some of them to be " put to death; another, by name Danuvanta, was led through the city in a woman's " dress, along with several others, cloathed in a ridiculous and whimsical manner, " at the expence of the nobles of Lelit-Pattan. They were then kept in close con- " finement for a long time; at last, after making certain promises, and interesting " all the principal men of the country in their behalf, Gainprejas set them at " liberty. . . . . "

" The King of Gorc'ha, despairing of his ability to get possession of the plain " of Nepaul by strength, hoped to effect his purpose by causing a famine; and with " this design, stationed troops at all the passes of the mountains, to prevent any " intercourse with Nepaul: and his orders were most rigorously obeyed, for every " person who was found in the road, with only a little salt or cotton about him, was " hung upon a tree; and he caused all the inhabitants of a neighbouring village, " to be put to death in a most cruel manner; even the women and children did not " escape, for having supplied a little cotton to the inhabitants of Nepaul; and when " I arrived in that country at the beginning of 1769, it was a most horrid spectacle " to behold so many people hanging on trees in the road. However the King of " Gorc'ha, being also disappointed in his expectations of gaining his end by this " project, fomented dissensions among the nobles of the three kingdoms of Nepaul, " and attached to his party many of the principal ones, by holding forth to them, " liberal and enticing promises, for which purpose he had about two thousand " Brahmins in his service. . . . . "

" The inhabitants of Certipore having already sustained six or seven months " siege, a noble of Lelit-Pattan, called Danuvanta, fled to the Gorc'ha party, and " treacherously introduced their army into the town; the inhabitants might still " have defended themselves, having many other fortresses in the parts of the town " to retreat to; but the people of Gorc'ha having published a general amnesty, the " inhabitants, greatly exhausted by the fatigues of a long siege, surrendered them- " selves prisoners upon the faith of that promise. In the mean time the men of " Gorc'ha seized all the gates and fortresses within the town; but two days after- " wards, Prit'hwinarayan, who was at Navacuta (a long day's journey distant) " issued an order to Suruparatna, his brother, to put to death some of the principal " inhabitants of the town, and to cut off the noses and lips of every one, even the " infants, who were not found in the arms of their mothers, ordering at the same " time, all the noses and lips which had been cut off, to be preserved, that he might " ascertain how many souls there were, and to change the name of the town " into Naskatapur, which signifies the town of cut-noses. The order was carried " into execution with every mark of horror and cruelty, none escaping but those who " could play on wind-instruments; although Father Michael Angelo, who without " knowing that such an inhuman scene was then exhibited, had gone to the house of " Suruparatna, interceded much in favour of the poor inhabitants. Many of them " put an end to their lives in despair; others came in great bodies to us in search " of medicines, and it was most shocking to see so many living people with their " teeth and noses resembling the skulls of the deceased."

" During the siege of Cat'hmandu, the Brahmins of Gorc'ha came almost every " night into the city, to engage the chiefs of the people on the part of their King; " and the more effectually to impose upon poor Gainprejas, many of the principal " Brahmins went to his house, and told him to persevere with confidence, that the " chiefs of the Gorc'ha army were attached to his cause, and that even they them- " selves would deliver up their King, Prit'hwinarayan, to his hands. Having by " these artifices procured an opportunity of detaching from his party all his principal " subjects, tempting them with liberal promises according to their custom, one night " the men of Gorc'ha entered the city without opposition, and the wretched Gain- " prejas, perceiving he was betrayed, had scarce time to escape with about three " hundred of his best and most faithful Hindostany troops, towards Lelit-Pattan, " which place however he reached the same night."

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

" The King of Gorc'ha, having made himself master of Cat'hmandu in the year " 1768, persisted in the attempt of possessing himself also of the city of Lelit-" Pattan, promising all the nobles that he would suffer them to remain in the " possession of their property, that he would even augment it; and because the " nobles of Lelit-Pattan placed *a reliance on the faith of his promises, he sent his " domestic priest to make this protestation, That if he failed to acquit himself of " his promise, he should draw curses upon himself and his family, even to the fifth, " past, and succeeding generation: so that the unhappy Gainprejas, and the King " of Lelit-Pattan, seeing that the nobility were disposed to render themselves " subject to the King of Gorc'ha, withdrew themselves with their people to the " King of B'hatgan. When the city of Lelit-Pattan became subject to the King " of Gorc'ha, he continued for some time to treat the nobility with great attention, " and proposed to appoint a viceroy of the city from among them. Two or three " months afterwards, having appointed the day for making his formal entrance into " the city of Lelit-Pattan, he made use of innumerable stratagems to get into his " possession the persons of the nobility, and in the end succeeded. He had prevailed " upon them to permit their sons to remain at court, as companions of his son; he " had dispatched a noble of each house to Navacut, or New Fort, pretending that " the apprehensions he entertained of them had prevented his making a public " entrance into the city; and the remaining nobles were seized at the river without " the town, where they went to meet him, agreeable to a prior engagement. After-" wards he entered the city, made a visit to the temple of Baghero, adjoining to " our habitation, and passing in triumph through the city amidst immense numbers " of soldiers, who composed his train, entered the royal palace which had been " prepared for his reception; in the mean time, parties of his soldiers broke open " the houses of the nobility, seized all their effects, and threw the inhabitants of the " city into the utmost consternation. After having caused all the nobles who were " in their power to be put to death, or rather their bodies to be mangled in a horrid " manner, he departed with a design of besieging B'hatgan, and we obtained per-" mission, through the interest of his son, to retire with all the christians into the " possessions of the English."

A multitude of other quotations which might be made in illustration of the Hindoo character, both from modern publications and from authors of more ancient date, as Sir Thomas Rowe, Hamilton, Baldæus, Nieuhoff, Tavernier, and others, are for the sake of brevity omitted; but as it may be interesting to see the sentiments of so distinguished a character as Timour, or Tamerlane, upon the subject in question, these extracts shall be closed with a quotation from his Institutes, supposed to have been compiled A. D. 1400.

" The inhabitants of Hindostan are equally debilitated in their corporeal, and " inert in their mental faculties; inexorable and penurious to such an extreme, that " only personal violence can enforce justice. Regardless of honour, and indecent in " their dress, they sacrifice their lives for trifles, and are indefatigable in unworthy " pursuits; whilst improvident and imprudent, their ideas are confined and views " circumscribed. When reduced to poverty, they patiently have recourse to the " most menial employments, forgetting their previous circumstances, and seldom " quitting the world without injuring their benefactors; but whilst the acquisition of " riches tempers every atrocity, indolence pervades their most momentous transac-" tions. The native of Hindostan has no pretensions to humanity but the figure; " whilst imposture, fraud, and deception, are by him considered as meritorious " accomplishments †."

Of the Mahomedans, who mix in considerable numbers with the former inhabitants of all the countries subdued by their arms in Hindostan, it is necessary also to say a few words. Originally of the Tartar race, proud, fierce, and lawless; attached also to their superstition, which cherished their native propensities; they were rendered by success yet more proud, sanguinary, sensual, and bigotted. Their government, though

* So in the original; but it seems to be an error of the press, the sense requiring that it should be "no reliance."

† Mackay's Asiatic Miscellany, Vol. I. page 279. This picture may be compared with that which Sir John Shore, drawing likewise from the life, more than three hundred years afterwards, has delineated. If it be said, that these are the representations of conquerors and foreigners, it may be replied, that they are not opinions advanced in a state of hostility or controversy, but mature observations, made in a time of settled government, after many years experience of the behaviour of the Hindoos to each other.

CHAP. II.
View of the Morals of the Hindoo Subjects of Great Britain.

though meliorated under the house of Timour, was undoubtedly a violent despotism, and the delegated administration of it too often a severe oppression. Breaking through all the restraints of morals which obstructed their way to power, they afterwards abandoned themselves to the most vicious indulgences, and the most atrocious cruelties. Perfidy in them, was more signal than in the Hindoos. Successive treacheries, assassinations, and usurpations, mark their history more perhaps than that of any other people. The profession of arms was studied by them, and they cultivated the Persian learning. They introduced Arabic laws, formed for rude and ignorant tribes, and in the administration of them, as may be judged from the specimen above exhibited, were most corrupt.

Every worldly profession, indeed every course of secular business, was in their avowed opinion (an opinion which they still hold) irreconcilable with strict virtue. Commerce, and the details of the finances, they left chiefly to the Hindoos, whom they despised and insulted. Where their government still prevails, the character resulting from their original temper, and superstition, aggravated by the enjoyment of power, remains in force. In our provinces, where their authority is subverted, and where many of them fall into the lower lines of life, that character becomes less obvious; but with more knowledge, and more pretensions to integrity, they are as unprincipled as the Hindoos. Their perfidy, however, and licentiousness, are the perfidy and licentiousness of a bolder people*.

From the government and intermixture of the Mahomedans, the Hindoos have certainly derived no improvement of character. The invaders, may fairly be supposed to have contributed their share to the general evils, and even to have increased them. But they did not produce those evils, nor could they have perpetuated them in opposition to the genius and spirit of the Hindoos, who are in number probably as eight to one. They may therefore be considered, rather as constituting an accession, than as giving a character to the mass. The vices however of the Mahomedans, and Hindoos, are so homogeneous, that in stating their effects, it is not inaccurate to speak of both classes under the description of the one collective body into which they are now formed.

Upon the whole, then, we cannot avoid recognizing in the people of Hindostan, a race of men lamentably degenerate and base; retaining but a feeble sense of moral obligation; yet obstinate in their disregard of what they know to be right, governed by malevolent and licentious passions, strongly exemplifying the effects produced on society by great and general corruption of manners, and sunk in misery by their vices†, in a country peculiarly calculated by its natural advantages, to promote the happiness of its inhabitants. The delineation from which this conclusion is formed, has been a task so painful, that nothing except the consciousness of meaning to do good could have induced the author to proceed in it. He trusts he has an affecting sense of the general imperfection of human nature, and would abhor the idea of needlessly or contemptuously exposing the defects of any man, or set of men. If he has given an unfavourable description, his wish is not to excite detestation, but to engage compassion, and to make it apparent, that what speculation may have ascribed to physical and unchangeable causes, springs from moral sources capable of correction.

CHAP. III.

Causes which have produced the present Situation and Character of the Hindoos.

CHAP. III.
Causes of the present Situation and Character of the Hindoos.

IN investigating the peculiar characters of different nations, it is both usual and reasonable to ascribe them principally to the influence of climate, of government and laws, and of religion: it will be proper, therefore, to lay before the reader the situation of Hindostan, with respect to each of those particulars, that he may be enabled

* See the character of the Mahomedans, before alluded to, in Scrafton's Reflections, p. 19, et seq.

† Some persons may be disposed to enquire, how the frame of society has been preserved from dissolution among these people, if they are indeed so greatly and so generally depraved. To that question, an answer will be given in the course of the following chapter.

"Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

enabled to judge whether the wretched state of society and manners among the Hindoos, who, as has been already observed, have a general identity of character, may not fairly be traced to that source.

The climate of India, particularly of the south-east provinces, must be allowed to be less favourable to the human constitution than the more temperate regions of Europe. The bodily frame is less strong and hardy, the faculties have less energy, their exercise is less expanded and delightful, ardor is checked, the oppressed spirits yield more easily to indolence and indulgence, and the fertility of the soil easily supplying the few natural wants of the natives, aids this propensity. Nevertheless in developing the causes of the Hindoo character, too much seems sometimes to have been imputed to the climate; effects greater, and of more necessary result, than fair examination will confirm.

The inhabitants of foreign descent, who continue the use of animal food, especially the Armenians, a sober people, are more robust than the Hindoos; and to speak of the Hindoos themselves, their military tribe has discovered, under foreign discipline, a considerable share of active vigor. The Banians, and all the trading part of the community, are capable of long sedentary application. Porters, boatmen, runners, and others of the labouring class, can endure severe fatigue. Multitudes of devotees manifest a resolution and perseverance in painful sufferings altogether astonishing. And with regard to the faculties of the mind, the Brahmins, who have cultivated learning, have certainly evinced themselves an acute, subtle, and penetrating order of men. These circumstances show, that the people in general are equal at least to decent application in different lines, susceptible even of a strong impulse, though not perhaps of great continued energy. And it is reasonable to believe, that were those evils corrected which do not arise from the climate, they would in time hold a much higher place among the human species, than they are now capable of maintaining.

The despotic mode of government which generally is prevalent in the East, and appears at all times to have subsisted among the Hindoos, has undoubtedly had a very considerable influence in the formation of their character. When a man finds himself dependent on the will and caprice of another, he thinks and acts as a degraded being; his regard for all that is valuable in life is reduced to the degree of personal interest which he has in it, his care for whatever extends to the rest of his race, and to future time, is sunk in the precariousness of the present hour. Fear necessarily becomes his grand principle of action; thence springs distrust; and as arbitrary power does not excite in those over whom it tyrannizes, the expectation of finding truth and justice its associates, it is not productive of integrity and veracity. The arts of deception, suppleness, and servility, are resorted to, and thus a system of falsehood and narrow selfishness is generated. Violence in the ruler quickens the process. The first idea raised is that of self-defence against him; then follow plans of concealed and avowed hostility against his deputies and agents, from whom injury is apprehended. The despotic principle actuates all the subordinate offices, and posts of authority, and its effects become general; every man is a slave to those above him, and a despot to those below him; the more he is oppressed, the more he oppresses; and thus is diffused a temper of universal enmity, acting secretly or openly according to opportunities. No wonder therefore, that when the principle is highly strained, treasons and revolutions are continual; by which the insolent and abject frequently change places, so that he who yesterday scarcely deigned to look on the suppliant before him, is today spurned from the feet of that suppliant, now in his turn exalted to the seat of authority. Such, in particular, is the description that may be given of a large period of the Mahomedan government in Hindostan. The descendants of Timour, holding for a time the greater part of that continent under one head, prevented much of the war and bloodshed that had before, and have since wasted it; but internal disorders, under the best of their governors, were necessarily very great; and the character of the Hindoos, suffering from the oppression of numerous invaders, must in several respects have been debased.

But they did not receive the despotic form of government from the Tartars, nor were they degraded only when they became subject to Mahomedan conquerors. Had they not been an abject people before, foreigners from a vast distance, carrying few magazines with them, could not have possessed themselves of so great a country, rendered by its natural defences, its climate, and its periodical rains, very strong against invasions by land. They have had among themselves a complete despotism from the remotest antiquity; a despotism, the most remarkable for its power and duration that the world has ever seen. It has pervaded their government, their religion, and their laws. It has formed by its various ramifications, the essentials of the character which they have always had, as far as the light of history goes, and which they still possess; that character, which has made them a prey to every invader, indifferent to all their rulers, and easy in the change of them; as a people, void of public spirit, honour, attachment; and in society, base, dishonest, and faithless. That despotism, with a variety of subordinate principles to which it has given birth, still exists in great vigour, even where the political government is in foreign hands, and therefore although by acting the part of upright rulers towards our Hindoo subjects, and endeavouring to provide for a fair administration of justice among them, we shall repress many disorders that before prevailed, yet this reform will not reach those evils in their character and conduct, already described, which are the bane of their happiness, personal and social. Nor will it ensure to us their attachment, which, in point of policy, it would be desirable to engage by an amelioration of their character, instead of leaving their old facility in changing, to co-operate with their imbecility, in favour of any new invader.

the

The ancient Hindoo government is thought scarcely to exist now in its original form*. The Hindoo states, raised from the ruins of the Mogul Empire, cannot well be taken as pure representations of it; at least we have but little certainty of possessing an entire model, and can therefore only refer to its fundamental principles, of which there is indisputable evidence. But their religion and their laws, both parts of one complex system, still remain; the former in all its authority, the latter also, in its essence and in many of its branches, operative: and these, by the principles on which they are founded, and by the rules and precepts which they deliver, have given birth to that spirit, and those practices of oppression, injustice, corruption, in a word, those immoralities which incomparably more than every other cause, render the people base and miserable. To this position, the most particular attention is requested. A full exhibition of all the proofs which might be brought in support of it, would require a much longer space than is necessarily prescribed to this treatise. Some leading facts and arguments however, sufficient it is hoped solidly to establish it, shall now be stated. They will be derived partly from the code of Hindoo laws, and partly from the tenets of the Hindoo religion. The code of laws was compiled and published in 1773, under the government of Mr. Hastings, and at his desire, by a body of "experienced lawyers, selected for the purpose from "every part of Bengal," who we are further told, "carefully picked out the "ordinances, sentence by sentence, from various originals in the Shanscrit language, "neither adding to, nor diminishing from, any part of the ancient text†." And the translator adds, what is of importance to be observed, "that from this code may "be formed a precise idea of the customs and manners of these people; that their "institutes are interwoven with the religion of the country, and therefore revered as "of the highest authority." The authenticity of this work, and the value of the general evidence which it furnishes, must thence be unquestionable.

With regard to the religion of the Hindoos, although a regular translation of the Vedes, those writings which they repute as sacred, has not yet given us all their mythology, doctrines, rites, and ceremonies, in authoritative detail; yet the intercourse of three centuries between the Europeans and that people, the relations of various travellers in different parts of India, and their agreement as to the general matter and character, as well as many particulars of the Gentoo faith, the elucidating accounts of the Mahomedans, and the daily experience of multitudes of Europeans, leave us at no loss concerning the grand features, the main credenda and agenda of that superstition, its genius, and its consequences. Of late the public has had other accessions of information, stamped with great authority. We refer, in the first place, to the Institutes of the Emperor Akber, compiled by his learned and intelligent minister

* The government of Nepaul, of which less was known when this passage was written, is probably no inexact representation of the original Hindoo constitution. Of that country, which, as has been already observed, was never subdued by the Musselmans, our information was scanty before the late deputation thither of Captain Kirkpatrick from Bengal. That gentleman has given a curious and interesting account of his journey, which affords much light into the history of Nepaul. It would thence appear, that the form of the government, the state officers, civil and military, employed under it, and the sources of its revenue, are nearly the same in kind as are found to have been established in Hindostan under the rule of the Moguls; a strong presumption in favour of what we have ventured elsewhere to suppose, that these conquerors did not innovate greatly in the forms of administration in the Hindoo countries of which they possessed themselves. 1797.

† Preface to the Hindoo Code.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

minister Abul Fazil, about A. D. 1550, in the zenith of the Mogul power*; one volume of which work is employed solely upon the religion and sciences of the Hindoos, and professedly formed from the communications of the most learned Brahmins. We may rest assured, that such a man, employed in a work intended for a public record of the highest order, would obtain from that source much authentic information, and that the view given him of the Hindoo doctrines would be at least sufficiently favourable. Favourable indeed, both in respect of those doctrines and the character of the people, that view will appear to have been, by comparing it with other authorities; and there are obvious reasons why the noble writer would naturally be disposed to acquiesce in it. It was the design of Akber, who was of a tolerant spirit, to conciliate all his subjects towards himself and towards each other; and in a work composed immediately under his inspection with this intention, and for public use, it could never be admissible to delineate at length the faults of the great body of those subjects.

The second recent acquisition, is the Bhagvad-Geeta, translated by Mr. Wilkins from a Shanscrit work, certainly of considerable antiquity. This is a very curious record. It is deemed to be so purified from the grosser parts of the Hindoo superstition, that it is carefully concealed by the Brahmins from the rest of the people; yet it has evidently been corrupted, in order to conciliate some tolerably just principles with a degenerate practice. Besides these publications, Sir William Jones†, a man wonderful for his stores of knowledge, and for the ardour with which he still presses forward to increase them, who penetrates into the abstruse recesses of oriental learning with singular felicity and success, has communicated much valuable information from his late researches. Arrived at length at the fountains of Shanscrit learning, he indeed appears to consider past discoveries as inaccurate or imperfect‡; referring probably to the speculative and metaphysical doctrines contained in the Vedes, concerning which the Brahmins themselves have divers opinions and systems. But of the obvious and popular tenets of the Hindoo religion, its worship, and ceremonies, enough is certainly known to enable us to judge of their nature and their effects.

In the following pages, the writer will rest the argument he maintains, on information already before the public, rather than on any new matter which his own observation, during his residence in India, might enable him to furnish. For though the shoots from the great trunk of Hindoo superstition are so numerous, and all partake of the same nature, yet the additional facts which a single individual, whose attention was not wholly devoted to the subject, could have an opportunity of ascertaining, must appear trifling, in comparison of the whole mass of knowledge collected by the industry of numbers, during a long course of time, and rendered more worthy of notice by ascending nearer the source of things. And where important deductions are to be made, as in the present case, he is far from wishing the premises from which they are drawn to rest upon his authority.

It is proposed then, to proceed to the consideration of the Hindoo laws. But since it has appeared that both the Mahomedan and English conquerors of India have by legislative provisions of their own, in part superseded those which they found there, persons who reason from the changes which have relatively taken place in the social state and in the laws, of every European nation, and from the mutual influence of laws and of manners upon each other, may naturally conceive, that rules which have been abrogated

* Translated from the Persian into English, by Francis Gladwin, Esq.

† Europe, and Asia, and the world, have since sustained an irreparable loss in the death of this most valuable man, who was cut off in the vigour of his days, and in the midst of new inquiries and discoveries, among the recondite repositories of Hindoo learning, into which he carried such a lamp of general knowledge, as threw surprizing light on every subject he investigated. What he has done, however, will immortalize his memory. He has opened the way into the mythological and scientific arcana of a people, who have for many ages been as remarkable for their adherence to their peculiar institutions, as for arrogating to themselves an unfathomable antiquity, and the possession of a pure and primeval, though carefully concealed system of theology and science; claims which have been as officiously as ignorantly accorded to them by some anti-christian philosophers of Europe. He has shown that one of their earliest traces of true history describes an universal deluge, in which only a patriarch, and seven other men, (to whom this account gives wives,) were saved in an ark; and that the whole of their chronology is reconcileable with the Mosaic history.—See Asiatic Researches, Vol. II. Art. "Chronology of the Hindoos."——It is impossible on this occasion to avoid expressing a very high degree of respect and esteem for the learned and instructive labours of various other members of that distinguished society. Though the character of the Hindoos be in a moral view now low, yet the development of their history, their literature, their mythology, and science, has been a great desideratum in human knowledge, and must prove of eminent importance to mankind. 1797.

‡ Asiatic Researches, Vol II.

abrogated can no longer affect the character of the people; therefore that before any application is made of evidence deduced from the Hindoo laws, it ought to be shown what portion of those laws is still operative, and from that portion only to estimate the effect produced. It is the wish of the writer, to allow to this objection all the weight to which it is entitled, and as far as he can, to afford the satisfaction which it requires.

To give an exact enumeration of the Hindoo laws, and to distinguish those which may now be regarded as obsolete, would, if the task could be performed, require a detail inconsistent with the design of this essay. But no such digest has yet been made. The general lines of discrimination however are tolerably clear. The Mahomedans, as we have seen, introduced their own forms of judicature. In criminal matters, their code, severe and barbarous, like that of the Hindoos, was made the general rule of judgment. In civil concerns between Hindoos, these people had the benefit of their own laws. The English continued, as we have also seen, the legal establishments of their predecessors, improving them, and softening in some instances the cruelty of punishment. At present therefore, the criminal law administered in Bengal, is that of the Mahomedans rendered in certain cases more mild and equitable. The civil code stands likewise upon the basis of their system, but has a larger infusion of English ordinances, and it refers causes between Hindoos to be decided by the laws of that people.

Those laws prescribe certain rules to the sovereign, which cannot of course be acted upon in our government, though the general influence of a governing power will still be felt: and on subjects of political economy, such as cultivation of the soil, revenue, and commerce, respecting which the Hindoo code is very defective, we have been obliged to enact new regulations.

On the whole, besides the Hindoo institutions, purely religious, all those which relate to castes, to marriage, to inheritance, and to divers other civil concerns, remain still in force; excepting only that certain offences against caste, for which the code decrees capital or sanguinary punishments, dreadfully severe, are not cognizable in our criminal courts; nor does our government countenance the infliction of those barbarities; and transgressions of the innumerable rules of caste being tried among themselves, are commonly punished by fines or excommunications. Still however, the branches now particularized, of their system, are those which have the greatest influence in the formation of their character and manners; and it should be remembered, that the ways in which caste may be contaminated or lost, have been, in course of time, arbitrarily and exceedingly multiplied.

But in estimating the effect produced upon the Hindoos of our territories, even by that portion of their institutions which is in a proper sense legal, some other considerations must be taken into the account.

The Hindoo law stands upon the same authority as the Hindoo religion; both are parts of one system, which they believe to have been divinely revealed. That law is regarded by them therefore with a superstitious veneration, which institutions avowedly of human origin do not produce; so that even under a foreign yoke, which in various particulars superseded its injunctions, it still maintained its credit. Hence may be deduced, in part, the predilection of that people, especially of the leading orders, for their ancient state and peculiar customs, which in all the long period of Mahomedan rule, prevented them from being assimilated to the institutions of their conquerors.

Laws, which by tacit consent have fallen into general disuse, can no longer be quoted as characteristic of the actual state of manners. They serve rather to prove some change in the sentiments or dispositions of a people; but the abrogation or suspension, by the power of a foreign master, of certain parts of a code still approved, does not necessarily infer any such alteration. The Hindoos have generally in their intercourses with each other, acted in the spirit of their own institutions. The landholders, for instance, many of them possessing extensive districts, have been to their obsequious dependents, as petty sovereigns; causes originating in their vicinity have been very commonly referred to their decision, or even in parts more distant, to their deputies. Disputes are also frequently referred to the Brahmins. Matters of caste are solely cognizable by them, or by arbitrators of the tribe in which the contest breaks out, and form a source of endless litigation. If even encreasing security and ease conciliate them more to our government, which is probable, they will still perhaps ascribe the change, not to the superiority of our system over their own, but to the superior personal conduct of the English, who preside over them. Their Mahomedan rulers, especially since the accession of the line of Timour, have partly from political, and partly from venal motives, paid considerable regard to their prejudices; and the English, both in the execution of the laws, and in the general exercise of their authority, have uniformly and spontaneously displayed a spirit of extreme toleration and indulgence to all their peculiar notions and usages.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

It is to be remembered also, that our subjects form only a small part of the vast race of people who profess the Hindoo faith, and that with whole nations of these, they live in immediate contact.

Nor lastly, must it be overlooked, that the account which has been given of the Hindoos, is a description of their character as it exists after a long suspension by their former rulers (a suspension continued by us) of some of the worst parts of their legal system.

If all these things then be considered, together with the influence of the congenial institutions, which are still authoritatively in force, perhaps we shall not see reason to suppose, that the innovations which we have made in the administration of law among the Hindoos, have produced, or are likely to produce, any material change in their character; but we may rather expect that this character will still bear the lively impress of the general spirit of their institutions, civil and sacred. To illustrate that spirit, is one object particularly proposed by the survey upon which we are now to enter of the Hindoo code.

Despotism is not only the principle of the government of Hindostan, but an original, fundamental, and irreversible principle in the very frame of society. The law, not contenting itself with enjoining passive obedience to the magistrate, or sovereign, and with having a due regard to the inequalities in condition, and subordinations in rank, which arise from the constitution of the world, and are plainly agreeable to the will of the great Creator, rests entirely on the following fundamental position:—that certain classes or races of the society are in their elementary principles, in the matter from which they were formed, absolutely of a higher nature, of a superior order in the scale of being, to certain other classes. It is, in the opinion of the Hindoos, an awful and momentous truth, a truth maintained in full vigour to this day, a truth placed in the front of their code, that the Brahmins were formed from the mouth of Brimha, the Kheterees from his arm, the Vyse (or Bice) from his thigh, and the Sooders from his foot. Hence it is a necessary consequence, that this primeval and essential distinction is no more mutable or defeasible, than it is possible for one of the brute creation to advance itself to the rank of man *. And such is the division of the Hindoos into four great tribes or castes—the priests, the soldiers, the husbandmen or traders, and the servile class, whose sole assigned duty is to serve the other three †.

Now the evils that flow from such an arrangement, are infinite. Other modes of depotism lead in their very excess and abuse to a remedy, but here the chain of servitude is indissoluble and eternal. Though the highest orders be guilty of the most flagitious wickedness, pervert the use of power, become weak, arrogant and oppressive, the frame of society can suffer no change; that order must still continue in the enjoyment and exercise of all its vast privileges and prerogatives.

The lowest rank, on the contrary, is doomed to perpetual abasement and unlimited subjection. It has no relief against the most oppressive and insulting tyranny, no hope of ever escaping from its sufferings. Though permitted indeed to

* "The Brahmins, indisputably persuaded that "the superiority of their tribe is interwoven with "the very essence of their nature, esteem that "to be a full and satisfactory plea for every advantage settled on them above the rest of the "people." Preface to the Code, page 52.

† It is worthy of remark, that according to a tradition in Nepaul, reported by Captain Kirkpatrick in the ingenious work before-mentioned, Pusso-Pusp-Deo, a Rajah of that country, is said to have first divided the general mass of his people into the four grand and well known tribes of the present day. The chronological series of Nepaul princes, which Captain Kirkpatrick has been able to exhibit, and which, as he well observes, assigns to many of the reigns an extravagant duration, (making on the whole an average of more than forty years,) would give to Pusso-Pusp-Deo an antiquity of about three thousand years. Be that as it may, it is evident, that a tradition subsisting in Nepaul makes the first institution of castes an human appointment. A small secluded valley like Nepaul, environed on all sides with hills, is very likely to have been an early, if not an original seat of such an institution; and there are at least strong reasons for believing, that the Brahminical religion had not its first rise in the southern parts of Hindostan, if at all in that region.

CHAP. III.
Causes of the present Situation and Character of the Hindoos.

to employ its industry, the greatest success can never in the slightest degree rescue it from inherent dishonour; and if the genius of a Newton should arise in that class, it could have no room to expand, nor if it had, could all its excellence deliver its possessor from the obligation of administering to the most ignorant and vicious of the Brahmins.

One of the heaviest grievances attending this state of degradation, is, that it discourages all liberal exertions, and consigns those who are destined to it, to ignorance, mean opinions of themselves, and consequent meanness of manners, sentiment, and conduct. Lest however, through the medium of learning, they should have a chance of emerging from this low and confined state, the Brahmins (by an ordinance of the Vedes, which through their imposture have the credit of proceeding from a divine origin, and of containing all valuable science) have forbidden them, on pain of death, to read the sacred books.

Now as this fourth tribe would naturally comprehend, at the very first, more than a fourth part of the people, and as the offspring of every subsequent, irregular commixture of the four original tribes, and all the descendents of that mixed race, fall by the law still lower than the fourth class, we may conclude that a large portion of the people is thus held down to earth. The evils inherent in this sort of distinction, (widely different it will easily be seen from mere gradation in society, because here essential superiority is entailed upon some classes, and essential inferiority upon others, for all generations,) extend in their degree to each of the intermediate classes, and the lowest feels the accumulated weight of general superiority. Those nearer the summit, become a cement to this system, which by allotting to them certain prerogatives, disposes them the more easily to acquiesce in it, and to support it.

Nothing is more plain, than that this whole fabric is the work of a crafty and imperious priesthood, who feigned a divine revelation and appointment, to invest their own order, in perpetuity, with the most absolute empire over the civil state of the Hindoos, as well as over their minds. It is true, that they assigned the reins of political government to another order, the Kheterees; but they still maintained in full exercise the indefeasible superiority of their own rank, they prescribed the rules of administration, they were the privileged advisers of the Magistrate, (as the sovereign, or ruler, is termed in the code,) they rendered themselves necessary to the man invested with that dignity, in his personal, as well as official capacity; and in the preliminary discourse to the code, we are told of a king, whom on his obstinate disregard of some ordinances of the Vedes, and of the counsel given by the Brahmins, they put to death. That "this resignation of the secular and executive power into the "hands of another caste, is a striking instance of the moderation of the Brahminical "order," cannot then be conceded to the translator of the code, for they secured to themselves all the power of the empire, but transferred the danger and trouble attendant on it to their inferiors; they retained all the advantages of secular pre-eminence, and divested themselves of all responsibility*.

To

* As some persons* appear disposed to think the institution of castes, and their separation by impassable barriers, the effect of profound political wisdom, it may be well for them to consider, whether it be possible to reconcile with the idea of true wisdom, that which derives both its origin and support from fraud and imposture; whether fraud and imposture can finally produce the fruits of truth and justice; and how far the supposed object of such policy, namely the good of society, is in fact fairly and solidly obtained by it. The subjection of one part to another is indeed secured; but is it good for the part so subjected, (infinitely the larger part of the whole,) and its numerous posterity, through all the successions of time, to be placed in bondage to the other? It seems difficult to maintain such an assertion by arguments, which will not also recommend, both in a personal and social view, the ancient system of slavery. That such a mechanical construction of society is not favourable to the external interests of a body politic, may be easily discerned: for what public principle can exist in a state, where the greatest part of the people are totally and for ever excluded, under the highest penalties, from taking any concern in public affairs. Some who have considered this subject philosophically, seem to rest the defence of such an arbitrary arrangement, upon a sentiment supposed to pervade the different classes, of the inviolability of each others rights†. Had a sentiment of that nature influenced them, the rights remained very unequal; but the truth is, that the same consequences follow which must ever be expected from unlimited power,—pride and tyranny on one side, abject servility and suffering on the other. And were it certain, as the translator of the code has intimated, "that long usage has persuaded the peo-"ple of the equity of their distinctions‡," this would be an additional proof of their minds and judgments being debased. Nothing is better known, than that the Brahminical tribe are pre-eminent in those

* See Dr. Robertsen's Ancient India. † Ditto - - - - - - - - page 264.
‡ Preface to the Code, page 11.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

To show how the singular species of despotism here described, pervades the legal system of the Hindoos, and to exhibit specimens of different laws, various passages from the code shall now be produced. Since it has, we trust, appeared, that the still remaining influence of that system is not to be ascribed solely to those parts of it which are sanctioned by British authority, we shall be justified in extending our view, and our selection, beyond them. And it will be recollected, on the other hand, that those parts include the laws which relate to the grand concerns of inheritance, marriage, and caste, besides others of inferior import; the severity only of some of the Hindoo punishments being discountenanced by our administration of criminal law. To one or other of those branches, the greater part of the ordinances now to be quoted, will be found to appertain; and for the introduction of others which do not belong to them, particular reasons, in addition to the general one already urged, will appear.

The specimens of laws to be adduced here, shall be arranged under the following heads:

First, Of those which determine some of the prerogatives, or duties, of the Chief Magistrate or Ruler.

Second, Of those which establish distinctions in favour of the superior castes.

Third, Of those which, without reference to castes, give a direct sanction to immoralities.

Fourth, Of those which, without reference to castes, go upon principles of oppression and injustice.

Fifth, Of those which, without reference to castes, discover a spirit of cruelty.

FIRST then, Specimens of Laws which establish some of the Prerogatives and Duties of the Chief Magistrate or Ruler.

Although no Hindoo can now exercise this office in our Eastern territories, these passages, few in number, are produced to show the arbitrary power with which the law invests the sovereign, and the abject submission which it imposes on his subjects. It may be remarked, that our tributary zemindars in the Carnatic, and even the great landholders in Bengal, have still retained some resemblance of this lordly authority over their people.

SOME of his PREROGATIVES.

Code, page 110. "He is not to be considered as a mere man, but as a Dewtah" (a subordinate deity, of whom they actually worship numbers.)

269. "If

those atrocities which disturb the peace of society: and this is but one branch of the mischiefs generated by such a system.

The subdivisions of the four original castes, arising from difference of professions, and a variety of separating distinctions, are now so many, the ways of contamination, (and therefore of purification,) so multiplied; stains or expulsions, on the one side, so terrible, and to those, on the other, who thereby succeed to property, so advantageous, that the subject of caste is a prodigious source of wrangling, animosity, litigation, loss of time, of property, and of peace, among the people, and of influence and emolument to the Brahmins, who are the arbiters in all these matters.

When these consequences are considered, together with that which must inevitably have been expected from the beginning, namely, the irregular commerce of the tribes, the political sagacity of the legislators of the Hindoos seems not entitled to great praise, since to every public benefit which they could propose from their system, the preservation of its simplicity appears to have been essential. And although a celebrated name* regards the institution of castes as a mark of considerably advanced society, there seems more probability in referring it to one of the earlier stages, in which there would indeed be priests, soldiers, and husbandmen, labouring and domestic servants, but the community would be small; and in such a community, an ordinance, apparently simple, fixing the several members and their families in the professions which they already exercised, might more easily be adopted and enforced. Had an ordinance of that nature been promulgated after the society was become numerous, and intermarriages, (not before prohibited), between persons of different professions, and between their descendants, had taken place; and when occupations had been multiplied, and various gradations already established, the difficulty of carrying it permanently into execution, would apparently have been insuperable.

* See Dr. Robertson's Ancient India.

269. " If in any place where the Magistrate is playing at tables, or any such " game, in that case if any person, without permission of the Magistrate, interposes " with his hand, or by speaking, the Magistrate shall put him to death."

270. " If a man complains causelessly against the Magistrate's counsellor, the " Magistrate shall put him to death."

" If a man performs any business or service for the Magistrate's accuser, " the Magistrate shall put him to death."

" Men who vilify the Magistrate, men of innate bad principles, or men who " without reason, cause any internal uneasiness to others, (of all which the Magistrate " himself must be the judge,) the Magistrate shall banish all such the kingdom."

188. " If a man speak reproachfully of any upright Magistrate, the Magistrate " shall cut out his tongue; or having confiscated all his effects, shall banish him the " kingdom."

189. " If a Magistrate, for his own good, has passed any resolutions, whoever " refuses to submit to such resolutions, the Magistrate shall cut out the person's " tongue*."

207. " If a man beat or ill use a Magistrate who commits a crime, whatever it be, " the crime of murdering a hundred Brahmins shall be imputed to him; he shall have " an iron spit run through him, and be roasted with fire."

Note.—This contains an exception in favour of Brahmins, for which see the next head.

SOME of his DUTIES.

Code, page 91. " A Magistrate must have near him a learned Brahmin."

92. " The Magistrate is required to maintain not less than ten Brahmins of " learning and worth, to give them money, and every token of respect and consi- " deration in the judgment seat."

113. " In all cases, he shall spare and excuse the Brahmins."

116. " He shall give much effects and money to the Brahmins of a conquered " country."

" And erect a stately building for them."

118. " He shall keep magicians who can cure by spells.".

" He shall keep a great number of buffoons, or parasites, jesters, and " dancers."

119. " If he resume a religious endowment, he shall remain in hell a thousand " years."

SECOND, Specimens of Laws, which establish Distinctions in favour of the Brahmins and the other Superior Castes.

First, concerning AUTHORITY.

Code, page 117. " The other three orders shall be obedient to the Brahmins†."

282. " Whatever

* In the Institutes of Menu, a work of great antiquity and curiosity, translated by Sir William Jones, since this tract was written, is the following description of the formation and dignity of the king:

" Since a king was composed of particles drawn " from those chief guardian deities, he conse- " quently surpasses all mortals in glory."

" Like the sun, he burns eyes and hearts; nor " can any human creature on earth even gaze on " him."

" He is fire and air; he, both sun and moon; " he, the god of criminal justice; he, the genius " of wealth; he, the regent of waters; he, the lord " of the firmament. A king, even though a child, " must not be treated lightly, from an idea that he " is a mere mortal; no, he is a powerful divinity, " who appears in human shape.—Institutes of Menu, page 159.

† The following passages in the Institutes of Menu are remarkable:

" Let not a king, though in the greatest distress " for money, provoke Brahmins to anger by taking " their property; for they, once enraged, could " immediately, by sacrifices and imprecations, de- " stroy him and his troops, elephants, horses, and " cars."

" Who, without perishing, could provoke those " holy men, by whom, that is, by whose ances- " tors, under Brahmá, the all-devouring fire was " created, the sea with waters not drinkable, and " the moon with its wane and increase?"

" What prince could gain wealth by oppressing " those, who if angry could frame other worlds " and regents of worlds, could give being to new " gods and mortals?"

" What man, desirous of life, would injure " those, by the aid of whom, that is, by whose " oblations,

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

282. "Whatever ordinances Pundits, (who are Brahmins,) deliver to the Ryots, "(the body of the people,) from the Shaster, the great body of their ordinances, "civil and religious,) the Ryots (who cannot and dare not read the Shaster,) are bound "to obey."

"A Pundit, not delivering the sentiments of the Shaster, to be fined two "hundred and fifty puns of cowries," (about four or five rupees, or ten shillings.)

261. "If a Sooder reads the Bedes to either of the other three castes, or listens "to them, heated oil, wax, and melted tin, shall be poured into his ears, and the orifice "stopped up."

"If a Sooder gets by heart the Bedes, he shall be put to death."

"If he always performs the jugg, (one of their modes of worship, in "which the Brahmin officiates,) he shall suffer death, or be fined two hundred ash-"rupees," (about £. 300.)

Second, Concerning RESPECT.

Code, page 261. "If a man of inferior caste, proudly affecting equality "with a superior, shall travel by his side on the road, he shall be fined equal to "his abilities."

"If a Sooder sits on the carpet of a Brahmin, the Magistrate, having thrust "a hot iron into his buttock, and branded him, shall banish him the kingdom, or "else shall cut off his buttock."

Note.—The shadow of a Chandal, one of those degraded below the fourth caste, passing over victuals, milk, or even water, defiles it. Ten thousand other ways of being polluted by the lower ranks, mark their vileness*.

275. "Brahmins waiting upon great men, shall have free entrance."

"Being passengers in a boat, shall pay no fare, and have precedence."

"And shall pay for goods in a boat, no freight."

Third, Concerning CRIMES,—as ASSAULTS, &c.

Code, page 206. 283. "No crime whatever, nor any number of crimes, "shall forfeit the life of a Brahmin: he shall not be put to death on any account "whatever."

"No crime in the world is so great as that of murdering a Brahmin; the "Magistrates shall never desire his life, nor cut off his limbs."

284. "A Brahmin murdering a Brahmin, or committing incest, shall be punished "only with ignominious branding."

206. "If a man deprive another of life, the Magistrate shall deprive that "person of life, except he be a Brahmin; he shall be fined a hundred gold mohurs," (about £. 150.)

207. "For

"oblations, worlds, and gods perpetually sub-"sist; those who are rich in the learning of the "Veda?"

"A Brahmin, whether learned or ignorant, is "a powerful divinity, even as fire is a powerful "divinity, whether consecrated or popular."

"Thus, although Brahmins employ themselves "in all sorts of mean occupations, they must in-"variably be honoured, for they are something "transcendently divine."

"Of a military man who raises his arm vio-"lently on all occasions against the priestly class, "the priest himself shall be the chastiser, since "the soldier originally proceeded from the "Brahmin."

"A priest who well knows the law, needs not "complain to the king of any grievous injury; "since even by his own power, he may chastise "those who injure him."

"His own power, which depends on himself "alone, is mightier than the royal power, which "depends on other men; by his own might there-"fore, may a Brahmin coerce his foes."

"He may use, without hesitation, the power-"ful charms revealed to Atharvan, and by him to "Angiras; for speech is the weapon of a Brahmin, "with "with that he may destroy his oppressors."—Institutes, pages 285. 286. 311.

* "The abode of a Chandal and a Swapaca "must be out of the town; they must not have "the use of entire vessels; their sole wealth must "be dogs and asses. Their clothes must be the "mantles of the deceased; their dishes for food, "broken pots; their ornaments, rusty iron; con-"tinually must they roam from place to place."

"Let no man who regards his duty, religious "and civil, hold any intercourse with them; let "their transactions be confined to themselves, and "their marriages only between equals."

"Let food be given to them in potsherds, but "not by the hands of the giver; and let them not "walk by night in cities or towns."

"By day they may walk about for the purpose "of work, distinguished by the king's badges; "and they shall carry out the corpse of every one "who dies without kindred: such is the fixed "rule."

"They shall always kill those who are to be "slain by the sentence of the law, and by the royal "warrant; and let them take the clothes of the "slain, their beds, and their ornaments."

Institutes of Menu, page 295.

207. " For beating or ill-using a Magistrate, who commits a crime, (which the " first head rates as the crime of murdering a hundred Brahmins,) a Brahmin shall " only be fined a hundred ashruffees," (about £. 150.)

209. " If a man sets fire to another person's house, with intent to destroy him; " or causes him to take poison; or is desirous to murder him with a sword; or " carries away that person's wife from his house, and keeps her himself; or plunders " all that person's effects, or his tillage; in that case, if the latter deprives the former " of life, he shall not be amenable. But he shall not kill either a cow or a Bramin," (consequently a Brahmin may do all this for a fine*.)

206. " With whatever limb a man strikes a Brahmin, that limb shall be cut off."

" If a Sooder strikes either of the other three classes, it shall be so done to " him."

208. " If a Sooder spit on a Brahmin, his lips, &c. shall be cut off."

" If a Sooder plucks a Brahmin by the hair, &c. both his hands shall be " cut off."

" If a Sooder gives much and frequent molestation to a Brahmin, he shall " be put to death."

CRIMES continued—ADULTERY.

Code, page 242. " A Sooder, Bice, or Kheteree, guilty with a woman of the " Brahmin caste, who has a master, (that is a husband or keeper,) shall suffer death " by mutilation and burning."

" A Sooder, guilty with a Chandal woman, (one of a degraded tribe,) shall " suffer death."

" A Bice or Kheteree, guilty with a woman of inferior caste, to be fined " five hundred or one thousand puns of cowries," (from eight to sixteen rupees, sixteen to thirty-two shillings.)

" A Brahmin, guilty with a woman of any of the castes, who has a master, " to be fined five hundred, or one thousand puns of cowries (eight to sixteen rupees.) " He is not in any case of adultery, to be deprived of life."

243. " A woman, guilty with one of the inferior caste, to be eaten by dogs, or " burnt with faggots."

" A woman of equal or inferior caste, guilty, shall not be liable to punish- " ment, only she shall perform the ceremony of expiation."

244. " If a man commits adultery with an unmarried girl of inferior caste, " by her consent, he shall not be deemed guilty. If it was done by violence, the " Magistrate shall take a small fine from him."

248. " For crimes beyond this class, and beyond the line of the human species, " the superior castes are taxed in a fine of five hundred puns of cowries (about eight " rupees) the Sooder only, doomed to death."

CRIMES continued,—STEALING.

Code, page 220. " If a man steals any man of superior caste, he shall be burnt " with fire, by having a particular species of grass bound round his body. If he " steal a woman, he shall have that grass bound round his body, be stretched out on " a hot plate of iron, and burnt in the fire."

" If a man steals a man or woman of middling caste, the Magistrate shall " cut off both his hands and feet, and cast him out upon a highway where four roads " meet."

" If any person steals a man of inferior caste, he shall be fined one thousand " puns of cowries," (about sixteen rupees or thirty-two shillings.)

" If he steals a woman of inferior caste, all his property shall be con- " fiscated."

" If a man, in time of war, steals a horse, or an elephant, the Magistrate " shall deprive him of life."

" If he steals either of these animals in time of peace, the Magistrate shall " cut off from him one hand and one foot." (Compare this article with the preceding one concerning stealing a Sooder.)

" If

* The Institutes of Menu however, appear to permit to a man who cannot otherwise escape, the slaying of a Brahmin, who assails him with an intent to murder. Page 234.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

" If a man steals an elephant or a horse, excellent in all respects, the " Magistrate shall cut off his hand, and foot, and buttock, and deprive him of life."

221. " If a man steals a small animal, the Magistrate shall cut off half his foot."

224. " If a man steals flowers for dying, &c. the Magistrate shall cause the " article to be returned, and take a coin of gold as a fine."

225. " If a man steals flowers, or fruit, or wood, or grass, belonging to a Brahmin, " the Magistrate shall cut off his hand."

226. " If a Brahmin who every day performs the jugg, commits a robbery " that deserves death, the Magistrate shall cut off the hair of his head."

Concerning the SCALE of PUNISHMENT, for scandalous or bitter Expressions, which species of offence will be further explained under a subsequent article, (Page 101.)

Puns Cowries

Code, page 182. " A man of equal caste and equal abilities with the " accused, shall be fined, - - - - - - - - - - 1,000
(about sixteen rupees, less than £. 2.)
" A man of inferior caste and inferior abilities, - - - - 2,000
" A man of superior caste and superior abilities, - - - 500
" An equal in caste and abilities, accusing another of one of the " crimes in anoo patuk, (the third class of this offence) - - - - 100
" An inferior in caste and abilities, ditto, - - - - - 200
" A superior in caste and abilities, ditto, - - - - - 50
(about one rupee.)

183. " A Sooder, accusing one of a superior caste of any of the crimes of the " three first classes, (which will be hereafter described,) shall have his tongue cut " out, and a hot iron of ten fingers breadth thrust into his mouth." This article may be compared with the one immediately preceding. The Sooder forfeits his tongue, and in effect his life, for committing against a superior that offence, which, if a superior commit it against him, costs only half a crown; a fine so trifling, whilst the penalty of retorting on the other side is so dreadful, as rather to encourage than prevent this species of wrong in the upper ranks.

Concerning CIVIL AFFAIRS.

As to interest of money, the proportion of rates payable by the different classes, shall be introduced for the sake of illustrating the spirit of the code.

Code, page 2. " Where a Brahmin pays per month 1 per cent.
" A Kheteree shall pay - - - - - 1½
" A Bice (or Vyse) - - - - - - 2
" A Sooder - - - - - - - - - 5
" And so in proportion whatever the rate is *."

PAYMENT of DEBTS.

Code, page 21. " If a very rich man, of weak understanding and of a very " mean tribe, from a principle of fraud and obstinacy refuses to pay his debts, the " Magistrate shall oblige him to discharge the money claimed, and fine him double " the sum."

22. " If a very rich man, of an excellent education and of a superior caste, from " a principle of fraud and obstinacy refuses to pay his debts, and the creditor com- " mences a suit against him, the Magistrate shall cause the money in dispute to be " paid, and shall fine the debtor one-twentieth of the sum recovered."

As to TAXES on BUYING and SELLING.

Code, page 258. " On all sales. Inland purchase and sale 10 per cent.
" Foreign - 5 per cent. on the profit.
" A Brahmin, learned in the Bedes, shall pay no tax on sales."

As

* The English government in Bengal has now ordained twelve per cent. per annum, to be the general legal maximum of interest, without distinction of castes or nations. Wealthy natives however, probably still favour borrowers of the higher castes.

As to FINDING THINGS.

Code, page 256. " A man finding his own, long lost, is to inform the Magistrate, " who is to take from him,

" If he be a needy unlearned person, one-sixth;

" If a man of science, - - - *one-half."

256 " A learned Brahmin finding any thing, the property of a stranger who is " unknown, takes the whole; an unlearned Brahmin takes five-sixths, and gives one- " sixth to the Magistrate."

" A Kheteree is to give the Magistrate one-fourth, and the Brahmins one- " fourth."

" A Vyse is to give the Magistrate one-fourth, and the Brahmins one-half."

" A Sooder finding any thing, divides to the " Magistrate, five-twelfths;

" Brahmins, five-twelfths;

" Himself, - two-twelfths."

" A Magistrate finding any thing, shall give one-half to the Brahmins, and keep " the other half himself."

As to GIFTS, and SUCCESSION to the PROPERTY of BRAHMINS.

Code, page 26. " A woman may give to the Brahmins any part of her husband's " effects to procure his future happiness: if she gives the whole, the gift is approved, " but she is blameable."

" A gift proposed to be given to a Brahmin, if afterwards withheld, shall be en- " forced by the Magistrate with interest."

33. " The property of Brahmins, must always descend to Brahmins."

46. " So must the property of Brahmins' wives."

128. " On failure of heirs to one of the three lower castes, the Magistrate may " appropriate the property to himself."

" But if a Brahmin has no heir, his property shall pass to other Brahmins; " and if there are no Brahmins, the Magistrate shall cause it to be thrown into the " water †."

As to SLAVERY.

Code, page 143. " Slaves are made of the three castes of Kheteree, Vyse, and " Sooder.

" A Brahmin can never be a slave."

" A man of superior caste, if he is upright and steady in the principles of that " caste, can never be the slave of a man of inferior caste."

144. " If a Brahmin has purchased a Sooder, or even if he hath not purchased " him, he may cause him to perform service."

These instances may suffice to illustrate the nature of the distinctions which obtain among the different castes. They extend indeed to all the concerns of life; and the laws regulating them are diffused throughout the code; make up a great part of it, and seem in reality to be its main business.

THIRD, Of those Laws, which without reference to Caste, give a direct Sanction to Immorality.

Concerning EVIDENCE, PROMISES, and FALSE PRETENCES.

Code, page 115. " Wherever a true evidence would deprive a man of his life, in " that case, if a false testimony would be the preservation of his life, it is allowable to

* So it is in the code, and the proportion in this instance seems to contradict the main principle of the law; but the striking point of comparison is, that a Brahmin, finding what belongs to a stranger, keeps the whole, or five-sixths of it; and another person finding his own, is obliged to give up a part of it.

† " Should the king be near his end, through " some incurable disease, he must bestow on the " priest all his riches accumulated from legal " fines." Institutes of Menu, page 286.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

" to give such testimony; and for absolution of the guilt of false witness, he shall per" form the Poojah Sershuttee (worship to Sershuttee, the Goddess of Letters): but
" to him who has murdered a Brahmin, or slain a cow, or who being of the Brahmin
" tribe has drunken wine, or has committed any of these particularly flagrant offences,
" it is not allowed to give false witness in preservation of life."

" If a marriage for any person may be obtained by false witness, such falsehood may " be told; as upon the day of celebrating the marriage, if it is liable to be incomplete
" for want of giving certain articles, at that time, if three or four falsehoods are
" asserted, it does not signify; or if a man promise to give his daughter many or" naments, and is not able to give them, such falsehoods as these, if told to promote " a marriage, are allowable."

" If a man, by the impulse of lust, tells lies to a woman; or if his own life
" would otherwise be lost; or if it is for the benefit of a Brahmin; in such affairs
" falsehood is allowable."

136.—" If a man says to another, I will give you something if you are able to " apprehend a thief or a murderer, or such kind of criminals, then even if the " other should apprehend and bring such a person, nothing shall be bestowed on " that account. If any thing had been given before the business, it may be taken " back."

19. 20.—" A creditor is repeatedly directed, by feigned and by evasive pretences,
" to get hold of some of the debtor's goods."

Introd. to the Code, page 114. " The Magistrate is directed to send to the " party in hostility against him, a man of intelligence, and well skilled in artifice,
" to insinuate himself among the enemy's men, and make them dissatisfied with " each other, that they may quarrel and fight among themselves, and so be " ruined."

It will be remembered, that the two last articles are not supposed to describe merely the practice or the counsel of sinister human policy, but to be, like the rest, the dictates of a divinity.

Mode of Sharing among Robbers.

Code, page 129. " The mode of shares among robbers is this: If any thieves
" by the command of the Magistrate, and with his assistance, have committed de" predations upon, and brought any booty from another province, the Magistrate " shall receive a share of one-sixth of the whole; if they received no command or " assistance from the Magistrate, they shall give the Magistrate, in that case, one-
" tenth for his share; and of the remainder their chief shall receive four shares,
" and whosoever among them is perfect master of his occupation, shall receive " three shares; also whichever of them is remarkably strong or stout, shall receive
" two shares, and the rest shall receive one share. If any of the community of the " thieves happen to be taken, and should be released from the Cutchery Court upon " payment of a sum of money, all the thieves shall make good that sum by equal " shares."

This is in every view, a curious, characteristic article. The translator of the code maintains, that it " by no means respects the domestic disturbers of the tran" quillity of their country, or violators of the first principles of society, but only " such bold and hardy adventurers as sally forth to levy contribution in a foreign " province." It were to be wished the article itself had spoken as definitely; but suppose it to be thus understood. In the first place then, it sets before us, not an open military expedition, but a thieving, robbing, excursion; for the actors are " robbers, thieves, by profession," they are recognized to be of a " community of " thieves," to be amenable for the depredations they have committed, to the civil court, and if taken, liable to punishment.

2d.—The Magistrate directs and assists these robbers and thieves to plunder in another province. It is a clandestine operation, and his concern in it must therefore be clandestine. Booty is the professed object, and he shares it with them.

3d.—As this regulation authorizes the procuring of a release from the court which may have seized any of these offenders, by the payment of a sum of money, it sanctions the concurrence of the Magistrate in such a transaction, which has strongly the complexion of being a private corrupt bargain between the judge of that court and

and the culprit; but whether the ransom be a secret bribe, or a more open commutation for punishment, the principles of justice are violated, the Magistrate becomes a party in a complicated outrage against society, and is in fact countenanced by this ordinance in being indulgent, in his turn, to criminals who may come into his power, for a pecuniary consideration.

4th. But it may be asked, how this "community of thieves," some "perfect "masters of their occupation," are formed and brought to such a state of perfection in their vocation?—Can we conceive it to be solely by the exercise of their parts in alien lands? Born, educated, and dwelling in the Magistrate's district, is it to be supposed that they never practise at home? Yet the Magistrate harbours these banditti, he knows them personally, and he sets them at work.

If the translator's apology be admitted, that this is an ancient law, correspondent to the early manners of other nations, still it is to be remembered, that it stands in a code which claims to be divine, that therefore an equal authority is necessary to its repeal, and that it is offered to us as a law of the Hindoos at this day.

But what are we understand by "another province:" if it means another state, Hindostan consisted anciently, as it does now, of many states. This law was made for the whole Hindoo people; therefore it authorizes and encourages them to rob and plunder each other. It recognizes a community of thieves and robbers in each state, and makes it lawful for them to live by depredations on their neighbours. Such accordingly has been the practice of at least smaller divisions, in all time past. The zemindars, throughout Hindostan, keep robbers and thieves under their protection; and whatever else has changed, the business of pillage, often attended with murder, still continues universally and systematically. Can it be doubted whether this ordinance has not had a most powerful effect in establishing and fortifying a practice so ruinous to the peace and good order of society? Must we not believe that robbers, finding their professions evidently recognized and sanctioned by the law, have thence with a quiet conscience formed themselves into castes and bands, and that it is the persuasion of acting upon the divine authority of the Shaster, which inspires them with contempt of death, and perseverance, from one generation to another? Can we suppose that our prohibition; and our punishment of predatory outrage, will in minds prone to them, destroy that persuasion? But the ordinance under consideration can hardly apply to any other than small divisions of territory: and if we were certain that "province" means the territory of another master, yet no fact is more notorious than that the bands of robbers whom the zemindars of Bengal are known to entertain, employ themselves within that country; for its "domestic tranquillity is disturbed by them" perpetually from one end to the other, as the extract before quoted from Lord Cornwallis has evinced, and a variety of other vouchers might be produced, if necessary, to prove.

We see then a most glaring instance in this ordinance, of immorality in principle, and of the consequent wide diffusion of evil in practice.

To proceed to further examples.

SERVANTS committing Crimes by order of their MASTERS.—Divers Cases of Licentiousness.

Code, page 149. "If a servant, at the command of his master, commits theft or "murder, or any such crimes, in that case, it is not the fault of the servant, the "master only is guilty."

239. "Adultery with common prostitutes and dancing girls, shall not be finable."

247. "Several kinds of adultery allowed, with consent of the Magistrate, for the "trifling fine of ten puns of cowries," (less than a shilling.)

"If a man by violence commits adultery on his own slave girl, a fine of ten puns "of cowries," (about a shilling.)

151. "Prostitutes and dancing women:"—Cases stated, and decrees thereupon, including pimps, &c.

COMMISSION of a BAD ACTION allowed, to save life.

Code, page 271. "If a man in immediate danger of his life, by committing a bad "action can save his life, in that case the Magistrate shall not fine him."

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

Designing to Procure Death.

Code, page 268. "Performing a jugg (religious ceremony), to procure the death of "an innocent person, a fine of two hundred puns of cowries."

268. "Causing an innocent person to drink a potion, in order to procure his "death, a fine of two hundred puns of cowries."

Note.—They have great faith in both these expedients; intentional murder is therefore here rated at about ten shillings.

Concerning Gaming.

Code, page 254. "Games of chance are allowed before the Magistrate, or a "man belonging to him; the winner to give half to the Magistrate." This last clause explains the reason of prohibiting hazard, except before the Magistrate.

138. "A man may become a slave by loss on the chances of dice, or other "games."

Scandalous and Bitter Expressions.

This is a copious article in the code, and becomes such from a correspondent feature in the character of the people. Virulent, foul, criminating abuse, overflows among them in a manner probably unparalleled any where else in the world. No language but their own could describe its shameless nature, and the malicious persevering eagerness with which they lavish it upon each other.

The Hindoo law has therefore found it necessary to arrange the various topics of scandalous abuse under distinct denominations, expressive of the quality, or rank, of the crimes which it imputes.

This classification is curious: it places together offences of very unequal enormity; it distributes into the same division, moral and ceremonial pollutions; and thus tends to lessen the guilt of some heinous iniquities, and to confound all just ideas of morality. For instance, under the second denomination, or class of crimes termed maha-putuk, with the murder of a Brahmin and incestuous adultery, there appears stealing eighty ashruffees, (about £. 120.) from a Brahmin, and a Brahmin drinking wine. Under the third, with "the murder of a friend," and divers kinds of incestuous adultery, is conjoined, "eating the victuals of the washerman's or any base "caste." The fourth class termed opoo-putuk, which the glossary of the code explains to be "small offences," contains a large association of crimes, of which the following make a part.

Code, page 108. "Slaying a cow; adultery with the wife of another; performing the jugg to procure the death of any person; giving a philter to obtain an unwarrantable power; spoiling trees; eating victuals at the hands of an astrologer; a man's not paying his debts; stealing grain and metals, except gold; depriving a woman or a man of either of the three inferior castes, of life."

Petty assaults (see code, 191) are also frequent among these people, and proceed from the temper just described. They employ a large chapter of the code, in which a number of frivolous ridiculous cases, hardly fit to engage the attention of children, the offspring of superstition, pushed to endless punctilios, are stated. The punishment, though lighter in itself, proceeds in the same gradation, as that for scandalous imputations, of which the scale has been already given. But concerning these it may be observed, under this head, that there is surely a direct breach of moral propriety in taking "abilities" into the decision, especially by the superiority of ability to alleviate indecorous behaviour; yet this direction, very frequently occurs; and how is the superiority of ability to be ascertained? In this instance, as in numberless others, every thing is left to the judge.

Fourth, Of Laws which, without reference to Caste, go upon principles of Oppression and Injustice.

Of Inheritance.

Code, page 64. "A person born blind, deaf, or dumb, without a hand, a foot, or "a nose, &c.; whoever is of such general ill-behaviour, that his relations and "partners

" partners refuse to eat or drink with him; whoever is so incurably disordered as " that remedies have no effect upon him; a man afflicted with a consumption, &c; " whoever procures his subsistence by an unwarrantable business or profession; is " thereby incapacitated for inheritance."

Note.—The relations must probably be often interested in the succession.

Of Recovering Debts.

Code, page 19. "After other methods prescribed there to a creditor for recovery " of debt, fail, he shall carry the debtor home with him and detain him. If this " mode also fails, he shall by feigned pretences, endeavour to get hold of some of " the debtors goods. If he succeeds not here, and has no pledge, he shall then " seize and confine the debtor's wife, children, cattle, buffaloes, horses, and such kind " of useful animals, also his pots, (necessary for dressing his food,) clothes, matts, " and furniture; and seating himself at the debtor's door, there receive his money. " If even these methods prove unsuccessful, he shall seize and bind the debtor's " person, and procure by forcible means, (corporal punishment,) a discharge of the " debt."

21. "If a man acknowledges himself indebted to another, and yet refuses to " pay, the creditor shall use the means above specified, to recover his money " without hindrance or molestation from the Magistrate. If the debtor should " lodge a complaint, the judge shall fine him, and cause the creditor to be " paid."

37. "If during the time of a famine, or for the execution of some religious " purpose, or on account of sickness, or to satisfy the importunate demands of a " creditor, who has proceeded so far as to seize his debtor, and confine him with- " out victuals, the husband should appropriate to himself his wife's property, with- " out her leave, he is justifiable, nor is he obliged to return or repay what is so " appropriated."

These regulations are limited by the following.

Code, page 20. "If a man lends money to a Magistrate, his own master, " or a Brahmin, he shall not be rude or uncivil in procuring payment."

23. "When a creditor procures his money by application to a Magis- " trate, he shall give him one-twentieth of the sum received, for his interpo- " sition."

270. "If a Magistrate's officer hath brought before the Magistrate any person " for any crime, and upon the Magistrate's examining that person, he should " deny the crime laid to his charge, then, even if a small offence be proved " against him upon a trifling crime, the Magistrate shall levy a great fine."

Fifth, Specimens of laws which, without reference to Caste, discover a Spirit of Cruelty.

Code, page 211. "A man killing a goat, horse, or camel, except for sacrifice, to " have one hand and one foot cut off."

212. "A man always guilty of selling the flesh of dogs or jackalls, for goat or " stag flesh, to have his hand and his nose cut off, and his teeth broke."

217. "A man selling white copper, &c. to counterfeit silver, the Magistrate " shall break the hands, nose, and teeth, of such person, and fine him a thousand " puns of cowries."

220. "A man stealing an elephant or horse, excellent in all respects, the " Magistrate shall cut off his hand, foot, and buttock, and deprive him of life." (Note.—Stealing a man of inferior caste is rated at a fine of a thousand puns of cowries, as we have already seen.)

218. "A man frequently guilty of counterfeiting gold, to be cut in pieces with " a razor."

But the cruelty of the Hindoo people appears in no way more evident than in the whole of the treatment to which their women are subjected in society, under the sanction and authority of the code. They are truly an unfortunate part of the community, and greatly to be pitied. Receiving no education, disposed of in marriage without having their consent asked, or knowing any thing of the person to whom they are to be given, they are immured for life, and made mere servants in the family of their despotic lord. If barren, or bearing only daughters, they are neglected; and not always released from oppression, even when death removes the husband; for they are then frequently reduced to the alternative of sinking into a state of infamy, or of burning themselves with his dead body.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

The code expressly sanctions this inhuman and astonishing custom.

253. "It is proper for a woman, after her husband's death, to burn herself in "the fire with his corpse."

"Every woman who thus burns herself, shall remain in paradise with her "husband, three crore and fifty lacks (three millions and a half) of years."

This strong recommendation and injunction from a law-giver, believed to be divine, is of course admitted to have the force of a religious obligation; and it is one of those institutions of which the Brahmins are very tenacious. We are naturally led to inquire, what could have been the primary cause of an institution so horrid. The Hindoo writings, so far as they are known, seem to be silent on this head: but an explanation however offers itself, from the principle of the perpetual separation of castes, and the manners of the people. It was essential to that principle, that the castes should marry each within itself. In a few permitted cases, men of a higher caste might take a wife from an inferior one of the original four orders, and all the children were deemed of that to which the father belonged; but in no case was it allowed to a woman of a higher caste to marry with a man of a lower.

Mixed intercourses were therefore almost universally prohibited under penalties; and the offspring which, notwithstanding prohibitions, appeared from that source, was degraded below the fourth caste. But polygamy has always been practised among the Hindoos, especially among those of the higher orders; and the latter wives must infallibly, from the custom of the country, be considerably younger than the husband, and generally still young when he dies. A multitude of widows must thus soon arise in the community, and from the nature of the case, progressively encrease. Second marriages of women, appear to be unknown and repugnant to the Hindoo law and usages.

When a woman's husband therefore dies, she is reckoned an useless being, and what is worse, a dangerous one. The jealousy of the Eastern people has placed their honour in the conduct of their women, as being what touches them most. Not the husband himself only, but the whole family are stained by the misbehaviour of a wife; and if she degrades herself after his death, they are still affected by her dishonour. If she should bring other children by a man of inferior caste, she would introduce, more signally than any misconduct in a man could, that disorder and confusion into the society which would tend to break down the lines of separation between castes. But seeing the number of widows must always be great, and they have no effectual superintendent or protector, there must be a proportionable danger of such irregularity as would at length make the exceptions bear down the rule; and if mothers, as in many instances might thus happen, were to rear the children of a Sooder with those left by her former noble husband, the higher caste could not be preserved, during infancy, from defilements produced by eating and drinking, and touching what appertained to the other; nor could the son of a Sooder, brought up in this way, afterwards regard his Brahmin brother and companion with the veneration deemed indispensably requisite to be shown to that order.

How then, might it be said, shall the evils to be apprehended from this source, notwithstanding prohibitions and disgrace, be prevented? Let an ordinance, professedly divine, recommend to widows a voluntary departure with their husbands to paradise, under an assurance of enjoying there a very long succession of felicity; honour shall stimulate them to embrace this choice, and lest the love of life should still prevail, the fear of infamy shall compel them to die. Nor would this expedient appear as shocking to the Hindoos, as it does to us. Admitting the separation of castes to be a sacred institution, whatever tended to subvert it, might be obviated, not only lawfully, but as a matter of duty.

Women

CHAP. III. Causes of the present Situation and Character of the Hindoos.

Women there have no concern in the education of their children after infancy; they cannot go abroad; the chief, if not the only way in which they are considered to be useful, terminates with the life of the husband; the code imputes to them the most depraved, impure, unsafe nature; they are ranked in the "Bhagvad" with those who are "of the womb of sin;" and it is believed that they are doomed to successive transmigrations, until they are regenerated in the body of a Brahmin. Vile therefore in their nature, and become useless and dangerous, to remove them from the earth, would be to study the preservation of order below, and to accelerate the course they have to pass through to a happier state. And thus there is a regular progress from the first stage of a false principle to a practical consummation that is tremendous.

Our supposition, that the original design of this institution was to prevent the dishonour and confusion of castes, appears to be confirmed by the terms of the ordinance in which it is delivered; for after saying that "it is proper for a woman "to burn herself in the fire with her husband's corpse," it adds, "if she cannot "burn, she is to maintain an inviolable chastity." If she remains always chaste, she goes (still) to paradise, and if she does not preserve her chastity, she goes to hell *.

It is probable that though the ordinance speaks in general terms of any woman, the Brahmins might not mean its operation to extend beyond the higher orders, and might especially intend to preserve their own in all the distinction of purity necessary to maintain their authority. Among the lower castes it is seldom enforced. With the others, what was originally in part at least policy, is now superstition, or an honourable family distinction; and in this last view, the practice seems to have extended to other Eastern nations, who probably adopted it from the Hindoos. Expences and domestic inconveniences attend it, which may contribute to confine it to those alone, even of the superior castes, who are in better circumstances; but among persons of that description, happiness and misery, honour and infamy, the present and the future, are all urged as motives to destruction, with great and horrid success. The number of women thus annually destroyed in Hindostan, probably far exceeds the general conception of Europeans †.

As connected with this subject, it may be added in illustration of the cruel genius which pervades the Hindoo code, that the Vedes undoubtedly enjoin human sacrifices; that such were certainly formerly offered to Kallee, the Goddess of Destruction, one of whose terrific ornaments is a necklace of human skulls; and that there is reason to believe, that this infernal practice, though now publicly disused, has not yet entirely ceased ‡.

One

* A paper in the fourth volume of the Asiatic Transactions, published long after this passage was written, exhibits a variety of decretory sentences from the Vedes and Shasters, relative to this subject, confirming in general the view of it here given. Asiatic Transactions, Vol. IV. page 209.

† No judgment can be formed of the number, from the transactions of this kind, occasionally seen about English settlements; by far the greater part takes place in the interior of the country, out of the view and intelligence of foreigners. Roger, a writer of great credit in the last century, relates that the Kheterces compelled their women to burn, reckoning it a disgrace if their wives were not laid on the funeral pile with them; and that during his residence at Paliacatta, a man of distinction of that caste dying, sixty of his wives were burnt alive with his corpse. A Hindoo of education stated to a friend of the writer, his conjecture that the victims thus annually burnt in the Bengal provinces, amounted to fifteen thousand. The calculation indeed seems excessive; yet if we adopt moderate data, the result will be enormous. Hindostan has been estimated to contain a hundred millions of inhabitants, and at least one-tenth of these to be Mahomedans. In the more opulent families of the three inferior original tribes, particularly the Kheterees, the practice in question is occasionally followed. Suppose then the four original tribes to make up two-thirds of the Hindoos, that is, sixty millions, the Brahmin families, with a small proportion of the Kheterees, and a few of those belonging to the other two tribes, to constitute a tenth part of the four original tribes, or six millions, the heads of families in this number to be one-sixth, or one million, the deaths of these annually, one in thirty, and (and a plurality of wives being in many of these families) one woman only to be burnt for each, the number annually sacrificed in Hindostan will then be about thirty-three thousand.

These data are all hypothetical and have little certainty; but let the proportion be reduced to the lowest probable scale, the annual immolation of human victims to a dire superstition, will still appear an enormity under which language must sink.

The principle alone, however, is so dreadful, that it needs not the aid of numbers to shew its atrocity.

‡ When Mr. Elliot, deputed by Mr. Hastings in 1777 to the Rajah of Berar, had advanced into the country, between that prince's capital and our territories, a young man presented himself, and solicited leave to travel under the protection of his suite; on being asked his reason, he replied he understood the rajah or zemindar of a district, before them, offered every year a human sacrifice, and generally seized some stranger passing by at that time.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

One article more shall close the elucidations from the Hindoo code.

Code, page 274. "In cases where it is ordered, a man shall be put to death, "instead thereof he shall pay one hundred ashruffees, (about £. 150); and where "it is specified that one of his hands, or one of his feet, shall be cut off, instead "thereof he shall pay fifty ashruffees; and instead of having two of his fingers cut "off, he shall pay twenty-five ashruffees; so also, when banishment from the king-"dom is his sentence, instead thereof he shall be fined twenty-five ashruffees."

"Men of rank, or good principles, or learning, committing such a crime as to "deserve capital punishment, if they are not men of property, the Magistrate shall "take less than one hundred ashruffees, according to his fortune."

"If a Brahmin who hath always acted in conformity to the Bedes, commits such "a crime as to deserve capital punishment*, the Magistrate, to prevent him in future "from the commission of such crimes, shall confine him in perpetual imprisonment." (No heavy punishment to a Hindoo, to whom indolent inactivity is a species of enjoyment.)

From what has been stated in the former part of this chapter, it will be understood that the ordinances quoted under this last article, as relating to criminal law, are not now a rule of judgment in our territorial courts, but they are introduced here for the sake of illustrating the genius of the Hindoo code. At first sight, they seem to diminish the cruelty of that code. They only afford however, a fresh and striking demonstration of its injustice and venality.

The best apology for a severe system of laws would be, that they were impartially administered. But here is an office of indulgence set up to the rich, and the pecuniary rates fixed at which they may commit crimes worthy of death. On the poor, who cannot perhaps raise one ashruffee, the laws must still have their course; and thus it becomes evident, that their steady object is not the prevention of offences, and that their remissions do not proceed from clemency; but that there is in the dispensation of punishments, a scandalous partiality in favour of rank and wealth, and a palpable regard to the emolument of the Magistrate. Indeed pecuniary fines are one great object of the code; they occur perpetually, the law is so loosely delivered that in personal disputes almost every thing is left to the discretion of the Magistrate, and one sure issue of them is his private advantage.

From this brief inspection of the Hindoo code, a tolerable adequate idea of its genius, in points upon which the happiness of society essentially depends, may be obtained. The articles which have been selected, are such as do not take their character from the light wherein they are placed, from forced constructions, or extraneous circumstances; their real nature, their intrinsic quality, their conformity or repugnance to the fair unalterable standard of good and evil, is evident. It cannot certainly have escaped attention, that the immorality, the injustice, and the cruelty of the code, are by no means confined to the instances which have been adduced under these heads, respectively, but appear in glaring colours in the numerous regulations which have been quoted, in reference to that wide and important subject, the distinctions in favour of the superior tribes. Actions are indeed often estimated, not according to their intrinsic good or evil, but according to the relation they have to caste.

Immoralities of every description are tolerated on easy terms to one part of the society, and some of the most atrocious kinds are permitted without reprehension, that is to say, have all the encouragement which a legal sanction can give them.

An unfeeling barbarity also runs through the punishments of the code; it defends sanguinary inflictions; and the translator, who is usually its apologist, acknowledges, that its "various modes of capital retribution contradict the general opinion adopted "in Europe, that the Gentoo administration was wonderfully mild, and averse "to the deprivation of life." If such an opinion has ever been general in the West, it was plainly a gross prejudice, and may show the necessity of paying more attention than has hitherto been given to the character of this people, in order to know it.

Of

* The implied consistency of these two suppositions deserves to be remarked.

CHAP. III.
Causes of the present Situation and Character of the Hindoos.

Of the effects produced upon a feeble, ignorant, superstitious people, by such a departure from the genuine principles of equity, truth, honesty, purity, benevolence, peaceableness, and good order, in a word, by such a standard of morals as these laws, professing the authority of a divine appointment, establish, it cannot be difficult to judge. It is a maxim so plain as not to be mentioned without apology, that a corrupt rule, must produce a practice still more corrupt, since no higher point of perfection being aimed at, and a progressive degeneration common to all establishments, the spirit and manners of the people, if seasonable reforms are not interposed, will in time become generally vicious.

But other causes have essentially co-operated in the formation of the Hindoo character; these are to be found in that part of their complex system which is purely Religious, and of which we next proceed to give some account.

So great an undertaking as a general or systematic exposition of the Hindoo religion, is not here intended. All that is proposed or thought necessary, is only a view of some of its tenets and institutions, which have a direct influence upon the morals and sentiments of the people; and these shall be presented under the five following heads:

First, Ceremonial and pecuniary atonements.
Secondly, Doctrines relating to transmigration.
Thirdly, The characters of the Hindoo deities.
Fourthly, Modes of worship.
Fifthly, Superstitious opinions, immediately affecting the conduct of the Hindoos in common life.

In the first place then, concerning that grand article, the expiation of the guilt of sin; the Hindoos are taught to have recourse to various ceremonial works and observances, and confidently to depend on these for absolution: real contrition and amendment, hatred of evil, and a respect to the holiness of the divine nature, do not appear to enter into their consideration of this subject. The whole is reduced to certain external performances; and in the Vedes, there are long enumerations of sins, that is to say, of offences against morality, and every species of offences which men can commit, with the particular expiation prescribed for each*. In general, these

* Ayeen Akberry, Vol. III. page 252.—Roger, pages 262, 267.—Sonnerat, Vol. I. pages 220, 273, & seq.—Religious Ceremonies, Vol. VI. pages 190, 221.—Baldæus, in Churchill's Collection, Vol. III. page 785.—Bernier, Tome II. page 221.—Herbert's Travels, page 334.—Bhagvad Geeta, page 46 et seq.—But see more particularly the Institutes of Menu, published since this tract was drawn up, Chap. II. pages 307, 343. The professed business of this chapter is to treat of penance and expiation. The efficacy of expiatory penance is laid down as a general principle or doctrine.

"Some of the learned, consider an expiation as "confined to involuntary sin; but others, from "the evidence of the Veda, hold it effectual even "in the case of a voluntary offence."

"A sin involuntarily committed, is removed by "repeating certain texts of the scripture; but a "sin committed intentionally, through strange "infatuation, by harsh penances of different "sorts."

After employing near thirty pages in describing various crimes, many of the deepest dye, and the performances by which atonement for them, if they are publicly known, and thence mischievous by their example, may be made, we meet with some sentences which speak of open confession, repentance, loathing of the sin committed, and abstinence from it. If the most favorable construction be put upon these expressions, what are a few such glimmerings of mental religion, amidst a heap of ceremonial observances, painful or ridiculous? They are overwhelmed and lost in a mass of false principles and senseless practices. They are indeed superseded and contradicted by the general tenor of this very chapter, and by the doctrine of penances; for no hint is any where given that the expiations and sacrifices prescribed in the Vedes are emblematical or typical, the plain and obvious sense of the precepts which enjoin them is that they really atone for sin. "By these penances," says the legislator, to quote the conclusion of his impositions for one species of offence, "may a twice-born man (one of the three "superior castes) atone for the guilt of theft." So with respect to secret sins, "the man who desires "to expiate his secret sins, great and small, must "repeat once a day, for a year, the text ava or "the text yatcinchida. Though he have com-"mitted many secret sins, he shall be purified by "repeating for a month the text somarandra, or "the three texts aryamna, while he bathes in a "sacred stream: or if he thrice repeat a sanditá "of the Vedas, or a large portion of them, with "all the mantras and brah'manas, dwelling in a "forest with subdued organs, and purified by three "páracas, (a total abstinence for twelve days and "nights,) he shall be set free from all sins, how "heinous soever." If some of the Brahmins should have juster views of the evil of sin, and of the necessity of moral purity, we may be assured that the bulk of the people, from whom even the contents of the Vedes are carefully concealed, rest in the external forms which are prescribed to them. So it has happened in various parts of Europe, amidst more general knowledge, and a light truly divine. Men have turned aside from that light, and resorted to inventions of their own, to penances, pilgrimages, indulgences, and supererogatory works; which being corruptly grafted upon a sytem in itself altogether pure and complete, have thence reconciled the practice of allowed sin, with the hope of pardon and of heaven.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

these expiations consist in pilgrimages, in living and dying in places reputed holy, in ablutions, in penances, in the celebration of festivals, in fasts, in largesses to Brahmins, in sacrifices and offerings to idols, in anointing the body with the excrements of a cow, and in other expedients of a similar nature.

It would far exceed the limits of this treatise, to enter into a detail of the methods adopted among the Hindoos for obtaining remission of sin. Besides those which the authority of the Vedes, or general usage has established, there are many other inventions, imposed by teachers individually upon their respective followers:—a few examples however shall be stated, of those which fall under the former description.

I. Holy Rivers, dedicated to one or other of the deities, Brahma, Vishnow, or Mahadeo, may be mentioned in the first place. There are twenty-eight of them named in the Ayeen Akberry, beginning with the Ganges, and traversing the whole continent to the Indus; so that all the professors of Hinduism are within reach of an antidote against the consequences of guilt. Each of these rivers has some peculiar property ascribed to it, and many places upon the banks are held sacred, and annually resorted to.

The virtues of the river Ganges are universally allowed to be pre-eminent;—the water of it assuredly purifies from all sin. Ablutions in it are used continually for this end, as Europeans daily see; and the dying, when within a moderate distance of it, are carried to its edge, and their feet are placed in the river, that thus they may have a happy passage out of life. Its water is conveyed to distant parts for the same purposes; and if persons confiding in its virtue are not within reach of it, thinking of it and invoking it, when they bathe in any other water, will still give them all the efficacy of it. This river is believed to have flowed down from Heaven; hence its transcendent excellency.

II. Holy Places*, dedicated to the same deities, are also spread through all parts of Hindostan. Some of the most distinguished are the following.—The city of Kashee, or Benares, with the district around it for ten miles. It is held that those who die here are transmitted immediately to Heaven. The celebrity of this city, and the continual resort to it of pilgrims, are well known.

Ayoda, or Owde, is another sacred region of considerable extent, hallowed by the birth of Rama, one of the most popular deities of the Hindoos.

Metra, with a territory around, is famous for the birth of Crishna, another of their distinguished deities.

Herdewar, where the Ganges falls into Hindostan, a place of great annual resort.

Ellahbass, formerly Pyag or Prayaga, at the confluence of the rivers Jumna and Ganges. This place is esteemed superlatively holy; the man who dies there, not only has the pardon of all his sins, but it is said, that whatever he wishes for, he will obtain in his next regeneration; and there also suicide, though in general thought by the Hindoos to incur future punishment, is deemed meritorious.

"The Hindoos," says Abul Fazel† "regard all Cashmere as holy land. Forty-"five places are dedicated to Mahadeo, sixty-four to Bishen or Vishnow, three to "Bramha, and twenty-two to the goddess Durgah. In seven hundred places, there "are carved figures of snakes which they worship."

Cashmere is about two hundred and forty miles in length, and thirty-five in breadth.

The famous Pagoda of Jaggernaut, in Orissa, is another place of great sanctity. It is alleged that the body of Chrishna was carried there, by an inundation of the sea, from Dowarka, near Surat, formerly a station of distinguished fame and resort. At Jaggernaut, a Brahmin, who would every where else be defiled even by the touch of a Sooder, may receive, without the least stain, victuals from his hands.

There are many more such places of great resort in the Decan, and the northern parts of Hindostan. Rules are laid down for every pilgrimage to them, and various rewards promised to those who perform them‡.

Not

* Ayeen Akberry, page 255.
† Ibid. - - Vol. II. page 156.
‡ Ayeen Akberry, Vol. III. page 254.

Not only are pilgrimages held beneficial, both to the soul and to the body, but such is the virtue ascribed to the sanctity of the sacred places, that by naming them only, men receive the remission of their sins; and on that account great persons, who are somewhat solicitous on this score, run over the names of the principal of them every morning, as if they repeated a prayer; so that where a pilgrimage cannot be conveniently undertaken, yet the benefit may thus be secured*.

III. SACRIFICES, OFFERINGS, and FESTIVALS, are celebrated at particular periods, and by the different castes in their respective forms. These are deemed eminent means of obtaining absolution from guilt.

IV. ALMSGIVING is prescribed in various ways, for the remission of particular crimes, or the obtainment of particular favours†. The Dan-Poojah, a religious ceremony, in which by many fantastic modes, costly presents are bestowed, is conceived to be followed by prodigious rewards in a future state.

V. ENDOWMENTS TO THE BRAHMINS, TO PAGODAS, &c. are all esteemed highly meritorious, and the variety and extent of these cannot be described. A large portion of the lands of Hindostan has been transferred, by means of them, into the hands of the Brahminical order.

VI. RIGOROUS PENANCES, procure the pardon of some species of offences particularly enormous.

VII. Methods are likewise devised for the benefit of those who have not been sufficiently careful during their own lives to ensure the pardon of their sins, by which their friends who survive, are enabled to be highly useful to them. The body or the bones of the deceased being thrown into the Ganges, temporary happiness at least is procured to the soul, and the advantage of such a condition in another transmigration as shall at last bring it to Heaven. At Gaya, a famous resort of pilgrims in Bahar, there is a particular stone on which the god Vishnow set his foot; and a person by putting on this stone, in the form prescribed, a certain paste prepared there, and by repeating at the same time the name of a deceased friend, can transfer that friend from hell itself to supreme felicity. And this benefit he may extend, not to one friend only, but by repeated applications of paste, to as many as he can recollect, even of his distant connections.

VIII. WORKS OF SUPEREROGATION, to procure distinguished eminence in the heavenly world, are also exceedingly numerous, and many of them altogether astonishing. An account of them would fill a volume; and a few instances, however striking, would give but an inadequate idea. The hideous painful distortions, and tormenting inflictions to which the Joguis subject themselves, till life is wasted away, would be perfectly incredible if they were not so abundantly attested, and yet seen, by many who visit those countries. They afford new proofs of what the human mind can invent, and the body endure, in the way of torture, under the influence of superstition. There is reason however to believe, that this species of zeal rather declines in the present day.

But though the painful details which it furnishes must be spared, it would be injustice to the present subject not to mention that divers kinds of suicide are held by the Hindoos to be meritorious. These, as stated in the institutes of Akber, are five in number. "1. Starving. 2. Covering himself with cow-dung, and, setting it on "fire, consuming himself therein. 3. Burying himself in snow. 4. At the extre-"mity of Bengal, where the Ganges discharges itself into the sea, through a thousand "channels, he goes into the water, enumerates his sins, and prays till the aligators "come and devour him. 5. Cutting his throat at Allahabad, at the confluence of "the Ganges and the Jumna." To this last species of suicide, performed at appointed times, such as eclipses of the sun and moon, great stores of wealth are promised in the next state‡.

In short, the modes of expiating guilt, and of acquiring merit, are endless among this people. To accomplish this end, is the business of all their vast train of ceremonies, services and external performances; it is the very thing that has upheld the

* Roger. † Ayeen Akberry, page 174. ‡ Ayeen Akberry, pages 274. 174.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

the fabric of Hindoo superstition, and has perpetuated the credulity of the multitude, and the impostures of their priests: even the Bhagvad, the purest production of Hindoo theology, proceeds upon the same principles for the remission of sin. The ingenious Translator, upon whose authority it has been stated that this work is carefully concealed from the vulgar, also observes that the great ignorance in which they are kept, contrary to the better knowledge of at least the more enlightened of the Brahmins, supports, together with the ceremonies of the Vedes, the consequence, and the very existence of the Brahminical order. But although the Bhagvad refines upon the popular system, and contains some moral passages, with others, which though mystical, have respect to the intention of the mind in religious worship; yet it palpably admits polytheism and idolatry, and inculcates such pitiable and pernicious doctrines as the following:

"Those who eat not but what is left of the offerings, shall be purified from all "their transgressions. Some attend to the worship of Devatas or angels; others "sacrifice their ears and other organs in the fire of constraint. There are also the "worshippers with offerings, the worshippers with mortifications. Some there are "who sacrifice their breathing spirit, and force it downward from its natural course, "whilst others force the spirit that is below, back with the breath. All these "different kinds of worshippers, are by their particular modes of worship, purified "from their offences *."

An intelligent friend of the writer expresses himself thus in a late letter from Calcutta. "One day at a Brahmin's house, I heard a wonderful man, a Poorannee "(a reader of commentaries on their sacred books,) explaining their Shasters. He "frequently made the people burst into tears, and weep aloud. Whenever their "passions were touched with any pathetic passage, the man obtained several rupees, "thrown to him both by Brahmins and Sooders, only the latter attended their "donations with a pernaum, or act of worship to the Poorannee. The Sooders, "you know, are taught to worship the Brahmins, and they do it by pernaum, that "is, touching the ground with their heads while they pronounce the word, then the "Poorannee holding out his hand in a convex manner, says isho, i. e. come, amount-"ing to "thy sins be forgiven thee," for by "come" they mean to call all the sins "on the neck of the Sooder to the hollow of their hand, where a mystic fire "consumes them. The Brahmins are the true idols, while they carry about with "them the powers of absolution, and to break off their yoke will not be easy. One "evening I went to Kallee-Ghaut (a temple of Kallee), at the time of the Arutee, "which is performed by the moving of a lamp with several wicks about the face of "the goddess. When the operation was over, a Brahmin brought up the lamp, "and walked through a passage lined with poor Sooders on each side, who anxiously, "as he passed, put their hands for a moment over the flame before it went out, in "order to procure the remission of their sins for that day."

Upon the whole then it appears, that the Hindoos pursue methods of obtaining pardon of sin without regard to the disposition of the mind, or the conduct of life on their own principles. They may go on committing wilful offences every day, and as regularly wiping them off, and die at last pure and in peace, and pass through the water of the Ganges to happiness in a new state. For the violations of conscience, which though smothered is not extinct †; for the disregard of truth, of justice, and of mercy, their system has enabled them, without making any the slightest compensation to men, to give sufficient satisfaction to their gods ‡. To them they pay a certain quit-rent, or acknowledgment, for liberty to do whatever their inclination and ability may prompt them to, as far as their fellow creatures are concerned. Can we hesitate to say what must be the effect of such principles on their character? Among such a people, crimes must prevail. True it is, and greatly greatly to be lamented, the prevalence of crimes is no new thing, nor peculiar to them. The ancient world exhibited a picture of the same kind; and to the dishonour of the Christian name, in countries nearer home, that pure religion has been changed into a mystery of imposture and corruption. But though it must be said, that the light which overspreads Europe, has prevented the same degree of effect from the system of delusive fraud still practised there, yet have not the consequences been infinitely prejudicial to those countries where it has prevailed; and is not that system likely, in the end, to dissolve the frame of society in them?

* Bhagvad-Geeta, page 55.

† "If having performed any expiation, he feel "not a perfect satisfaction of conscience, let him "repeat the same devout act, until his con-"science be perfectly satisfied."—Institutes of Menu, On Expiation, page 339.

‡ This is spoken of their practical system. In a passage of the work just quoted (page 330) it is said that "the penitent thief must always restore "the goods that he stole." But besides that neither restitution nor penance can satisfy the offended justice of God, this seems to be spoken only of those who literally, by the act of stealing, subduct the property of others. It ought certainly to apply to all dishonest agents and traders, but is probably not so understood; if it be, surely no precept was ever less observed. The banks of the Ganges afford every day the sight of multitudes of worshippers of different lines of business, who are in the habitual practice of cheating, and never think of restitution.

SECONDLY, The DOCTRINE OF TRANSMIGRATION, and others connected with it, universally received among the Hindoos, have great influence upon their modes of thinking and acting, and serve to weaken their sense of moral obligation. The Hindoos are taught to believe that their present corporeal habitation, and earthly sufferings, whatever they may be, result from their actions in a former state; and that there are inherent original qualities in the constitution of man, from which all his good and all his evil actions proceed. From these tenets it follows, that the commission of crimes is the result of destiny, and yet that they are punished; and that natural evils, the consequences of personal misconduct, will be regarded as the chastisement of offences to which destiny compelled the sinner in a former state. Thus ideas are introduced of original injustice, of arbitrary destination to sin, and to punishment, in the constitution of things; and offences bear the character of misfortunes rather than of guilt. It is very common to hear a criminal answer, when he is asked how he could be guilty of such atrocity, "that it was his nusseeb," his fate. The same persuasion extends to the success of men in life, particularly of warriors and conquerors; and he who has once got the opinion of a happy destiny in his favour, will from that very prejudice, achieve things which a contrary opinion might have rendered impracticable to him.

The doctrine of transmigration tends likewise to weaken the idea of future responsibility. It unites the soul sometimes to the human form, then again to one of the lower animals, in which, even according to the Hindoo notions, there is an incapacity for the exercise of rational powers, and a want of a moral sense: it likewise supposes the consciousness of former states of existence to be lost. Hence there is no sense of personal identity, no suffering from the reflection of past crimes, no real perception of the reasons of suffering; but merely passive temporary endurance. It is true the Brahmins have an art by which they profess to discover the former state and character of persons, by their present sufferings; but the existence of such an imposture does not invalidate these observations, since with whatever credulity it may be regarded by a Hindoo, it cannot impart to him the conscious knowledge of experienced truth. Its chief object seems to be money, and as it affords a curious specimen of the subjection into which the human mind may be brought, some notice of it shall be taken hereafter.

The Hindoos, indeed, entertain such inadequate and obscure apprehensions of a future state of punishment, and have so many ways of fortifying themselves against them, that their moral conduct is little influenced by fear derived from that source.

One of the notions which they have acquired from the doctrine of transmigration is, that some departed spirits may be doomed to whirl for ten days after death, like devils, in the air, suffering from hunger and thirst; and therefore during that space, after funerals, victuals are laid out for the birds, that the unhappy deceased, if they are floating in the airy regions, may partake of the food. On the other hand there is a happy state, to which the course of transmigrations may convey men, to the court of Indra, God of the Firmament, "where," says Sir William Jones, "the "pleasures, as in Mahomed's paradise, are wholly sensual."

But even he who is arrived at paradise is not secure; for the omission of certain ceremonies, or oblations to the manes of deceased ancestors, by the descendents of those no longer in a state of probation themselves, is dreadfully fatal, "precipi- "tating the unhappy persons into nark, or hell, thence to be borne again into the "bodies of unclean beasts, until by successive regenerations, all sins are done away*." These offerings, which come under the denomination of sheradha, are made by some daily, by others monthly and annually; and the manner of performance is thus explained in the Ayeen Akberry †. "He gives to the Brahmins, money, goods, and "food, dressed and undressed, in the name of his father, grandfather, and great- "grandfather,

* Notes to the Bhagvad. † Vol. III. page 231.

Mr Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

"grandfather, and of his mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother." The principle upon which they proceed, is that of increasing the welfare, solace, and enjoyment of departed progenitors; the real effects are to provide a stated succession of sacrificial entertainments for the Brahmins, to add to the ceremonial burthens and superstitious terrors of the people, by threatenings of dreadful consequences, as well to those who omit these rites, as to the spirits of the deceased, who are thus neglected.

What suitable ideas of spiritual happiness and of divine justice can a people, adopting such a practice, possess; and how must it discourage virtuous exertion to think, that all may be undone after the death of the performer, by the carelessness of another person!

THIRDLY, The CHARACTER of the WHOLE MULTITUDE of HINDOO DEITIES, male and female, is another source of immorality. The legends and histories of their actions are innumerable, and in the highest degree extravagant, absurd, ridiculous, and incredible. But the feature by which they are, above all, distinguished, is the abandoned wickedness of their divinities, Brahma, Vishnow, Mahadeo, (who are held to be respectively the creator, the preserver, and the destroyer of the world,) and of all the rest, in their several subordinate capacities. The most enormous and strange impurities, the most villanous frauds and impostures, the most detestable cruelties and injustice, the most filthy and abominable conceits, every corrupt excess and indulgence, are presented to us in their histories, varied in a thousand forms. These scandalous legends are more or less known among all the millions of Hindostan; they form an immense series of adventures, which fill the imagination of a weak and credulous people; very many of them are perpetuated by images, temples, and ceremonies, and those of such a nature as it were pollution to describe. Representations which abandoned licentiousness durst hardly imagine within the most secret recesses of impurity, are there held up in the face of the sun to all mankind, in durable materials, in places dedicated to religion; nay, they are the objects of religious adoration, and miniatures are taken from them and worn by multitudes about the neck*. Is it conceivable that the senses and imagination of the people, especially of the youth, should not be utterly depraved by such representations; or that all feelings and ideas of natural modesty should not be confounded and extinguished by them? What then must be the effect when religious influence is superadded?

If such indecent exhibitions as are now forbidden by the law in this country, were to be presented to public view with the highest honour, in lofty and elegant edifices, appropriated by the legislature for that purpose, and all ranks, sexes, and ages, were encouraged to resort to them; if religious merit were added as a further encouragement; and if the practice were to be permanent; what would be the effect upon the general manners? A great revolution in all ideas of modesty, chastity, continence, and decorum; the exclusion of sentiment and virtue. Of all these, nothing would be left, but the consideration of what custom had prescribed, and positive institution had forbidden, as to exterior demeanor and conduct. Such is the state of the people of Hindostan as to these points: there is a discernible absence of our feelings and opinions of propriety and decorum in what regards the sexes, a grossness in their language, manners, and ideas, which (whatever allowances are to be made for the differences of eastern or of ancient habits of life) is best to be accounted for by tracing it to this source. There is a certain modesty which seems to be inherent in the constitution of the human mind; traces of it are to be seen in the rudest hordes still uncorrupted; it is positive corruption that destroys it; and the usages of the Hindoos must therefore be an effect, as well as a cause of depravity.

Nor are these which have been enumerated, the only ways in which the Hindoo mythology influences the manners of the people. He who wants to glut his revenge, knows where to address himself to a patroness, Kali (or Kalee), the Goddess of Destruction, has still many votaries; and the Vedes afford examples of sacrifices and tremendous incantations for the destruction of enemies. The robber also, when about to issue forth against the person and the property of his neighbour, propitiates his his tutelar deity for a successful expedition. We have seen from the code, that the practice of offering worship and sacrifices, in order to compass the death of another, is known to the law. In short, what is the nefarious practice for which a patron may not be found in the Hindoo pantheon? The morals of these people are therefore poisoned at the fountains and altars of religion.

* Ceremonies Religieuses, Tome VI. passim.—Roger, page 157.—Voyage de Gentil, Tome I. page 163.—Voyage de Sonnerat, Vol. I. page 41 & 175.—Hamilton's Travels, Vol. I. page 379.—Pietra della Volle, page 55, &c.—Sir William Jones, in the first Vol. of the Asiatic Transactions, page 254.—Baldæus, in Churchill's Collection, Vol. III. passim.—Nieuhoff, in Ditto, Vol. II. page 184.—Fryer's Travels, page 179, &c.

FOURTHLY. The WORSHIP and CEREMONIES practised by the Hindoos, with various circumstances appertaining to them, have the effect of vitiating, as well as of stupifying, their minds. In an enlightened land it may appear superfluous, formally to state, that such are the consequences of idolatry; but that which is admitted, it may be well also, to recollect and to view, as exemplified in practice. The divine nature is infinitely degraded by every material representation; and the man already so gross as to resort to one, becomes more gross in using it. If he does not at length drop the idea of a distinct invisible power, and think only of the object before him, (as there is reason to suspect he will,) he at least believes that his god inhabits the stock or the stone, which he has set up. European apologists for so monstrous a practice, have been willing to deny this idea of idolatry; but an evidence of far superior authority, the author of the Bhagvad, asserts its reality. He introduces Crishna, who is there represented as Vishnow, with supreme authority, saying, "the "ignorant * believe me, who am invisible, to exist in the visible form under which "they see me †." And the learned translator of the Bhagvad is of opinion, that it was one of the aims of that work, "to induce men at least to believe God, that is "the Supreme God, present in every image before which they bent." Between depraved opinions entertained of the Divine Being, and depraved practice, there is a necessary and inseparable connection. Those opinions originate from corruption, and he who makes a god for himself, will certainly contrive to receive from him an indulgence for his corrupt propensities. Hence all the scandalous and shocking proceedings, of which some intimation has been given in the preceding pages. If we suppose the origin of the erroneous notions in question to have been the allegorization of physical truths, or of the powers of nature, still if the inventors had not ceased to be shocked by lust, fraud, and robbery, would they have stamped those qualities on their gods, and chosen extravagant representations of them as badges of religion? In all the popular worship of the Hindoos, God is never set forth under the idea of Holiness, "as of purer eyes than to behold iniquity;" nor is any service offered to him worthy of a rational mind. The Supreme God has indeed neither temple nor honour among the people; the few Brahmins who recognize his being, do not suppose him to concern himself with the affairs of the world; and the better conceptions which they have of his nature, (though the rays of original truth scattered through their system, are overwhelmed in the mass of polytheism and idolatry,) they hold as speculations, which they conceal from the multitude, and in practice oppose. So that the indulgence in immorality, which we have seen to be carried to such a length, is not the perversion and degeneracy of their system, but its very essence.

Unrestrained however as the Hindoos are, with respect to immoral licence, they gain little satisfaction from their religion, with regard to those things which affect them most, namely, natural evils, and the interests of the present life. They do not consider one Mind, one Power, as governing the universe; they are distracted by a multiplicity of deities, who are not represented as acting in uniform concert, but often as at variance. It must generally therefore be an uncertainty among them, whether the tutelar deity whom they have chosen, is able to protect them; whether the prayers of their enemies may not prevail; whether other deities, whom they do not assiduously serve, may not injure them; though they multiply inventions to persuade themselves, and others, of the pre-eminence of their respective peculiar deities; and the followers of Vishnow and Eswara are, on this account, in mortal opposition to each other.

They invoke indeed particular deities for particular things, (with ceremonies of the most abominable kinds, in which the women are pre-eminent,) and those of the subordinate classes are perhaps not to be enumerated. But after all, they think it best, especially the lower castes, to endeavour to conciliate evil spirits likewise, to deprecate their malice, and implore their friendship. To one of them ‡ they sacrifice, on

* The "ignorant," from the whole scope of the work whence this is taken, appear to be all except a few of the most enlightened Brahmins.

† Bhagvad-Geeta, page 71.

‡ Called by Roger, page 243, Ganga-gramma.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

on the festival dedicated to his honour, goats and buffaloes, instead of a man, the sacrifice which it is said was formerly offered; at which time also, some of his deluded votaries were wont to throw themselves before his processional car, that by being crushed under it, they might receive a happy death. The practice still common, of swinging by hooks fixed in the muscles of the back, and attached to ropes, which with a lever raise the body to a considerable height, is performed in honour of this malevolent spirit. This is the same deity described by Sonerat* as a goddess, under the name of Mariatale, who, he says, was a most infamous woman, guilty of all sorts of cruelties; but her body after the head had been deservedly severed from it, being re-animated by an evil spirit, she is now, under this decapitated form, greatly feared and served by the lower Indians on the Coast of Coromandel, and by the Pariaus in particular, who put her, he adds, above God.

Another mode of honouring their deities, is common in those provinces where the Mahomedan invaders never fully settled themselves. Troops of prostitutes are attached to the pagodas, they are brought up as the servants of the idol, dance in its processions, and make part of the establishment of the place. The accession of such auxiliaries to a religious institution, and the belief of their being even in an enviable state as to another world, are justified by the legendary merit of one of their order, who is related to have been visited by Dewender, keeper of the celestial regions, in the form of a man, and to have shown great fidelity to him. Let this notorious fact declare, whether the impurity of their deities and temples, has any connection with immorality in practice.

The Hindoo mythology has not only the tendency of directly vitiating the heart, but gives such false notions of nature, as must envelop the mind in gross ignorance and error, and thus strengthen the dominion of superstition, and its attendant vices. Their legendary allegorical histories of the creation of good and evil spirits, and saints, with their wars and actions; of the elements, the seasons, and the planets, all of which are personified by them, have come at length literally to be received by the vulgar; who thus seriously believe that the sun and moon are animated beings, or Dewtahs, and that when they are eclipsed, two evil spirits, or dragons, have seized them. On such occasions therefore vast multitudes have been used to resort to the rivers for the purpose of ablution and prayer, to beat the water, and make hideous noises, in order to induce the dragons to relinquish their hold. Bernier witnessed a scene of this sort at Delhi, in the last century, of which he has given a striking description†. The people in our settlements do not seem now to be so loud on these occasions. The learned among the Brahmins know better: but if they have for more than two thousand years, persisted in keeping the vulgar under such absurd deception, they are very unworthy depositories of science. In the knowledge of the globe they seem to be themselves grossly defective, maintaining a scheme of geography, imaginary and ridiculous, the offspring of the same genius as the mythological legends. The extravagant errors of the Hindoos respecting visible nature, tend to render their minds less apt for the perception of moral truth.

Besides the consequences of idolatry, which are universal, the very appearance of the Hindoo idols in general, has a tendency to degrade the worshippers: they are hideously ugly, with many heads, arms, and weapons; with great teeth and eyes, and terrific countenances, of a black colour; many of them smeared with oil, and smelling strongly of it. They are shut up in narrow dark rooms, and the approach to them is through obscurity and silence. The scandalous obscenity of others has been before hinted. Figures of the monkey, the bull, and of various other animals, are often placed around, and worshipped as the attendants of the superior deity of the place.

Of the innumerable, strange, and antic ceremonies, gestures, and postures, practised by the Hindoos in their worship, no full description can be given. They are varied according to the rules of different sects, and the fancies of individuals. The account contained in the Ayeen Akberry‡, of the Poojah, a form in daily and ordinary use, will give some idea of them, and hardly fail to excite commiseration for the deplorable blindness of the people.

" Poojah is divided into sixteen ceremonies. After the worshipper has performed " his usual ablutions, with the Sindehya and Howm, he sits down, looking towards " the east or the north, with his legs drawn up in front; then taking in his hand a " little

* Vol. I. page 246. † Tome II. page 97. ‡ Vol. III. page, 226.

" little water and rice, sprinkles the idol, thinking that he thereby begins the worship " of God. Next is the Kulsh Poojah, or the worship of the conch-shell. Last is " the Gunta-Poojah, which is plaistering the bell with sandal wood. When he has " performed these Poojahs, he throws down a little rice, and wishes that God may " be manifested; thus far includes the first of the sixteen ceremonies. 2. He places " a table of metal, or any thing else, as a seat for the deity. 3. He throws water " into a vessel, to wash his footsteps. In Hindostan it is the custom, that when a " superior enters the house of an inferior, he washes his feet. 4. He sprinkles " water thrice, to represent the idol rinsing his mouth. It is also the custom for " an inferior to bring to a superior water to rinse his mouth before meals. 5. Sandal " flowers, beetle, and rice, are offered to the idol. 6. The idol and his seat are " carried to another spot. When he takes in his right hand a white conch-shell full " of water, which he throws over the idol, and with his left rings the bell. 7. He " dries the idol with a cloth, replaces it upon its seat, and dresses it. 8. He puts " the zenar (a sacred thread) upon the idol. 9. He makes the kushck (lines with a " composition of cow-dung, &c.) upon the idol, in twelve places. 10. He throws " over the idol, flowers or green leaves. 11. He fumigates it with perfume. " 12. He lights a lamp with ghee (clarified butter). 13. He places before the idol, " trays of food, according to his ability, which are distributed amongst the by- " standers, as the idol's leavings. The 14th is called numskar, which is worshipping " God with heart and tongue; and stretching himself at full length, with his face " towards the ground, (this prostration is called dundowt); then he lays himself in " such manner that his eight members touch the ground, namely, the two knees, " two hands, forehead, nose, and cheeks; and this they call shastang. These kinds " of prostrations are also performed to great men. 15. He compasses the idol " several times. 16. He stands like a slave with his hands uplifted, and asks per- " mission to depart. There are particular prayers, and many different ways of per- " forming these sixteen ceremonies; and others believe that only from the ninth to " the thirteenth are indispensable duties. Excepting a Sonny-assy and a Sooder, all " other Hindoos perform this Poojah thrice every day."

Fifthly, The spirit of superstition extends among the Hindoos to every hour, and every business of life. The particulars recently stated, though striking, give no adequate idea of the universality of its operation; and to follow it through all its influences, would be an endless task. Some further illustrations may however suffice to confirm the existence of such a spirit, and to prove its powerful and incessant influence over the minds of this people. Affecting, in a variety of ways, their understanding and their conduct, it must also enter, in no inconsiderable degree, into the constitution of their moral and national character.

The Hindoos, it has been already observed, are afraid of evil spirits, such as are denominated among us, dæmons and genii. They believe the world to abound with them; every little district has its haunted places; and persons who pass them often, make some offering, or render homage to appease and conciliate the residing genius. Many are the devices in use amongst them to fortify themselves against the assaults of these malignant beings, which they apprehend on small occasions as well as on great; for when a Hindoo yawns, he performs a short exorcism, to prevent the dæmon from seizing that opportunity of entering into his body. Possessions are most firmly believed by them, and the appearance of them is not at all uncommon. The persons are evidently convulsed and agitated in an extraordinary manner; they declare that a spirit has seized them; and there is seldom reason to think them insincere in making such assertions, because the circumstance happens to servants, and others, who from caste, and the usages of the country, hardly ever meddle with the curious arts. The notion of apparitions, is also very familiar among the people. Their legends countenance it, and their imaginations, weak and inordinate, multiply relations of this kind. It is supposed also, that the spirits of the dead have access to the living, in various ways, and may do them good or evil. Witchcraft is universally believed, and practised among them. Every village has one or more female professors of this art, and wizards also abound: these are dreaded, accused, and resorted to, as was the case in Europe in the dark ages. But in Hindostan, this is still an active and flourishing profession. The several arts of divination, soothsaying, sorcery, necromancy, and above all, astrology, are well known and highly regarded. From the work of Abul Fazil, it would appear, that they are all explained and sanctioned in the Shasters. The Vedes, we know, enjoin the horoscope to be drawn at the birth of a child, and this is constantly practised. The Magistrate, among the Hindoos, was bound always to have skilful astrologers and soothsayers about him. The code imposes punishment upon any one ignorant of astrology, who shall presume to predict misfortune to the Magistrate. No affair of importance is at this day undertaken without consulting a soothsayer.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

Incantations also, which form another very large branch in the occult arts of the Hindoos, are amply treated of in the Vedes, and in practice are universal. Their object is unlimited; to procure all good, and avert all evil.

With incantations, may be classed the endless variety of charms, spells, talismans, amulets, and other inventions of this nature, of which no individual, small or great, of all the millions of the Hindoo race, is destitute. The confidence reposed in these things is wonderful. It is a part of the duty enjoined in the Hindoo code to the sovereign, "that he keep magicians, men who can cure by spells," upon which far more reliance is placed than on medicine. While the writer of this sketch was in Hindostan, he saw in one morning, two fine young men, the pupils of a snake-charmer, lying dead, in consequence of their undoubting confidence, that the spell which he had taught them would render the poison of the serpent innoxious. Presuming upon this spell, first one and then the other provoked a most venomous snake to bite him, and in two hours they were both corpses, leaving destitute families. Unsuccessful instances of this sort do not open the eyes of the people. They are referred to irregularity in the application of the spell, and do not impeach the efficacy of the art.

As a further illustration of this vast system of imposition, the following transcripts are made from the Ayeen Akberry*, the work it is to be remembered, of a man of the first eminence for talents, rank, and information, who was born and passed his life in Hindostan.

SUR,

"Is the art of predicting events, by observing in what manner the breath issues "through the nostrils. The breath comes out of the nostrils after three ways. First, "when it comes mostly out of the left nostril. This they attribute to the influence "of the moon, and call adda and chandernaree. The second, when it issues most "from the right nostril, which they attribute to the influence of the sun, and therefore "call soorejnaree and pingela. The third is, when both nostrils breathe equally. The "following is the order in which the breath ought to pass through the nose:—from "pervà to the third tith, chandernaree, and the same number of days soorejnaree, "alternately throughout the month: others, make it weekly, thus, Sunday, Tuesday, "Thursday, and Saturday, soorejnaree; and Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, "chandernaree. Others maintain that it is regulated by the sun's course through the "zodiac, Aries beginning with the soorejnaree, Taurus with chandernaree, and thus "alternately through all the signs. All the learned of the Hindoos believe, that if "a man breathes differently from one of these three ways, some misfortune will befal "him; if the irregularity lasts two days, a quarrel will ensue; if it continues ten "days, some misfortune will befal him; if fifteen days, he will have a severe fit of "sickness; if for a month, his brother will die. Others speak thus of the irregularity "of breathing; if for a day and night, soorejnaree is in excess, the person will die "at the expiration of a year; if it lasts two days and nights, he will live two years; "and so a year for every day; if the excess continues for a month, he will die at the "end of the ensuing month. For the excess of chandernaree, they say, if it lasts "a day and night, that person will have a fit of sickness at the expiration of a year; "and according to the number of days he will be so many years sick."

The manner of predicting events by the knowledge of this art†.

"If any one comes to enquire whether a woman who is pregnant shall be deli-"vered of a boy or girl, the person who is to answer, must examine the nostrils of "the questioner; if he breathes more through one nostril than the other, and stands "on that side, it shall foretel a son; but if he happen to place himself on the "opposite side, it shall indicate that it will be a daughter; if he breathes equally "through both nostrils, there will be twins. Some believe that if the questioner "stands on the soorejnaree side, it will be a boy; and if on the chandernaree, a "daughter; and that if the breathing be equal, it denotes an hermaphrodite."

If

* Vol. III. page 175.

† Ayeen Akberry, Vol. III. page 176.

CHAP.
Causes of the Situation and Character of Hindoos.

" If an inquiry is made concerning a person who is sick; if the questioner stands " on the soorejnaree side, the sick person will die; but if on the chandernaree side, " he will recover."

" If it be inquired whether or not an enemy's army will come; if the questioner " is chandernaree, and stands on that side, the army will come; but if he is soorej- " naree, and stands on that side, it will not come."

" If he enquires concerning peace and war; chandernaree implies the first, and " soorejnaree the last."

AKUM *,

" Teaches what incantations are advantageous, and what are hurtful; what " will improve the understanding, increase rank and fortune, cure diseases, subdue " enemies, cement friendships, insure the conquest of countries, and advance the " success of government."

SHOOGUN †,

" Is the art of discovering what is now happening, and predicting future events " by observing the motions of birds. This is an art in which many Hindoos " are skilled."

" The learned Hindoos discover hidden things by means of five things; 1, Astro- " logy,—2, Sur,—3, Shoogun,—4, Keyweel, which are omens learnt by throwing dice, " —5, Samdirg, predicting from observing the form of the limbs, and their motion, " and the lines and moles on the body."

GARUD ‡,

" Is the art of repeating certain incantations for recovering a person who has been " stung by a scorpion, or snake, or any other venemous reptile. This is done by " repeating his gencalogy and praising his ancestors, which obliges the animal to " present itself. The following is a wonderful fact. When they have caught an old " snake of a particular species, they repeat certain incantations, and then make it " bite a Brahmin; when the poison takes effect, the Brahmin continues for some " time in a state of stupefaction, when, upon any question being put to him, he " gives answers which are invariably found to be true. The Hindoo philosophers " believe that during the revolution of the Cal-jowg, nothing is truer than such " answers. And these answers have been collected together into several volumes."

INDERJAL §,

" Includes the art of necromancy, talismans, and slight of hand, in which they " are wonderful beyond description."

But the excessive solicitude of the Hindoos about the future, is in nothing more conspicuous than in their regard to omens, signs, lucky, and unlucky days. They carry this attention to a length almost incredible. It interferes perpetually in all the affairs in which they are concerned, as Europeans who have to act with them have the mortification to find. Roger, a Dutch clergyman of great credit, frequently cited in this treatise, has given in his work, written in the earlier part of the last century, on the Coast of Coromandel, and since translated into French, an account of their proceedings in this respect, which so well suits the present manners of Bengal, that while it fully illustrates the subject under consideration, it evinces the sameness of character, prevalent among them in distant periods and places.

" D'autant‖ qu'il a esté dit dans l'onzieme chapitre, que les Brahmins, et autres " nations payennes, prennent garde aux jours, quand ils ont dessein d'aller faire " la demande d'un marriage, ou pour le confirmer, il ne sera pas pour ce sujet, " hors de propos, de parler un peu comme on prend garde au signes et aux choix " des jours."

" Ils n'entreprendront point une affaire qu'en un jour, qui, selon leur compte, " est bon; et s'il se presente quelque signe ce bon jour-là, qui selon leur opinion, " est mauvais, ils ne la poursuivront pas, craignant que la fin n'en soit pas bonne.

" Quand

* Ayeen Akberry, Vol. III. page 177.
† Ibid. - - - III. - 178.
‡ Ibid. - - - III. - 178.
§ Ayeen Akberry, Vol. III. page 179.
‖ Roger, Porte Ouverte, page 71.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

" Quand ils ont le dessein d'entreprendre un voyage par terre, ils avanceront sou-
" vent leur voyage, pour prendre l'occasion d'un jour et d'une bonne heure, quoique
" ce seroit vers le soir, et qu'ils ne pourroient pas aller plus d'un quart d'heure loin
" de la ville, cela n'estant pas capable de les en empescher, estant asseurez que
" quand ils partent en une bonne heure tout leur voyage sera heureux. Ils differont
" souvent leur voyage quelques jours, pour avoir un bon jour et une bonne heure;
" et il arrive souvent, (comme j'ay dit,) qu'ils ont perdu, en attendant les bons
" jours, la bonne occasion, et le temps propre, pour avancer leur voyage, et pour
" avoir un heureux succez de leurs affaires. De façon qu'on peut dire, avec juste
" raison, de ces payens-là, ce que Seneque disoit des sabats des Juifs; " que
" plusieurs choses, qu'on devoit faire à l'instant, estoient souvent perdues, ou ne
" se faisoient jamais, à cause qu'on differoit, et qu'on ne les faisoit pas en temps."
" Il s'en va de cette façon avec ces payens-cy; car pendant qu'ils attendent assez
" des bons jours, et les bonnes heures, ils les perdent souvent, et souffrent beaucoup
" de dommage; et ce que je n'ay pas vu seulement une fois, pendant que j'ay
" fait là ma résidence, mais d'an en an, que par le retardement, ils ont laissé passer
" le temps de mouson, et ont esté contraints de revenir, sans rien faire, apres estre
" parvenus à la moitié du chemin de Pegu, Jannasseri, et Achim*. C'est une " chose estonnante, qu'ils ne deviennent pas plus prudents pour l'avenir, par le " dommage, et la perte qu'ils souffrent continuellement; qu'ils persistent et con-
" tinuent tousjours dans leur ancienne erronée, et inutile practique. Comme
" cette opinion est profondément enracinée en eux, ils n'en peuvent pas estre
" divertis."

" Mais† pour entendre ledit panjangam (almanach) il faut sçavoir, comme nous
" avons dit au chapitre précédent, que les payens avoient trente heures au jour, et
" trente heures à la nuict. Il est déclaré dans ce panjangam, touchant chaque jour
" de la semaine, et touchant chaque heure qui se rencontre dans le jour, ce qu'on
" peut faire en icelles avec bons succez, et ce qu'on doit laisser."

" 1. Que le dimanche commençant au lever du soleil, la premiers heure est
" bonne pour toutes sortes d'affaires de discours, ou de conseil."

" 2. Si l'on entreprend quelque affaire, qui apporte ordinairement du profit, elle " succédera bien, et apportera du profit."

" 3. Si l'on entreprend quelque affaire pour en recevoir du profit, elle ne
" succédera pas bien."

" 4. Si l'on espere recevoir quelque chose de bon, l'enemy jouira de ce
" bien-là."

" 5. Il y aura du profit à faire merchandise."

" 6. Il fait bon célébrer une feste, ou entreprendre quelque chose concernant
" joye ou doctrine."

" 7. Traité touchant femmes succédera selon le desir."

" 8. La marchandise ne donnera point de profit."

" 9. Comme en la sixieme heure."

" 10. Ce qu'on entreprend ne succédera pas bien."

" 11. Il est mauvais de prendre mêdicine, ou de faire quelque chose pour le
" contentement du corps."

" 12. Qui cherche victoire, il luy succédera bien."

" 13. Il fait bon d'acheter des vaches, des bestes, &c."

" 14. Il fait bon de prendre quelqu'un à son service."

" 15. Il est mauvais d'entre dans une maison neuve, ou de visiter quelqu'un dans " sa maison."

" 16. Il est bon de commencer quelques maisons, village, ou ville."

" 17. Il n'est pas bon d'entreprendre un voyage."

" 18. Il est bon de visiter les grands."

" 19. Il est bon de faire des images à l'honneur des pagoden."

" 20. Il est mauvais d'entreprendre quelque chose."

" 21. Celuy qui pense gaigner quelque chose, sera trompé."

" 22. Celuy qui entreprend une bataille, la perdra."

" 23. Il

* The mariners concerned in these voyages were probably Mahomedans, the owners of the vessels may have been Hindoos, but both have this superstition.

† Roger, page 84.

" 23. Il est bon de rechercher l'amitié."
" 24. Il fait bon se battre."
" 25. Il fait bon prendre conseil de quelqu'un quelque part."
" 26. La marchandise n'apportera pas de gain."
" 27. Qui aura la connoissance d'une femme, aura un enfant."
" 28. Tout ce qu'on entreprendra, réussira."
" 29. Celuy qui entreprendra quelque chose de plaittage, aura bon succez."
" 30. Tout ce qu'on souhaitera auparavant, ne succédera pas bien."
" Il ira de mesme la nuict, d'heure à heure, jusqu'au soleil levant."

The other days of the week, and the sixty parts into which each is divided, are detailed in the same strain; and thus every half hour is marked by something specific to be undertaken or to be avoided *. How much the affairs of life, and all rational considerations about them, must be interrupted; how much the poor people, who are enslaved to this superstition, must be harassed by it; may easily be conceived. They seek relief from every thing, and fear every thing except the Supreme Lord.

But this is not the only yoke imposed upon them. Their ceremonial defilements, pollutions, and uncleannesses, the ways in which caste may be stained or lost, the methods of purification, the regulations concerning food, the manner of dressing and eating it, the ceremonies at births, at different ages, at marriages and deaths, all these multiplied beyond enumeration, with a prodigious calendar of burthensome festivals and fasts, constitute a most grievous bondage.

A scrupulous Hindoo cannot go forth from his house without being accessible, on all sides, to dangers from omens and defilements. He must proceed every step with fear and circumspection, lest some calamity should come upon him. " Dust † shaken " from flesh, from a broom, a garment, or from divers animals; the touch of a burnt " net, a crow, a cock, a hen, a rat or mouse, an eunuch, a washerman, a hunter, a " fisherman, a gamester, a distiller, an executioner, a tanner, a dealer in leather, an " oilman, and of any sinner;" these are some of the manifold ways in which by contact, by accidents, or by the arts of others, personal pollutions may be contracted. The ceremonies which respect the article of food alone, might form a volume. Many kinds of provisions are totally forbidden; others become, in particular circumstances, unlawful; and those which are allowed, may be defiled by a thousand contingencies. The vessels used in preparing food, if touched by one of the lower caste, are defiled. The shadow of a chandal, (a person of the base caste before mentioned,) passing even over water, defiles it. All things usable, liquids, grain, metals, silks, cottons, vegetables, domestic utensils, the earth itself, are liable to pollution, and the remedies to be applied for their purification are prescribed ‡. " Sunshine, moon-" shine, the light of a fire, air, water, earth, ashes, mustard-seed, wild grain, the " shade of a tree, the hind part of a cow's leg, a plough, milk, milk curds, ghee or " clarified butter, the dung and urine of a cow," are a very few of the things which are esteemed to have a purifying virtue, and mostly in cases of personal defilement.

Besides the time employed in their daily ablutions and ceremonies, that which is lost from attending to the lucky and unlucky hours, and that which must be given to the removal of contracted defilements, there are many rigorous fasts § prescribed, and a still greater number of festivals ‖. Of these last only, the whole number appointed for the different castes appears, from the Ayeen Akberry, to be about a hundred in the year, and they are in general carefully observed.

It is not however enough, that the Hindoos bear the accumulated evils, natural and fictitious, of their present state of existence. The Brahmins profess a science called Kurrembeypak, " by which," says Abul Fazil, " can be discovered whatever was " done by men in their former state of existence;" and it prescribes a particular expiation for each crime ¶. It is probable that there has always been more discretion than

* A few articles in the detail are curious enough to be noted,
" Celuy qui entreprendra quelque chose au " desavantage de son prochain, cela lui réussira.
" Il fait bon, entreprendre une mauvaise affaire.
" Il est bon, d'entreprendre quelque chose, pour " donner de la crainte a quelqu'un; celuy qui mange " du poison, il en recevra les mesme avantages que " de l'Amortam," (supposed to be the same as " Amrita, the nectar of the gods.)
" Il faitbon brusler les malades, ou les couper.
" Celuy qui cherche chose pour tromper, il ne " le recontrera pas.
" Qui veut entreprendre quelque chose, ses " enemies mouront.

† Ayeen Akberry, page 242.
‡ Ibid. - - - - 243.
§ Ibid. - - - - 247.
‖ Ibid. - - - - 268.
¶ Ibid. - - - - 167.

" Il

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

than rigour, in the exercise of the authority derived from this source; but the invention itself is so singular, as to merit some further observation.

The art is subdivided into four kinds; and distinct examples of each are given in the Ayeen Akberry, (Vol. III. page 167) *.

From these examples, the following only shall be selected, as being short, and affording a sufficient explanation of the nature, and possible extension of this new species of taxation.

DISEASES which are Punishments for CRIMES in a FORMER STATE.

" Lameness is a punishment for having kicked a Brahmin.—Cure, Let him take " one tolah of gold, in the form of a horse, and bestow it in charity; and give food " to one hundred and eighty Brahmins."

" A fever is a punishment for killing an innocent Kheteree.—Cure, Repeating one " hundred times the incantation of Mahadeo, feeding thirteen Brahmins, and sprink- " ling with water the image of Mahadeo one hundred times."

" A cough is a punishment for killing a Brahmin.—Cure, Making a lotus of four " tolahs of gold, and after repeating certain incantations, performing with it the " ceremony of the Howm, and giving it to a righteous Brahmin."

" A woman whose husband dies before her, in her former state was of a great " family, which she left to live with a stranger, and when he died burned herself with " him.—Cure, She must pass all her life in austerities, or put an end to her existence " by burying herself in snow."

" A woman who has only daughters, is punished for having possessed a great deal " of pride in her former existence, and not showing proper respect to her husband.— " Cure, Besides ornamenting a white ox with gold, &c. she is to satisfy with food " one hundred Brahmins: or she must make ten mashes of gold, in the form of " a deity, and after performing certain incantations, give it in charity, and feed fifty " Brahmins."

The review of the Hindoo religion shall be closed here. Whatever antiquity may be justly ascribed to that religion, whatever acknowledgements its mysterious writings may contain of one Supreme Being †, and of some of his perfections, whatever mixture

* The Institutes of Menu established the doctrine of sufferings for sins committed in a former state, and describe both the signs by which those sins may be discovered, and the expiations which must be made for them. Some passages from that work will further illustrate the doctrine.

" If a twice-born man, by the will of God in " this world, or from his natural birth, have any " corporeal mark of an expiable sin committed in " this or a former state, he must hold no intercourse " with the virtuous while his penance remains un- " performed."

" Some evil minded persons, for sins committed " in this life, and some for bad actions in a preceding " state, suffer a morbid change in their bodies."

" A stealer of gold from a Brahmin, has white " lows on his nails; a drinker of spirits, black " teeth; the slayer of a Brahmin, a marasmus; " the violator of his guru's bed, a deformity in " the generative organs; a malignant informer, " fetid ulcers in his nostrils; a false detractor, " stinking breath; a stealer of grain, the defect " of some limb; a mixer of bad wares with good, " some redundant member;

" A stealer of dressed grain, dyspepsia; a stealer " of holy words, or an unauthorised reader of the " scriptures, dumbness; a stealer of clothes, le- " prosy; a horse-stealer, lameness."

" Penance therefore, must invariably be per- " formed for the sake of expiation; since they who " have not expiated their sins, will again spring to " birth with disgraceful marks."

Institutes of Menu, page 313.

† It is doubtless very pleasing to discover the recognition of this grand principle, the foundation of all true religion, even under an immense mass of falsehood and superstition; but some persons seem to have thought, that in ascertaining the existence of this principle in the writings of the Hindoos, or in the opinions of their learned men, they had substantially vindicated and established the religious character of that people; making little account of their idolatry, which is practised by the Brahmins, they represent to be no more than a symbolical worship of the divine attributes; and which as admitting among the vulgar, the idea of subaltern intelligences, they represent to arise from the veneration paid to the elements, which are thought to contain a portion of God, who according to an alledged tenet of the Hindoo faith, is held to be the soul of the world *. Not to dwell upon the falsity of this view of Hindoo idolatry, which has been already contradicted by quotations from the Bhagvad-Geeta, it may be sufficient to observe to any who lean to so latitudinarian an opinion, an opinion which falls below even the creed of deism, that the speculative admission of one or more important truths will not, in the least, prove the religious system, or the religious practice, of any person or community to be right. The picture of the ancient Heathens, given to us by unerring authority, is a striking, and affecting repretentation of the people of whom we now speak. " They " held the truth in unrighteousness. . . . . From " the visible works of the Creator, they under- stood mixture of moral principles may be found interspersed in its ordinances (for without some cement of this kind it would be impossible to constitute a religion for creatures, endowed with any share of reason and conscience) it plainly appears, that its general system is in theory most depraved; and that it is a system which, when reduced to practice, renders abortive the few moral principles originally admitted into it; and not only tolerates, but necessarily countenances, and encourages, the most extravagant and abandoned wickedness. The manners of some of the Brahmins who pass their time in going through the ceremonies of their religion, or an indolent application to their books, exempt from the concerns of the world, and therefore unblackened with the crimes so common among those of more active pursuits, form no exception to this remark; nor the rigorous austerities practised by the devotees of another class, who give themselves entirely up to a life of wandering mortification. Both these descriptions of men deny themselves in some things, but it is in order to be more abundantly gratified in others. The pride of their superior rank and qualifications, and above all, of their supposed sanctity, and the idolatrous reverence which they receive from the common people, render them insufferably arrogant; and there is the grossest deviation from rational and meritorious principles in the conduct of both:—in that of the Brahmin, who imposes upon the people a worship and ceremonies, which he knows to be groundless and pernicious; in that of the Jogee, who abandons his wife, children, and connections, to become useless and burthensome to others, and to himself, for the rest of his days.

* Dow's History of Hindostan, Vol. I. Dissertation on the Religion, &c. of the Hindoos.

The absolute dominion which this religion gives to the Brahmins, and a few of the second tribe, over the rest of the people, must also have forced itself upon the attention. No similar invention among men, seems to have been so long and so completely successful. This success may be accounted for, partly, from a favourable concurrence of various circumstances; but chiefly, from the character of the religion itself. Erected upon the darkest ignorance, and the boldest falshood, it has been the work of ages to strengthen these foundations, and to render the fabric impregnable. The understanding is chained and kept in perpetual imprisonment, like dreaded rivals for power in the East, who deprived of their eyes, and immured in dungeons, receive poisoned provisions from the gaoler's hands. Every avenue which might lead to emancipation, is strongly guarded. Fear is immeasurably excited, and incessantly wrought " stood his eternal power and godhead . . . . . .

" But when they knew God they glorified him not " as God, neither were thankful; but became vain
" in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was " darkened. . . . . Professing themselves to be " wise, they became fools . . . . . And changed
" the glory of the uncorruptible God into an image
" made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and " four-footed beasts, and creeping things . . . . . .
" Wherefore also God gave them up to uncleanness, through the lust of their own hearts, to " dishonour their own bodies between themselves;
" . . . . . Who changed the truth of God into a " lie, and worshipped and served the creature more " than the Creator, who is blessed for ever, amen.
" . . . . . For this cause, God gave them up to vile " affections . . . . . And even as they did not like
" to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them
" over to a reprobate mind, to do those things
" which are not convenient; . . . . . Being filled
" with all unrighteousness." Romans i. 18. 24. 26. 28. 29.

With respect to the real tenets of the Hindoos on subjects of theology, they are to be taken from their ancient books, rather than from the oral declarations of the most learned Brahmins of modern times, who have discovered that the opinions of Christians, concerning the nature of God, are far more rational than those currently entertained among them, and that the gross idolatry of the Hindoos is contemned by the more intelligent natives of the western world. Bernier * seems to have found occasion for the same remark in his time, for after relating a conference between him and some learned pandits, in which the latter endeavoured to refine away the grossness of their image-worship: " Voila (says he) sans ajôuter, ni " diminuer, la solution qu'ils me donnerent, mais a " vous dire le vrai, cela me sembloit un peu trop " bien concerté, a la chretienne, aux prix de ce " que j'en avoit appris de plusieurs autre pandits." —It may be allowable to add here, that it is of importance in communicating, through the medium of European tongues, the writings of Eastern nations, not only to render their sense with rigid strictness and accuracy, but as much as possible, with the dress, the air, the manners of the original; for it is conceivable, that elegance of language, harmony of periods, grace of composition, and the illuminations of European learning, may in a version, unintentionally impart to doctrines, sentiments, or narrations, an elevation, a symmetry, or a polish, which, in their original garb, they do not possess. In this view, an author, to whom the world are under considerable obligations, may be quoted with applause.

" In executing this work," (says Mr. Wilkins, " of the translation of the Hectopades) I have " scrupulously adhered to the text; and I have " preferred drawing a picture, of which it may be " said, 'I can suppose it a strong likeness, although " I am unacquainted with the original, to a flattering portrait: where characteristic features, be" cause not altogether consonant to European " taste, must have been sacrificed to the harmony " of composition. I have ever attended to the " form of my model, and have preserved what " was originally in verse, distinct, by indenting " every line but the first of each distich."—Mr. Wilkins' Preface to the Hectopades, page 14.

* Tome II. page 159.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

wrought upon; not a rational fear of falling into moral evil, and offending the righteous and holy Sovereign of the universe, but a fear of numberless fictitious dangers from every part of nature, from things real and imaginary, in every situation, and in every transaction. Fear is the grand instrument by which these poor people are held down, never daring to examine into the reality of what they are told is impending over them. False hope is likewise held out to them; and they are taught to seek deliverance, safety, and happiness, in a multitude of unmeaning, fantastic ceremonies, which constitute a grievous drudgery, engrossing their time, and confining their thoughts. In all these rites, and in whatever regards the civil and personal, as well as the religious concerns of the Hindoos, the Brahmins have made themselves indispensably necessary. They formed the religion, they are the sole exclusive depositaries of its ordinances, they are the expounders of them, they are, under a Hindoo sovereign, authorized to assist in the government of public affairs, and in effect to control it; they are the framers and administrators of the law, they have exorbitant personal privileges in all the ordinary affairs and transactions of life, they are the sole ministers, either officiating or directing, in all the vast train of ceremonies, observances, ablutions, defilements, purifications, penances, and works of supererogation, of which their religion consists; the endless questions arising about caste, are determined by them. In short, a Hindoo, from the hour of his birth, through the different stages of his existence, in infancy, in youth, in manhood, in old age, and in death, in all the relations, and in all the casualties of life, is subject to an accumulation of burthensome rites, with which the preservation of his caste, his credit, and place in society, are strictly connected: nay, for his conduct in former states of being, preceding his birth, these absolute lords of his faith, conscience, and conduct, bring him to account, nor do they resign their dominion over him when he is dead. The return he has for unbounded subjection, is an indulgence in perpetual deviations, even from those few principles of morality which his religion acknowledges. It is thus that abject slavery, and unparalleled depravity, have become distinguishing characteristics of the Hindoos.

Before we dismiss this branch of our subject, it may be proper to meet an enquiry which may have been rising in the mind of the reader while this account has proceeded. It may be said, If the representation here given be just, if such be the consequences of the complex system of Hindoo government, religion, and laws, how has Hindostan flourished under that system, as it is said to have done in ancient times? How has even the frame of society among the Hindoos been preserved from dissolution?

That country, certainly possessed of various advantages, derived them however from nature, not from its government. It enjoyed a most genial climate, a most fertile soil, a situation the most happy for security and for commerce. But its political institutions cramped its natural powers; in process of time they produced general corruption; the interest of the country, or of the state, came to be no concern with people, who, excluded even from thinking of public affairs, and unalterably fixed to one rank and occupation, had little to hope, or to fear, from a change: whence it was, as the ancients inform us, that the husbandman might be seen calmly tilling his field, while two armies were contending in his sight for dominion. Those institutions failed in effectual provision against foreign invasion, in the same degree that they produced internal degradation; and the people having at length filled up a high measure of immorality, the natural consequence of their principles, their northern neighbours, after many desolating inroads, and massacres, brought them under a foreign yoke.

But though the Hindoos lost the dominion of their own country, the influence of their religion, and their priests, remained. The ignorance and fear of the people, their terrible apprehension, especially of the loss or contamination of caste; the necessity thence resulting of adhering to the profession, and remaining in the country in which they were born; these causes, with the great extent of continent over which Hinduism had anciently spread, and the prodigious number of the people professing it, upheld its institutions (institutions which eventually sacrificed every thing else to perpetuate themselves) long after the transfer of sovereignty to foreigners of another faith. Thus the people were held together in the forms of the social state, by a chain, which the rude bigotry and ignorance of their conquerors only served to fasten more strongly; and this, in a word, with the coercive power exercised by the conquerors, explains explains why they still continue united, beyond the period, when their corruptions might have dissolved the frame of society *.

CHAP. IV.

Inquiry into the Measures which might be adopted by Great Britain, for the Improvement of the Condition of her Asiatic Subjects; and Answers to Objections.

CHAP. IV. Inquiry into Measures for improving the Condition of our Asiatic Subjects; and Answers to Objections.

WE now proceed to the main object of this work, for the sake of which all the preceding topics and discussions have been brought forward,—an inquiry into the means of remedying disorders, which have become thus inveterate in the state of society among our Asiatic subjects, which destroy their happiness, and obstruct every species of improvement among them.

That it is in the highest degree desirable, that a healing principle should be introduced, no man surely will deny. Supposing it to be in our power to convince them of the criminality of the annual sacrifice of so many human victims on the funeral pile; of the profession of robbery, comprehending murder; of the indulgence of one class of people in the whole catalogue of flagitious crimes, without any adequate punishment; of the forfeiture of the lives of others, according to their institutes, for the merest trifles; of the arbitrary imposition of burthensome rites, devoid of all moral worth; of the pursuit of revenge, by offerings to vindictive deities; of

* The ancient splendor of India, its career in refinement, and the happiness resulting from its policy, have been viewed by the celebrated author of the Historical Disquisition, through a medium which hath magnified them to his apprehension greatly beyond their just dimensions, and guided his masterly hand in the delineation of a picture, far more beautiful than the original. In treating of the progress of society, one position seems of late to be generally assumed, that men at first set out from the savage state; a position which may sometimes at least be questionable, and which in respect to the original inhabitants of Hindostan, must be disputed. From this point however, Dr. Robertson conceives them to advance, through a long series of internal improvements, to the highest stages of refinement, unaided even by the accession of extraneous lights; whereas it appears more probable, that upon the first dispersion of mankind from the plains of Shinar, where the habits of civilized life must have prevailed, the most attractive climates would direct the lines of migration, and that early colonies proceeding to the eastward, through tracts of fertile country, would, without sinking into barbarism, soon spread into the luxuriant regions of India, where the rich abundance of the soil would speedily lead them to the arrangements of regular society. For countries extremely productive of the bounties of nature, seem to ripen the ideas of men, in some respects, with a quickness analogous to the rapidity of their vegetation; and where enjoyments are profusely offered, a certain degree of refinement will easily take place, and rights of property be understood, though the facility of acquisition will not be favourable to the spirit of improvement, and there may be vices in the political constitution which will absolutely limit its progress.

With respect to the Braminical system of religion, law, and science, from which the strongest arguments for a long progressive course of refinement are deduced, reason has of late been given us to believe, that the elements of them did not spring up in Hindostan, but were derived from a source nearer to the original seat of the post-diluvian race. (See, in the Asiatic Researches, the papers of Sir William Jones, concerning the Hindoos.) But whatever the origin, or extent of knowledge among the Hindoos might be, it was, as we have seen, monopolized and concealed by the Brahmins. It spread little light among the great body of the people, and it is incorrect to refer to the whole nation, what only the priests possessed and guarded as a mystery. So with respect to the accumulations of wealth, which the nation enjoying abundant produce, and having few wants, might at length contain, it would centre with the Princes, Brahmins, and some of the chief persons of the other tribes. There might be numerous armies, splendid retinues and establishments, appertaining to the great, with a profusion of jewels and effeminate finery, in which these people delight; there would be many superb richly endowed pagodas, astonishing for their workmanship and cost, there would be great bodies of indolent well appointed priests, troops of buffoons, players, and dancers, the last belonging to the temples as well as the court; and all these appearances, with the general face of a country ever verdant and luxuriant, would strike the imagination of a stranger, especially if his business were with the metropolis, like that of Megasthenes, from whose superficial account of a country then little known, the opinions of the ancients seems to have been formed. But there is no reason to believe, that wealth was diffused freely through all the body politic; the head and arms might be enlarged, but the other parts would retain nearly their original size. There is no reason, in short, to believe, that the common people ever lived upon any thing but rice, or other inferior grain; ever wore any thing but a cincture, or at best a slight half covering of ordinary cotton cloth; or ever inhabited any better dwellings than low inconvenient huts, with matted or mud walls, and straw roofs. Such is the present style, and such in all probability it ever has been, not because the people preferred this, but because they had no choice.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

of the establishment of lying, false evidence, gaming, and other immoralities, by law; of the pardon of capital offences for money; of trying to purchase the expiation of wilful and habitual iniquity, by ceremonial observances; and of the worship of stocks, stones, impure and malevolent deities; no man living, surely, would affirm that we ought, that we are at liberty, to withhold from them this conviction.

Are we bound for ever to preserve all the enormities in the Hindoo system? Have we become the guardians of every monstrous principle and practice which it contains? Are we pledged to support, for all generations, by the authority of our government and the power of our arms, the miseries which ignorance and knavery have so long entailed upon a large portion of the human race? Is this the part which a free, a humane, and an enlightened nation, a nation itself professing principles diametrically opposite to those in question, has engaged to act towards its own subjects? It would be too absurd and extravagant to maintain, that any engagement of this kind exists; that Great Britain is under any obligation, direct or implied, to uphold errors and usages, gross and fundamental, subversive of the first principles of reason, morality, and religion.

If we had conquered such a kingdom as Mexico, where a number of human victims were regularly offered every year upon the altar of the Sun, should we have calmly acquiesced in this horrid mode of butchery? Yet for near thirty years we have, with perfect unconcern, seen rites, in reality more cruel and atrocious, practised in our Indian territories. If human life must be sacrificed to superstition, at least the more useless, worthless, or unconnected members of the society might be devoted. But in Hindostan, mothers of families are taken from the midst of their children, who have just lost their father also, and by a most diabolical complication of force and fraud, are driven into the flames.

Shall we be in all time to come, as we hitherto have been, passive spectators of this unnatural wickedness? It may indeed well appear surprising that in the long period during which we have held those territories, we have made no serious attempt to recal the Hindoos to the dictates of truth and morality. This is a mortifying proof how little it has been considered, that the ends of government, and the good of society, have an inseparable connection with right principles. We have been satisfied with the apparent submissiveness of these people, and have attended chiefly to the maintenance of our authority over the country, and the augmentation of our commerce and revenues; but have never, with a view to the promotion of their happiness, looked thoroughly into their internal state.

If then we ought to wish for the correction of those criminal habits and practices which prevail among them, it cannot reasonably be questioned, that we ought also to make allowable attempts for this end; and it remains therefore only to consider in what manner this design may be best pursued.

Shall we resort to the power we possess, to destroy their distinctions of castes, and to demolish their idols? Assuredly not. Force, instead of convincing them of their error, would fortify them in the persuasion of being right; and the use of it, even if it promised happier consequences, would still be altogether unjust.

To the use of reason and argument, however, in exposing their errors, there can be no objection. There is indeed the strongest obligation to make those errors manifest, since they generate and tend to perpetuate all the miseries which have been set forth, and which our duty, as rulers, instead of permitting us to view with silent indifference, calls upon us by every proper method to prevent.

The true cure of darkness, is the introduction of light. The Hindoos err, because they are ignorant; and their errors have never fairly been laid before them. The communication of our light and knowledge to them, would prove the best remedy for their disorders; and this remedy is proposed, from a full conviction, that if judiciously and patiently applied, it would have great and happy effects upon them, effects honourable and advantageous for us.

There are two ways of making this communication: the one is, by the medium of the languages of those countries; the other is, by the medium of our own. In general, when foreign teachers have proposed to instruct the inhabitants of any country, they have used the vernacular tongue of that people, for a natural and necessary reason, that they could not hope to make any other mean of communication intelligible to them. This is not our case in respect of our Eastern dependencies. They are our own, we have possessed them long, many Englishmen reside among the natives, our language is not unknown there, and it is practicable to diffuse it more widely. The choice therefore of either mode, lies open to us; and we are at liberty to consider which is entitled to a preference. Upon this subject, it is not intended to pass an exclusive decision here; the points absolutely to be contended for are, that we ought to impart our superior lights, and that this is practicable; that it is practicable by two ways, can never be an argument why neither should be attempted. Indeed no good reason appears why either should be systematically interdicted, since particular cases may recommend, even that which is in general least eligible.

cation

The acquisition of a foreign language is, to men of cultivated minds, a matter of no great difficulty. English teachers could therefore be sooner qualified to offer instruction in the native languages, than the Indians would be prepared to receive it in ours. This method would hence come into operation more speedily than the other; and it would also be attended with the advantage of a more careful selection of the matter of instruction. But it would be far more confined and less effectual; it may be termed a species of deciphering. The decipherer is required to unfold, in intelligible words, what was before hidden. Upon every new occasion, he has a similar labour to perform, and the information obtained from him is limited to the single communication then made. All other writings in the same character, still remain, to those who are ignorant of it, unknown; but if they are taught the character itself, they can at once read every writing in which it is used. Thus superior, in point of ultimate advantage, does the employment of the English language appear; and upon this ground, we give a preference to that mode, proposing here, that the communication of our knowledge shall be made by the medium of our own language. This proposition will bring at once to trial, both the principle of such communication, and that mode of conveyance which can alone be questioned; for the admission of the principle must at least include in it the admission of the narrowest means suited to the end, which we conceive to be the native languages. The principle, however, and the mode, are still distinct questions, and any opinion which may be entertained of the latter, cannot affect the former; but it is hoped, that what shall be offered here concerning them, will be found sufficient to justify both.

We proceed then to observe, that it is perfectly in the power of this country, by degrees, to impart to the Hindoos our language; afterwards through that medium, to make them acquainted with our easy literary compositions, upon a variety of subjects; and, let not the idea hastily excite derision, progressively with the simple elements of our arts, our philosophy and religion. These acquisitions would silently undermine, and at length subvert, the fabric of error; and all the objections that may be apprehended against such a change, are, it is confidently believed, capable of a solid answer.

The first communication, and the instrument of introducing the rest, must be the English language; this is a key which will open to them a world of new ideas, and policy alone might have impelled us, long since, to put it into their hands.

To introduce the language of the conquerors, seems to be an obvious mean of assimilating the conquered people to them. The Mahomedans, from the beginning of their power, employed the Persian language in the affairs of government, and in the public departments. This practice aided them in maintaining their superiority, and enabled them, instead of depending blindly on native agents, to look into the conduct and details of public business, as well as to keep intelligible registers of the income and expenditure of the state. Natives readily learnt the language of government, finding that it was necessary in every concern of revenue and of justice; they next became teachers of it; and in all the provinces over which the Mogul Empire extended, it is still understood, and taught by numbers of Hindoos.

It would have been our interest to have followed their example; and had we done so on the assumption of the Dewannee, or some years afterwards, the English language would now have been spoken and studied by multitudes of Hindoos throughout our provinces. The details of the revenue would, from the beginning, have been open to our inspection; and by facility of examination on our part, and difficulty of fabrication on that of the natives, manifold impositions of a gross nature, which have been practised upon us, would have been precluded. An easy channel of communication also, would always have been open between the rulers and the subjects; and numberless grievances would have been represented, redressed, or prevented, which the ignorance of the former in the country languages, and the hindrances experienced by the latter in making their approaches, have sometimes suffered to pass with impunity, to the encouragement of new abuses. We were long held in the dark, both in India and in Europe, by the use of a technical revenue language; and a man of considerable judgment, who was a member of the Bengal administration near twenty years since, publicly animadverted on the absurdity of our submitting to employ the unknown jargon of a conquered people. It is certain, that the Hindoos would easily have conformed to the use of English; and they would still be glad to possess the language of their masters, the language which always gives weight and consequence to the natives who have any acquaintance with it, and which would enable every native to make his own representations directly to the Governor-General himself, who, it may be presumed, will not commonly, henceforth, be chosen from the line of the Company's servants, and therefore may not speak the dialects of the country. Of what importance it might be to the public interest, that a man in that station should not be obliged to depend on a medium with which he is unacquainted, may readily be conceived.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

It would be extremely easy for government to establish, at a moderate expense, in various parts of the provinces, places of gratuitous instruction in reading and writing English: multitudes, especially of the young, would flock to them; and the easy books used in teaching, might at the same time convey obvious truths on different subjects. The teachers should be persons of knowledge, morals and discretion; and men of this character could impart to their pupils much useful information in discourse: and to facilitate the attainment of that object, they might at first make some use of the Bengaleze tongue. The Hindoos would, in time, become teachers of English themselves; and the employment of our language in public business, for which every political reason remains in full force, would, in the course of another generation, make it very general throughout the country. There is nothing wanting to the success of this plan, but the hearty patronage of government. If they wish it to succeed, it can and must succeed. The introduction of English in the administration of the revenue, in judicial proceedings, and in other business of government, wherein Persian is now used, and the establishment of free-schools for instruction in this language, would insure its diffusion over the country, for the reason already suggested, that the interest of the natives would induce them to acquire it. Neither would much confusion arise, even at first, upon such a change: for there are now a great number of Portugueze and Bengaleze clerks in the provinces, who understand both the Hindostanny and English languages. To employ them in drawing up petitions to government, or its officers, would be no additional hardship upon the poorer people, who are now assisted in that way by Persian clerks; and the opportunity afforded to others who have sufficient leisure, of learning the language of the government gratuitously, would be an advantage never enjoyed under Mahomedan rulers.

With our language, much of our useful literature might, and would, in time, be communicated. The art of Printing, would enable us to disseminate our writings in a way the Persians never could have done, though their compositions had been as numerous as ours. Hence the Hindoos would see the great use we make of reason on all subjects, and in all affairs; they also would learn to reason, they would become acquainted with the history of their own species, the past and present state of the world; their affections would gradually become interested by various engaging works, composed to recommend virtue, and to deter from vice; the general mass of their opinions would be rectified; and above all, they would see a better system of principles and morals. New views of duty as rational creatures would open upon them; and that mental bondage in which they have long been holden would gradually dissolve.

To this change, the true knowledge of nature would contribute; and some of our easy explanations of natural philosophy might undoubtedly, by proper means, be made intelligible to them. Except a few Brahmins, who consider the concealment of their learning as part of their religion *, the people are totally misled as to the system and phœnomena of nature; and their errors in this branch of science, upon which divers important conclusions rest, may be more easily demonstrated to them, than the absurdity and falsehood of their mythological legends. From the demonstration of the true cause of eclipses, the story of Ragoo, and Ketoo, the dragons, who when the sun and the moon are obscured are supposed to be assaulting them, a story which has hitherto been an article of religious faith, productive of religious services among the Hindoos †, would fall to the ground; the removal of one pillar, would weaken the fabric of falsehood; the discovery of one palpable error, would open the mind to farther conviction; and the progressive discovery of truths, hitherto unknown, would dissipate as many superstitious chimeras, the parents of false fears, and false hopes. Every branch of natural philosophy might in time be introduced and diffused among the Hindoos. Their understandings would thence be strengthened, as well as their minds informed, and error be dispelled in proportion.

of

But perhaps no acquisition in natural philosophy would so effectually enlighten the mass of the people, as the introduction of the principles of mechanics, and their application to agriculture and the useful arts. Not that the Hindoos are wholly destitute of simple mechanical contrivances. Some manufactures, which depend upon patient attention and delicacy of hand, are carried to a considerable degree of perfection among them; but for a series of ages, perhaps for two thousand years, they do not appear to have made any considerable addition to the arts of life. Invention seems wholly torpid among them; in a few things, they have improved by their intercourse with Europeans, of whose immense superiority they are at length convinced; but this effect is partial, and not discernible in the bulk of the people. The scope for improvement, in this respect, is prodigious.

What great accessions of wealth would Bengal derive from a people intelligent in the principles of agriculture, skilled to make the most of soils and seasons, to improve the existing modes of culture, of pasturage, of rearing cattle, of defence against excesses of drought, and of rain; and thus to meliorate the quality of all the produce of the country. All these arts are still in infancy. The husbandman of Bengal just turns up the soil with a diminutive plough, drawn by a couple of miserable cattle; and if drought parches, or the rain inundate the crop, he has no resource; he thinks he is destined to this suffering, and is far more likely to die from want, than to relieve himself by any new or extraordinary effort. Horticulture is also in its first stage: the various fruits and esculent herbs, with which Hindostan abounds, are nearly in a state of nature; though they are planted in inclosed gardens, little skill is employed to reclaim them. In this respect likewise, we might communicate information of material use to the comfort of life, and to the prevention of famine. In silk, indigo, sugar, and in many other articles, what vast improvements might be effected by the introduction of machinery. The skilful application of fire, of water, and of steam, improvements which would thus immediately concern the interest of the common people, would awaken them from their torpor, and give activity to their minds. At present it is wonderful to see how entirely they resign themselves to precedent: custom is the strongest law to them. Following implicity, seems to be instinctive with them, in small things as well as great. The path which the first passenger has marked over the soft soil, is trodden so undeviatingly in all its curves, by every succeeding traveller, that when it is perfectly beaten, it has still only the width of a single track.

But undoubtedly the most important communication which the Hindoos could receive through the medium of our language, would be the knowledge of our religion, the principles of which are explained in a clear, easy way, in various tracts circulating among us, and are completely contained in the inestimable volume of Scripture. Thence they would be instructed in the nature and perfections of the one true God, and in the real history of man; his creation, lapsed state, and the means of his recovery, on all which points they hold false and extravagant opinions; they would see a pure, complete, and perfect system of morals and of duty, enforced by the most awful sanctions, and recommended by the most interesting motives; they would learn the accountableness of man, the final judgment he is to undergo, and the eternal state which is to follow. Wherever this knowledge should be received, idolatry, with all the rabble of its impure deities, its monsters of wood and stone, its its false principles and corrupt practices, its delusive hopes and vain fears, its ridiculous ceremonies and degrading superstitions, its lying legends and fraudulent impositions, would fall. The reasonable service of the only, and the infinitely perfect God, would be established: love to him, peace and good-will towards men, would be felt as obligatory principles.

* Page 48.

† Page 66; and Bernier, Tome II. page 102.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

It is not asserted, that such effects would be immediate or universal; but admitting them to be progressive, and partial only, yet how great would the change be, and how happy at length for the outward prosperity, and internal peace of society among the Hindoos! Men would be restored to the use of their reason; all the advantages of happy soil, climate, and situation, would be observed and improved; the comforts and conveniencies of life would be increased; the cultivation of the mind, and rational intercourse, valued; the people would rise in the scale of human beings; and as they found their character, their state, and their comforts, improved, they would prize more highly, the security and the happiness of a well ordered society. Such a change would correct those sad disorders which have been described, and for which no other remedy has been proposed, nor is in the nature of things to be found.

Desirable as it must be that such animating prospects were realized, and reasonable as the grounds on which they are held out are presumed to be, it is nevertheless probable, that various objections, more or less plausible, may be started against all that has been advanced. These objections, as far as they are foreseen, shall now be distinctly met; and it is hoped, that upon examination, none of them will be found to possess that substance and validity, which we are entitled to require in arguments opposed to a scheme resting on principles the most incontrovertible, and having for its end the most diffusive good.

First. The plan here proposed, presenting so new an association of ideas, so strange a revolution, as the abject Bengaleze using the language and the light of Europe, may upon the very suggestion of it, be treated as in its nature idle, visionary, and absurd.

But this would be the decision of prejudice, rather than the conclusion of mature reflection and reason. If the character of the Hindoos proceeded only from a physical origin, there might be some foundation for thinking it unalterable; but nothing is more plain, than that it is formed chiefly by moral causes, adequate to the effect produced: if those causes therefore can be removed, their effect will cease, and new principles and motives will produce new conduct and a different character. It is unwarrantable to infer, that because the Hindoos, or to narrow the term, the Bengaleze, are at present low in their sentiments, conduct, and aims, they must always remain so. We cannot presume from the past state of any people, with respect to improvement in arts, that they would, under different circumstances, for ever continue the same. The history of many nations who have advanced from rudeness to refinement, contradicts such an hypothesis; according to which, the Britons ought still to be going naked, to be feeding on acorns, and sacrificing human victims in the Druidical groves. In fact, what is now offered, is nothing more than a proposal for the further civilization of a people, who had very early made a considerable progress in improvement; but who, by deliberate and successful plans of fraud and imposition, were rendered first stationary, then retrograde. These considerations alone, forbid us to assume, that if they were released from the darkness and stupefaction of ignorance and superstition, the human mind could not among them, regain some ordinary degree of elasticity; or that if light shone upon them, they would still be incapable of seeing or judging for themselves. Let it however be again observed, that the argument maintained here supposes only a gradual change. If we bring into immediate contrast, the present state of the Hindoos, and the full, general, accomplishment of such a change, tacitly sinking in our comparison, a long series of years, and of slow progressive transitions, we shall indeed form to ourselves a picture of egregious contrarieties, but it will not be a just representation. Nothing is contended for, which cannot be supported from the nature of man, and the experience of past ages.

Second. Nearly allied to the objection now considered, is another which some persons acquainted with the Hindoo character and habits, and possibly apologists for them, may derive from the attachment of that people to their own modes and customs. "If," may it be said, "the Bengaleze are not to be reckoned below the reach of in"struction,

" struction, and incapable of new perceptions and views, still their attachment to " long established opinions and usages, is so rooted, as to form an insuperable obstacle " to such an innovation as is proposed; and therefore the scheme may at least be " regarded as impracticable."

Is this argument however, quite philosophical? Must it be granted, without fair trial, that there is any portion of the human race, upon which reason and science can have no influence, which is doomed by nature to perpetual ignorance and prejudice? It is true that the Hindoos have a strong predilection for their system; but still it must be remembered, that in the bulk of the people, this is a predilection consequent of a privation of light, and riveted by the errors which darkness generates, not an attachment which has resisted the light, or as have ever been tried by it. Many Europeans have implicitly adopted an overstrained notion of the immutability of Hindoo opinions in matters of religion, and of the obstinacy of the people in retaining their own practices, even in civil life. But if we look to facts, we shall find that a variety of sects have prevailed, and still prevail, among them. The rise, especially of the Seeks, a new religious order, numerous and powerful, who have abjured the Brahminical faith, is sufficient to evince that the Hindoos are capable of considerable fluctuations of opinion. Hitherto indeed they have more commonly fluctuated only from one delusion to another; though it must be allowed, that the system of the Seeks, if the accounts which have been received of it are accurate, is comparatively simple and rational; and we cannot without wonder behold a set of Hindoos casting off at once, in the heart of their country, the whole load of Brahminical incumbrances, and as it should seem, renouncing polytheism and the worship of images*. A sight far more pleasing has also been exhibited to us, in the conversion of Hindoos to the divine religion of the Gospel. These were not encouraged by an armed protection, or actuated by the prospect of conquest, which may have stimulated the followers of the Seeks; but in opposition to the allurements and terrors of the world, they yielded to conviction, and rendered homage to the truth. This important fact, which is perfectly established, it may suffice barely to state here, since there will be occasion, in speaking to a following objection, to which it more pointedly applies, to enlarge upon it. When we read of these things on the one hand, and on the other of the extremities which Hindoos have sometimes endured through the bigotry of their Mahomedan masters, or from the pressure of misfortune, rather than submit to apprehended contamination, what is the inference fairly deducible from these dissimilar views but this, that whether the dread either of dishonour in this life, or of degradation in the next transmigration; whether resentment, or the idea of acquiring distinguished merit, were the principle from which these people suffered, still what terror could not induce them, misguided as they were by false notions, to relinquish, they yielded voluntarily to reason and persuasion.

If we now turn to instances of a more familiar nature, in the affairs of common life, here too actual experience will inform us, that it is not insuperably difficult to induce the Indians to depart from old established practices, and to adopt new ones. One or two cases of pre-eminent magnitude and notoriety will suffice to confirm this position. Raw-silk, as is well known, has been for many years a great article of commerce in Bengal. The natives had their own methods of winding it, and much attachment to those methods, defective as they were. The India Company attempted to introduce the Italian mode of winding this article, a mode more complex, but far more perfect; they have completely succeeded, and that mode is now practised in all parts of the country. So again with respect to the culture and manufacture of indigo, which the skill and industry of Europeans have, within these last twelve years, introduced into Bengal, and have now rendered an immense article of commerce between that country and Europe: the natives, though possessed of the indigo plant, from which their dyers extracted a very inferior substance for domestic purposes, held the culture of it rather in disesteem, and had no idea of those modes, and that scale of manufacture, of which the Europeans gave them examples; but those examples they now begin to follow on their own account, and there is reason to believe the Hindoos will come in for a share of the produce of this article in the London markets. Be it acknowledged then, that they are now incurious, and without love of learning; yet make it their interest, and they will attend to new discoveries; make it easy for them also to know the English language, and they will acquire it; show them profitable improvements in agriculture and the arts, and they will imitate them; make

* See Mr. Wilkins's account of the Seeks, in the first volume of the Asiatic Transactions.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

make it in short their interest, and why may they not become in time students, and even teachers of natural philosophy?

Let not the idea be hastily treated as chimerical, if we add that the India Company possessing the revenues of a great country, might very beneficially for themselves and that country, set the example in introducing such improvements. It would be worthy of them to turn their attention to this fruitful subject, to employ skilful artists of various kinds in ascertaining what improvements are practicable, and in carrying plans for them into execution. Were such a design to be taken up, with due zeal, by the Company, and their governments abroad, the expense and labour would assuredly be repaid in the end, probably by specific returns, but certainly by the augmentation of the agriculture and commerce of the country, and the general effects upon society. In like manner, if after the English language begun to be diffused, seminaries, with suitable apparatus, were instituted, for gratuitous instruction in natural philosophy, and premiums assigned to those who should excel, young persons, both Hindoos and Mahomedans, would become students and candidates; and if those who were found competent, were at length to be taken as assistant teachers, with suitable salaries, such a measure would prove a new and powerful means of establishing this species of knowledge. If a kind, patient, and encouraging conduct, were observed towards the Hindoos; that contempt with which Europeans in general regard them, restrained; and their first inaptitude borne with; it cannot be irrational to expect, that in things which come home to their business and interest, which respect the truths of nature, and the improvements of art, such a conduct should be productive of success. Many of the Hindoos and Mahomedans are brought up to the ready practice of writing and accounts; and persons of this class might be more easily carried on further.

THIRD, It may be objected, with more plausibility, that the Brahmins, by their determined opposition to innovations, which would so essentially affect their interests, would prevent the introduction or success of them.

It is certainly natural to suppose, that they could not look with indifference upon any attempt from which they might apprehend danger, to that system whence they "have their wealth," their honour, and their influence. It shall be readily admitted therefore, that upon any serious alarm for the stability of these distinctions, such opposition as should be within the power of that order of men might be expected. But though it will be proper to consider the effect of that opposition, and the force of the objection grounded upon it, we must previously maintain that it can constitute no reason at all against endeavouring, by prudent and pacific means, to make the truth known; for to admit this, would be to make the resistance of those who profit by abuses, an argument for continuing to tolerate them, and upon the same principle, Christianity had never been propagated.

To objections of a prudential or political kind, it is one main design of this piece to oppose answers founded on considerations of a like nature; and we venture to believe, that if the cause here pleaded for, rested on this ground alone, it could have nothing to fear. But the employment of political arguments does not oblige us to decline the use of others justly applicable to the subject; and upon the present occasion, it would be strange to omit one of decisive weight, which flows from the very nature and principles of Christianity.

The divine authority of that religion, its unrivalled excellence, and incomparable fitness to promote the happiness of man, its whole tenor, and many particular injunctions and encouragements which it holds forth, impose upon those who profess subjection to it, the duty of contributing to diffuse, by all proper methods, the knowledge and influence of it in the world. No man who takes the Gospel as the standard of his reasoning, can for a moment dispute this position; to deny it, would be virtually to deny the authority of Christ, and therefore it will not be expected, that we should enter here into the proof of a position which rests upon the truth of Christianity itself. But affirming as we may with perfect right, the validity of this argument, it will apply to communities as well as individuals; the duty is incumbent upon this nation, and it is augmented two-fold by the addition of that which we owe to the misguided Pagans who are become our subjects.

Having asserted the regard due to this important argument, let us proceed, in the next place, to examine how far the present objection is warranted, in ascribing so great an efficacy to the opposition of the Brahmins; or in other words, to inquire into the

the extent and probable amount of their counter-action, still supposing their resistance to be strongly excited; for here it will be proper to remark, that in general where they see no indication of persecution, they are not likely to feel any alarm. As the more learned and ingenious of them lead a retired life, inattentive to novelties, so the rest, chiefly men busied in worldly concerns, possess the confidence which often belongs to deluded ignorance. They know that their system is held by numerous nations. They believe from their legends, that it always has been, and always will be so. They possess the same spirit as that Pagan votary of old, who felt himself quoting a fact of universal notoriety and authority, sufficient to appease a popular tumult, when he affirmed that the image of the great goddess Diana fell down from Jupiter. When therefore they see a few simple foreigners offering "certain strange "things" to the ears of their people, they may be ready secretly, if not to use the language of the conceited Athenians, yet to say with a more ancient scoffer, "what "do these feeble Jews?" Still less will the people be apprehensive about consequences. And whilst things continue in this state, it will be the business of Christian teachers to confine themselves chiefly to the positive declarations of the Gospel, giving no occasion for an imputation which indeed they should never wish justly to incur, that of being "blasphemers," or resorting to abusive language in speaking of the Hindoo gods, or the Hindoo absurdities. They have greater themes; "temperance, righteousness, and judgment to come;"—the noble topics brought forward by St. Paul to the superstitious Athenians. "God that made the world..... the "Lord of Heaven and Earth, who is not worshipped with men's hands..... who "giveth to all, life, and breath, and all things..... in whom we live, move, and "have our being..... And that forasmuch as we are the offspring of God, we "ought not to think that the godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone graven by "art and man's device..... And the times of this ignorance God winked at; but "now commandeth all men, every where to repent; because he hath appointed a "day in which he will judge the world in righteousness, by that man whom he hath "ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised "him from the dead."

If by such doctrines as these, or the fruits of them, resentment and opposition should be provoked, let us now consider what the utmost activity of opposition so stimulated could effect. Usually true religion has been combated, and false religions have been upheld, either by fraud or force, or by both. What artifice, imposture, misrepresentation, and vicious indulgence have not been able to effect, persecution and the coercion of the secular power have been called in to accomplish. False religion shuns fair examination; before this test it cannot stand. Such is the force of truth, that on the first promulgation of Christianity, it prevailed against all the deceits, impositions, ignorance, prejudice, and prescriptive authority of the ancient superstition, aided by the utmost cruelties that tyrannic governments could inflict. Now in the present case, the Brahmins will not possess the instrument most effectual for the support of religious error and imposture, that is, the power of the sword. They may be able to strengthen indisposition to new opinions by their personal influence, by availing themselves of traditional respect and existing habits, by venting calumnies, by denouncing spiritual judgments, especially that most formidable of their punishments, loss of caste; and it shall be granted, that these expedients may be sufficient to narrow the avenues, and retard the progress of truth. Such obstructions are to be contended with only by patient perseverance, maintained on Christian principles. But with these expedients, the means of opposition end; and if all such means have not prevented many Hindoos, even of the superior orders, on the Coast of Coromandel, from embracing the doctrine preached by a few humble Europeans, without national or local consideration, why should it be thought that pious, discreet, intelligent teachers, should have no success in Bengal, where the full establishment of our authority must at least secure the national religion from open contempt or disrespect. In that country, the gross absurdities of Heathenism have never yet been clearly exposed, and their abettors would find themselves extremely at a loss to defend by argument, assumptions wholly destitute of evidence, internal and external. Indeed how is it possible to justify to the common sense and imperfect natural light of men, the monstrous actions ascribed to the deities of the Hindoos, the immoral tenets established by the Hindoo system, and the immoral practices which they are used to sanction? These things could not stand before the pure and heart-searching word of God, which recommended by the lives of those who declared it, could not fail to make a powerful impression; especially as the Hindoos, who easily suppose the authenticity authenticity of other systems of religion, (thus with Pagan latitude concluding the certainty of that which they hold to be peculiarly assigned to them,) would not be inclined to controvert the truth of ours, and therefore would be reduced to the task of proving that their own is of divine authority. And the great difference between this kind of contest, and the religious controversies which have usually prevailed in Europe, ought to be considered. For here the dispute has commonly been, which of two contrary systems or tenets was the right one, and entitled to general acceptance. But the Hindoos do not wish for proselytes; they cannot receive any: on the other hand, Christian teachers neither able nor desirous to resort to any kind of compulsion, would be confined to a quiet exposition of the truths of their own system, and of the errors of Heathenism. From such a state of things no violent contention could easily arise. If finding excommunication insufficient to deter Hindoos from embracing Christianity, the Brahmins should attempt to follow with persecution those who had been converted, the calm interposition of the civil government to prevent such an infraction of justice and good order, would be sufficient. And if natives acknowledging from conscience the Christian revelation, at the hazard of sacrifices which the confession of it might require, were thereby rendered more honest, more faithful, and upright, would this be any injury to society? Need we ask whether it would make them better servants and agents, make them more useful and valuable in all the relations of life? Would not such persons be a real accession to European masters; and must it not be supposed, that men professing Christianity, whose interest would be promoted by employing such converts, would not reject them, upon a principle which even Paganism could not justify, that is, because they had honestly followed their convictions? In this way the great terror of excommunication would be obviated; for it is in the loss of employment, the want of subsistence, and protection, that its great evil consists. Let it not be said, that such views might tempt natives hypocritically to assume the profession of Christianity who would afterwards disgrace it. The truth is not to be kept back, nor a credible profession of it discouraged, because it may be thus abused; and those who should act so dishonestly, would generally soon find themselves despised by all parties.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

Thus it is hoped a satisfactory answer has been offered to the objection now under consideration, even when admitted in its strongest form; that is, in supposing the great question respecting religion to be brought into early and direct controversy. Of such a collision of systems however, for some considerable time to come, the probability may, from the observations which have been advanced, be reasonably doubted; and if the more gradual process here assumed, a process by the concurring extension of the English language, should be followed, additional aids will, in the mean while, arise to the argument we maintain. That extension for instance, and the employment of the language in public business, cannot be disputed by the Brahmins; for how could they deny the same obedience to our government which they formerly yielded to the Mahomedan, and in a matter on which it is solely the province of government to decide? Brahmins themselves have spoken English for a century past; many of them now speak it; and no religious plea can therefore be henceforth advanced against the use of it. Improvements in manufactures and the arts, the Brahmins could not exclude; for in the adoption of some such improvements introduced by Europeans, they have also joined. The true system of natural philosophy, demonstrable as it is to the sight by machines, could be communicated to the Mahomedans, through whom it would have a wide diffusion, even if the Brahmins could prevent all Hindoos from attending to it, which is not to be imagined; nor could such an expedient occur to them until the progress of light had made an impression. That progress it is probable, would operate silently with persons who would not choose to encounter the painful feelings attendant on the dereliction of caste; and in this way, without any great external change which should excite alarm, a gradual enlargement of views and opinions, guided by that spirit of order and obedience which the Gospel eminently inculcates, and operating rather to the prevention of any vehement conflict of opinions, might take place, to the true happiness, as far as it went, of all parties.

Fourth. It may possibly occur to some of the readers of this tract, that the Portuguese of India, many of whom speak English, are nevertheless still a vicious and contemptible race.—There are among them, it must be admitted, many who cannot be cleared from this imputation. These men, descendents of the Portuguese soldiers and free-booters of a rude age, and of the lowest Bengaleze women, born in the the meanest stations, dispersed under governments foreign to them, adopted by no other class of society, commonly without education, retaining only the errors of the Roman Catholic persuasion, grow up in ignorance, immorality, and superstition, like the Heathen around them; and if they know the English language, it is but imperfectly and colloquially. They cannot be referred to as specimens of the effects of Christianity, any more than some of the Indians of America, for they understand and possess hardly any thing of it beyond the name. But there is another description of persons ranking under the general denomination of Portuguese, more respectable; persons of some education, who are clerks, traders, or merchants. These are often men of decent lives and tolerable information; they are, in some degree, an improving set of people, and have clearly profited from their acquaintance and intercourse with Europeans, particularly the English. Now the proposed plan of communicating instruction to the Hindoos, through the medium of our language, does not suppose that the vilest out-casts of society are first to be selected for the purpose, or that a new name merely is to be imparted, but that men of substance and consideration, men employed in the affairs of government, connected with the revenues and with the administration of justice, will procure for their children, if not for themselves, the knowledge of a tongue which will then be necessary in transacting business; and that the instruction to be conveyed by this, or any other vehicle, shall be important and practical.

FIFTH. Another objection may arise from the result of the direct attempts which been made to enlighten the Hindoos, by the preaching of the Christian religion: It has been said by some, that the success of such attempts has been very small, and has been confined to the Parriars and others of the lowest castes.——This statement is, in the first place, very erroneous; and in the next, to infer from it the impracticability of extending, by any efforts however strenuous, by any means however prudent, and under any circumstances however favourable, the influence of Christianity in Hindostan, would be altogether illogical and fallacious. Little stress shall be laid here upon the attempts of Roman Catholics; for it must be confessed, that though they made numerous converts, they too often only changed one set of ceremonies and images for another. Yet it must also be admitted, that the Romish establishments in Europe have shewn a zeal in this matter, much superior to that of any of the Protestant nations; and that Xavier, who traversed a great part of the coasts and islands of India, about the beginning of the sixteenth century, and appears to have been a pious indefatigable man, planted the Gospel in various places, in a way that might have led to a large extension of it, if his labours and zeal had been well seconded. The efforts of the Dutch to establish Christianity in their Indian settlements, as being made under circumstances more similar to our own, may deserve greater attention. There was, in the earlier periods of that republic, a very laudable spirit in the government at home for the promotion of this object, and the number of native Christians in their colonies abroad was very considerable. Baldæus, the author of the History of Ceylon, a person of great credit, who was one of the Dutch ministers there in the last century, and wrote from his own knowledge, has stated that in the year 1663, the Christians in the province of Jaffnapatnam,* amounted (exclusive of slaves) to sixty-two thousand, many of whom must no doubt have been educated in the Romish churches, which the Portuguese had founded there; but it is extremely worthy

* The inhabitants of Jaffnapatnam are Malabars, known to have come originally from the continent, and are a distinct people from the Cingaleze, who possess the rest of the island, and follow the religion of Bowde, or Bhoudda, whom the Brahmins treat as a heretic; whilst some learned Europeans are inclined with great appearance of reason to believe, that his religion, which prevails over many countries of the East, is more ancient in India than the Brahminical system. He is mentioned by Jerome, Clemens Alexandrinus, and other authors of antiquity, and is now held to be the same as the Sommonacodom of Siam; the Foe of China, and the Saca of Japan. See in the first volume of the Asiatic Transactions a curious and learned paper, which has relation to this subject, by William Chambers, Esq.

A premature and lamented death has since deprived learning and society of this excellent man, who to an exquisite skill in several Oriental languages, joined a very uncommon knowledge of Asiatic history and manners. But these qualities were in him only themes of inferior praise. He exhibited, during a long residence in India, in all his relations, employments, and intercourses, a consistent and distinguished example of the Christian character: and from him, inquisitive and ingenious natives, both Mahomedans and Hindoos, with whom it was his practice often to converse, received at once just views and favourable impressions of Christianity. If the occasion had permitted, it would only have been doing justice to his name to place it in a far more conspicuous station than the present note assigns to it; and for this particular reason, among many others, that he was always a strenuous advocate for the diffusion of the Gospel in the East. He had himself begun, with great care, a translation of the Gospels into Persian. 1797.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

worthy of remark, that this author declares the number of children in the schools, maintained by the Dutch government, to have risen at the time of his departure from the island, to eighteen thousand.

The learned John Leusden, Professor of Hebrew at Utrecht, about the end of the last century, produced several letters from his correspondents, which gave the following further accounts of the state of Christianity in the Dutch possessions in Ceylon. "Mr. Herman Specht, minister of the Gospel at Columbo, writes, that in "the province of Jaffnapatnam, without including Manaar, which appertains to it, "there are, according to the last computation and the list sent thence to us, one "hundred and forty-one thousand four hundred and fifty-six Christians, who have "five pastors to take care of them." The same Mr. Specht, in another letter from Columbo, dated January 6th, 1688, says, "the number of converted Indians, who "have embraced Christianity, is in the space of four years greatly encreased; for "the provice of Jaffnapatnam, subject only to the Dutch East India Company, hath "two hundred and seventy-eight thousand seven hundred and fifty-nine inhabitants; "among whom there are Indians professing to be Christians, one hundred and "eighty-eight thousand three hundred and sixty-four*." Another very respectable authority of the same period informs us, that "the Dutch East India Company "maintain in the Indies, thirty or forty ministers for the conversion of poor Infidels, "who are under their dominion, and are at the annual expense of £. 10,000. for "this purpose, and have hereby converted many hundred thousands of them to the "true Christian faith; and for the further propagating of it, have lately erected a "college in the Island of Ceylon, in which one place only they have above eighty "thousand converted Indians upon the roll, for whose use they print bibles, "catechisms, and many other books †."

The Dutch Company however, it appears from recent information, never could get a sufficient number of ministers to undertake the work of propagating the Gospel in those countries, or even to serve the churches which had been founded in them; and in later times, the funds allotted for the support of those churches and of the clergy there, have been more and more curtailed; so that from want of labourers, of maintenance, and zeal, Christianity has greatly declined in most of the Dutch settlements, through the course of the last fifty years.

Nearer to our own days, the single Protestant mission which has been seriously prosecuted, that of the Danes at Tranquebar, under the patronage of the English Society for promoting Christian Knowledge, though extremely limited in its funds, and aided by little, if any, territorial or commercial influence, has produced solid and valuable effects, not among the lowest castes only, but among the Brahmins and Pandarims, persons of the highest order and greatest knowledge; and some of the converts have themselves become useful teachers to their countrymen. There has been, since the beginning of this century, a succession of zealous missionaries at Tranquebar, who by no other means than preaching the truth, and exposing the errors of Heathenism, have won multitudes over to the faith of Christ, and formed several respectable churches on the Malabar Coast ‡. The congregations of native Christians under this mission, have indeed been diminished by the wars and calamities, which within the last twenty years have ravaged the Carnatic; but upon the whole, the number of converts made by it, in spite of all the opposing terror of exclusion from their own tribes, has been very considerable; and it may be asserted, upon unquestionable

* Millar's Propagation of Christianity, Vol. II. page 318, in which is cited Mastricht's Theologica Theo-practica.——If it were asked, whether all these converts were sincere in their profession, it might be answered, that probably some were ignorant and some hypocritical; but so would the result be upon any large survey, even in Europe. Yet to have discarded the horrid idolatry and mythology of the Hindoos, and to come under the stated instructions of a pure and divine system, would be important changes.

† A proposal from the eminent Dean Prideaux to the Archbishop of Canterbury (Dr. Tennison) for the propagation of the Gospel in the English settlements in the East Indies, contained in a letter to his grace, dated the 20th January 1694-5. In this letter the Dean greatly complains of the indisposition disposition of the English East India Company to the good work which he recommends. The Company, then under the management of Sir Josiah Child, must have much declined from its earlier zeal for the honour of religion.

See the Life of Dean Prideaux.

‡ "The Danish mission of Tranquebar was "very highly extolled by several people here, "(Columbo in Ceylon) who at the same time "assured me, that had the Catholics in their endeavours to propagate Christianity in India, conducted themselves with equal gentleness, moderation, and Christian charity, devoid of avarice, haughtiness, and violence, the major part of the numerous inhabitants of Asia would, at this present time, have been converts to this doctrine."—Thunberg's Travels, Vol. IV. Anno, 1778.

able authority, that many of them have been truly sincere and earnest, living and dying in a manner worthy of the Christian profession. It is evident then, that the light of Christianity has not been held out by this mission without effect. Such is the force of eminent goodness, that the name of Swartz in particular, a missionary still living, who has laboured with a spirit truly apostolical for more than thirty years in that country, exposed to its hottest sun, and furnished only with the scantiest necessaries of life, is revered all over the peninsula of India, by Hindoos, Mussulmans, and Europeans. The Hindoo King of Tanjore, when dying, was solicitous to make him the guardian of his heir, and to put the whole management of affairs into his hands, a trust which he declined. The famous Hyder Ali, received him as an envoy on the part of the English, and offered to take his word as the guarantee of a proposed engagement, when, as we have been assured, he would trust no one else; and Colonel Fullarton, who was commander of an English army in that country, though severe in his strictures upon others, has declared publicly, that Mr. Swartz singly had retrieved the European character in India. This mission, supported by men of such a stamp, has still real success in educating the young, and converting the adult, not to a new name only, but to a better life and conversation. And if the number of missionaries there were greater, it cannot reasonably be doubted, that the success would be proportionably increased.

The history of the Romish missions proves, that it is practicable to induce multitudes of the professors of Hinduism, to embrace a new faith. The present low state of Christianity, both in those missions, and in the Dutch establishments, is clearly to be ascribed, not to the determined adherence of the Indians to their own tenets, but to the remissness, indifference, and at length almost total neglect of the Europeans, whose too general disregard of the spirit, and precepts of their own professed faith, is, it must be acknowledged, a hindrance of another kind, more lamentable and pernicious than all the rest put together; for had they generally lived conformably to their religion, Hindostan would at this time probably have been Christian.

The observation therefore of a late writer, that "notwithstanding the labours of "missionaries for two hundred years, and the establishments of different Christian "nations who support and protect them, out of perhaps one hundred millions of "Hindoos, there are not twelve thousand Christians, and those chiefly Chandalas or "outcasts*," leads to a wrong conception of facts, and to conclusions totally unsupported. Though this number were correct, it ought by no means to be taken as the utmost possible product of united exertions for a long series of time; for nothing is plainer, than that these exertions, never great, never in any degree what they ought to have been, have gradually declined, except in the solitary instance of the small mission of Tranquebar, for more than a century past, and are in most places now entirely abandoned, not for want of success, but for want of the spirit that should animate such undertakings. Even if the success had never been greater than it is said to be at this day, and had been confined to the lower classes, who however have immortal souls, they who consider the value of Christianity, and the vast importance of the interests connected with it, as well as the opposition which the priests of other religions have uniformly made to it, would still think this success an object of very considerable magnitude. But we have seen what had been done in the times of Baldæus, and of Specht †, and we may judge how far it is reasonable to take the number of twelve thousand ‡ in the year 1790, as the existing amount of Christians in Hindostan, when we may fairly state no less a number than one hundred and eighty thousand to have been existing in the year 1688, a full century earlier. Length of time however, can be no exact criterion in this case. Persecutions, wars, and famines, may reduce the number of Christians. A want of pastors may disperse them, and in a generation or two leave no vestige of flourishing churches. The diligence and earnestness employed in this work will in general be found the truest test, and wherever these have appeared, the effect has been proportionable. As to "the establishments of different Christian nations, who support and protect them," where are they? Exclusive, first of wandering Romish missionaries, who to do them justice subsist on little, and submit to a painful course of life, and next of the Tranquebar

* Sketches concerning the Hindoos, quoted in Dr. Robertson's Ancient India, page 230.

† Page 165, 166.

‡ A letter recently received from a very respectable person on the Coast of Coromandel, states, that in consequence of the capture of Ceylon by the English, twenty thousand native Christians in the province of Jaffnapatnam were left without pastors, and thence were falling off to Paganism. 1797.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

quebar mission already mentioned, which consists not of above seven or eight ministers, on very narrow appointments, where are the establishments, where are the support and protection? Do the Dutch, possessing many large islands and settlements, now maintain even a sufficient number of clergy for their factories? Do the British, the lords of immense territories, and of twenty-four millions of Heathen subjects, maintain a single missionary? Pudet hoc opprobrium! This is a very serious subject, which would require and well deserves a distinct consideration *.

The conclusion therefore, which the writer recently quoted, would draw, that the peculiarly obstinate attachment of the Hindoos to their religion, has prevented, and by parity of reason will ever continue to prevent, their conversion to Christianity, is repugnant to the past experience of Europeans. Wherever an attempt has been seriously and prudently made, a certain degree of success has followed it; and if such attempts were more extended, the success would be correspondent.

Doubtless there is always difficulty in turning men from error to truth; and those who have been taught to place a high degree of merit in abstinence from certain meats and liquors, will be prejudiced, as has also been objected, against a religion which treats these things as indifferent. But prudence and discretion will do much. The Danish missionaries have never encouraged converts to shock their Heathen neighbours,* nor to run themselves into unnecessary expense and danger in this respect; for in imitation of the conduct of the first teachers of Christianity towards the Jews, whilst they have explained to them the allowableness of using any kind of food without exception, they have also inculcated the expediency, in their circumstances, of forbearance. But it is idle to lay any great stress as some have done upon such an impediment, when in order to real conversion, much greater obstacles must be overcome. Undoubtedly the grand hindrance, on the part of the Hindoos, to the reception of the Christian faith, is not so much an attachment to their religion, as the dreadful forfeitures which follow the dereliction of it,—excommunication from society, family, wife, children, inheritance, employment, subsistence, every thing valuable in life, and every thing necessary to its support; yet these prodigious sacrifices many have made for conscience sake; and if converts could have protection from persecution, and the means of subsisting themselves by honest labour, which among so many European Christians as are in Bengal could not be wanting, their numbers would be far more considerable than they are at present. In remoter ages, we know from undoubted authority, that the diffusion of Christianity in India, was more general than it has been in modern times†; but the people were the same, their religion and prejudices the same as they are now; nothing was different, but the ardour for propagating the Gospel; and when this ardour revives, in places where the ascendency of Europeans has prevailed over the Hindoo government, it may be expected that more homage will be paid to true religion, than it has yet received.

Sixth. If after all that has been already said of the causes by which the Hindoo character is formed, any person should still be willing to believe, that nothing more is necessary for the social peace, order, and happiness, of our Asiatic subjects, than to enact good laws, and duly to administer them, such persons may be pleased to consider

* National support is here spoken of. The Society for promoting Christian Knowledge, before noticed, from their moderate funds, the subscription of individuals, have for a long series of years given an annual allowance to the Danish missionaries of Tranquebar, or more properly have upheld the valuable mission established there nearly since its commencement; and they wish to extend their labours both on the Coast and in Bengal; but their funds, enlarged as they have lately been, are not adequate to the scheme now proposed.

An evasive plea, with which some persons meet proposals of this kind, is hardly entitled to notice. "Let us, say they, begin at home;" as if they were hindered in any domestic plans of benevolence by such proposals; as if he who sincerely wishes the extension of religion at home, must not also wish it abroad; as if it were ability, and not will, for both, which is wanting; as if we ought to postpone the communication of light to other countries, whilst any individuals remain uninstructed, (though through the fault of appointed teachers,) among ourselves; as if the duties of sovereignty did not extend wherever we hold possessions; as if the communication of the Gospel to all our subjects, were not an indispensable duty, and the obligation to perform one duty, could justify the neglect of another both incumbent and practicable; as if in a word, a resident of this country, having a foreign estate peopled with Heathens, should not immediately attend to their religious instruction.

† A considerable church subsisted on the Coast of Malabar from a very early period, and when the Portuguese first visited India, the Christians on that coast were still very numerous and respectable. They were a simple people, and by a complication of artifice and force were brought into subjection to the Romish see, whence they were incorporated with the Portuguese and shared in their fate. See Histoire du Christianisme des Indes, par la Croze, and the Portuguese writers cited by him.

consider a maxim which experience has established in the science of legislation, "that laws are of no avail without manners." Where the general spirit of a community runs counter to particular laws, those laws, instead of overcoming that disposition, more commonly lose their own efficacy, as may be seen in the case of duelling, and many other forbidden practices among ourselves. And it usually happens, that regulations which have the maintenance of good morals for their immediate object, fall sooner into neglect, and are infringed with more impunity, than those made to protect the property of individuals.

Our government in India is besides, in this respect, under some peculiar disadvantages. A handful of foreigners presides over a very numerous people, extremely corrupt, and fortified in their corruptions by their own institutions. Out of that mass, we must take the subordinate instruments of our administration in all departments, particularly in the courts of law, and in the police of very extensive provinces. The number of our courts, and of British judges or officers in them, from the heavy expense which they occasion, can hardly be made equal to what is required for the conveniency of the people, of whom also, many reside at a distance from the seats of justice, where moreover the formalities of procedure, and the accumulation of suits, necessarily produce delays repugnant to the nature and circumstances of that people, who earnestly desire prompt decisions.

It may easily be seen, that these causes, especially the national characteristics attaching to the multitudes whom we are obliged to employ in all the inferior lines of administration, would, notwithstanding the many excellent things done to render the fountains and the channels of justice pure, hinder the perfect operation of our legal institutions, even if it were in the nature of such institutions to furnish internal principles of morals, as well as to punish the external violations of right. That it is not, authority and experience concur to assure us. It is the judgment of the great Lord Bacon, a man pre-eminent in jurisprudence as well as in philosophy, "that "good government, and good laws, though they indeed nourish virtue when grown, "do not much mend that seed." Corruption has destroyed many states, where legislation had attained to considerable perfection; and how plainly does it come within our own observation, that even in countries where the awful sanctions of true religion are added to the wisest laws, uprightly dispensed, all are found little enough to check the progress of depravity? The insufficiency of laws alone to this end, cannot then be better stated than in the words of another writer of superior order, which may close the discussion of a topic in itself so clear. "As for human laws, made to "encourage and requite virtue, or to check and chastise vice, it is also manifest that "they do extend to cases in comparison very few; and that even as to particulars, "which they touch, they are so easily eluded or evaded, that without intrenching "upon them, at least without incurring their edge, or coming within the verge of "their correction, men may be very bad in themselves, extremely injurious to their "neighbours, and hugely troublesome to the world; so that such laws hardly can "make tolerable citizens, much less thoroughly good men, even in exterior demeanor "and dealing. However no laws of men can touch internal acts of virtue or vice; "they may sometimes bind our hands, or bridle our mouths, or shackle our feet, "but they cannot stop our thoughts, they cannot still our passions, they cannot bend, "or break our inclinations; these things are beyond the reach of their cognizance, of "their command, of their compulsion, of their correction; they cannot therefore "render men truly good, or hinder them from being bad*."

SEVENTH. There is another species of objection, which does not peculiarly apply to the plan now in question, but equally to all schemes which go upon a principle of proselyting men of one religion to another. The objection is to the principle itself. It supposes that if any religion be necessary, the religion in which a man happens to be born, will do at least as well for him as any other; that being sincere in his hereditary religion, he will be safe and happy in a future state; and that it is therefore wrong to disturb him about any new one. Now this objection plainly assumes, that all religions, however contrary to each other, are much the same as to their end and efficacy. It must suppose, that they are all indifferent or all acceptable to the Deity; and if the latter, that either they had their origin from him, or that human inventions of various and opposite systems of faith and practice, according to the different tastes, fancies, habits of men, and their degrees of knowledge, are at least approved of by him.

This

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

This is no other than the old Heathen opinion, revived and extended by modern infidels *. But some men who have fallen into it perhaps carelessly, as an easy way of solving points dubious or disquieting to their minds, have surely not reflected on the gross and impious absurdities with which it is pregnant. Allowing that it does not mean to discard morals, it proceeds upon a fatal sophism, too common, that they may equally subsist with any or with no religion, and that only the duties which our fellow creatures claim, are important, those owing to God, mere ceremonies; it implies, that an infinitely pure, wise and good Being, may be pleased with rites fantastic, cruel, and impure, which in their nature violate every idea, even of morals; or what is nearly as monstrous, that he places on the same level, doctrines and services essentially contrary to each other, and many of them utterly unsuitable to his own holy character. In either case, the greatest outrage will at once be offered to right reason and to the infinite perfections of the divine nature. But one inference will thus be reserved, which it is to be feared is too often the main drift of all the crude profane notions unhappily indulged upon a subject the most momentous,—that no religion has an exclusive claim to be preferred, or that in other words, there is no such thing as a divine revelation; for if a revelation were acknowledged, the consequence must of course be, that it is entitled to supreme regard.

But this is directly to attack the truth of Christianity, which claims God for its author, and, including as it does, the Jewish and patriarchal dispensation, to be the only religion that he hath revealed. This is not the place to vindicate the justice of the claim, nor is it necessary. The truth of Christianity has been a thousand times proved, against every species of attack which the abilities or the passions of men have been able to devise. It stands upon such various invincible evidence, external and internal, as belongs to no other object of human belief; evidence sufficient to satisfy the most secret doubts of every honest inquirer, and to astonish him with its clearness and power. All the assaults of ancient and modern enemies have only served to establish the authenticity of Christianity more firmly. It gains by being examined. It courts the light. The age in which it was introduced, and made its way in the world against all opposing powers, was an age of light. With the revived and increased light of modern times, it has received new lustre and confirmation. Those superior geniuses, who have extended the sphere of human knowledge, have been steady believers in Christianity. The discoveries of science invalidate none of the truths of revelation. The improvement of the mental faculties yields no illumination that can disparage the matter, or lessen the importance of those truths. But in proportion as the investigation of nature, and of the character and state of man, enlarges his views of the great Creator, and his acquaintance with himself, he sees more of the suitableness of the Christian scheme, to the perfections of the one, and the condition of the other. It is by a gross perversion of language, that the light of this advanced period is spoken of, as affording any ground for disregarding the doctrines or the precepts of the Gospel. Men have indeed, by too general an agreement, departed from them in practice, and thence the transition is easy to a denial of their authority, the source of all which is corruption, and the consequence, a return to the darkness of error; yet this common, profane relaxation, in opinions and in manners, is all that is often meant by such phrases as "the light "of the eighteenth century;" and experience has shown, that wherever the Gospel has been obeyed, it has made communities and individuals better and more happy, as in proportion to the degree in which it has been rejected or slighted, vice and misery have prevailed. It is the only religion which ever has wrought any reformation among mankind; all other systems have made men easy in their immoralities. Christianity will allow no compromise with evil, and this is the true cause of the resistance made to it; men do not oppose it from the love of truth, or any honest intelligent conviction of its want of foundation, but because it holds out too strong a light, and too strict a rule. To argue therefore as if it were untrue, (which is indeed done when the sufficiency of any other is pleaded,) after every attempt to destroy its authority has ended in its stronger confirmation, is a high strain of unjustifiable assumption, and most indecorous in a country where this religion is the established faith, faith, and a part of the law of the land. This single consideration however, our national acknowledgment and profession of its truths, imposes upon us, as has been already stated, the obligation of communicating, as far as we are able, the blessings of it to the Heathen world, and precludes therefore the use of any such objection as we are now combating, especially in all national or public discussions of this subject.

* It is the creed of Voltaire, and many others styling themselves philosophers, who from pleading for toleration, moderation, indifference, in matters of religion, proceeded gradually, and by a thousand insidious arts, first to bring into contempt, and then to overturn the established faith of that country, in which they were left at liberty to enjoy even their most extravagant dogmas; and to effect this purpose, razed its civil constitution, its monarchy, all its existing establishments, to the foundation, covering them with anarchy and blood.

It may not be unnecessary however, to repeat here, that every kind and degree of compulsion is utterly excluded from this scheme, as subversive of the rights of private judgment and conscience, and totally contrary to the spirit and genius of Christianity. The abuses which have been committed in this way, whether under the name of that religion, or avowedly in opposition to it, have furnished the enemies of revelation with a set of common-place objections, which also require some notice, because they are applied, not merely against religious persecution, but against the principle of propagating the knowledge of the Gospel in Pagan countries. "The "agitation of religious opinions," say those opposers, "and particularly of the doc- "trines of Christianity, has been the occasion of manifold contentions and immense "bloodshed." That is so say, in effect, that because some wicked men have persecuted their fellow-creatures for preaching or embracing Christianity, and others, professing that religion, have been guilty of similar cruelties against those who could not hold every dogma which they sought to impose, nothing should be done that might possibly awaken this persecuting spirit; men ought not to be disturbed in their errors, however fatal; and the occasional or possible abuse of a thing, however excellent in itself, is sufficient to decide against the dissemination or maintenance of it. The mere statement of these objections is enough to expose their weakness: they allege the conduct of the greatest enemies of religion, against religion itself. They go to supersede reverence to God, love to man, obedience to conscience, and all freedom of opinion.

But the very ground of these objections, surely never sincere, has now ceased. Toleration in matters of religion is well understood. Religion is not propagated by force; and all that is now proposed is, that a certain moderate number of individuals, armed with nothing but truth, reason, and argument, shall in a mild, pacific way, communicate the Christian system to those who have never hitherto had an opportunity of hearing it, and who, whether they listen to it or not, certainly have need of its benign and salutary influences.

It is not, let us again disavow the idea, the introduction of a new set of ceremonies, nor even of a new creed, that is the ultimate object here. Those who conceive religion to be conversant merely about forms and speculative notions, may well think that the world need not be much troubled concerning it. No, the ultimate object is moral improvement. The pre-eminent excellence of the morality which the Gospel teaches, and the superior efficacy of this divine system, taken in all its parts, in meliorating the condition of human society, cannot be denied by those who are unwilling to admit its higher claims; and on this ground only, the dissemination of it must be beneficial to mankind.

Do we then wish to correct, to raise, to sweeten the social state of our Indian subjects? Would we at little cost, impart to them a boon, far more valuable than all the advantages we have derived from them? The Gospel brings this within our power. Of the effects which it would produce in civil society, if men acted according to its principles, we may, in the words of a distinguished prelate*, say, that "in superiors it would be equity and moderation, courtesy and affability, benignity "and condescension; in inferiors, sincerity and fidelity, respect and diligence. In "princes, justice, gentleness, and solicitude for the welfare of their subjects; in "subjects, loyalty, submission, obedience, quietness, peace, patience, and cheerful- "ness. In parents, tenderness, carefulness of their children's good education, "comfortable subsistence, and eternal welfare; in children, duty, honour, gratitude. "In all men, upon all occasions, a readiness to assist, to relieve, to comfort one "another. Whatsoever, in a word, is pure, and lovely, and good."—Can we help exclaiming, with the celebrated author of the spirit of laws,—"How admirable the "religion, which while it seems only to have in view the felicity of the other life, "constitutes the happiness of this†!"

And

* Bishop Horne. Sixteen Sermons, page 101. † L'Esprit des Loix, Liv. XXIV. Chap. 3.

Mr Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

And is this the religion which we hesitate to communicate,—to communicate to those whose welfare it is alike our duty and our interest to consult? Is it not enough that more than thirty years have already elapsed, more than twenty millions of our subjects have passed into eternity, without our making any attempt to instruct them?

EIGHTH and LAST. Another objection still remains to be stated, one of an opposite nature to some of those which have been discussed, and in appearance more formidable than any of them. Its constituent idea is, the danger which might result from the adoption of the proposed plan. Put in its strongest and amplest terms, it may be thus expressed: "if the English language, if English opinions, and improvements, are introduced in our Asiatic possessions, into Bengal for instance; if Christianity, especially, is established in that quarter; and if, together with these changes, many Englishmen colonize there, will not the people learn to desire English liberty and the English form of government, a share in the legislation of their own country, and commissions in the army maintained in that country? Will not the army thence become, in time, wholly provincial, officered by natives of India, without attachment to the sovereign state:—will not the people at length come to think it a hardship to be subject, and to pay tribute, to a foreign country: and finally, will they not cast off that subjection, and assert their independence?"

Before we proceed to offer a reply to this objection, it is fair to remark, that whoever seriously entertains it, cannot also entertain those which may be advanced against the practicability of the plan, or the possibility of its succeeding. And in like manner, he who thinks success hopeless, can feel no real alarm for the danger which another might conceive success to be capable of producing. Hence though every man is unquestionably entitled to follow the best decision of his own judgment, yet in this case, an opposition, increased in numbers by contradictory principles, would therefore be diminished in argumentative strength, since objections incompatible with each other could not both be valid.

It will be proper likewise, previously to separate and exclude from this complex objection, some parts of it, which can with no justice be reckoned among the imaginable consequences of any estimated improvement in the state of our Indian subjects. Such are the free colonization of Europeans in that country, and the gradual transfer of military appointments and military power into the hands of provincials. These are things which do not depend on the admission of any particular religion into our territories, or its exclusion; nor upon the will of the people inhabiting them; but upon the government of this country. They are wholly unnecessary; they would, in our humble apprehension, be most unwise; and that light which we now possess regarding our Eastern affairs, that sound policy in the management of them, of which late years have furnished so many proofs, forbid the admission of suppositions so superfluous and extravagant.

With respect to colonization, the nature of our connection with that country, renders the residence there of a certain number of Europeans, for the various lines of public service, necessary. The admission of a further number as merchants, navigators, artists, and professional men, is useful and important; but beyond such a fair proportion as may be requisite for these different lines of employment, and the prosecution of useful improvements and enterprizes, in which the energy and skill of Europeans are essential, their ingress into that country ought not to be permitted; for otherwise a new race might spring up, with larger pretensions, and more untractable than the Hindoos. Those also admitted should be laid under particular restrictions; the more considerable settlements should be confined to the sea coasts; and the laws against the entrance of unlicensed adventurers be strictly enforced; for these adventurers may be of nations hostile to our interests, they will be less known, less to be depended on by us, more liable to fail of success in their own views, and from necessity, be more likely to colonize. But in all the decent and liberal classes of Europeans, there is even an ardent desire to return at length to their native country; and hardly an instance can be found of any person, capable from his circumstances of following this course, who has deliberately chosen to make India his ultimate home. The state of native society there, may, no doubt, contribute to form this disposition; but the Indian climate is not congenial to the European constitution, and the strong endearing attachments of early days, with the rational judgment of maturer years, powerfully impel the natives of this happy island to their original seat *.

judgment

The other idea, which makes our Indian power to depend at length on provincial officers and soldiers, proceeds upon the supposition of previous unrestrained colonization, which has just been shown to be needless and inadmissible, and upon other imagined changes, into the probability of which we need not now examine. For upon any hypothesis compatible with our retention of the country, it is not conceivable how we should ever be exposed to the danger here alleged. Is it not among the first prerogatives of government to select its military servants? What inducement could possibly arise to transfer the delicate and important trust of military command from the natives of this country to those less connected with it? Do we act thus with our American colonies, peopled by subjects of the British race? As we now ultimately depend not only on British officers, but on British troops, so, in the opinion of most competent judges, an opinion which appears to be indisputably solid and important, ought we to do in all time to come †.

Among

* The following remarks, added as a postcript to the first copy of this tract, and intended to apply to the subject of the Company's charter, then about to be renewed, it may still not be improper to insert here.

"Lest the scope of these observations should "be misunderstood, the writer begs leave to de- "clare, that he is no advocate for any system "of intercourse between this country and our "Eastern territories, which shall give Europeans "an unlimited freedom of entrance there; but "would most earnestly deprecate all schemes, of "which such unlimited freedom should be the pro- "fessed basis, or the actual, though unavowed "consequence. There is a question concerned "here, of far greater importance than the merely "commercial one of an open or a restricted trade "to India; it is a question that involves in it the "welfare, both of Great Britain and of our Asiatic "possessions.

"If the subjects of this country are permitted, "at their pleasure, to visit those possessions as "they may our American colonies, though pro- "fessedly but for the purposes of traffic, great "numbers of them will settle; for mercantile "transactions must entail residence, because it "will be impossible for a government to say, that "all such transactions shall be closed, and the par- "ties be gone within a certain time, or to take "cognizance in this manner of the conduct of "every individual; and if such a measure were "at first attempted, it would not continue any "time. All the lines of trade and manufactures "would soon be overstocked, and then men would "seek to fasten themselves on the soil. Coloni- "zation would therefore very soon commence in "India, especially in Bengal; those whom uncon- "trouled enterprizes in commerce would carry "thither, would see a rich soil, apprehend great "scope for exertions, and regard the natives as a "subjected people, feeble, timid, and contemptible; "all things would tempt them, and many, both "agents and seamen, would remain. But the in- "crease of Europeans there would not be regulated "by the gradual progress of colonial industry. "Multitudes of the needy and the idle, allured by "the fame of that country, and eager to seize "novel privileges, would flock thither at once. "Britain would, in a short space, be thinned of "inhabitants, and those eastern provinces filled "with a new race of adventurers, many of them "low and licentious. Being there, they must "subsist; they would spread themselves through- "out the country, would run into the inland trade, "fix themselves wherever they could on the lands, "domineer over the natives, harass, extrude, ex- "asperate them, and at length provoke them to "plots and insurrections; they would be bold and "assuming towards our own government there; "its present form calculated chiefly for the na- "tives, would not be sufficiently coercive in such "a new state of things, and hardly any govern- "ment which we could maintain in that quarter, "would controul swarms of Europeans, thus let "loose, and animated by the spirit of adventure "and acquisition. Nor would the emigrations be "confined to our countrymen only. If we tole- "rated the practice of free colonization in India, "people from all the nations in Europe, would "resort thither, mix with other subjects, and ag- "gravate the mischiefs of such an invading sys- "tem. In a certain degree, we should have that "lawless destructive scene acted over again, "which the Spaniards exhibited when they first "poured into America. It was thus that the "Portuguese power in the East declined. The in- "tolerable licence of the roving adventurers of that "nation, rendered them odious to the natives, and "armed the coasts and islands of India against "them, so that weakened before, they fell an easy "prey to the Dutch. And thus too, we should "ourselves be exposed, perhaps at no distant "period, to the danger of general convulsion and "revolt in those possessions, which prudently "guarded and cultivated; may under the favour "of Providence, to conciliate which should be our "first care, be preserved for ages, to our great ad- "vantage, and the happiness of their native in- "habitants.

"The question now therefore, with respect to "these possessions, is not, whether all British "subjects shall have a right to trade thither in "their own persons, but whether the natives "shall be protected from being over-run and op- "pressed by foreigners. A different cause recom- "mends, that the intercourse with these provinces "be still carried on by one national organ, like "the India Company. At first, such a collective "body was preferred, as a better defence against "the arbitrary and rapacious temper of the native "governments. Now that the countries are our "own, such a limited channel is also preferable, "to save this nation, and our Asiatic subjects, "from the evils which might accrue from too great "a transfusion of the people of Europe among the "Hindoos."

† If, upon premises very opposite to those on which the objections we are now answering are grounded, a doubt should be started of the propriety of keeping any people perpetually under foreign rule, this would be to agitate a question involving the right of conquest, and the nature of government; but it might perhaps be sufficient to reply, that we can foresee no period in which we may not govern our Asiatic subjects, more happily for them than they can be governed by themselves or

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

Among the articles unreasonably crowded into the objection now to be examined, are those which state the people as becoming, in consequence of some future supposed events and combinations, dissatisfied at the payment of a foreign tribute, and with subjection to a foreign country. Is it to be thought, that such ideas are then only to have existence, or that the people have in any past time been contented under the dominion of strangers? Surely not. The only point for consideration here is, their comparative acquiescence in this condition under their present circumstances, and under those which it is assumed may hereafter arise.

We shall now enter upon the consideration of the objection itself; and the first things which attract our attention here, are the foundation on which the whole of this objection rests, and the principle upon which it proceeds. The foundation is pure hypothesis, or conjecture; and hypothesis supported by no real experience of any case similar to the one assumed to happen, nor by any just analogy. Some general apprehension, prepossession, or unexamined suspicion, suggests the possibility of certain events; and to this suggestion, without any satisfaction concerning the premises on which it is advanced, or the conclusion deduced from it, without regard to all the other relations of the subject in question, we are required to give our assent. The principle of the objection, at least equally remarkable, is plainly no other than this, that to prevent the remotest chance of such consequences as the proposed improvements might produce, our Asiatic subjects must be for ever held in the same state of ignorance and error in which they now are. "Give them not," says the unstrained sense of this objection, "the light of true religion, teach them not a "better system of morals, provide no stated means for their public or private in- "struction, impart not to them our knowledge of nature, be not liberal to them, even "in communicating the principles of our arts; afford them, in a word, no benefit "whatever of light and improvement, lest our interest should in some future period "suffer; keep them blind and wretched for all generations, lest our authority should "be shaken, or our supremacy over them incur the slightest possible risk." Surely those who may have inconsiderably lent themselves to this objection, will not, upon a clear deliberate view of its principle, seek to justify or to contend for it. A Christian nation cannot possibly maintain or countenance such a principle To do so would be virtually to trample upon every sentiment which we profess in religion or in morals. It would be to make ourselves parties in all the impositions of the Brahminical system, and in effect to hold with its priests, the doctrine of Demetrius,* "by this craft, we have our wealth." To enlarge upon so very obvious an argument, must be unnecessary.

Besides the series of effects which the objection professedly supposes, certain other positions are tacitly comprehended in it, which next claim our notice. It implies, that the establishment of Christianity in a country may, on the whole, prove unfavourable, or less favourable than some other religious institution, to good government; that its efficacy may, on the whole, be inferior in securing the subordination, obedience, and attachment of the people, and the authority of the sovereign. Since reason, experience, and general consent, have fully decided against this position, it would be superfluous and unbecoming to enter into any refutation of it. It is certainly one of the grossest misconceptions of the nature and tendency of the religion of the Gospel, which is known to afford precepts, motives, and encouragements to lawful submission and good order, infinitely more powerful and efficacious than those of any other system. Its real genius is so contrary to licentiousness and anarchy, that as we have seen in a late memorable instance, their triumph can be raised only upon its extinction. If we would read the judgment of enlightened Europe upon this subject in a single sentence, the celebrated author already quoted, who spent a long life in profound and certainly unbigotted investigations into the nature of different systems of religion and law, may supply it. "True Christians," says he, "must be citizens "thoroughly enlightened respecting their duties, with the greatest zeal for fulfilling "them; the more they feel the obligations of religion, the more must they be "sensible of what they owe to their country. The principles of Christianity well "engraven on the heart, must be infinitely stronger than the false honour of monar- "chies, the humane virtues of republics, and the servile fear of despotic states†."

the

or any other power; and doing this we should not expose them to needless danger from without and from within, by giving the military power into their hands.

* Acts, Chap. 19.——Page 159.

† L'Esprit des Loix, Liv. XXIV. Chap. 6.

The objection implies also, that rather than expose ourselves to the possibility of suffering future evils, which it is assumed Christianity might ultimately introduce, we should forego great advantages which are confessedly within our reach. The probability of effecting considerable improvements is not denied; it is, on the contrary, supposed; and this supposition constitutes the very ground of resistance. "Though the field be spacious, and much might be done, attempt not to benefit either "your subjects or yourselves, lest success should, at some very distant day, be abused. "Let us not do moral good, that political evil may not come." Such is the language of the objection; an acquiescence in the propriety of which, since the duty of aiming at those salutary meliorations has been sufficiently established, would imply this further notion: "that the way of duty is not, on the whole, the way of prosperity." It is enough to have pointed out these exceptionable positions.

But another still remains to be mentioned, which goes to the essence of the present subject. The objection silently assumes, "that in a system opposite to the one pro-"posed in this essay, must consist our future safety and stability in India." The high importance of this proposition, not surely one of such intuitive evidence as to command instant assent, entitles it to particular consideration; but that consideration will be more conveniently bestowed, after we have viewed the direct matter of the objection, to which we now proceed.

It alleges then, the probability of the utmost possible success from the adoption of a system of improvement, and the greatest possible abuse of that success. We have no design to exaggerate the effects or events which are necessary to justify these large conjectures; but we apprehend, that upon any reasonable estimate of them, they will be found to form a long series of stages, not only in the advancing, but also in the descending scale of human society; for no partial change in the people, either with respect to opinions or to numbers, seems adequate to the production of them. Let us endeavour therefore, to trace the career which is thus imagined, and to expand to the view, the various gradations of that ample progression by which we are to be conducted through greatness to decline. First, the diffusion of a foreign language, of foreign opinions and arts, of a spirit and religion the most dissimilar to those of the natives, who are a people exceedingly numerous, and from remote antiquity peculiarly attached to their own customs and notions; next a large increase of agriculture, manufactures, commerce; with new wants, tastes, and luxuries; a great demand for English productions and fashions; and a gradual separation from neighbouring nations, in whom these changes, probably misrepresented to them, would beget disgust and aversion to the converted Hindoos. The objection must imply moreover, not only the rise of just notions of civil liberty, but that they have become deeply rooted in a country where despotism seems to have been in all ages, and to be still, the natural and only idea of government*; it must imply vigour and unanimity to assert this liberty; then (before it can be abused) the possession and enjoyment of it; after this, a progress to licentiousness; and lastly, the violent dissolution of their connection with their sole protector, in the midst of nations become hostile to them, without a rational prospect of improving their situation, if they threw themselves upon the support of other European or native powers, or of maintaining independence if they stood alone.

To what distant age, may we not now ask, does this immense process lead us? If we even contract it to any space which an objector could urge as at all commensurate to the assumed consequences, should we still, in reasoning upon such conjectural delineations, stand upon any solid foundation? Would we act in serious and great concerns, even of private, individual import, upon such precarious remote contingencies? Do they not set us afloat upon the ocean of possibilities, where the prospect, extended so far as to become wholly indistinct, confounds sea and sky, and, in interspersed clouds of many shapes gives fancy easily to discover formidable promontories and rocks?

But if we look to known realities, to some of the many and great obstacles which will stand in the way of any such political revolution as is imagined, we shall be at a loss to give any sober satisfactory account of the manner in which they are to be removed. We insist not on the difficulty of disseminating, only by just and rational means, a new religion, opposed by inveterate habits and prejudices. The friends of that

* The government of the Seeks, though it have more of an aristocratic or republican form, seems no real exception to this observation, still less the aristocratic connection of the Mharatta chiefs.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

that scheme, indeed, dare not speak of success, with the confidence which the language of the objection seems to favour; yet they are not without hope; and they are animated by a conviction, that even a partial diffusion of Christianity, would improve the whole mass of society. But if we inquire, for instance, into the probable period of the general abolition of castes, which allowing it ever to happen, must be conceived, in the natural order of things, to precede some other supposed changes, what place shall we assign to it? Some point, we may venture to say, not within our ken; and beyond which, it seems vain to stretch our political solicitude in so changeable a world as this, wherein political prediction is so often baffled; perhaps indeed, because it is so seldom connected with present duty. Supposing, however, the tendency of events to be towards such an abolition, we may conclude, that the progress to it will be gradual. With the institution of castes, are blended not only religious doctrines and legal privileges, but the whole system of Hindoo manners. Deep rooted prejudices, combined with strong interests and immemorial habits, cannot reasonably be expected to give way to sudden impressions. The entire manners and usages of a people do not change at once. The institution therefore, will not be deprived of its power by any violent rupture or convulsion. And even after the doctrine of castes shall have lost its religious authority, and its tyrannical influence in society, (still arguing on the supposition that these things may happen,) the manners which it contributed to form, will, in a considerable degree, and for a certain time, remain. Among the Malabar converts to Christianity, distinctions of caste have not lost all their force; the habit of separation, the repulsive feelings, the secluding reserves, which spring from that source, though abated, still exist, in some degree perhaps analagous to the ceremonial prejudices of the first Christian Jews. As long as a principle of this nature remains in society, preventive as it will be of an intercommunion in marriages and professions, no formidable political association is likely to arise. Hence as the decline of the institution of castes will be slow and imperceptible, so the moment of its expiration will be unperceived; subsequent observation only will discover that it is past: therefore neither can this change be a signal for new events.

The grand danger with which the objection alarms us is, that the communication of the Gospel and of European light, may probably be introductive of a popular form of government and the assertion of independence. Upon what grounds is it inferred, that these effects must follow in any case, especially in the most unlikely case of the Hindoos? The establishment of Christianity in a country, does not necessarily bring after it a free political constitution. The early Christians made no attempts to change forms of government; the spirit of the Gospel does not encourage even any disposition which might lead to such attempts. Christianity has been long the religion of many parts of Europe, and of various protestant states, where the form of government is not popular. It is its peculiar excellence, and an argument of its intended universality, that it may subsist under different forms of government, and in all render men happy, and even societies flourishing; whereas the Mahomedan and Hindoo systems are built upon the foundation of political despotism, and adapted, in various instances, only to the climates that gave them birth. Christianity seeks moral good, and general happiness. It does not, in the pursuit of these objects, erect a peculiar political system; it views politics through the safe medium of morals, and subjects them to the laws of universal rectitude.

Nor are we to expect, that Christianity is entirely to supersede the effects of physical causes. The debilitating nature of the climate of our Eastern territories, and its unfavourable influence upon the human constitution, have been already mentioned *, and by others represented in strong colours: "Notwithstanding," says the celebrated historian of the British Transactions in Hindostan, "the general effemi-
"nacy of character which is visible in all the Indians throughout the empire, the "natives of Bengal are still of weaker frame, and more enervated disposition, than "those of any other province; bodily strength, courage, and fortitude, are unknown;
"even the labour of the common people is totally void of energy; and they are of a "stupidity, which neither wishes, nor seems to be capable of extending its opera"tions into any variety of mechanical dexterity. All those of the better castes, who "are not fixed to the loom, are bred to the details of traffic and money, in which "their patience and perseverance are as great as their detestation of danger, and "aversion

* Chap. III, pp. 39, &c.

"aversion to bodily fatigue*." From this striking description ought to be excepted the military tribes, to whom it will not properly apply; and the general features, we must take the liberty to say, are overcharged: but having made due allowances on these accounts, the picture will certainly possess no faint resemblance of the original.

Indolence, pusillanimity, insensibility, as they proceed not wholly from physical sources, would be at least partially corrected by moral improvement; but the influences of a tropical sun would still be oppressive. The slight structure of the human body, with its ordinary concomitants, still forming the taste to a vegetable diet, would ill second ardent designs, even if the mind were vigorous enough to conceive them. In the early formation of the relations and habits of domestic life, which modify, in no inconsiderable degree, the Hindoo character, there would be no material innovation. The nature of the country adds to the effects of the climate. It is unfavourable for long journies; and the Hindoos, in general a remotely inland people, have a strong aversion to the sea; even the air of it is offensive to them. They are thus deprived of all the advantages which the intercourses of navigation, and an acquaintance with the world at large, would procure to them. Nor is there the least probability, that they will ever become maritime; and as little likely are they to become in other respects, an enterprizing people. More calculated for passive suffering than for arduous attempts, they little love such exertions as freedom demands, and wish rather to be protected, than to have the trouble of protecting themselves.

Where then is the rational ground for apprehending, that such a race will ever become turbulent for English liberty? A spirit of English liberty is not to be caught from a written description of it, by distant and feeble Asiatics especially. It was not originally conceived nor conveyed by a theoretical scheme. It has grown in the succession of ages from the active exertions of the human powers; and perhaps can be relished only by a people thus prepared. Example is more likely to inspire a taste for it than report; but the nations of Europe have seen that liberty and its great effects, without being led to the imitation of it; for the French revolution proceeds not upon its principles; it is an eruption of atheism and anarchy.

The English inhabiting our settlements in India, have no share in the British government there. Some are employed as servants of the Public, but no one possesses any legislative right. Why then should we give to the natives, even if they aspired to it, as it is unlikely that they will thus aspire, what we properly refuse to our own people? The British inhabitants would be extremely averse to such a participation. Our Government, as it is now constituted, interests Europeans in its support, without the danger which colonization might ultimately incur, their views of establishment and of final comfort centering in the mother country.

The conduct of the British American colonies has raised, in some minds, confused surmisings and apprehensions of the possibility of similar proceedings on the part of our Indian provinces. These alarms are easily caught by such persons, as shrink from the idea of whatever might have a remote tendency to advance our Asiatic subjects in the scale of human beings; conceiving, (with what political truth may perhaps hereafter appear,) that the more entirely they continue in their present ignorance, superstition, and degradation, the more secure is our dominion over them†. But never surely were apprehensions more destitute of solid foundation. There

* Part II, page 5th, of the History of Military Transactions, &c. by Mr. Orme, an author well entitled to the high rank he holds in public estimation, by his generally just and comprehensive views of the subjects which he treats, the clearness, accuracy, vigour and dignity of his narration; but not appealed to in the former part of this Tract in the account there given of the state of society among the Hindoos, from an idea that he had not any large opportunities of intimately observing the conduct and manners of the middling and lower classes, who live remote from European intercourse.

† From the mischief which has recently been done in this country, by the dissemination of pernicious publications among the lower people, some persons seem inclined to think, that it would be better for the national security and tranquillity, if that class of the community received no education. As this opinion touches very nearly the main argument which is maintained in the present Tract, the writer, though conscious that neither his ability, nor the limited space of a note, can do justice to the subject, hopes he shall be pardoned in throwing out a few observations upon it.

Springing probably from much better motives than the old exploded maxim, that "ignorance is "the mother of devotion," it nevertheless seems to go upon a principle of a similar kind; it seems to imply, that "ignorance is the surest source of "obedience." But it is presumed, that neither history nor reason will justify such a position, in any sound sense, or indeed in any sense at all, unless a government could be supposed to confine all the knowledge of a country to itself. Knowledge has been said, with apparent truth, to be a species

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

There is, and there ever must be, an essential dissimilarity between the two cases. The Americans were, in fact, Englishmen, (with some infusion of foreign Europeans, which may have contributed to alienate the colonies from this country,) they possessed all the energy of the European character, all the lights of Europe; they were born in a temperate climate, nursed in the largest principles of freedom; nay the seeds of republicanism were sown in the first formation of the leading colonies. They had already species of power. The knowing have power over the ignorant; even the pretence of knowledge, where ignorance only is opposed to it, has a similar advantage; and knowledge, like other kinds of power, the more exclusively it is possessed, the more it may be made an instrument of abuse. In the dark ages, when the stock of learning and information was comparatively little, and that little was shared only among a few, the abuses of knowledge and of pretended knowledge, and the ill consequences of those abuses, were greater than they have been in more enlightened times. In our own country, what numerous and gross evils prevailed in society from these causes? Corrupt churchmen and ambitious nobles, (who had the credit of superior intelligence as well as the honour of superior rank,) led the common people within their respective spheres, as they pleased. The common people indeed, had then a spirit of implicit obedience, but it subjected them continually to the impositions of those who assumed the direction of them, and generally to the detriment of the nation at large. Hence the history of this island, prior to the Reformation, exhibits a frequent succession of internal convulsions. That grand event introduced new light; and it was diffused among the lower orders, whose instruction became thenceforth an object of particular care. The consequences were, greater internal order, peace, and stability; thence sprung enlarged industry, adventurous enterprizes, and all the long succession of prosperity which this country has enjoyed.

We have advanced to a high degree of improvement in sciences and arts, in all the conveniences and enjoyments of civil life. Vast commerce has brought vast wealth; and wealth has been followed by its too inseparable attendant, corruption of manners. Our old solid principles, which were the foundation of our greatness, have been gradually falling into disregard and neglect. They might have been well enough in our humbler beginnings, or in a less liberal age; but encreased lights, greater elevation, and a fulness of all means of gratification, have seemed to many to plead first for relaxation, and then for the admissions of other principles allowing a suitable enlargement in indulgencies without fear. This spirit has spread through the whole mass of society. Writings and representations have helped the diffusion of it. Its effects have been visible on morals, and on the happiness of private life. Reverence for religion and for government has decayed. Both have been insidiously attacked from time to time; and at length, as the more mature produce of this spirit, some, disdaining the measured advances hitherto made in unprincipling men, and encouraged by the fatal consummation of a like career in a neighbouring country, have openly and furiously attempted the subversion of all legitimate authority, human and divine. The incendiary torch and the secret mine, have been industriously employed to destroy the venerable fabrics of our religion and our constitution. Seditious and atheistical writings, superlative in the impudence of their falsehood, have been particularly adapted to the vulgar taste; and obviously, because the ignorance of the vulgar exposes them to easier imposition, as the too general example which they had long seen around them, predisposed them to progressive boldness in licentiousness. Then it is, that some men seeing the foundations of our polical existence thus attacked, begin to argue from the abuse of a thing against its use, and to think it would be better for the community, that the lower people should not be instructed even to read, as by such privation they would, it is conceived, be inaccessible to infection from the press.

But in fact, the evils of which we complain, originate in no small degree from the ignorance that has naturally followed the dereliction of right principles. The symptoms indicate a method of cure contrary to that which is proposed. The habit is diseased; the disorder, too deep to be reached externally, requires that the application be directed to its source. A return to ignorance may hasten the destruction of a society become corrupt through refinement, but can hardly contribute to restore it to soundness. At our advanced stage of improvement, it must be vain to imagine, that any retrograde movement we could effect in knowledge, would avail to secure the common mind from agitations and commotions. If any scheme of that kind even succeeded so far as to confine knowledge again among a smaller number, it could not reach to such characters as are now zealous to loosen and root out all received opinions in religion and government; but they would, on the contrary, be able to do more mischief than they effect now, because the more profound were the ignorance of the multitude, the more scope would there be, as in the dark ages, for the arts and activity of wicked men to work upon their credulity. Of this France has furnished a recent instance, too memorable to be ever forgotten. The want of knowledge and principle among the lower classes, left them a prey to Jacobinical impostures and delusions, by which they were hurried at once into the atrocities of anarchy and atheism.

It is not then by exposing our common people, unarmed and defenceless, to the daring blasphemies and sophistries of the preachers of impiety and sedition, that we can hope to keep them quiet. Our security lies, and lies only, in diffusing good instruction and right principles among them. In this too, the French revolutionists have afforded a lesson, which may suggest something useful to us. They endeavour that the minds of the people may not remain in that unfurnished state, of which they made advantage; but that the young especially, may be imbued with the tenets and prejudices favourable to their cause.

It is perhaps a mistake to suppose, that the common people among us, who have been most prone to tumult and disorder, are such as can read and write, or that the tendencies to commotion which have appeared, are to be ascribed to any degree of education possest by that class. Besides that one reader in a circle or in a village would be sufficient to disseminate what was level to the vulgar understanding and acceptable to vulgar prejudices, and that the lower ranks are more affected by what they see or hear, than by what they read; those tendencies have chiefly manifested themselves in large towns, abounding with manufacturers, or idle vagabonds destitute of character or qualities sufficient to procure an honest livelihood, and it is therefore fair to presume, the least instructed part of the community. The manufacturers, generally put to work when yet children, already a popular government. They were inured to arms, to hardships, and toils. The spirit of improvement animated them in a thousand different lines. They were expert seamen; their country abounded in excellent harbours; and in their geographical situation, they were (with the exception of one or two of our detached, more recently settled colonies) the sole civilized people in a great tract of continent, which seemed to offer to them the tempting prospect of becoming there the only political power. With all this, they were near enough to our insidious enemies to be constantly instigated to resistance by their arts, and effectually aided by their arms and resources. To what one of these many particulars, shall we discover a parallel among our Hindoo subjects? To none, as they now are; and in various important points, no resemblance is ever to be expected. The origin, the physical character and dren, often receive no education. When grown up, they are, not unfrequently congregated in large numbers, sometimes without due attention to decorum; they encourage each other in vice; and the gains of their labour enable them to pass the time of relaxation, in which they commonly include what ought to be allowed to sacred purposes, in dissolute indulgence. Among people of this character, there is combustible matter already prepared for the designs of those who seek to kindle discontent and disturbance. But the writer of these observations had occasion, not long ago, to see a contrast to this description, in a populous country parish. In that district there were very few persons of sufficient age, who could not read. The people were in general sober, decent, regular in their attendance on public worship; and in the course of twenty preceding years, one instance of the commission of a capital crime among them had not occurred. The doctrines of Paine found little to work upon in such a community; the Bible was reverenced there, and every man kept steadily within his own place.

But we are not left in this case to smaller instances of individual observation. An experiment has been going on upon a large scale for a long series of years, in the sight of the whole nation, in the two countries of Ireland and Scotland. The common classes of the former country have unhappily been too generally kept in ignorance to the present day; and are not the consequences most obvious and most serious? How lamentably are the lower people there distinguished by vicious, turbulent, and lawless proceedings? In what division of the British dominions has there appeared so great a propensity to embrace democratic, disorganizing principles? And it is observable, that these principles, and the barbarities of which we hear so much, have prevailed chiefly in remoter, less enlightened parts of the kingdom, whilst the vicinities of Dublin, Cork and other considerable places more civilized by knowledge, have been more orderly and quiet. Scotland, on the contrary, has been remarkable for attention to the instruction of the lower classes of its inhabitants, and they have, in general, been distinguished for near two centuries past by a spirit of sobriety and order. In the more remote inaccessible parts of that country, whither, obstructed by particular causes, light penetrated more slowly, regularity and good order were also of later establishment; but the natives of those divisions, misguided into excess on some occasions now long past, have since been as eminent for a quiet and peaceable demeanour at home, as for standing numerously in the foremost ranks of those who have bled for the interests and the honour of this country in every quarter of the globe; and at the present critical juncture have come conspicuously forward, in many bands, for the support of our constitution and our religion, against all enemies, foreign and domestic.

Indeed, if we were even to set aside the consideration of religion, and the good principles it inculcates, and to regard knowledge merely as power, or as an instrument of civilization, we might safely rest the present question upon this ground. The diffusion of knowledge would, in the end, render a nation more disposed to check the admission of disorganizing principles. Doctrines it is admitted, while new, might make, as they often do, an irregular impression; but at length these irregularities would be corrected by good sense and reflection; and surely literature, even in its lowest stages, must be allowed to be more favourable to the production of good sense and reflection than ignorance.

But when we take into the question the influence of religion and all its salutary principles, certainly no one who considers their force and tendency can hesitate how to decide. Christianity was given to be a "a light to the world;" ignorance is declared in the inspired writings to be one of the leading causes of the ruin of the Jewish nation, and of the vices of the Heathens. The ancient Pharisees were condemned by the Author of our religion for taking away the key of knowledge, that is, the use of the Scriptures from the people; which also has been eminently the sin of the Romish Church. It is, on the contrary, a stated prayer of the Church of England, that the people may so read the word of God as duly to profit by it; and as that word "thoroughly furnishes" those who submit to it "for all good works," so where else shall we find such pointed authoritative precepts for the due regulation, order, and peace of society? "Put the people in mind to be subject to principali-
"ties and powers, and to obey magistrates, not only
"for fear of human punishment, but for conscience
"sake; to submit to every ordinance of man for
"the Lord's sake, whether it be to the king as su- "preme, or to governors as sent by him, for so
"is the will of God. Prayers, are to be made for "Kings and all in authority, that we may lead a
"quiet and peaceable life, in all godliness and ho-
"nesty. Christians are commanded to study
"to be quiet and to mind their own business, to "fear God and the King, and not to meddle with
"those who are given to change."

Those therefore, who would, by with-holding the knowledge of letters from the vulgar, abridge the use of the Scriptures, would in fact aid the views of such as wish to overthrow our Christian faith and our civil establishment. If there be any who misuse the doctrines of the Gospel, by teaching a wild and shallow religion, which may indeed too easily connect with political error and disorder, the remedy must assuredly be, in this or in any similar case, not to leave the field entirely to mistaken guides, but more strenuously to oppose error by truth; and if the same zeal, the same personal interest, with which the emissaries of sedition have laboured, were universally employed on the other side, rationally and solidly to inculcate right principles and wholesome instructions, we might comfortably hope, that the attempts of domestic and foreign enemies to excite internal troubles among us would end in their disappointment and disgrace.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

and condition, the intellectual, moral, and political state of the Hindoos, have already appeared, in the course of this essay, to be totally different. On their local circumstances only, it remains to say, in addition to what was before intimated, a few words. If they were ever "to exalt the spear of enmity" against their ancient masters, they would do so almost environed by Hindoos, whose faith they had renounced, and to whom their apostacy would have rendered them odious. Could they trust such neighbours as allies, or resist them as enemies? What their interest would obviously require them to avoid, surely we have no right to assume that they would be so unwise as to commit. And if they called in the assistance of an European power, would they thus obtain independence, or only change one master for another? On all the coast of Hindostan there are but three or four good ports, and these at great distances from each other; though the shore is in many places accessible to an invading force, and there are some tolerable harbours in the islands of the Bay of Bengal, of which an enemy could take great advantage. Now if the Hindoos could be renovated in every other particular, no assignable period can be imagined for their acquiring and practising the art of navigation; and therefore those of them now subject to Great Britain must, in their supposed new circumstances, not only continue to need the supply of many wants from that country, but always be exposed to the hostile approaches of the navies of Europe. By a people so circumstanced, it does not appear how independence is attainable. They must, in effect, be at the mercy of the strongest maritime power. Whilst therefore, we continue to be that power, it is rather to be expected that their own interest, and the preference which their imitation of our manners will have given us over other European nations, will jointly induce them to remain safe under our protection; as these motives, on their part, will strengthen us in India against European invaders, and so contribute to maintain our naval superiority at home; which superiority, in the present state of our Hindoo subjects, is still more necessary for the preservation of our Eastern possessions, than it would be on the suppossed approximation of that people to the British character.

It may now be fair to enquire into the propriety with which that species of doubt or apprehension, which has just been considered, insinuates, as it does, some moral relation between the American revolution, and such principles as are proposed to be introduced among our Indian subjects. Is it to be supposed, that if the Americans, being in their physical character, their local and political circumstances, the same, had professed Mahomedanism, or any pagan religion, they would not have been at least equally prone to a revolution? If we had maintained in America, the same kind of despotic government which has prevailed in the East, where the sovereign, when dispatching a viceroy to a distant province, could seldom know that he should not soon have to send an army to reduce him to obedience, will it be asserted that our authority would have been better or equally secured? But after all that is said of the separation of the American colonies from Great Britain, it is now a fact well known, that it did not spring from the general disposition, or the previous design of the people: in the possession of all the advantages, which have been enumerated, they had not become impatient for independence; and among the reasons to be assigned for the attachment which then still remained among them for this country, may certainly be reckoned their possession of the same language and religion.

If it be urged, that a comparison between the American colonists, and the natives of our Eastern territories, can be justly instituted only in considering the latter, not as they are at present, but as they would be after all the proposed improvements were diffused among them, it may be answered, that our previous statement of the effects of these improvements, affords matter for this comparison, so far as things contingent and unknown, can be compared with things established and known; and that it is fair, for a double reason, to state the present disparity between the two races of people, first to shew the immense career which the Hindoos have yet to run, even in the prosecution of such improvements as are attainable, and secondly to demonstrate, that in the character, situation, and circumstances of the Americans, at the æra of their revolution, there were radical important distinctions, which no improvement, on the part of the Hindoos, could annihilate; or in other words, that they could never be expected to arrive at the point at which the Americans then stood.

Indeed those who know the country of Hindostan will probably think that political liberty is the last thing likely to flourish there. Though that country has been, from causes causes of a different nature which will be hereafter noticed, always subject to revolutions and convulsions; a revolution, the idea and act of the popular mind, upon the principles, or rather from an abuse of the principles of civil liberty, would be as great a political phenomenon as the world has exhibited, and one of which Asia has given no example. To bring a timid submissive people, whom the Tartars called "worshippers of power," up to the manliness of the European character, to elevate the feeblest of them, the Bengaleze, to so high a point of energy, that like the American descendants of the British themselves, they should plan the daring project of an independent empire, seems to be something beyond what has yet been seen, or is reasonably to be expected from the effects of institutions, civil or religious, upon nations.

CHAP. IV. Inquiry into Measures for improving the Condition of our Asiatic Subjects; and Answers to Objections.

Having thus considered the adverse consequences held forth by the objection, it may now be proper to notice more particularly, the favourable suppositions which it contains. The dangers it fears, are the dangers of prosperity. If then, this prosperity were realized, and the produce, the manufactures, and the riches of the country were greatly encreased, as according to the objection, English manners, tastes and wants, must also have become common, would not exports thither, and the reciprocal commerce arising from the change (not to reckon the imposts which merchandize, now hardly taxed at all, would then easily bear) be proportionably augmented? For what series of years, and with what multiplying powers, may we then conceive this augmentation to be progressive? Large as the assertion may seem, perhaps the shortest term we could assign to it would produce an accumulation of commercial profits and advantages, more than tantamount to a very high valuation of the fee simple of our provinces, if we could suppose a sale of them to be now made. And it is fair also to admit, that if the country were finally lost, our commerce might still be necessary to it, and possibly even continue to encrease. Such then would be the conclusion afforded by this formidable objection; if for the sake of argument, we were to allow the process described in it, to go on without resistance to its exceptionable parts. But we trust, we have already shewn, that it is not entitled to this concession, and that whilst it holds forth evils, only as distant and hypothetical, it is obliged, as the sole ground of its apprehension, to admit advantages to be certain and proximate.

It remains now to examine one important position, already mentioned to be tacitly contained in the objection, "that in a system, opposite to the one here proposed, must consist our future safety and stability in India." Unwilling as the writer is, to enter on so delicate a subject, and indeed inadequate to the due treatment of it, he feels himself called by his argument, to make some circumspect observations upon it. Certainly in a political view, the great question which this country has to determine respecting India is, "What are the best means of perpetuating our empire there*?" Not, what set of measures or line of policy may suit with the aspects of the day, or keep up the motion of the machine of government; but upon what general principles may we best hope to make our connection with that country permanent, and, as far as we can, indissoluble? Towards the determination of this question, perhaps it will be well to revert to the past history of our Indian provinces (or let us say to those of Bengal in particular, the chief seat of our dominion) and to the character of the natives of them. The English, it is true, were at first guided in their eastern administration, rather by nascent events, than by abstract principles or recorded experience; but however natural this may be, in the progress to establishment, a more extended survey of the course of past affairs in the acquired country, with their causes and consequences, may well befit the new possessors, when firmly settled in their power. It is not perhaps enough to exempt them from this review, that they follow a system of government widely different from the system of their predecessors, and are themselves a very different people. Among their Asiatic subjects, certain general properties which belong to human nature, and certain peculiar qualities resulting from a peculiar composition of society, may be expected to have a steady operation, where not controlled by stronger influences. If we look back then to the history of Bengal for five centuries, we

* Some will be ready to answer, "By securing to the people their religion and laws;" and in the just sense of the words, namely, that no violent change in either, contrary to the sense of the people, is to be enforced, we agree to the proposition. But what if the religion should be less favourable to our dominion than another system, and the people were induced voluntarily to make that other their religion; would not the change be for our interest?

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

we shall find, that except in the period when the Mogul empire was in its vigour, and the component parts of it thereby kept in peace with each other, that country has been the scene of frequent revolutions; and we cannot fail to discover, that as the despotism of eastern government may be reckoned the first and remote principle of such changes, so they have immediately proceeded from two causes, the lawless spirit of ambitious adventure common among all the military tribes of Hindostan, and the nature of the general mass of the people inhabiting that region.

The Persians and Tartars, who have poured into it from early ages, have generally been soldiers of fortune, who brought little with them but their swords. With these they have not unfrequently carved their way to dignity and empire. Power has been, and is their darling object; nothing was scrupled by them to obtain it; the history of Mahomedan rule in Hindostan is full of treasons, assassinations, fratricides, even parricide is not unknown to it. These northern adventurers by their spirit and pursuits, became in fact an accession, of more active and stronger qualities indeed, to the military division of the people of Hindostan. The Hindoos, though held to be less prone to the shedding of blood, have not however, carried their nicety far, when the prize of sovereignty or authority has been in question; but among them, sanguinary ambition has been usually confined to the Brahmins and the military caste; to the latter more.

The military class of the Hindoos, which in its institution has some of the features of a militia, forms in reality a great standing army of mercenaries, ready to be hired on all occasions, though usually not obliged to enter into actual service. Thus the sovereign of a country cannot always command their assistance, whilst the existence of such a body may often render a domestic competitor, or a foreign enemy, formidable to him. From this copious source, any man of enterprise, whatever were his views or pretensions, could always find partisans, if he had funds to entertain them; the treasure of the prince has been often used by his servants, to hire men to despoil him also of his throne. No character has been so bad, no cause so unjust, as not to find an army to support it if there were money to pay them. The members of the military caste, conceiving themselves destined by their creation to fight, often take up arms with the same indifference and indiscrimination as a labourer takes up a spade; insomuch that it has not been unusual to see a defeated army join the standard of the victor, upon the same principle which carries the labourer from one employer, with whom business runs low, to another whose service and means he deems more sure. The military Mahomedans (for many of the descendants of the Tartars who settled in Hindostan fell into the lines of civil life) are equally ready as the military Hindoos to engage themselves in commotions, quarrels, and any species of warfare, both having always, in times of confusion, an eye to plunder.

From this institution of a military class, the wisdom of which is surely impeached by the general effects it has produced, the military spirit came at length to reside almost wholly in one portion of the people. And hence may, in part at least, have followed the abjectness of the inferior tribes, composing the main body of the nation, and their want of public spirit. However much they may, on different accounts, have preferred a Hindoo to a Mahomedan government, no instance is recollected of their rising to support any native prince, or keep out any invader. The whole history of the Mahomedan empires in Hindostan, as well as the traces we have of the anterior government of the Hindoos, and what we see in modern days, all concur to prove the slavish disposition of that people, and their want of attachment to their rulers.

From these several causes, the despotic genius of Eastern government, the exclusive hereditary allotment of the military profession to one class, and the abject character of the people, have proceeded the great encouragement of individuals to the violent assumption of power, and the frequency of insurrections, convulsions, and revolutions in that country. And the same causes, though their operation may, by various circumstances, be occasionally suspended, will as long as they exist, have a tendency to produce the same effects. Hindostan has alternately been united under one great head, or partitioned into many states. New conquerors have, in different ages, appeared on that continent, who encreasing as they went on, have at length, by the vast number of their followers, overwhelmed every thing that opposed them. We now, indeed, see the empire of the Moguls prostrate, and may be apt to think, that arranged as the politics and powers of Hindostan are, the same order of things

things is not likely to return; but it was upon the subversion of the Patan empire that the Moguls rose; and may not a new adventurer, and a new horde from Tartary, establish yet another dynasty? It was perfectly in the option of Nadir Shaw, when he entered Delhi as a conqueror, in 1739, to have done this*. And if one of those scourges of mankind who have so frequently desolated India, should again arise, sending his fame, and the idea of his "happy destiny" before him, might not the multitudes collected in his progress, poured out at length into the remote quarter of Bengal, endanger our existence there? Whether we suppose him to advance in the first flush of conquest, or after he had given a central consolidation to his power, he would be backed by the resources of a vast inland region, by large armies of horse, and myriads of infantry. If we now figure to ourselves the progress of his operations, it will not bring them nearer; it will be in order that we may be better guarded against them. The Tartars, unaccustomed to cope with our steady military gallantry and skill, might be repeatedly repulsed. Still fresh swarms of assailants might be brought forward, and season after season, invasion be renewed. We could bring few cavalry into the field; the numerous squadrons of the enemy might waste and exhaust the country; the landholders, from whom the revenues are derived, would, as is usual in Hindostan, upon the appearance of commotion, withhold the payment of their rents; the produce of the districts which the enemy might occupy, they would immediately appropriate; and the credit of our government, as indeed we even now experience in times of exigency, would not procure us any adequate supplies. We should thus be straitened and embarrassed in our resources; suspicions of our stability might arise in the minds of our subjects, and among them would be a great number of the military caste, unemployed by us, and ready to make their own use of any promising occasion. Many of those subjects, won by the splendor of new power, and the proud display of an imperial standard, or desirous of securing an early interest, perhaps indulging new hopes from a revolution, would fall away from us: others would wish for a cessation of predatory vexations, at the expence of our expulsion. The Seapoys, whose attachment to us has appeared surprising, though the causes of it seem neither inexplicable nor immutable,† supplied tardily, and perhaps only partially with the pay, of which the regular advance had before so conciliated them to our service; and instead of being animated by the career of victory, cooped up in a dubious defensive warfare, might also be tempted to listen to the large offers of a dazzling leader, in whom their ready notions of fatalism might easily present to them a new king of the world. In such an arduous crisis, we trust that every thing to be expected from bravery, fortitude, and military science, would be performed on our part; but must not our lasting dependence be chiefly on British troops, on our maritime power, and on supplies by sea? With all these, it is very easy to see how oppressive, how threatening a long struggle, maintained under such circumstances, possibly by aids derived from the mother country, must be to us; how much also it must shake our interests and our stability in the rest of India. Now in any such state of things, in any case of the same nature, less extreme, what would be of more importance to us, what could so effectually fortify our cause, as to have the people of our territories sincerely attached to our government; to have established in their minds such an affectionate participation in our lot, such an union with our interests, as should counteract the defection, defalcations, and treachery, to be otherwise apprehended from the ordinary bent and practice of the Asiatic character? We should thus have the service of all the resources which our rich provinces contained, we should have the steady adherence and co-operation of the people, and in this way, might certainly confound and baffle even the powerful preparations of an imperial despot, to whose affairs long and spirited resistance might prove highly detrimental, by encouraging distant provinces which he had before over-run, to throw off the yoke. And how are our subjects to be formed to a disposition thus favourable to us, to be changed thus in their character, but by new principles, sentiments, and tastes, leading to new views, conduct, and manners; all which would, by one and the same effect, identify their cause with ours, and proportionably separate them from opposite interests? It is not, we may venture to affirm, from such a change, but in continuing as we are, that we stand most exposed to the dangers of political revolution. The objection which conceives remote evils to result from a plan of improvement, does not advert to others which may, in the mean time, arise from causes of a different kind. We join with it in the desire of securing in permanence, the fair possession this country has

* If he had, we might probably have still been mere merchants in India.

† See note to page 31.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

has obtained (more, it may be concluded, by the overruling dispensation of Providence, than by any scheme of man,) but differ as to the means. To us it appears, that nothing promises so fair for the end proposed, as engaging the attachment and regard of the people, and removing those causes which have hitherto made them so acquiescent in every change. It was this passive temper, joined to the expectations which many might entertain from the deposition of the reigning Nabob, that contributed to our easy acquisition of the country; but the same temper would render our hold of it less sure in any arduous contest. At present, we are every way different from the people whom we hold in subjection; different in country, in language, in manners, in customs, in sentiments, and in religion; their interest also, for the reasons mentioned in the early part of this memoir, they must conceive to be different from ours. What then can be a healing principle with regard to all these points, but a principle of assimilation, a common-bond, which shall give to both parties the reality and the conviction of mutual benefit from the connection? Without an uniting principle, a conjoining tie of this nature, we can suppose the country to be, in fact, retained only by mere power; but in the same degree that an identity of sentiments and principles would be established, we should exhibit a sight new in the region of Hindostan, a people actively attached, cordially affected to their government, and thus augmenting its strength. In this laudable way, we should become more formidable to the other powers of that continent, we should be best secured against foreign enemies, insurrections, and the dangers of an hereditary military body; we should have more support from the mass of the people, and in a word, be most effectually guarded against a revolution.

It is remarkable, that the radical principle of the conclusion thus made, a conclusion to which an acquaintance with the Indian character, and the experience that progressive time has afforded of the effects of knowledge, particularly the divine knowledge of Christianity, may now easily lead an ordinary mind, directed, according to the judicious historian of The ancient European Intercourse with India, the policy of the Grecian conqueror of that country, in securing his Eastern acquisitions. However different, in other respects, the circumstances of that celebrated personage may be from ours, in this we agree with him, that we have an Asiatic empire to maintain. And Dr. Robertson, who in acknowledging the eccentricities of that extraordinary man, gives him also the credit of profound political views, observes, "he early perceived, that to render his authority secure and permanent, it "must be established in the affection of the nations he had subdued, and maintained "by their arms; and that in order to acquire this advantage, all distinctions between "the victors and the vanquished must be abolished, and his European and Asiatic "subjects be incorporated and become one people, by obeying the same laws, and by "adopting the same manners, institutions, and discipline." It is the leading idea only of this policy, that is meant to be applied here; and that leading idea is plainly the principle of assimilation. It would neither suit us, nor our subjects, to act upon it universally, as Alexander proposed. We ought not to wish, that the distinctions between the two races should be lost, or to aim at introducing into Asia laws framed for this country; but to attach our subjects by affection, by interest, by winning them to our religion and our sentiments,—this would be at once to add to their happiness, and to arrive at the same object which the great conqueror had in view, that of rendering our authority "permanent and secure."

This policy is recommended by some other considerations, which shall be briefly noticed. It is sufficiently understood, that since our first appearance on the theatre of Indian war and politics, the native powers have improved in military discipline, and that we now find it necessary to bring into the field, armies proportionably larger than those that served to achieve our early victories. Having so interesting an evidence of the capability of the natives to improve, there appears no good reason to conclude, that their advancement in military skill may not be further progressive. It is extremely probable, that the beneficial effects of our civil policy will also in time force themselves upon their attention, and from the cogent motive of self-interest, produce at least some imitations. All the advances they make in the arts of war or of peace, will serve to lessen that superiority in both, by which, under the disadvantages attaching to us as foreigners, and with forces comparatively small, we have acquired an ascendancy among the powers of Hindostan. The nearer we approach to an equality, the more these disadvantages will be felt. Our business seems to be therefore, by new resources in policy, still to preserve the relative rank in which we have hitherto stood; and what can more directly conduce to this end, than to infuse new principles of attachment, of activity, and industry, among the people we govern, thus strengthening their character, and deriving additional support from them?

principles

The European nations have an undisputed possession of the Indian seas, and are now so much connected with the continent of India, that every material change which takes place in them, may be expected, in some shape or other, to extend its influence thither. It cannot be irrational, therefore, to suppose, that the astonishing events which have lately convulsed Europe, and are likely to produce consequences durable and momentous, may have their bearings upon our Asiatic interests. That exorbitant ambitious power which seeks our destruction, may aim, by different channels and instruments, to excite troubles and disorders in our possessions, or to embroil us with our Indian neighbours. The Cape of Good Hope, the head of a vast country, in a fine climate, and singular in the felicity of its position for a great emporium, whether it remain with us or fall under French influence, will probably, by a change already begun in its internal policy, swarm, at no distant period, with a numerous race, of European character and descent, planted at the entrance into the Indian seas, and within two months sail of the Indian coasts. Another great colony of the same race, in a climate equally favourable to the human constitution, is springing up on the eastern side of the Indian Ocean. The appearance of many adventurers of these descriptions on the shores of Hindostan, as one day they may be expected to appear, (a day perhaps nearer than it is possible to bring other apprehended improvements,) can hardly fail to have some effect upon the political affairs of that country, those of the native princes as well as our own. In all these, or any other supposable cases then, the more closely we bind the people under our rule to ourselves, the more firmly shall we be prepared, in that quarter, against adverse events and combinations.

It may be urged by some, in opposition to the systematical improvement here proposed, that the influence of the British government and character, especially where the intermixture of Europeans is large, will of itself gradually produce a change in the sentiments of our Eastern subjects. Let this position be, to a certain degree, admitted; it is one interesting enough to merit some attention. The English, in their obscure commercial state, were little known or regarded by the people whom they now govern. Their elevation to power, brought into public display all the particulars of their character, with their manners and customs. These, in various instances, at first shocked the prejudices of the Hindoos, who thought, with a kind of horror, of the new masters to whom they bowed. But by degrees they perceived, that usages the most repugnant to their ideas, were free of that turpitude which they had associated with them. They found these foreigners superior to them in general powers and knowledge, in personal honour and humanity; and at length saw the British government assume a character of equity and patriotism, unknown in their preceding administrations. These qualities, it shall be granted, have a tendency to conciliate in some measure, the natives who are near enough to observe them. Among those who live in our settlements, or are much connected with Europeans, long habits of intercourse have softened down repugnancies, or blunted the sensations which our manners at first inspired; and there is in such, an apparent, perhaps a real abatement of jealousy and solicitude respecting their own notions and punctilios. But in all these varying aspects of the European character, something essential to those disposed to fall into an imitation of it has been absent. Men that meet together in this country for the purposes of business, seldom enter into communication respecting the foundations of their faith and practice; any serious discussion of this nature, occurs still more rarely there. The indifference for religion, which Mr. Hume ascribes to the English in general of the present age,—(he calls it profound indifference,)—may there pass for liberal toleration, or complaisant forbearance towards inferiors of another faith. Discovering in their intercourses with us little of the nature of the religion we profess, they will not, of course be apt to refer the good qualities of which the English appear possessed, to that source; nor will they know, that the national standard of morals formed from it, has an influence, even upon the conduct of those who pay no particular regard to a religious system. If then any of the Hindoos should, in time, feel some tendency to imitate that freedom in manners, sentiments, and intercourses, that latitude as to religious opinions and observances, which they see in their European masters, what would be the consequence but evidently this, that they would be loosened from their own religious prejudices, not by the previous reception of another system in their stead, but by becoming indifferent to every system. For a transition from one error to another is, it must be acknowledged, more readily made, than a transition from error to truth. Error is more easily imbibed, more hardly eradicated; truth more slowly received, more easily resigned. And in this way it is, that if we conceive the anarchial principles which have burst forth in Europe ever to spread to India, they will be most likely to have their entrance. Indeed so wonderfully contagious do they appear to be, so congenial to the worst qualities of human nature, that it may be difficult to point out a place where they can find nothing to fasten upon. Societies in which much corruption and much superstition prevail, seem in general more liable to them, than those in which true religion and morals are still strongly rooted. The French, it will readily be allowed, fell into them more readily than they would have embraced any scheme of personal reformation, or a more pure and strictly practical religious system. The abuses of civil and religious institutions lead to them, and furnish the most plausible pretences for them. False principles, and the fooleries of a false religion, even when used to support things good in themselves, as government and subordination, would ill stand before such arts and abilities as have lately assailed the truth. Truth only is invincible. To teach it therefore, is to take the surest means of excluding the infection of licentious disorganizing sophistries. A change from false religion to the true, is a movement from an exposed place to a strong fortress; and every advance made in the system of moral and religious instruction here recommended, so far from opening the way to those loose latitudinarian notions which tend to a rejection of all authority, would establish rights, human and divine, upon their proper basis, and bind the conscience to the observance of them.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

To these considerations, which on the whole may certainly be deemed not unworthy of attention, two other reflections may serve to give additional weight. First,—It is to be feared, that the number of lower Europeans will go on to encrease in our territories; they mix most with the natives, and by them the worst parts of our manners will be exhibited. Secondly,—By the security which we have with great wisdom given to the land tenures of Bengal, the value of property there, and the consideration arising from the possession of it, will naturally be enhanced, so that in process of time, the owners of large estates, hitherto little productive to them, may become of consequence by their wealth and possessions. We know also, that encreasing prosperity tends to strengthen pride and disorderly propensities. Here again, therefore, we find motives for the introduction of our principles; for if some at least, both of the higher and lower orders, may be led, by European manners, to adopt new ideas of relaxation, at the same time that new powers are put into the hands of the former, we ought, in good policy and reason, to communicate to them a system which, divested of all burthensome unnecessary ceremonies, and all superstitious folly, is yet calculated to produce a purer and higher influence than their own, upon the general moral conduct, and all the relative duties of life. As then we have already been gradually led, by good sense and expediency, to introduce regulations derived from our national ideas and principles, into the government and management of our possessions, their advantage and our safety may dispose us also to wish, that our religion and moral principles might obtain a fair establishment there; for if we can suppose, that through the encreasing relations between Europe and India, the common lights and manners of Europeans adventuring thither should ever make a strong impression, unaccompanied by the knowledge of those principles, which do not propagate themselves spontaneously, and are not to be inplanted without culture and care, that change might not be favourable to our interests; since the present circumstances of Europe seem emphatically to point out, that nothing but such principles can be depended upon, for keeping subjects in obedience and subordination *.

In

* These several objections, and the answers to them, excepting the sixth and seventh, were, as to their substance and scope, committed to writing in the latter end of the year 1792, though not then in any shape brought into notice. In April 1793, a discussion took place in a general Court of Proprietors of East-India Stock, in which almost all the same objections were advanced, by persons with whom the writer never had any communication on such subjects. This was on occasion of two resolutions which the House of Commons, very honourably for itself, had voted in the view of introducing the purport of them into the Act of Parliament then about to be passed, for renewing the charter of the East-India Company. The resolutions were these:

"RESOLVED, That it is the opinion of this "House, that it is the peculiar and bounden "duty of the legislature, to promote, by all just "and prudent means, the interests and happiness "of the inhabitants of the British dominions in "India; and that for these ends, such measures "ought to be adopted, as may gradually tend to "their advancement in useful knowledge, and to "their religious and moral improvement.

"RESOLVED, That sufficient means of religious "worship and instruction be provided for all "persons of the Protestant communion in the "service,

In coming, as we now do, to the close of the answer to the last and most material of the objections which are foreseen against the proposed scheme, that objection which questions the expediency of using the English language, it will be proper to call to recollection what was stated in the first opening of it,—that the principle of communicating our light and knowledge, and the channel or mode of communication, were two distinct things; that the admission of the former did not depend on the choice

" service, or under the protection of the East " India Company in Asia, proper ministers being " from time to time sent out from Great Britain " for those purposes; and that a chaplain be " maintained on board every ship of 500 tons " burthen, and upwards, in the East-India Com- " pany's employ; and that moreover, no such " ministers or chaplains shall be sent out, or " appointed, until they first shall have been ap- " proved of, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, " or the Bishop of London, for the time being."

Several Proprietors of East India Stock made a violent attack upon these resolutions, and the following is an abstract of all the arguments or objections urged against them, as they are reported by Mr. Woodfall. It is with reluctance that any reference is made here to the opinions then given, because they stand connected with particular names; and it is far from being the wish of the writer, to introduce any thing that may seem to have even a remote tendency to personality; but as opinions delivered in a public assembly, and afterwards made more public by the press, are fairly open to animadversion, so justice to the present subject, renders some notice of those now in question, indispensable.

OBJECTIONS STATED GENERALLY. " That " sending missionaries into our Eastern territories, " is the most wild, extravagant, expensive, un- " justifiable project, that ever was suggested by " the most visionary speculator. That the prin- " ciple is obnoxious, impolitic, unnecessary, full " of mischief, dangerous, useless, unlimited."

SPECIFIC ARGUMENTS, First Class. " The plan " would be dangerous and impolitic; it would " affect the peace and ultimate security of our " possessions. It tends to endanger and injure " our affairs there most fatally, it would either " produce disturbances, or bring the Christian " religion into contempt. Holding one faith or " religion, is the most strong common cause with " mankind, and the moment that took place in " India there would be an end of British su- " premacy.

" That the principle of proselyting was im- " politic, and was, or ought to be exploded, in so " enlightened a period as the eighteenth century."

" That it would be a most serious and fatal " disaster, if natives of character, even a hun- " dred thousand of them, were converted to " Christianity.

" That the establishment of seminaries and " colleges in America, was one of the most " efficient causes of the loss of that country.

" That suffering young clergymen, (who are " usually of pleasurable habits,) to over-run the in- " terior of India, would be dangerous, and prove ul- " timately destructive to the Company's interest."

Second Class. " The scheme would be un- " successful. It is extravagant to hope for the " conversion of the natives. They are invincibly " attached to their own castes; their prejudices, " manners, and habits, are all against a change."

" It is vain to attempt to overcome pre- " judices fixed by the practice of ages, far ex- " ceeding the time in which Britons had any idea " of religion at all. The attempt is, in these " views, idle, absurd, and impracticable."

" Only the dregs of the people can be con- " verted; they will pretend conversion, and dis- " grace Christianity.

" The higher, and more respectable natives, are " people of the purest morality, and strictest " virtue, (this was said only by one speaker, who " knew little of India.)

" The services of religion are devoutly per- " formed in the Company's settlements and ships, " either by clergymen or laymen, and their eccle- " siastical establishments are sufficient."

Third Class. " The scheme would be expen- " sive. The expence would be enormous, into- " lerable; one, two, or three hundred thousand " pounds."

Fourth Class. " The scheme would be un- " limited, in respect of the numbers and qualifi- " cations of the missionaries."

All these objections will be found already answered in the text. A few brief remarks upon them may however be proper, and will be sufficient here.

1st. The objections urged in general terms, are merely declamatory. They are accompanied by no reasonings or elucidations. But the principle which they censure as the most wild, extravagant, unjustifiable, mischievous, dangerous, useless, impolitic, that ever was suggested by the most visionary

---

* It will be remembered, that these are chiefly Idolaters, something of whose character and worship we have already seen. With whatever indifference idolatry may be viewed, and however venial it may be accounted in these times, even by persons born in Christian countries, it is a crime against which the displeasure of the holy and true God, the sovereign and unerring judge of the qualities of actions, is expressed, with peculiar indignation, contempt, and abhorrence, throughout that revelation which he hath vouchsafed to us; and it is therein shewn to have often brought on, by its nature and effects, the misery and ruin of individuals and of nations.

Even the wiser men of ancient Pagan Europe, between the superstition of which, and the idolatry of the Hindoos, an identity has been proved, (by Sir William Jones, in the Asiatic Transactions, Vol. I.) saw and complained of the evils of their popular system of religion. Cicero brings in an Epicurean philosopher, arraigning that system in severe terms. " The most absurd things, observes he, are said by " the poets; things which are noxious even by the agreeable " style in which they are conveyed; for they have intro- " duced gods mad with anger, inflamed with lust, and have " presented to our view their wars, battles, fightings, " wounds; their hatred, differences, strivings; their births, " deaths, " deaths, complaints, lamentations; their lusts, exceeding " in every kind of intemperance; their adulteries, fetters; " their lying with mankind; and mortals begotten of im- " mortal gods." (De Nat. Deor, Lib. I. §. 16.) And again, in the person of a Stoic, he thus reprobates the same system: " The introduction of feigned gods, has begotten false " opinions, and turbulent errors and superstitions, no better " than old wives' fables; for the figures of the gods, their " ages, dress, and ornaments, are set forth; their alliances, " marriages, affinities; and all are reduced to the similitude " of human imbecility: They are brought in as men dis- " turbed by passion; we hear of their lusts, sickness, " anger; yea as fables tell us, the gods have not wanted " wars and battles . . . . . These things are said and believed " most sottishly, and are full of extreme vanity and futility." (Ibid. Lib. II. §. 28.)

To these base gods, however, temples were erected, and divine honours paid. They had their costly trains of priests, services, sacrifices, festivals, and games. Some of their rites were atrociously cruel, others infamous for debauchery, prostitution, and the most unbridled excesses. Hence corruption was diffused among the people, the moral system, even of the philosophers, was very defective, and their allowed practices, in some respects abominable.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

choice which might be made of the latter, and was alone absolutely contended for. The channel of the English language, however, has been preferred, in the present plan, as being deemed the most ample and effectual; and though new, also safe and highly advantageous. Against this channel, however, the writer thinks it possible, that reluctancies may remain when arguments are obviated. Strongly as he is himself persuaded, that great and peculiar advantages would flow from it, he nevertheless would sionary speculator, is the principle of the Gospel itself.

The Gospel was propagated by missionaries; missionaries planted it in the different countries of Europe. Almost all those countries have, in imitation of the same practice, sent missionaries into infidel parts; and how is it possible for men to communicate it otherwise? In this kingdom, two societies are established by royal charter, for propagating the Gospel in Heathen lands; and there is a third society of long standing, employed in the same object, which enrolls among its members, many of the most eminent persons of the nation. So much for the antiquity, authority and general acknowledgment of this principle, which is treated as if nothing like it had ever been heard of before.

2d. It is obvious, that the first and second classes of specific objections, militate against each other. Since the scheme proposes only a pacific exposition of Christian truths, it cannot be both dangerous and unsuccessful. The danger is avowedly founded mainly, if not wholly, on the supposition of success. If success therefore is not to be hoped for, where is the danger? And again, if the scheme really threatens so much danger, what becomes of the argument against success?

These contradictory objections cannot both be just. The same speaker however, who is reported to have "thanked God" that the conversion of the natives would be a matter of impracticability, strenuously opposed the scheme on this ground, that the moment they and we came to hold one faith there would be an end of our supremacy in the East; but if he thought it impracticable to convert them to our faith, with what reason could he urge the danger which would follow from such conversion, as a serious and alarming objection? When the cause does not exist, neither can that, which can only flow from it as its effect.

3d. The principle of not communicating to the Hindoos the Christian religion, lest this should in the end, destroy our government over them, is however here fairly acknowledged and argued upon. The establishment of seminaries and colleges in our American colonies, is in the same spirit adverted to in a way of warning; as if Christianity had produced the revolution there, when in fact they were men of infidel opinions, who planned both the American and French revolutions.

The reason assigned in justification of this precautionary principle also deserves attention; "be-"cause holding one religion is the most strong "common cause with mankind." If the proposal had been, that the English should become converts to Hindooism, this argument might have been well placed; but applied to the present scheme, it can only operate in favour of it.

4th. It is curious to find it alleged, among the arguments against the proposed clauses, that some of the Hindoos were too good, and others too bad to be converted.

This was advanced by only one gentleman, little acquainted with India, whose speech happening by a common newspaper to reach the Reverend Mr. Swartz, already noticed as long a missionary of distinguished reputation in the Tanjore and Trichinopoly districts, produced from him a vindication of the conduct and effects of the mission in which he is concerned; a vindication framed indeed in modest and simple terms, suitable to the character of the writer, but highly honourable to the cause of missions, and though he intended it not, to his own. This piece, too good to be concealed, has been printed in the Transactions of the English Society for promoting Christian Knowledge, and a copy of it is given in the Appendix.

The assertion of the same speaker, that the higher natives of India are people of the purest morality and strictest virtue, is altogether new, and in palpable opposition to testimony and experience. Upon the gospel scheme, no man is too good or too bad for the benefits it proposes; and there is a very large class between the best and the worst, of whom the speaker took no notice. His other assertion, that the ceremonies of religion, or the service of the Common-prayer Book, were with great decency and devotion regularly performed by laymen on board the Company's ships, and on land, in places where there happened to be no clergyman, is a topic for ridicule, if the subject were not of so serious a kind; the reverse of this assertion being so notorious. And is there no use for a minister of religion, but to perform a ceremony, or to read a form of prayer once a week?

5th. The objections urged on the ground of the unlimited expence of the scheme, the unlimited numbers of the clergy that would be sent, their improper character, and their roving through the country, all go upon assumptions not only unwarranted, but contradicted by the tenor of the clauses themselves, and in opposition to the dictates of common sense. The Directors of the Company were themselves to be entrusted with the execution of the scheme; they were to judge of the number of missionaries sufficient, they were to regulate the expence. Was it conceivable, that they would have gone, in either article, to a length burthensome or dangerous to the Company? Was it conceivable that they would have suffered missionaries to ramble, at their pleasure, through the country, if the missionaries sent should have been men so disposed? but can it be imagined, that the friends of the scheme, and the respectable authorities whose testimonials were to render the missionaries receivable by the Company, (not to force them into their employ,) would have had so little regard to the success of their own object, as to select persons the least likely to promote it? In fact, the danger was of another kind; so much was left in the discretion of the Directors that if they should have had the disposition, they might also have possessed the power, very materially to thwart the prosecution of the scheme. And as to the real number and expence of missionaries at first, the former, if proper persons should have been found, would perhaps have been thirty; and the annual charge of their establishment, including dwellings, probably about fourteen thousand pounds.

6th. Upon the whole of this discussion, it appears to have been undertaken with a vehement determination against the principle of introducing Christianity among our Asiatic subjects, but without much previous consideration, or a large acquaintance with its bearings and relations, still less with a dispassionate temper of mind; for arguments subversive of each other, assertions palpably erroneous, assumptions clearly unwarrantable, were pressed into the opposition; the question was argued chiefly upon a partial view of supposed political expediency, and the supreme would do injustice to the cause for which he pleads, if he were to suspend its success entirely upon the adoption of this mode. The channel of the country languages, though less spacious, less clear, less calculated to transmit the general light of our opinions, our arts, and sciences, less free also for the conveyance of the light of religion itself, is nevertheless so far capable of rendering this last and most important service, in which are essentially involved all the other proposed meliorations, that if the question were between making no attempt, or making it in this way, undoubtedly there could be no hesitation. This mode ought, by no means to be declined or neglected, if there were no other. Through the medium of the country languages, though more contracted, more dim, and distant, still something may be done, and that in a concern which is of the last importance to present and to future happiness. But in choosing this method, more instruments ought necessarily to be employed; and then the meliorations which are so much wanted, may in time be partly effected; and the apprehensions which some may entertain from the diffusion of the English language, will have no place. But still it must be maintained, that for every great purpose of the proposed scheme, the introduction and use of that language would be most effectual; and the exclusion of it, the loss of unspeakable benefits, and a just subject of extreme regret.

THUS, we trust, it has been evinced, that although many excellent improvements have of late years been made in the government of our Indian territories, the moral character and condition of the natives of them is extremely depraved, and that the state of society among that people is, in consequence, wretched. These evils have been shewn to lie beyond the reach of our regulations, merely political, however good; they have been traced to their civil and religious institutions; they have been proved to inhere in the general spirit and many positive enactments of their laws, and more powerfully still in the false, corrupt, impure, extravagant, and ridiculous principles and tenets of their religion. Upon any of these points, it is conceived, that persons who either form their opinion, from actual observation, or from the current of testimony, will not greatly differ; shades of distinction there may be between them, but no substantial, radical contrariety. A remedy has been proposed for these evils;—the introduction of our light and knowledge among that benighted people, especially the pure, salutary, wise principles of our divine religion. That remedy has appeared to be in its nature suitable and adequate; the practicability also of applying it has been sufficiently established; our obligation to impart it has been argued, we would hope convincingly, from the past effects of our administration in those countries, from the more imperious consideration of the duties we owe to the people of them as our subjects, and from our own evident interest, as involved and consulted in their welfare. Our obligation has been likewise urged from another argument, the authority and command of that true religion which we have ourselves the happiness to enjoy and profess*. As the leading subject of this essay has been intentionally treated chiefly upon political grounds, the argument now mentioned has not been insisted upon at great length; but all its just rights are claimed for it, and it is transcendent and conclusive.

Nothing it would seem besides these intrinsic properties of the proposed measure, and these powerful extraneous motives, can be necessary to recommend the adoption of it. Yet since some persons have appeared to think, that the improvements which they allow to be likely from the prosecution of the suggested scheme might, by producing a course of encreasing prosperity, at length open the way to consequences unfavourable to the stability of our Indian possessions, these conceived consequences have importance, authority, and command, of Christianity, were left out of sight.

It ought to be remarked, upon the second of the two resolutions passed in the House of Commons, that the maintenance of a chaplain on board every ship of considerable size, employed in the long navigation to and from India, was the early spontaneous practice of the Company, and enjoined to them in the charters of King William and Queen Anne, the clauses of which, respecting this point, the said resolution did no more than revive.

*. To disallow either the fitness of our religion as a remedy, or our obligation to promote the knowledge of it, would be to differ from the reasoning of this essay in first principles; and such a difference, if any mind were influenced by it to resist the projected communication, ought in candour to be avowed.

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

have also been largely examined; and if the whole of the reasoning used by the writer has not been erroneous, they have been found to resolve themselves at last into mere apprehensions, conjectures, and general surmises, which the causes assigned for them seem so little to warrant, that in proportion to the degree in which those causes may actually exist, effects propitious to the permanence, as well as prosperity of our Eastern dominion, effects more propitious than our present system can generate, may rather be expected from them; as indeed it would not be less a phenomenon in the political than in the natural world, that from a root the most excellent, the worst fruit should be produced. The principle also upon which such consequences are objected, and the improvement of our Heathen subjects opposed, the principle of keeping them for ever in darkness and error, lest our interest should suffer by a change, has been shown to be utterly inadmissible in a moral view, as it is likewise contrary to a.l just policy.

In reasoning about things future and contingent, the writer would wish to stand remote from whatever should have the appearance of dogmatical decision, which indeed is not the right of even superior penetration, and to speak with that diffidence of himself, and deference for others, which so well become him; he would wish to speak for no cause further than the truth will bear him out; but the views he entertains of the present subject afford him no other conclusions than those he has advanced, and in them he thinks he is well supported. That a great remedy is wanted; that we have an excellent one in our hands; that it is our duty, on general and special grounds, to apply it; all these, are in his apprehension, positions nearly self-evident: from these alone a strong presumption, he conceives, arises, that it must be our interest to make the application; and if cogent specific reasons are further adduced to prove, that our interest would, in fact, thus be promoted, opposition to this scheme ought, in his opinion, to be justified by arguments very clear and very powerful; and such, he must honestly say, he has not been able to discover.

This subject has not hitherto received a formal consideration; but the objection which would resist all improvement, lest future inconvenience should arise from it, necessarily brings on this decisive question, whether we shall, in all time to come, passively leave our subjects in the darkness, error, and moral turpitude in which they now grovel, or shall communicate to them the light of truth, and the means of melioration, and of happiness personal and social? The question may more properly be,—whether we should keep our subjects in their present state? For if improvement ought not to be communicated to them, we should not be merely passive, but be careful to exclude it; as on the other hand if it ought to be communicated, or if it is possible that any rays of light may fortuitously break in upon them, we should not leave the task to others, or to chance, but be ourselves the dispensers of the new principles they receive, and regulate the administration of them. This question then is to determine the grand moral and political principle, by which we shall henceforth, and in all future generations, govern and deal with our Asiatic subjects: Whether we shall make it our study to impart to them knowledge, light, and happiness; or under the notion of holding them more quietly in subjection, shall seek to keep them ignorant, corrupt, and mutually injurious, as they are now? The question is not, whether we shall resort to any persecution, to any compulsion, to any sinister means:—No; the idea has been frequently disclaimed; it is an odious idea, abhorrent from the spirit of true religion; but whether, knowing as we do the falsehood and impiety of idolatrous polytheistic superstitions, knowing the cruelties, the immoralities, the degrading extravagancies and impositions of the Hindoo system, we shall silently and calmly leave them in all the fulness of their operation, without telling our subjects, who ought to be our children, that they are wrong, that they are deluded, and hence plunged into many miseries? Whether, instead of rationally, mildly explaining to them the divine principles of moral and religious truth, which have raised us in the scale of being, and are the foundation of all real goodness and happiness, we shall wink at the stupidity which we deem profitable to us; and as governors, be in effect the conservators of that system which deceives the people? Whether, in a word, we shall do all this merely from fear, lest in emerging from ignorance and error, they should be less easy to rule, and our dominion over them be exposed to any risk.

The wisdom, as well as the fairness of such a proceeding, must also be determined; whether on the whole it would be the best policy for our own interest, even if we look only to the natural operation of things: and here at least we should be careful

CHAP. IV. Inquiry into Measures for improving the Condition of our Asiatic Subjects; and Answers to Objections.

careful and clear; for if we mistake our interest, we lose our all, the very thing to which we sacrifice other considerations: especially it should be pondered, whether believing the moral government of the world, we can expect the approbation and continued support of the supreme Ruler of it, by willingly acquiescing in so much evil, so much moral and political evil, when so many just means for the alleviation of them are in our power.

These are the inquiries which this subject presents; the inquiries which fidelity to himself and to all the interests involved in it, would not permit the writer to suppress when he originally considered it; and the same motives, to which he may add, the duties of the station wherein he has since had the honour to be placed, forbid him to keep them back now: But does he in stating them, mean to point them offensively to any individual or body of men? No,—far from it; they were, at first, penned as they are now delivered, in good will and with a general aim: in this great question he strives rather to abstract his mind from personal recollections; and if it glances involuntarily at the idea of any one who he fears may not accord with his sentiments, if he should especially dread to find among such any whom he particularly respects and loves, it is a painful wound to his feelings. He cannot wish to offend or to censure,—he has no objects to serve by such means; and is sufficiently aware of the situation in which a work of this nature may place him, both in Europe and in India, never to have brought it forward but from some serious sense of duty. This question is a general one; if it seem to carry in it any retrospective censure, that censure applies to the country and to the age. Circumstances have now called for a more particular consideration of it, and of the result of that consideration he entertains encouraging hopes. He will not allow himself to believe, that when so many noble and beneficial ends may be served by our possession of an empire in the East, we shall content ourselves with the meanest and the least, and for the sake of this, frustrate all the rest. He trusts we shall dare to do justice, liberal justice, and be persuaded, that this principle will carry us to greater heights of prosperity, than the precautions of a selfish policy. Future events are inscrutable to the keenest speculation, but the path of duty is open, the time present is ours. By planting our language, our knowledge, our opinions, and our religion, in our Asiatic territories, we shall put a great work beyond the reach of contingencies; we shall probably have wedded the inhabitants of those territories to this country; but at any rate, we shall have done an act of strict duty to them, and a lasting service to mankind.

In considering the affairs of the world as under the controul of the supreme Disposer, and those distant territories, as by strange events, providentially put into our hands, is it not reasonable, is it not necessary, to conclude that they were given to us merely that we might draw an annual profit from them, but that we might diffuse among their inhabitants, long sunk in darkness, vice, and misery, the light and the benign influences of truth, the blessings of well-regulated society, the improvements and the comforts of active industry? And that in prudently and sincerely endeavouring to answer these ends, we may not only humbly hope for some measure of the same success which has usually attended serious and rational attempts for the propagation of that pure and sublime religion which comes from God, but best secure the protection of his providential government, of which we now see such awful marks in the events of the world.

In every progressive step of this work, we shall also serve the original design with which we visited India, that design still so important to this country,—the extension of our commerce. Why is it that so few of our manufactures and commodities are vended there? Not merely because the taste of the people is not generally formed to the use of them, but because they have not the means of purchasing them. The proposed improvements would introduce both. As it is, our woollens, our manufactures in iron, copper, and steel, our clocks, watches, and toys of different kinds, our glass-ware, and various other articles are admired there, and would sell in great quantities if the people were rich enough to buy them. Let invention be once awakened among them, let them be roused to improvements at home, let them be led by industry to multiply, as they may exceedingly, the exchangeable productions of their country, let them acquire a relish for the ingenious exertions of the human mind in Europe, for the beauties and refinements, endlessly diversified, of European art and science, and we shall hence obtain for ourselves the supply of four and twenty millions of distant subjects. How greatly will our country be thus aided in rising still superior to all her difficulties; and how stable, as well as unrivalled, may we hope our commerce will be, when

Mr. Grant's State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain.

when we thus rear it on right principles, and make it the means of their extension? It might be too sanguine to form into a wish, an idea most pleasing and desirable in itself, that our religion and our knowledge might be diffused over other dark portions of the globe, where nature has been more kind than human institutions.—This is the noblest species of conquest; and wherever, we may venture to say, our principles and language are introduced, our commerce will follow.

To rest in the present state of things, or to determine that the situation of our Asiatic subjects, and our connection with them, are such as they ought to be for all time to come, seems too daring a conclusion: and if a change, a great change be necessary, no reason can be assigned for its commencement at any future period, which will not equally, nay, more strongly recommend its commencement now. To say, that things may be left to their own course, or that our European settlements may prove a sufficient nursery of moral and religious instruction for the natives, will be, in effect, to declare, that there shall be no alteration, at least no effectual and safe one.

The Mahomedans, living for centuries intermixed in great numbers with the Hindoos, produced no radical change in their character; not merely beca se they rendered themselves disagreeable to their subjects, but because they left those subjects, during that whole period, as uninstructed in essential points as they found them. We are called rather to imitate the Roman conquerors, who civilized and improved the nations whom they subdued; and we are called to this, not only by the obvious wisdom which directed their policy, but by local circumstances, as well as by sounder principles and higher motives than they possessed.

The examples also of modern European nations pass in review before us. We are the fourth of those who have possessed an Indian empire. That of the Portugueze, though acquired by romantic bravery, was unsystematic and rapacious; the short one of the French was the meteor of a vain ambition; the Dutch acted upon the principles of a selfish commercial policy; and these, under which they apparently flourished for a time, have been the cause of their decline and fall. None of these nations sought to establish themselves in the affections of their acquired subjects, or to assimilate them to their manners; and those subjects, far from supporting them, rejoiced in their defeat: some attempts they made to instruct the natives, which had their use; but sordid views overwhelmed their effects. It remains for us to shew how we shall be distinguished from these nations in the history of mankind; whether conquest shall have been in our hands the means, not merely of displaying a government unequalled in India for administrative justice, kindness, and moderation, not merely of encreasing the security of the subject and prosperity of the country, but of advancing social happiness, of meliorating the moral state of men, and of extending a superior light, further than the Roman eagle ever flew.

If the novelty, the impracticability, the danger of the proposed scheme, be urged against it, these objections cannot all be consistent; and the last, which is the only one that could have weight, presupposes success. In success would lie our safety, not our danger. Our danger must lie in pursuing, from ungenerous ends, a course contracted and illiberal; but in following an opposite course, in communicating light, knowledge, and improvement, we shall obey the dictates of duty, of philanthropy, and of policy; we shall take the most rational means to remove inherent, great disorders, to attach the Hindoo people to ourselves, to ensure the safety of our possessions, to enhance continually their value to us, to raise a fair and durable monument to the glory of this country, and to encrease the happiness of the human race.

APPENDIX.

Extract from the Transactions of the Society for promoting Christian Knowledge, for the year 1795.

Appendix.

"ANOTHER letter has been received from Mr. Swartz, dated at Tanjore, February 13th, 1794, which being of a particularly interesting nature, the Society judge fit to produce at length. As moreover the Society, after forty years experience, have had constant reason to approve of Mr. Swartz's integrity and veracity as a correspondent, his zeal as a promoter of Christian knowledge, and his labours as a missionary, they take this opportunity of acknowledging his faithful services, and recommending his letter to the consideration of the Public, as containing a just statement of facts relating to the mission, believing that Mr. Swartz is incapable of departing from the truth, in the minutest particular."

To the Reverend Dr. GASKIN, Secretary to the Society for promoting Christian Knowledge.

Reverend and Dear Sir, Tanjore, February 13, 1794.

AS His Majesty's seventy-fourth regiment is partly stationed at Tanjore, and partly at Vallam, six English miles distant from Tanjore, we commonly go once in a week to Vallam to perform divine service to four companies of that regiment.

When I lately went to that place, the 210th number of a newspaper, called the Courier, Friday evening, May 24th, 1793, was communicated to me.

In that paper I found a paragraph, delivered by Mr. Montgomerie Campbell (who came out to India with Sir Archibald Campbell, in the station of a private secretary) wherein my name was mentioned in the following manner:

"Mr. Montgomerie Campbell gave his decided vote against the clause, and reprobated "the idea of converting the Gentoos. It is true, missionaries have made proselytes of the "Parriars; but they were the lowest order of people, and had even degraded the religion "they professed to embrace.

"Mr. Swartz, whose character was held so deservedly high, could not have any reason to "boast of the purity of his followers: they were proverbial for their profligacy. An instance "occurred to his recollection, perfectly in point;—he had been preaching for many hours "to this caste of proselytes, on the heinousness of theft, and in the heat of his discourse, "taken off his stock, when that and his gold buckle were stolen by one of his virtuous "and enlightened congregation. In such a description of natives, did the doctrine of the "missionaries operate. Men of high caste would spurn at the idea of changing the religion "of their ancestors."

As this paragraph is found in a public paper, I thought it would not displease the Honourable Society to make a few observations on it; not to boast (which I detest) but to declare the plain truth, and to defend my brethren and myself.

About seventeen years ago, when I resided at Tiruchinapally, I visited the congregation at Tanjore. In my road, I arrived very early at a village which is inhabited by Collaries, a set of people who are infamous for stealing; even the name of a Collary (or better, Kallen) signifieth a thief.

These Collaries make nightly excursions, in order to rob. They drive away bullocks and sheep, and whatever they can find; for which outrage, they annually pay fifteen hundred chakr, or seven hundred and fifty pagodas, to the Rajah.

Of this caste of people, many live in the Tanjore country, still more in Tondiman's country, and likewise in the Nabob's country.

When I arrived at one of those villages, called Pudaloor, I took off my stock, putting it upon a sand-bank. Advancing a little to look out for the man who carried my linen clothes, I was regardless of the stock, at which time, some thievish boys took it away. Not one grown person was present. When the inhabitants heard of the theft, they desired me to confine all those boys, and to punish them as severely as I pleased.

But I refused to do that, not thinking that the trifle which I had lost was worth so much trouble.

That such boys, whose fathers are professed thieves, should commit a theft, can be no matter of wonder.

All the inhabitants of that village were Heathens; not one Christian family was found therein.

Many of our gentlemen, travelling through that village, have been robbed.

Appendix.

The trifle of a buckle I did therefore not lose by a Christian, as Mr. Montgomerie Campbell will have it, but by Heathen boys.

Neither did I preach at that time: Mr. Montgomerie Campbell says that I preached two hours.: I did not so much as converse with any man.

This poor story totally misrepresented, is alleged by Mr. Montgomerie Campbell to prove the profligacy of Christians, whom he called, with a sneer, virtuous and enlightened people.

If Mr. Montgomerie Campbell has no better proof, his conclusion is built upon a bad foundation, and I shall not admire his logic: truth is against him.

Neither is it true, that the best part of those people who have been instructed, are Pariars. Had Mr. Montgomerie Campbell visited, even once, our church, he would have observed that more than two thirds were of the higher caste; and so is it at Tranquebar and Vepery.

Our intention is not to boast; but this I may safely say, that many of those people who have been instructed, have left this world with comfort, and with a well-grounded hope of everlasting life.

That some of those who have been instructed and baptized, have abused the benefit of instruction, is certain. But all sincere servants of God, nay even the Apostles, have experienced this grief.

It is asserted, that a missionary is a disgrace to any country. Lord Macartney, and the late General Coote, would have entertained a very different opinion. They, and many other gentlemen, know and acknowledge, that the missionaries have been beneficial to government, and a comfort to the country.

This I am able to prove, in the strongest manner. Many gentlemen who live now in England, and in this country, would corroborate my assertion.

That the Reverend Mr. Gerické has been of eminent service to Cuddalore, every gentleman, who was at Cuddalore at the time when the war broke out, knows. He was the instrument, in the hands of Providence, by which Cuddalore was saved from plunder and bloodshed.

He saved many gentlemen from becoming prisoners to Hyder, which Lord Macartney kindly acknowledged.

When Nagapatnam, that rich and popular city, fell into the deepest poverty, by the unavoidable consequences of war, Mr. Gerické behaved like a father to the distressed people of that city. He forgot that he had a family to provide for. Many impoverished families were supported by him; so that when I, a few months ago, preached and administered the sacrament in that place, I saw many who owed their, and their childrens' lives, to his disinterested care. Surely this, my friend, could not be called a disgrace to that When the Honourable Society ordered him to attend the congregation at Madras, all lamented his departure. And at Madras, he is esteemed by the governor, and many other gentlemen, to this day.

It is a most disagreeable task to speak of oneself. However, I hope that the Honourable Society will not look upon some observations which I am to make, as a vain and sinful boasting, but rather as a necessary self-defence. Neither the missionaries, nor many of the Christians, have hurt the welfare of the country.

In the time of war, the fort of Tanjore was in a distressed condition. A powerful enemy was near; the people in the Fort, numerous; and not provision even for the garrison. There was grain enough in the country, but we had no bullocks to bring it into the Fort. When the country people formerly brought paddy (rice in the husk) into the Fort, the rapacious dubashes deprived them of their due pay. Hence all confidence was lost; so that the inhabitants drove away their cattle, refusing to assist the Fort. The late Rajah ordered, nay intreated the people, by his managers, to come and help us; but all was in vain.

At last the Rajah said to one of our principal gentlemen: "We all, you and I, have lost our credit; let us try whether the inhabitants will trust Mr. Swartz." Accordingly he sent me a blank paper, empowering me to make a proper agreement with the people. There was no time for hesitation. The seapoys fell down as dead people; being emaciated with hunger; our streets were lined with dead corpses every morning; our condition was deplorable. I sent, therefore, letters, every where round about, promising to pay any one, with my own hands; and to pay them for any bullock which might be taken by the enemy. In one or two days, I got above a thousand bullocks, and sent one of our catechists, and other Christians, into the country. They went at the risk of their lives, made all possible haste, and brought into the Fort, in a very short time, eighty thousand kalams (of rice.) By this means, the Fort was saved. When all was over, I paid the people (even with some money which belonged to others) made them a small present, and sent them home.

The next year, when Colonel Braithwaite, with his whole detachment, was taken prisoner, Major Alcock commanded this Fort, and behaved very kindly to the poor starving people. We were then, the second time, in the same miserable condition. The enemy always invaded the country when the harvest was nigh at hand. I was again desired to try my former expedient, and succeeded. The people knew that they were not to be deprived of their pay, they therefore came with their cattle. But now the danger was greater, as the enemy was very near. The Christians conducted the inhabitants to proper places, surely with no small danger of losing their lives. Accordingly they wept, and went, and supplied the Fort with grain. When the inhabitants were paid, I strictly enquired whether any of the Christians had taken from them a present. They all said, No, no; as we were so regularly paid, we offered to your catechist a cloth of small value, but he absolutely refused it.

But Mr. Montgomerie Campbell says, that the Christians are profligate to a proverb.

If Mr. Montgomerie Campbell was near me, I would explain to him who are the profligate people who drain the country. When a dubash, in the space of ten or fifteen years, scrapes together two, three, or four lacks of pagodas, is not this extortion a high degree of profligacy?

Nay, government was obliged to send an order, that three of those Gentoo dubashes should quit the Tanjore country. The enormous crimes committed by them, filled the country with complaints; but I have no mind to enumerate them.

It is asserted, that the inhabitants of the country would suffer by missionaries.

If the missionaries are sincere Christians, it is impossible that the inhabitants should suffer any damage by them. If they are not what they profess to be, they ought to be dismissed.

When Sir Archibald Campbell was governor, and Mr. Montgomerie Campbell his private secretary, the inhabitants of the Tanjore country were so miserably oppressed by the manager and the Madras dubashes, that they quitted the country: of course, all cultivation ceased. In the month of June, the cultivation should commence; but nothing was done, even at the beginning of September. Every one dreaded the calamity of a famine. I entreated the Rajah to remove that shameful oppression, and to recal the inhabitants. He sent them word, that justice should be done to them; but they disbelieved his promises. He then desired me to write to them, and to assure them, that he, at my intercession, would show kindness to them. I did so. All immediately returned; and first of all, the Kallar (or as they are commonly called, Collaries) believed my word, so that seven thousand men came back on one day. The other inhabitants followed their example. When I exhorted them to exert themselves to the utmost, because the time for cultivation was almost lost, they replied in the following manner: "As you have showed kindness to us, you shall not have reason to repent of it; we intend to work night and day, to show our regard for you."

Sir Archibald Campbell was happy when he heard it; and we had the satisfaction of having a better crop than the preceding year.

As there was hardly any administration of justice, I begged and entreated the Rajah to establish justice in his country. "Well," said he, "let me know wherein my people are oppressed." I did so. He immediately consented to my proposal, and told his manager, that he should feel his indignation, if the oppression did not cease immediately. But as he soon died, he did not see the execution.

When the present Rajah began his reign, I put Sir Archibald Campbell in mind of that necessary point. He desired me to make a plan for a court of justice, which I did; but it was soon neglected by the servants of the Rajah, who commonly sold justice to the best bidder.

When the Honourable Company took possession of the country, during the war, the plan for introducing justice was re-assumed; by which many people were made happy. But when the country was restored to the Rajah, the former irregularities took place.

During the assumption, government desired me to assist the gentlemen collectors. The district towards the west of Tanjore had been very much neglected, so that the water-courses had not been cleansed for the last fifteen years. I proposed that the collector should advance five hundred pagodas to cleanse those water-courses. The gentlemen consented if I would inspect the business. The work was begun and finished, being inspected by Christians. All that part of the country rejoiced in getting one hundred thousand collums (of rice) more than before. The inhabitants confessed, that instead of one collum, they now reaped four.

No inhabitant has suffered by Christians; none has complained of it. On the contrary, one of the richest inhabitants said to me; "Sir, if you send a person to us, send us one who has learned all your ten commandments;" for he, and many hundred inhabitants, had been present when I explained the Christian doctrine to Heathens and Christians.

The inhabitants dread the conduct of a Madras dubash. These people lend money to the Rajah, at an exorbitant interest, and then are permitted to collect their money and interest, in an appointed district. It is needless to mention the consequences.

When the Collaries committed great outrages in their plundering expeditions, Seapoys were sent out to adjust matters; but it had no effect. Government desired me to inquire into that thievish business. I therefore sent letters to the head Collaries; they appeared; we found out, in some degree, how much the Tanjore, and Tondaman's, and the Nabob's Collaries had stolen; and we insisted upon restoration, which was done accordingly. At last, all gave it in writing, that they would steal no more. This promise they kept very well for eight months, and then they began their old work; however, not as before. Had that inspection over their conduct been continued, they might have been made useful people. I insisted upon (their) cultivating their fields, which they really did. But if the demands become exorbitant, they have no resource they think, but that of plundering.

At last some of those thievish Collaries desired to be instructed. I said, "I am obliged to instruct you; but I am afraid that you will become very bad Christians." Their promises were fair. I instructed them; and when they had a tolerable knowledge, I baptized them. Having baptized them, I exhorted them to steal no more, but to work industriously. After that, I visited them; and having examined their knowledge, I desired to see their work. I observed, with pleasure, that their fields were excellently cultivated. "Now," said I, "one thing remains to be done. You must pay your tribute readily, and not wait "till it is exacted by military force," which otherwise is their custom. Soon after that, I found that they had paid off their tribute exactly.

The

Appendix.

The only complaint against those Christian Collaries was, that they refused to go upon plundering expeditions, as they had done before.

Now I am well aware, that some will accuse me of having boasted. I confess the charge willingly, but lay all the blame upon those who have constrained me to commit that folly.

I might have enlarged my account; but fearing that some characters would have suffered by it, I stop here.

One thing, however, I affirm, before God and man, that if Christianity, in its plain and undisguised form, was properly promoted, the country would not suffer, but be benefited by it.

If Christians were employed in some important offices, they should, if they misbehaved, be doubly punished; but to reject them entirely, is not right, and discourageth.

The glorious God, and our blessed Redeemer, has commanded his Apostles to preach the Gospel to all nations.

The knowledge of God, and his divine perfections, and of his mercy to mankind, may be abused; but there is no other method of reclaiming mankind, than by instructing them well. To hope that the Heathens will live a good life, without the knowledge of God, is a chimera.

The praise bestowed on the Heathens of this country, by many of our historians, is refuted by a close (I might almost say, superficial) inspection of their lives. Many historical works are more like a romance than history. Many gentlemen here are astonished, how some historians have prostituted their talents by writing fables.

I am now at the brink of eternity; but to this moment I declare, that I do not repent of having spent forty-three years in the service of my Divine Master. Who knows but God may remove some of the great obstacles to the propagation of the Gospel? Should a reformation take place amongst the Europeans, it would no doubt be the greatest blessing to the country.

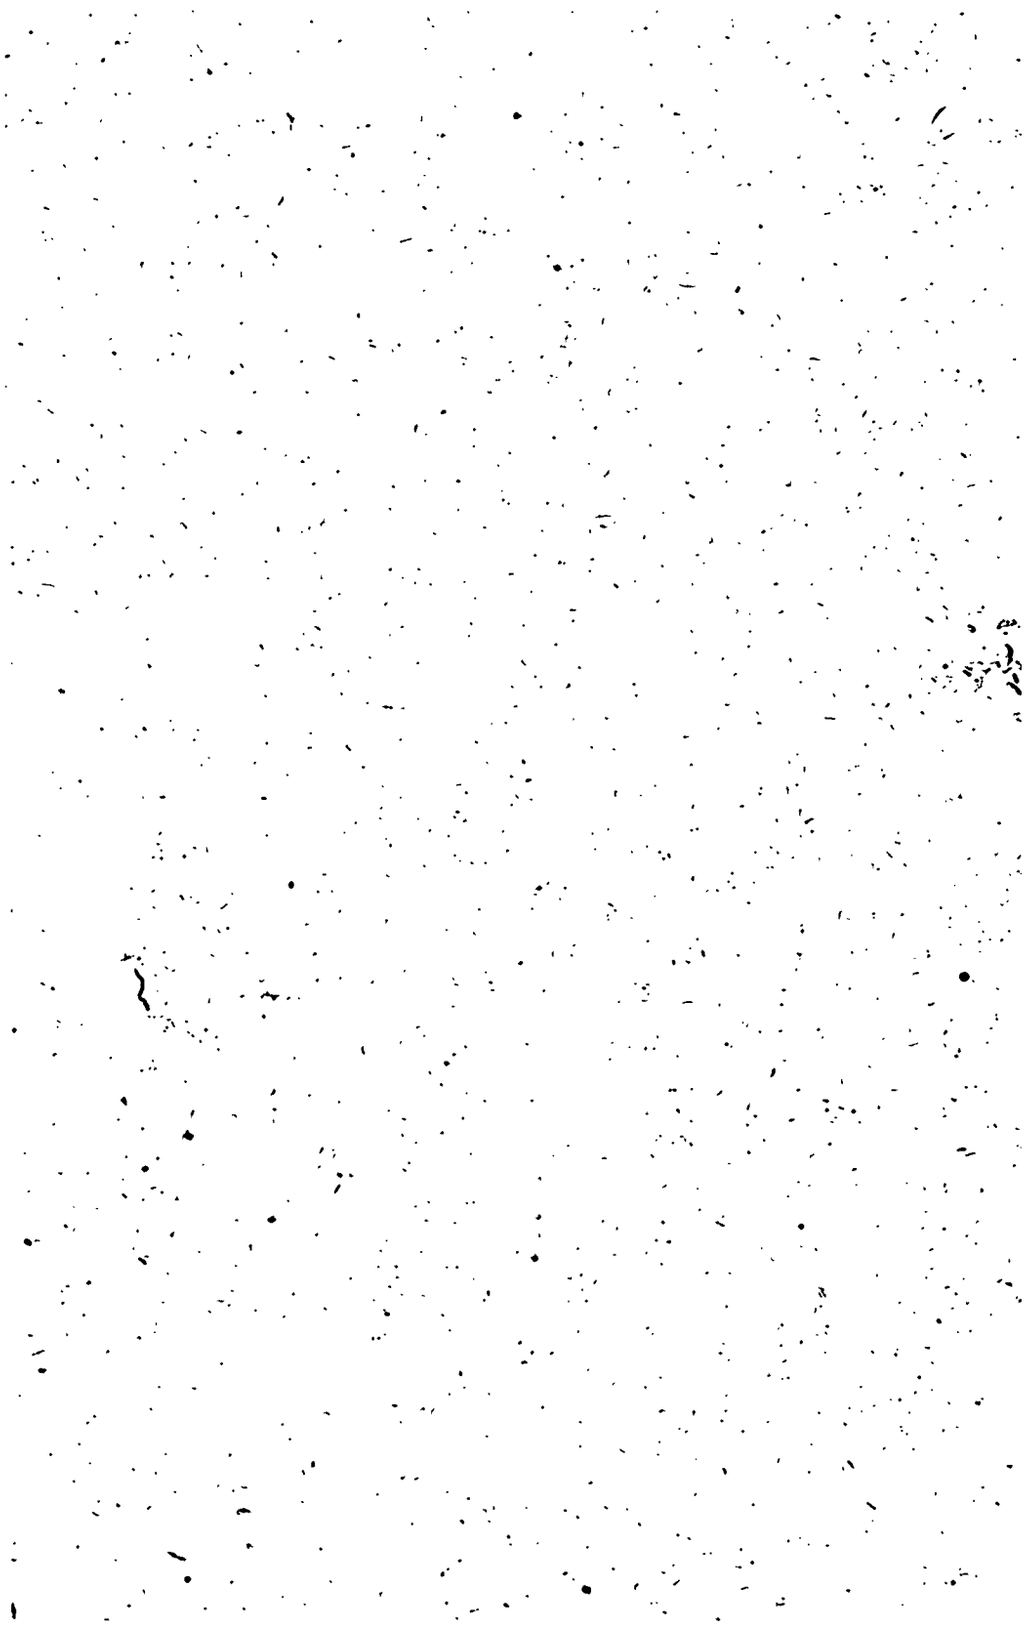
These observations I beg leave to lay before the Honourable Society, with my humble thanks for all their benefits bestowed on this work, and sincere wishes that their pious and generous endeavours to disseminate the knowledge of God and Jesus Christ, may be beneficial to many thousands.

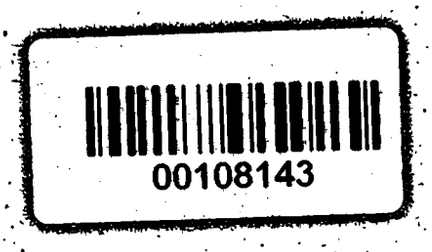
I am sincerely,

Reverend and Dear Sir,

Your affectionate Brother, and humble Servant,

C. F. SWARTZ.





00108143

Digitized with financial assistance from

NSDL
Technology, Trust & Reach

on 06 November, 2019